third book he develops the idea of the state according to its separation into different forms of government; in the fourth book he considers the several constitutions according to their differences in kind, because these exercise an influence on legislation. For legislation is dependent on the constitution, not vice versa. That is to say, constitution is the arrangement of the powers in the state, according to which the sovereignty (τὸ κάρα) is determined. The constitution is thus the soul of the state. (Politi. iv. 1, iii. 4.) The laws, on the other hand, are the determining principles, according to which the governing body governs, and holds in check those who transgress them. Aristotle distinguishes aristocracy, kingdom, and republic (πολιτεία ἢ τὸ κοινὸ προσώπωμενός δικαίωμα), and sets by the side of these the three perversions (αναγκαίως) of them: oligarchy, tyranny, democracy. These constitutions arise out of the three principles, 1, of equality, founded on the preponderance of number; 2, of inequality, which is founded either, a. on the preponderance of external strength and wealth (πλούσια, oligarchy), or b. on the preponderance of internal or spiritual strength (monarchy, aristocracy). Aristotle then, in the 5th book, considers the disturbing and preserving causes in the different constitutions, always having regard to reality and experience (Politi. iii. 17, iv. 1); and, for the determination of that form of government which is best adapted for the greatest number of states, gets this result, that in it democratical and oligarchical principles must be intermixed and united. (Politi. iv. 12.) From such a mixture of the elements of constitutions result new forms of mixed constitutions (συμβασικά), which Aristotle characterizes more closely according to the three essential functions of political power. (Politi. iv. 14, vi.) Having thus prepared the way, the philosopher proceeds to the real problem, to shew how a state can be so perfectly constituted, as to answer to the requisitions of human nature. He shews that the question, What is the best constitution? is connected with the question, What is the most desirable mode of life? (Politi. vii.1) he develops the external conditions for the realisation of the best constitution (Politi. vii. 4, &c.), which are dependent on fortune,—and then passes to the internal conditions of such a constitution, which are independent of fortune. (Politi. vii. 12, &c.) For these latter he finds the central point in the education of youth, which he therefore considers as a public concern of the state. (Politi. viii. 1.) Its object is the harmonious culture of all the physical and mental powers, which lays the foundation for that harmony of perfect virtue both in the man and in the citizen, in which the purely human develops itself in all its fulness and power. By the individual citizens of the state (Politi. viii. 18) being trained to a virtuous, moral life, virtue and morality become predominant in all the spheres of political life, and accordingly by means of politics that is completely realised, for which ethics form the ground-work; viz. human happiness depending on a life in accordance with virtue. Thus on the one hand, the science of politics is again reflected therefrom to the point from which it started—ethics, while on the other hand, inasmuch as art and oratory are included in the circle of the means by which the citizen is to be trained, it points beyond what is immediately connected with itself to the departments of

1. Rhetor.—Here we need say but little; partly because the works of Aristotle, which relate to this subject, are more generally known and read than the property philosophical writings, and partly because the subject itself is of considerably less difficulty. We therefore make only some general observations.

Rhetoric stands side by side (ἀπ' ἀστρωνομος) with dialectics, for both have to do with subjects, with which, as pertaining to no particular science, every one may make himself acquainted, and respecting which every one deems himself capable of forming a judgment. Every one considers himself, and is to a certain extent, an orator and dialectician. Rhetoric raises this routine to an artistic knowledge, by means of τεχνή, which arrives at the perception of the causes why, and the means by which, the orator, who has not been theoretically trained, attains his object. (Rhet. i. 1.) The kernel of such a theory is the argumentation by which conviction is produced. Enthymemes are the foundation (εἰσαλαίτω τῆς πεπτωκίας) of argumentation. Aristotle, as he himself says, first directed his attention to the fundamental principles of these. The object of Rhetoric is conviction, but its business (ἐργαζόμονται) consists in discovering that which awakens belief with respect to the subject in hand. (Rhet. i. 1, ὑπὸ τὸ πέντε ἐργὸν αὐτῆς, ἀλά τὸ ἱερόν τὰ υπάρχουσα πᾶσα περὶ ἐκδοτος.) Comp. Quintil. ii. 15, 19; Max. Schmidt. de legumae quo ab Arist. loco art. rhet. edita, p. 8, &c.) The means of proof (αἰσθηταὶ) therefore are what we are mainly concerned with. These are partly external (αἰσθηταὶ, &c.), partly artistic, the latter being to be described by the orator: to these belong the personal qualities (αἰσθηταὶ) of the orator himself, and the disposition of the hearers, and the mode itself in which the arguments are exhibited. From the means of proof we discover what is requisite in the orator: he must understand how to form conclusions, must possess an insight into the moral nature and virtues of man, as well as an acquaintance with the passions. (Rhet. ii. 22.) Accordingly rhetoric grows as it were out of the roots of dialectics and ethics. (i. 4.) For argumentation, example and enthymemes are in rhetoric, what induction and conclusion are in dialectics. As regards their subject matter, most enthymemes are taken from the special departments of the sciences. In the laying down of the general and particular points of view the excellence of the genuine empiricism of Aristotle, which is united with the most acute sagacity, amply displays itself, and, particularly in the treatment of the πράξεως, unfolds a rich treasure of psychological experience, which lays bare the most secret recesses of the human heart.

The several species of oratory develop themselves out of the different dispositions which may exist in the hearer of a speech. The speaker, namely, is either a διαλέκτων, i.e. listens only for the sake of artistic enjoyment, or he is one who forms a judgment respecting what is to come, or what is past: in accordance with these different characters in which the hearer appears, there result three species of oratory: the deliberative (γένος συμβουλευτικῶν), the forensic (γένος δικαστικῶν), the epideictic (γένος ἐπειδηκτικῶν). Aristotle then determines what are the essential elements of these species, and further the occasion and purposes of them. The difference of purpose again involves attention to the appropriate arguments, according as these are common to all, or particular.

The power of convincing, however, depends not merely on oratorical conclusions, but also on the credibility of the orator, and the disposition of the hearers. Therefore it is necessary to show how the favourable disposition requisite on every occasion is to be produced in the mind of the hearer. But a person must know not only to say, but how to say it. Therefore rhetoric has, by way of conclusion, to treat of oratorical expression and arrangement.

2. Poetics.—"Thou, O man, alone possessest art!" This dictum of Schiller’s is already expressed by Aristotle. (Met. i. 1.) In art the production of a work is the main matter and the main purpose, whilst the purpose of oratory, which is throughout practical, is extraneous to speech itself. The relation of art to morality and virtue is, on the side of the artist, a very slight one; for, with dispositions and sentiments, which in actions form the most important point, we have nothing to do in the practice of art, where the main thing is to produce (να προνάο), for a work of art. On the other hand, however, every art, and every work of art, exerts a moral influence, purifies and purges the stronger emotions of the soul, strengthens and elevates the mind.

Art, like nature, produces by fashioning organically, but, with consciousness (Phys. ii. 8), and its creative efforts, as well as the contemplation of these efforts, and of the work of art produced, belong to those higher exhortations of the mind (να προνάο) which have their purpose in themselves. Aristotle, indeed, in accordance with the light in which the matter was generally viewed by the ancients, reckons art amongst the higher purposes of the state and of religion (Pol. viii.), but with him it has also already the signification of an independent creation of the mind, which ennobles reality, and which again draws within its sphere religion and morality likewise.

All the several arts find a common bond of union in this, that they are all intimations (μιαναίες), i.e. all arts, epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, lyric poetry, music, orchestic (the art of dancing), painting, and statuary, strive after truth, the real essence of things, which they represent. That which distinguishes the arts from each other lies partly in the diversity of the means by which they represent, partly in the object of representation, partly in the mode of representation. According to this diversity arise the distinct differences in the arts, the species of art, and the different styles of art. How, according to Aristotle’s view, the beautiful developed and manifested itself in the separate arts, can be pointed out only with reference to poetry, because this is the only art that Aristotle (in his work περὶ τοιητικῆς) has treated of. Poetry is the product of inspiration (Rhet. iii. 7), and its means of representation is language, metrical as well as unmetered. (Poet. 1.) Improvisations form the historical starting-point for all poetry, which from its very commencement divides itself into two principal directions, that which follows the more homely, and that which follows the more exalted. This dominated on the peculiar character of the poet. A delicate perception of what is correct and appropriate, an acute faculty of observation, and a mind easily excitable and capable of inspiration (δύο εύφωνίας ὑπὸ τοιητικῆς ἐστὶν ὑπὸ μανηξ., Rhet. ii. 15 ex.) make the poet, who at the same time cannot dispense with discretion. The external form of the representation, the metre, is not decisive as to whether anything is poetry or not. The history of Herodotus reduced to metre would still remain a history. (Poet. 9.) A subject becomes poetical only through a lively, vivid mode of representation, and the principal point is the composition and arrangement of the matter, the σύνθεσις (οἱ συντάσσεις) τῶν τραγμάτων (Poet. 7*), in other words, the invention or idea, which has assumed a lively form in the poet; and this is the starting-point, and as it were the soul of poetry (φρεκὴ καὶ οἶον ψυχῆς) ὅ μέσος τῆς τραγαδίας, Poet. 7*). Poetry is more comprehensive and philosophical than history; for whilst history is restricted to individual actual facts, the poet takes higher ground, and represents in the particular that which, considered in itself, can happen at any time; that which is universally applicable and necessary. The universal in poetry, however, is not an abstract, indefinite something which manifests itself in the characteristic individuality of person by means of language and action in accordance with internal probability and necessity. (Poet. 9.) Whilst therefore in poetry everything individual, as importing something universal, is thoroughly significant, history, on the other hand, relates in chronological succession what the individual has really done, and what has happened to him. The historian is restricted as to the order, arrangement, and succession of the facts which he describes; the poet has these unrestrictedly under his dominion. With these individual features of Aristotle’s Poetics we must here content ourselves, as a complete examination of his theory of the epic and of the drama might easily lead us beyond the limits to which we are restricted.

IX. APPENDIX.

The main sources for the life of Aristotle are lost to us. The number of works on biography and literary history extant in antiquity, from which information might have been obtained respecting Aristotle, must have been immense, since out of Diogenes Laërtius alone the names of nearly 40 such writers may be collected, whose works, with the exception of single quotations, have disappeared.

With respect to Aristotle in particular, we have to regret the loss of the works of Hermippus of Smyrna, Timotheus of Athens, Demetrius of Magnesia (ὁ Μαγνησεύ), Pseudo-Aristippus, Appolodorus of Athens, Euenetus, Flavium, &c., as well as those of Aristarchus of Tenedos, Pellicum Teos, Sidon, Aristocles of Massene, Damuscius, Andronicus of Rhodes, and Ptolemaeus Philadelphus.

The scanty and confused sources still extant are the following:— 1. Diogenes Laërtius, v. 1—35; 2. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Epistola ad Ammianum de Demuthēne at Aristotele; 3. Pseudo-Ammonius, v. vita Aristotelis, by a later com-pler, according to others by Philopoemen, edited by J. Numaevius, together with an old Latin translation of the same, with some additions (Vetus translatio); 4. The short Greek biography, by an anonymous writer, published by Menage (Anonymus Menagi in Diog. Laërt. v. 35, vol. ii. p. 201, ed. Meibom.), with which the article in Suidas coincides; 5. Hesychius Milesius. These ancient biographies will be found together in the first vol. of Buhle's edition of Aristotele. Among the more modern biographies, we need mention only the works of Guarinus of Verona (a. d. 1460, Vida Aristoteles, appended to his translation of Plutarch's biographies); Patritius (Discussiones Peripateticae, Basl. 1681), a passionate opponent of Aristotle and his philosophy; Numaevius (in his commentary on Ammonius, Vida Aristoteles, Lugd. 1621); Andreas Schott (Vita comparativa Aristoteles et Democritus, Augustus Vindelic., 1603, 4to); Buhle, in his first part of his edition of Aristotle, and in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia, v. p. 273, &c.; Blakesley's Life of Aristotle; and the work entitled Aristotelia by the writer of this article. [A. S. J.]

ARISTOTELIA (Ἀριστοτέλες). 1. Of Sicily, a rhetorician who wrote against the Panegyricus of Isocrates. (Diog. Laërt. v. 35.) Some modern critics attribute to him, on very insufficient grounds, the μετεξέχεισθαι, which is printed among the works of Aristotle.

2. Of Athens, an orator and statesman, under whose name some forensic orations were known in the time of Diogenes Laërtius (v. 35), which were distinguished for their elegance.

3. Of Cyrene, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 35) as the author of a work Πενηγραφία.

4. Of Argos, a meager or dialectic philosopher. (Plut. Arat. 3, 44; Diog. Laërt. ii. 118.) He belonged to the party at Argos which was hostile to Cleomenes of Sparta, and after Cleomenes had taken possession of the town, Aristoteles contrived to get it again into the hands of the Achaeans. (Polyb. vi. 53; Plut. Cleom. 20.)

5. The author of a work Περὶ Πανομωγοίων, which is completely lost. (Diog. Laërt. v. 35.)

6. The author of a work on the Heil, which is likewise lost. (Diog. Laërt. v. 35.)

7. There are apparently three Peripatetic philosophers of the name of Aristoteles. The first is mentioned as a commentator of his great namesake (Syrian. Metaphys. xii. 55); the second, a son of Erasistratus, is mentioned by S. Empiricus (ad. Math. p. 51); and the third, a Mytilenaean, was one of the most distinguished speculative philosophers in the time of Galen. (De Consecrat. p. 552, ed. Parin.)

8. Of Chaleus in Eubaea, who is mentioned as the author of a work on Eubaea. (Πελ. Εὐβοκᾶ, Harpocrat. s. n. Αριστεία; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 568.) Some critics have been inclined to think that this Aristoteles is not a distinct person, and that the work on Eubaea ascribed to him is only another name for the Πελ. Εὐβοκᾶ of the great philosopher Aristotle. But there is no reason for such a supposition.

Ancient writers make mention of many more persons of the name of Aristoteles, respecting whom no particulars are known. Diogenes enumerates eight, including the great philosopher, and Jonsius (De Script. Hist. Phil. i. 12) no less than thirty-two persons of this name. [L. S.]

ARISTÔTILOS (Ἀριστότελος), a philosopher of the Peripatetic school. The date of his birth is not known; but from the account of Suidas, and from incidental notices in other writers, we learn that he was born at Tarcentum, and was the son of a learned musician named Spintharnus (otherwise Mnesias). (Aelian. H. A. ii. 11.) He learnt music from his father, and having been afterwards instructed by Lampus of Erythrae and Xenophilus the Pythagorean, finally became a disciple of Aristotle (Gell. iv. 11; Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 18), whom he appears to have rivalled in the variety of his studies, though probably not in the success with which he prosecuted them. According to Suidas, he produced works to the number of 453 upon music, philosophy, history, in short, every department of literature. He gained so much credit as a scholar of Aristotle, that it was expected, at least by himself, that he would be chosen to succeed him; and his disgust at the appointment of Theophrastus caused him afterwards to slander the character of his great master. This story is, however, contradicted by Aristotles (ap. Euseb. Proop. Eclog. xx. 2), who asserts that he never mentioned Aristoteles but with the greatest respect. We know nothing of his philosophical opinions, except that he held the soul to be a καρνούσα of the body (Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 10, 18; Lact. Invit. viii. 18, de Opif. Del. c. 16), a doctrine which had been already discussed by Plato (in the Phaedo) and combated by Aristotle. (De An. i. 4.)

It is only in his character as a musician that Aristoxenus appears to have deserved and acquired a reputation for real excellence; and no considerable remains of his works have come down to us except three books of ἄριστομικά στοιχεῖα, or rather, as their contents seem to show, fragments of two or three separate musical treatises. (See Burney, Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 442.) They contain less actual information on the theory of Greek music than the later treatises ascribed to Eucles, Aristotle's Quinctilanus, and others; but they are interesting from their antiquity, and valuable for their criticisms on the music of the times to which they belong. Aristoxenus, at least if we may trust his own account, was the first to attempt a complete and systematic exposition of the subject; and he aimed at introducing not only a more scientific knowledge, but also a more refined and intellectual taste than that which prevailed among his contemporaries, whom he accuses of cultivating only that kind of music which was capable of sweetness. (Aristox. p. 23, ed. Meibom.) He became the founder of a sect or school of musicians, called, after him, Aristoxeneans, who were opposed to the Pythagoreans on the question whether reason or sense should furnish the principles of musical science and the criterion of the truth of its propositions. Pythagoras had discovered the connexion between musical intervals and numerical ratios; and it had been found that the principal concords were defined by simple ratios which were either superparticular (of the form $\frac{n+1}{n}$) or multiple (of the form $\frac{n}{n}$). From this fact, he or his followers inferred, that no interval could be consonant which was defined by a ratio of a different kind; and hence they were obliged to maintain (contrary to the evidence of the senses) that such intervals as the octave and fourth (the eleventh), for example, were dissonant. Aristoxenus justly blamed them for their contempt of facts, but went into the opposite extreme of allowing too much authority to the decisions of the ear, though without denying the existence of a certain truth in the arithmetical theory (p. 33). He maintains, for instance, not only that every consonant interval added to the octave produces another consonance, which is true; but also that the fourth is equal to two tones and a half (p. 56), the falsity of which proposition is not directly apparent to the ear, but indirectly would become evident by means of the very experiment which he suggests for the confirmation of it. (See Porphyry, Com. in Ptol. Harm. in Wallis, Op. vol. iii. p. 211, and Wallis’s appendix, pp. 159, 169; Burney, n. vol. i. chap. v.; Theon Smyrn. p. 83, ed. Bulliard, and not. p. 203.)

The titles of a good many other works of Aristoxenus have been collected from various sources by Meursius and others. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 257; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. appendix, c. 12.) Among them are lives of Pythagoras, Archytas, Socrates, Plato, and other distinguished persons; and several treatises on subjects connected with music, including one Proharm. 'Orph. ces., and one Proharm. Tréc. A fragment of Pythag. stœchiæ was edited by Morelli, Ven. 1785. A collection of fragments of the other works is given in the essay by Mahn referred to below.

The three books of 'Αρμόνικα στοιχεῖα were first edited in Latin, with the Harmonics of Ptolemy, by Ant. Gogavins, Ven. 1662. The Greek text, with Alpyius and Nicomachus, by Meursius (Lugd. Bat. 1618), who, like his predecessor, seems not to have had sufficient medical knowledge for the task. The last and best edition is at present that of Melibomus, printed (with a Latin version) in the Supplements of the Stoa Praeconis (Sept. 1737). (Mahn, Diat inscription of Aristonius philosopho Peripateticus, Anst. 1793.)

CA. F. D.)

ARISTOXENUS (Ἀριστοξένους). 1. Of Selinus in Sicily, a Greek poet, who is said to have been the first who wrote in amphaeatic metres. Respecting the time at which he lived, it is expressedly stated that he was older than Epicharmus, from about n. c. 540 to 445. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plut. 487; Hephastion, ExÆvird., p. 45, ed. Guise.) 2. Aristoxenus (Chron. p. 333, ed. Mai) places him in Ol. 29 (n. c. 664), but this statement requires some explanation. If he was born in that year, he cannot have been a Selinntian, as Selinus was not founded till about n. c. 628. But Aristoxenus may perhaps have been among the first settlers at Selinus, and thus have come to be regarded as a Selinntian.

2. A Cyrenian philosopher, who appears not to have been distinguished for anything except his gluttony, whence he derived the surname of καλώς. (Athen. i. p. 7; Suid. s. v. Ἀριστοξένους.) [L. E.]

ARISTOXENUS (Ἀριστοξένους), a Greek physician, quoted by Caesius Aurelianus (Du Mora. Auct. iii. 16, p. 232), who was a pupil of Alexander Philalethes (Galen. De Difier. Pal. iv. 10, vol. viii. p. 748), and must therefore have lived about the beginning of the Christian era. He was a follower of Herophilus (ibid. c. 7. p. 744), and studied at the celebrated Herophilian school of medicine, established in Phrygia, at the village of Mem-Carus, between Laodica and Cardia. He wrote a work Ἱπποληπν Αἰθήρεια, De Herophilii Secta, of which the thirteenth book is quoted by Galen (ibid. c. 10. p. 746), and which is not now extant. (Mahnne, Diatrise de Aristoxeno, Amstel. 1793, 8vo.) [W. A. G.]

ARISTUS (Ἀρίστος), of Salamis in Cyprus, a Greek historian, who wrote a history of Alexander the Great, in which he mentioned the embassy of the Romans to Alexander at Babylon. (Aesop. Aud. vii. 16; Athen. x. p. 436; Clemens Alex. Protrept. p. 16; Strab. xiv. p. 682.) That he lived a considerable time later than Alexander, may be inferred from Strabo (xxv. p. 730), although it is impossible to determine the exact time at which he lived. Some writers are inclined to believe that Aristus, the historian, is the same person as Aristus the academic philosopher, who was a temporary and friend of Cicero, who taught philosophy at Athens, and by whom M. Brutus was instructed. This philosopher moreover was a brother of the celebrated Anthias of Acalus. But the opinion which identifies the historian and philosopher is a mere hypothesis, supported by nothing but the circumstance that both bore the same name. (Cic. Brut. 91, de Finibus. v. 5; Aesop. i. 3, ii. 4; Tuct. Quaesit. v. 8, ad Att. vi. p. 10; Plut. Brut. 2.)

ARISTYLLUS (Ἀρίστυλλος), a Greek astronomer, who appears to have lived about n. c. 233. (Plut. de Pyth. Ora. 18.) He wrote a work on the fixed stars (ἐπίγραφα ἀναλυόντα), which was used by Hipparchus and Ptolemy (Magna. Sph. v. 2), and he is undoubtedly one of the two persons of this name who wrote commentaries on Aratus, which are now lost. [L. S.]

ARIUS or ARISTUS (Ἀρίους), the celebrated heretic, is said to have been a native of Libya, and must have been born shortly after the middle of the third century after Christ. The charism of his name is Anomius. In the religious disputes which broke out at Alexandria in A. D. 306, Arius at first took the part of Meletius, but afterwards became reconciled to Peter, bishop of Alexandria, and the opponent of Meletius, who made Aries deacon. (Socin. H. E. i. 15.) After this Aries again opposed Peter for his treatment of Meletius and his followers, and was in consequence excommunicated by Peter. After the death of the latter, Achilles, his successor in the see of Alexandria, not only forgave Aries his offence and admitted him deacon again, but ordained him presbyter, A. D. 315, and gave him the charge of the church called Balsalis at Alexandria. (Ephr. Hier. vi. 68. 4.) The opinion that, after the death of Achilles, Aries himself wanted to become bishop of Alexandria, and that for this reason he was hostile to Alexander, who became the successor of Achilles, is a mere conjecture, based upon the fact, that the Theodoret (H. E. i. 2) assures Aries of envy against Alexander. The official position of Aries at Alexandria, by virtue of which he interpreted the Scriptures, had undoubtedly gained for him already.

a considérable number of followers, when in A.D. 318, the celebrated dispute with bishop Alexander broke out. This dispute had a greater and more lasting influence upon the development of the Christian religion than any other controversy. The accounts respecting the immediate occasion of the dispute differ (Epiphani. Haeres. 69. 3; So- crat. H. E. i. 5; Sozom. H. E. i. 15; Philostorg. i. 4), but all agree in stating that Alexander after having heard some reports respecting Arian's novel views about the Trinity, attacked them in a public assembly of presbyters. Hereupon Arian charged the bishop with being guilty of the errors of Sabellius, and endeavoured to defend his own opinions. He maintained that the Son is God, that God has been created by God, previous to the existence of the world and of time, by an act of God's own free will and out of nothing; that therefore the Son had not existed from all eternity; and that consequently in this respect the Son was not perfectly equal to the Father, although he was raised far above all men. This first dispute was followed by a circular letter from Alexander to his clergy, and by a second conference, but all had no effect. As in the meantime the number of Arian's followers was rapidly increasing, and as both the clergy and laity of Egypt, as well as several bishops of Syria and Asia Minor, were favourably disposed towards Arians, partly because his doctrines resembled those of Lucian, who had died a martyr about ten years before, and partly because they were captivated by Arian's insinuating letters addressed to them, Alexander, in A.D. 321, convened at Alexandria a synod of nearly one hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops. The influence of Alexander, of course, prevailed at this synod: Arians was deposed, and he and his followers were excommunicated. In order to insure the proper effect of this verdict, Alexander addressed numerous letters to foreign bishops, in which he announced to them the judgment passed upon Arian, endeavoured to refute his doctrines, and urged them to adopt his own views of the case, and not to afford any protection to the heretic. Two of these letters are still extant. (Alexander, i. 11.)

It was owing to these letters and to the extensive exertions of Arians to defend his doctrines and to win more followers, that the possibility of an amicable settlement of the question diminished more and more every day. At Alexandria the Arians regularly withdrew from the church, and had their separate places of worship; and in Palestine, whither Arian had fled from Egypt, he found a favourable reception. Here he addressed a letter, still extant (Epiphani. Haeres. 69. 6; Theodoret. H. E. i. 5; to his friend, Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedea, the most influential bishop of the time, and who himself bore a grudge against Alexander of Alexandria. Eusebius in his answer, as well as in a letter he addressed to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, expressed his perfect agreement with the views of Arians (Athanas. de Synod. § 17; Theodoret. H. E. i. 6), and even received Arian into his own house. During his stay at Nicomedea, Arian wrote a theological work called Thalēs (Σωκράτης), which is said to have been composed in the effeminate style of Sotades, and to have been written in part in the so-called Sotadic metre. [SOTADES] He also addressed a letter to bishop Alexander, in which he entered into an explanation of his doctrines, and which was signed by the clergy who had been excommunicated with him. Of his Thalēs we possess only some abstracts made by his enemy Athanasius, which are written in a philosophical and earnest tone; but they contain statements, which could not but be offensive to a believer in the divinity of Christ. These things, when compared with the spirit of Arian's letters, might lead to the belief that Athanasius in his epistle exaggerated the statements of Arian; but we must remember that Arian in his letters was always prudent and moderate, to avoid giving offence, by not showing how far his theory might be carried. On the whole, the controversy between Arians and Alexander presents no features of noble generosity or impartial character. Arian is ambitious and obstinate. Arian was as zealous in endeavouring to acquire new followers as Alexander was fierce and stubborn in his persecution. At last, in A.D. 323, Eusebius and the other bishops who were in favour of Ariusianism, assembled in council in Bithynia, and issued a circular to all the bishops, requesting them to continue their ecclesiastical communion with Arians, and to use their influence with Alexander on his behalf. But neither this step nor the permission granted by several bishops to Arians to resume his functions, as presbyter, so far as it could be done without encroachment upon the rights of Alexander, was calculated to restore peace; on the contrary, the disputes for and against Ariusianism spread so much both among the laity and clergy of Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, that in A.D. 324, the emperor Constantine thought it necessary to write a letter to Arians and Alexander in common, in which he declared the controverted point of little importance, exhorted the disputants to a speedy reconciliation, and left it to each to hold his own opinions, provided he did not disturb the outward union of the church. (Euseb. De Vit. Const. M. ii. 64, &c.) This letter was carried to Alexandria, whither Arians had returned in the meantime, by Hosius, bishop of Corduba, who was also to act as mediator, but his mission was soon frustrated by Arians, and his mission had no effect.

The disputes became more vehement from day to day, and Constantine at last saw himself obliged to convocate a general council at Nicea, A.D. 325, at which upwards of 300 bishops were present, principally from the eastern part of the empire, and among them Arian, Alexander, and his friend Athanasius. Each defended his own opinions; but Arians being the accused party was in a disadvantageous position, and a confession of faith, which he presented to the council, was torn to pieces in his presence. Athanasius was the most vehement opponent of Arians, and after long debates the council came to the resolution, that the Son of God was begotten, not made, of the same substance with the Father, and of the same essence with him (διονύσων). Arians was condemned with his writings and followers. This verdict was signed by nearly all the bishops present. Eusebius and three others, who refused to sign, were compelled by the threats of the emperor to follow the example of the rest: only two bishops, Theonas of Marmarica and Secundus of Potamais, had courage enough to share the fate of Arians and accompanied him to Illyricum whither he was exiled. At the same time an edict was issued, commanding every one, under the penalty of death, to sus-read the books of Arius, which were to be burnt, and stigmatizing the Arians with the name of Orphorynches — (from Phorpyrus, a heathen opponent of Christianity, who had nothing to do with the Arian question). The Arians at Alexandria, however, remained in a state of insurrection, and began to make common cause with the Macedonians, a sect which had likewise been condemned by the council of Nicaea, for both had to regard Alexander, and his successor Athanasius, as their common enemies.

Arius remained in Libya until A.D. 328, when Eusebius of Nicomedia and his friends used their influence at the court of Constantine, to persuade the emperor that the creed of Arius did not in reality differ from that established by the council of Nicaea. In consequence of this Arius was recalled from his exile by very gracious letters from the emperor, and in A.D. 330, had an audience with Constantine, to whom he presented a confession of faith, which consisted almost entirely of passages of the scriptures, and apparently confirmed the report which Eusebius had given of his opinions. The emperor thus deceived, granted to Arius permission to return to Alexandria. (Socrat. H. E. i. 25; Rufin. H. E. ii. 5. 1.) On the arrival of Arius in Alexandria, A.D. 331, Athanasius, notwithstanding the threats of Eusebius and the strict order of the emperor, refused to receive him into the communion of the church; for new outbreaks took place at Alexandria, and the Macedonians openly joined the Arians. (Athanas. Apolog. § 59.) Eusebius, who was still the main supporter of the Arian party, had secured his asylum in Syria, and caused the synod of Tyre, in A.D. 335, to depose Athanasius, and another synod held in the same year at Jerusalem, to revoke the sentence of excommunication against Arius and his friends. The attempt of Arius to re-establish himself at Alexandria failed notwithstanding, and in A.D. 336, he travelled to Constantinople to have a second interview with the emperor. He again presented his confession of faith, which was apparently orthodox. Hereupon Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, who had hitherto refused recognizing Arius as a member of the orthodox church, received orders from the emperor to administer to Arius, on the Sunday following, the holy communion. When the day came, Arius accompanied by Eusebius and other friends, went in a sort of triumph through the streets of Constantinople to the church. On his way thither he went aside for a moment to relieve a physical want, but he never returned: he was seized by a fainting fit and suddenly died, and his corpse was found by his friends and buried. (So- crat. H. E. i. 38; Epiph. Haeres. 69. 10; Rufin. H. E. i. 13.)

Arius must have been at a very advanced age when he died, since he is called the old Arius at the time when he began his disputes with Alexander, and he was undoubtedly worn out and exhaused by the spiritual struggles to which his life had been exposed. He is said to have been unusually tall, pale, and thin, of a severe and gloomy appearance, though of captivating and mo-
ARMINIUS.

It was in the upper Valley of the Lippe, and then covered with the deep wood of the Teutoburger Wald. Here Arminius met him, as he had promised, but with a furious assault. (Dion Cass. Ivi. 19.) The legions were in disorder, making their way through the forest, and encumbered with a heavy baggage train, when the Germans charged on all sides upon them. Night put an end to the fight, which was renewed at daybreak. But the country was almost impassable—a violent storm of wind and rain rendered it still more so—and the legions were unable to advance or retreat. Varus fell on his own sword. (Tac. Ann. i. 61.) Those who were taken alive were sacrificed at altars in the forest to the gods of the country, and the legions were cut to pieces, with the exception of a very small body, who broke through the Germans, and made their way to the Rhine.

The conformation felt at Rome is well known. (Suet. Aug. 23.) Tiberius was despacheted (A. D. 10) with a veteran army to the Rhine. But Arminius had manifestly succeeded in making that river again the barrier of the Roman power.

In the year A. D. 14, Germanicus took the command of the legions, and collected his forces on the Enns to penetrate along that river into Germany. But the party of Arminius had rapidly gathered strength. He had been joined by his uncle, Inguiomerus, a powerful chief who had hitherto fought for the invaders; and the popular feeling was so strong against his father-in-law, Segestes, still a partisan of the Romans, that he had been rescued only by the legions of Germanicus from a peace in which he had been besieged by his own tribe. It was on this occasion that the wife of Arminius fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved, with the infant boy to whom she soon after gave birth in her captivity, to swell the triumph of Germanicus at Rome. (Strabo, vii. p. 291; Tac. Ann. i. 57.) As Germanicus advanced, Arminius retired before him into the forests. He at last halted on some open ground, and allowed the Romans to attack. He then gradually withdrew his men towards a wood, on the skirts of which he had concealed strong bodies of men, whose unexpected charge threw the Romans into confusion. After an obstinate struggle, Arminius received a mortal wound, and fled into the woods. His head was afterwards found, and placed on a sled, and drew towards the Rhine. (Tac. Ann. i. 63.) One division of the Roman army under Cæcina was ordered to retire by a causeway raised over an extensive marsh, and called the Long Bridges. Arminius occupied the woody heights about the place where the bridges began; and as Cæcina halted to repair them, Arminius charged down from the hills, and the Romans were giving way when night ended the contest. The next morning, the Romans endeavoured to make their way round the border of the marsh, and when their long-extended line of march had already got into confusion, Arminius rushed down from the woods, broke the Roman line, and nearly made Cæcina prisoner; and nothing but the cleverness of the Germans for plunder, and the approach of night, saved the Romans from destruction. In the morning, Arminius urged, that the enemy, who had formed an entrenched camp during the night, should be allowed to leave their lines before they were attack ed. But he was overruled by Inguiomerus, who led the impetuous Germans to the assault. The result was what Arminius expected. As they were mounting the ramparts, they were suddenly met by a vigorous and steady charge along the whole line. They were routed and pursued with great slaughter, and the Romans made good their retreat to the Rhine. (Tac. Ann. i. 68.)

The next year the Romans made no attempt on Germany; but on the following year, A. D. 16, they appeared on the left bank of the Weser. Arminius collected his own and the neighbouring tribes on the plain of Idistavius, and there resolved to await Germanicus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 16.) It was a winding plain between the river and the neighbouring hills. A forest clear of underwood was in the rear of the main body of the Germans. Arminius with his tribe occupied some rising ground on the flank; and he seems to have chosen his ground and disposed his men with ability. But the generality of Germanicus and the discipline of the veterans prevailed. Arminius and his tribe were surrounded. He himself was badly wounded, and after making every exertion to maintain the fight, he broke through the enemy, and saved himself by the fleetness of his horse. (Tac. Ann. ii. 17.)

Germany again seemed at the mercy of the Romans. Arminius could not meet them in the field; but he had maintained the struggle long enough to save his country from subjection, till the jealousy of Tiberius recalled Germanicus, A. D. 17, and left Germany to secure the independence for which her gallant chief had so nobly struggled.

The same year that the Romans retired, Arminius was engaged with another enemy in Marcolibus (or Maribo), the king of the Suevi. He was despatched by his uncle, Inguiomerus, who was jealous of his glory, and joined his enemy. But he had attached himself, as the champion of German liberty, the powerful tribes of the Somanones and Longobardi, and a battle was fought in which he was victorious. (Tac. Ann. ii. 45.)

These successes, however, suggested to him other objects than his country's liberty. Not contented with being the chief of a free tribe, he aimed at absolute power. His countrymen rose in arms against him, and the struggle was undecided when he fell by the hands of his own relations in the 37th year of his age, A. D. 19. (Tac. Ann. ii. 83.) [A. G.]

ARNOB. [Irisus and Magamethus]

ARNE ("Apen"). I. A daughter of Aeleus, from whom the Boeotian town Arne (afterwards called Chauconia), as well as the Thessalian Arne, were believed to have derived their name. (Thuc. i. 12; Paus. ix. 40. § 3;) Müller, Orchom. p. 392; Aeleus.)

2. A woman who betrayed her native country for gold, and was therefore metamorphosed into a jackdaw. (Ov. Med. vii. 465.) [L. S.]

ARNOBUS, a native of Africa, and sometimes called the Elder, to distinguish him from a later writer of the same name, lived about the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century of our era, in the reign of Diocletian. He was at one time a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa, but afterwards, according to Jerome (Chron. ad ann. Const. M. xx.; de Vir. Illust. 79), he was called upon in his dreams to embrace Christianity, of which he had been a zealous opponent. (Arnob. adv. Gent. i. 39.) He accordingly became a convert, but was not admitted to baptism until he had proved his sincerity as a Christian. To remove all doubts as to the reality of his conversion, he wrote, while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work against the Pagans, in seven books (Libri septem aedaeus Gentes), which we still possess. The time when he wrote it, is not quite certain; some assign its composition to the years A. D. 297 and 298, but it is more probable that it was written in or shortly after the year A. D. 303, since it contains some allusions (as iv. 36) to the persecution of the Christians by Diocletian, which commenced in that year. The work is a vindication of Christianity, and the author first refutes the charges of the Pagans against the Christian religion, especially the one which was then frequently brought against it, that the sufferings and calamities of the times were only the fruits of Christianity. He then proceeds to prove, with great learning, acuteness, and eloquence, that polytheism is irreconcilable with good sense and reason, and tends to demonize mankind. In the sixth book he describes the superiority of the Christian religion; and the last contains a justification of the Christian views respecting sacrifices, and a comparison of the Christian notions of Deity and divine things with those of the Pagans.
ARNOBIUS.

In writing this work, Arnobius was evidently animated by a genuine zeal to establish the truth of Christianity, but was free from the eccentricity and enthusiasm of Tertullian. His style is plain and lucid; though animated and sometimes rhetorical, it is yet not free from harsh and barbarous expressions: he treats of his subject with calmness and dignity, and is on the whole a pleasing writer, and superior to his contemporaries. As regards his knowledge of Christianity, it is difficult to form a decided opinion, for it was either his intention to set forth only the main doctrines of Christianity against the pagan mythology, or he possessed but a limited knowledge of the Christian religion. The latter is indeed the more probable, since he wrote his work when yet a catechumen. What he says in his second book about the nature and immortality of the soul, is not in accordance with Christian views, but with those of the Gnostics, and at a later time would have been regarded as heretical. The Old Testament seems to have been altogether unknown to him, and he shows no acquaintance with the New, except so far as the history of Christ is concerned. In regard to heathen antiquity, on the other hand, its religion and modes of worship, the work exhibits most extensive and minute learning; and is one of our best sources of information respecting the religions of antiquity. It is for this reason that Vossius calls him the Varro of the early Christian writers. The arrangement of his thoughts is philosophical, though not always sufficiently strict. Arnobius is a writer worthy to be studied not only by theologians, but also by philosophers. He is not known to have written anything besides his book against the Gentiles; there are, however, some works which have sometimes been ascribed to him, though they manifestly belong to a later writer or writers of the same name. (See the following article.)

ARNOBIUS, the Younger, is usually placed about A.D. 460, and is believed to have been a bishop or presbyter in Gaul. He is known to us only as the author of one or two works of very little importance, which have sometimes been attributed to Arnobius the elder. We possess under his name an allegorical commentary on the Psalms, which is assigned to Leontius, bishop of Arles, and Rauscinus, bishop of Lyons. This commentary, though the notes are very brief, contains sufficient evidence that the author was a Semipelagian. It was first printed at Basel (1522, 4to.) together with Erasmus's commentary on Psalm ii., and was reprinted at Cologne, 1532, 8vo. A much better edition than either of these is that by L. de la Barre, Paris, 1633, 8vo., which also contains some notes by the same Arnobius on several passages of the Gospels, which had been published separately before by G. Cognant, Basel, 1545, 8vo. The commentary of Arnobius is also contained in the Bibl. Patr. (Lugdun. vol. viii.), where it is also assigned to him to write a work entitled "Alaricorum in figuris legationem," in the form of a dialogue with an Arnobius who speaks in this Alaricino are strictly those of St. Augustin, and it cannot be the work of a Semipelagian. Simond has endeavored to show, that our Arnobius the Younger is the author of the work which bears the title Prædestinatus, and which has come down to us as the production of an anonymous writer; but his arguments are not satisfactory. (Du Pin, Nouv. Bûl. des Aut. Eccl. iii. 2, p. 219; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 380, ed. Lond.; Bähr, Die Christl. Kôn. Theol. p. 378.)

ARPOXASIS (Aρπόξασις), the son of Targinas, was the ancestor, according to the Smythians, of the Scythian people, called Anchateae. (Herod. iv. 5, 6.)

ARRACHTON (Άρραχτων), of Phigalia in Arcadia, a celebrated Panentist, conquered in the Olympic games in the 52nd, 53rd and 54th Olympiads. In the last Olympiad he was unfairly killed by his antagonist, and was therefore crowned and proclaimed as conqueror, although dead. (Paus. viii. 40, § 2.) Philostratus (Imag. ii. 6) calls him Arrichion, and Africanus (ap. Euseb. Chron. p. 50) Archion.

ARRIBAEUS (Άρριβαεὺς), king or chieftain of the Macedonians of Lyncestis, is mentioned by Thucydides, in the eighth and ninth years of the Peloponnesian war, as in revolt against his sovereign, king Pericles. (Thuc. ii. 90.) It was to reduce him that Pericles sent for Brasidas (b. c. 424), and against him took place the unsuccessful joint expedition, in which Pericles deserte Brasidas, and Brasidas effected his bold and skillful

ARRIA GENIS. The name of Arria does not occur till the first century A.D., but is rather common under the emperors. The coins of this gens which are extant, of which a specimen is given below, bear the name Q. Arrius Secundus; but it is quite uncertain who he was. On the reverse is a spear between a crown of laurel and a kind of altar. (Eckhel, v. p. 143.)

ARRIA'NIUS (Ἀρραῖνος). 1. A Greek poet, who, according to Suidas (s. a.), made a Greek translation in hexameter verse of Virgil's Georgics, and wrote an epic poem on the exploits of Alexander the Great (Ἀλέξανδρος), in twenty-four rhapsoodies, and a poem on Attalus of Pergamus. This last statement is, as some critics think, not without difficulties, for, it is said, it is not clear how a poet, who lived after the time of Virgil, could write a poem on Attalus of Pergamus, unless it was some of the later descendants of the family of the Attal. But it might as well be said, that no man can write a poem upon another unless he be his contemporary. It is, however, not improbable that Suidas may have confounded two poets of the same name, or two poets Arianus and Arrianus, the former of whom is known to have written an Alexandrian. [Arianus.]

2. A Greek historian, who lived at, or shortly after, the time of Maximin the younger, and wrote a history of this emperor and the Gordiani. It is not improbable that he may be the same as the L. Annius Arrianus, who is mentioned as consul in A. D. 243. (Capitol. Maximin. Jan. 7, Tres Gorg. 2.)

3. A Greek astronomer, who probably lived as early as the time of Eratosthenes, and who wrote a work on meteors, of which a fragment is preserved in Iambus Philoponus's Commentary on Aristotel's Meteorologica. He also wrote a little work on comets, to prove that they harboured neither good nor evil. (Agatharchid. op. Phot. p. 460, b. ed. Bekker.) Some writers ascribe the latter work to Arrianus of Nicomedia. A few fragments of it are preserved in Stobaeus. (Eclog. Phys. i. 29 and 30.)

4. Of Nicomedia in Bithynia, was born towards the end of the first century after Christ. He was a pupil and friend of Epictetus, through whose influence he became a zealous and active admirer of the Stoic philosophy, and more especially of the part of the system. He first attracted attention as a philosopher by publishing the lectures (Σχολ kont) of his master. This he seems to have done at Athens; and the Athenians were so much delighted with them, that they honoured him with their franchise. Arrian, as we shall see hereafter, had chosen Xenophon as his model in writing, and the Athenians called him the young Xenophon, either from the resemblance of his style to that of Xenophon, or more probably from the similarity of his connexion with Epithectetus, to that which existed between Xenophon and Socrates. (Photius, 17. b, ed. Bekker, Suidas,
s. v. Ἀριανὸς.) In A. D. 124, he gained the friendship of the emperor Hadrian during his stay in Greece, and he received from the emperor's own hands the broad purple, a distinction which conferred upon him not only the Roman citizenship, but the right to hold any of the great offices of state in the Roman empire. From this time Ar-rian assumed the praenomen Flavius. In A. D.
138, he was appointed praefect of Cappadocia, which was invaded, the year after, by the Alani or Massagetae. He defeated them in a decisive battle, and added to his reputation of a philosopher that of a brave and skilful general. (Dion Cassius, lxxv. 13.) Under Antoninus Pius, the successor of Hadrian, Arrian was promoted to the consulship, A. D. 146. In his later years he apppears to have withdrawn from public life, and from about A. D. 150, he lived in his native town of Nicomedea, as priest of Demeter and Persephone (Phot. p. 73, b.), devoting himself entirely to study and the composition of historical works.
He died at an advanced age in the reign of M.
 Aurelius. Dion Cassius is said to have written a life of Arrian shortly after his death, but no part of it has come down to us. (Suid. s. v. Αριανὸς.)

Arrian was one of the most active and best versed historians of his time. He seems to have perceived from the commencement of his literary career
a resemblance between his own relation to Epithectetus and that of Xenophon to Socrates; it was his endeavour for a long time to carry out that resemblance, and to be to Epithecus what Xenophon had been to Socrates. With this view he published 1. the philosophical lectures of his master (Διατριβὴν ἐπιτεχνου) in eight books (Phot. p. 17, b.), the first half of which is still extant. They were first printed by Trinacelli, 1553, and afterwards

Trapezus, whence he proceeds to Dioscurias, the Cimmerian and Thracian Bosporum, and Byzantium. This Periplus has come down to us together with two other works of a similar kind, the one a Periplus of the Erythraeean, and the other a Periplus of the Euxine and the Palaus Maeotis. Both these works also bear the name of Arrian, but they become undoubtedly to a later period. These Periplus were first printed, with other geographical works of a similar kind, by S. Gelenius, Basle, 1533, and somewhat better by Struck, Geneva, 1577. They are also contained in the collection of the minor works of Arrian by Blanchard (Amsterdam, 1683 and 1750). The best editions are in Hudson's Geographia Minore, vol. i., and in Gall's and Hoffmann's collections of the minor Geographers.

It seems to have been about the same time that Arrian wrote, IX. a work on Tactics (Ἀθογος παπακτων or τεχνη τακτικην). What we now possess under this name has been only a section of the whole work, as it treats of scarcely anything else than the preparatory exercises of the cavalry; but this subject is discussed with great judgment, and fully shows the practical knowledge of the author. The fragment is printed in Scheffer's collection of ancient works on tactics (Upsala, 1664), and better in Blanchard's collection of the minor works of Arrian.

The greatest literary activity of Arrian occurs in the latter period of his life, which he devoted wholly to the composition of historical works. Their number was not smaller than their importance; but all of these later productions are now lost, and some of them seem to have fallen into oblivion at an early time; for Photius states, that there were several works of Arrian of which he has no knowledge. There are only the smaller works, such as—X. A Life of Dion (Phot. p. 73, b.), XI. A Life of Timoleon (Phot. τ. c.), and XII. A Life of Tiliborus, a notorious Asiatic robber of the time (Lucian, Alloc. 2), we have mention of the following great works: XIII. A History of the successors of Alexander the Great (τα μετα Αμελετου), in ten books, of which an abstract, or rather an enumeration of contents, is preserved in Photius (Cod. 92). XIV. A History of the Parthians (Παρθικα), in 17 books (Phot. p. 17, a.), the main subject of which was their wars with the Romans, especially under Trajan. XV. A History of Bithynia (Βιθυνια), in eight books. (Phot. Cod. 93; comp. p. 17, a.). This work began in the mythical age, and carried the history down to the time when Bithynia became united with the Roman empire, and in it the author mentioned several events connected with his own life. From a quotation in Eustathius (ad Hom. II. viii. p. 694), who seems to have had the work before him, it is highly probable that it was written in the Ionic dialect. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. II. iv. p. 490, v. 505, xv. p. 1017.) XVI. A History of the Alani (Ἀλανων) or τα κεκτημενα Αλανων, Phot. p. 17, a.). A fragment entitled ηεραγας κατ' Αλανων, describing the plan of the battle against the Alani, was discovered in the seventeenth century at Milan: it seems to have belonged to the History of the Alani. It is printed in the collections of Scheffer and Blanchard above referred to.

A collection of all the works of Arrian was edited by Boruik, Lemgo, 1792-1811, 8 vols. 8vo., which however has no merit at all. (Saint Croix, Examen crit. des Anciens Historiens d'Alexandre la Grand, Paris, 1804, p. 88, &c.; Ellendt, Do Arripractice the annual income of 250,000 sesterces (about 1952. 2s. 6d.). This may give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. [W. A. G.]

ARRIUS. 1. ARRNIUS, proscribed by the triumvirs, and killed, n. c. 43. His son escaped, but perished at sea, and his wife killed herself by voluntary starvation, when she heard of the death of her son. (Appian, B. C. iv. 21.)

2. ARRNIUS, was also proscribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, but escaped to Pompey, and was restored to the state together with Pompey. (Appian, B. Civ. 46; Vell. Pat. ii. 77.) This is probably the same Arrnius who commanded the left wing of the fleet of Octavius at the battle of Actium, n. c. 31. (Vell. Pat. ii. 85; comp. Plut. Ant. 66.) There was a L. Arrnius, consul in n. c. 22 (Dion Cass. liv. 1), who appears to be the same person as the one mentioned above, and may perhaps also be the same as the L. Arrnius, the friend of Trebius, whom Cicero mentions (ad Fam. vii. 18) in n. c. 53.

3. L. ARRNIUS, son of the preceding, consul in n. c. 6. Augurias was said to have declared in his last illness, that Arrnius was not unworthy of the empire, and would have been able to seize it, if an opportunity presented. This, as well as his riches, talents, and reputation, rendered him an object of suspicion to Tiberius. In a. d. 15, when the Tiber had flooded a great part of the city, he was appointed to take measures to restrain it within its bed, and he consulted the senate on the subject. The province of Spain had been assigned to him, but Tiberius, through jealousy, kept him at Rome ten years after his appointment, and obliged him to govern the province by his legates. He was accused on one occasion by Arrius, and was acquitted, and his accusers punished. He was subsequently charged in a. d. 37, as an accomplice in the crimes of Albusellius; and though his enemies wished him to delay his death, as Tiberius was in his last illness, and could not recover, he refused to listen to their advice, as he knew the wickedness of Caligula, who would succeed to the empire, and accordingly put himself to death by opening his veins. (Tac. Ann. i. 8, 13, 76, 78, vi. 27, Hist. ii. 65, Ann. vi. 5, 7, 47, 48; Dion Cass. iv. 25, ivii. 27.)

It was either this Arrnius or his father, in all probability, who wrote a history of the first Parthian war, in which he imitated the style of Sallust. (Sene. Epist. 114.)

ARRIUS STELLA. [Stella.]

 ARRNIUS. 1. C. ARRNIUS, son of M. Arrnius, was the name of the founder of the Parthian empire, which was also borne by all his successors, who were hence called the Arsacidæ. Pett (Etymologic. Peregrinum, ii. p. 173) supposes that it signifies the "Shah or King of the Ari," but it occurs as a Persian name long before the time of the Parthian kings. Aeschylus (Pers. 397) speaks of an Arsaces, who perished in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece; and Ctesias (Pers. cc. 49, 53, 57, ed. Lion) says, that Arsaces was the original name of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

ARSACES, I., is variously represented by the ancient writers as a Scythian, a Bactrian, or a Parthian. (Steb. xi. p. 51; Arrini, op. Phot. Cod. 68, p. 17, ed. Belkher; Herod. vi. 2; Moses Chor. I. 7; Justin (xii. 4) says, that he was of uncertain origin. He seems however to have been of the Scythian race, and to have come from the neighbourhood of the Oenus, as Strabo says, that he was accompanied in his undertaking by the Parthi Dræa, who had migrated from the great race of the Scythian Dræa, dwelling above the Palus Maectis, and who had settled near the Oenus. But from wherever country the Parthians may have come, they are represented by almost all ancient writers as Scythians. (Curt. vi. 2; Justin, xii. 1; Plut. Crass. 24; Isidor. Ortg. ix. 2.) Arseses, who was a man of approved valour, and was accustomed to live by robbery and plunder, invaded Parthia with his band of robbers, defeated Andragoras, the governor of the country, and obtained the royal power. This is the account given by Justin (i. c.), which is in itself faithful and probable, but different from the common one which is taken from Arrian. According to Arrian (ap. Plot. Cod. 59), there were two brothers, Arseses and Tiridates, the descendants of Arseses, the son of Phriapitus. Pherecles, the satrap of Parthia in the reign of Antiochus II., attempted to violate Tiridates, but was slain by his brother Arseses, who induced the Parthians in consequence to revolt from the Syrians. The account of Arrian in Synecclus (p. 284) is again different from the preceding one preserved by Phorus; but it is impossible to determine which has given the account of Arrian most faithfully. According to Synecclus, Arrian stated that the two brothers Arseses and Tiridates, who were descended from Artaxerxes, the king of the Persians, were satraps of Bactria at the same time as the Macedonian Agathocles governed Persia (by which he means Phthia) as Epch. Agathocles had an unnatural passion for Tiridates, and was slain by the two brothers. Arseses then became king, reigned two years, and was succeeded by his brother Tiridates, who reigned 37 years. The time, at which the revolt of Arseses took place, is also uncertain. Apianus (Syr. 65) places it at the death of Antiochus II., and others in the reign of his successor, Seleucus Callinicus. According to the statement of Arrian quoted above, the revolt commenced in the reign of Antiochus II., which is in accordance with the date given by Eusebius, who fixes it at B.C. 250, and which is also supported by other authorities. (Clint. P. H. vol. iii. sub anno 250.) Justin (xii. 4, 5), who is followed in the main by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxviii. 6), ascribes to Arseses I. many events, which probably belong to his successor. According to his account Arseses first conquered Hyrcania, and then prepared to make war upon the Bactrian and Syrian kings. He concluded, however, a peace with Theodorus, king of Bactria, and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the successor of Antiochus II. in a great battle, the anniversary of which was ever after observed by the Parthians, as the commencement of their liberty. According to Pseudo-Eusebius (ap. Athen. iv. p. 153 a.), Seleucus was taken prisoner in a second expedition which he made against the Parthians, and detained in captivity by Arseses for many years. After these events Arseses devoted himself to the internal organisation of his kingdom, built a city, called Dara, on the mountain Zaphoetenon, and died in a mature old age. This account is directly opposed to the one given by Arrian, already referred to (ap. Syneccl. i. c.), according to which Arseses was killed after a reign of two years and was succeeded by his brother. Arrian has evidently confounded Arseses I. and II., when he says that the former was succeeded by his son. This statement we must refer to Arseses II. Arseses II., Tiridates, reigned, as we have already seen, 37 years, and is probably the king who defeated Seleucus. Arseses III., Artabanus I., the son of the preceding, had to resist Antiochus III. (the Greck), who invaded his dominions about B.C. 212. Antiochus at first met with some success, but was unable to subdue his country, and at length made peace with him, and recognized him as king. (Polyb. x. 27—31; Justin, xii. 5.) The reverse of the annexed coin represents a Parspect, and gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage; but the marriage appears not to have been solemnized till the accession of his son Phraatas II. Mithridates died during the captivity of Demetrius, between a. c. 138 and 130. He is described as a just and upright prince, who did not give way to pride and luxury. He introduced among his people the best laws and usages, which he found among the nations he had conquered. (Justin, xli. 6; Oros. v. 4; Strab. xi. pp. 516, 517, 524, &c.: Appian, Syr. 67; Justin, xxxvi. 1, xxxviii. 9; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 9; 1 Macrob. c. 14; Diod. Sic. p. 597, ed. Wess.) The reverse of the annexed coin has the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΑΠΙΑΛΑΝΟΣ.

ARSACES VII., PHRAATSES II., the son of the preceding, was attacked by Antiochus VII. (Sidetes), who defeated Phraates in three great battles, but was at length conquered by him, and lost his life in battle, a. c. 128. [See p. 199, a.] Phraates soon met with the same fate. The Scythians, who had been invited by Antiochus to assist him against Phraates, did not arrive till after the fall of the former; but in the battle which followed, the Greeks whom Phraates had taken in his service, deserted from him, and revenged the ill-treatment they had suffered, by the death of Phraates and the destruction of his army. (Justin, xxxviii. 10, xlii. 1.) The reverse of the annexed coin has the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΘΕΟΠΑΙΟΤΟΡΟΣ ΝΙΚΑΤΟΡΟΣ.

ARSACES VIII., ARTABANUS II., the youngest brother of Arsaces VI., and the youngest son of Arsaces IV., and consequently the uncle of the preceding, fell in battle against the Thogarri or Tochari, apparently after a short reign. (Justin, xlii. 2.)

ARSACES IX., MITHRIDATES III., the son of the preceding, prosecuted many wars with success, and added many nations to the Parthian empire, whence he obtained the surname of Great. He defeated the Scythians in several battles, and also carried on war against Artavasdes, king of Armenia. It was in his reign that the Romans first had any official connection with Parthia. Mithridates sent an ambassador, Orubazanes, to Sulla, who had come into Asia a. c. 92, in order to restore Ariobarzanes I. to Cappadoce, and requested alliance with the Romans, which seems to have been granted. (Justin, xlii. 2; Plut. Sulla, 5; Justin (xlii. 4) has confounded this king with Mithridates III., i.e. Arsaces XIII.

ARSACES X., MNASERCES? The successor of Arsaces IX. is not known. Vaillant conjectures that it was the Mnaserces mentioned by Lucian (Macrob. 16), who lived to the age of ninety-six; but this is quite uncertain.

ARSACES XI., SANAPROCES, as he is called on coins. Phileon calls him Sinatracces; Appian, Sintrius; and Lucian, Simatrocles. He had lived as an exile among the Scythian people called Sacaianos, and was placed by them upon the throne of Parthia, when he was already eighty years of age. He reigned seven years, and died while Lucullus was engaged in the war against Tigranes, about a. c. 76. (Lucian, Macrob. 15; Phileon, ap. Phot. Cod. 57, p. 84, ed. Bekker; Appian, Mithr. 101.)

ARSACES XII., PHRAATSES III., surnamed Οΐςα (Phileon, l.c.), the son of the preceding. Mithridates of Pontus and Tigranes applied to Phraates for assistance in their war against the Romans, although Phraates was at enmity with Tigranes, because he had deprived the Parthian empire of Nisibis and part of Mesopotamia. Among the fragments of Sallust (Hist. lib. iv.) we have a letter purporting to be written by Mithridates to Phraates on this occasion. Lucullus, as soon as he heard of this embassy, also sent one to Phraates, who dismissed both with fair promises, but according to Dion Cassius, concluded an alliance with the Romans. He did not however send any assistance to the Romans, and eventually remained neutral. (Memnon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 229, ed. Bekker; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 1, 3, comp. 6; Appian, Mithr. 97; Plut. Lucull. 30.) When Pompey succeeded Lucullus in the command, a. c. 66, he renewed the alliance with Phraates, to whose court meantime the youngest son of Tigranes, also called Tigranes, had fled after the murder of his two brothers by their father. Phraates gave the young Tigranes his daughter in marriage, and was induced by his son-in-law to invade Armenia. He advanced as far as Artaxata, and then returned to Parthia, leaving his son-in-law to besiege the city. As soon as he had left Armenia, Tigranes attacked his son and defeated him in battle. The young Tigranes then fled to his grandfather Mithridates, and afterwards to Pompey, when he found the former was unable to assist him. The young Tigranes conducted Pompey against his father, who surrendered on his approach. Pompey then attempted to reconcile the father and the son, and promised the latter the sovereignty of Sophanene; but as he shortly after offended Pompey, he was thrown into chains, and reserved for his triumph. When Phraates heard of this, he sent to the Roman general to demand the young man as his son-in-law, and to propose that the future should be the boundary between the Roman and Parthian dominions. But Pompey merely replied, that Tigranes was desired to his father than his father-in-law, and that they could determine the boundary in accordance with what was just. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 28, 34—36; Plut. Pomp. 33; Appian, Syr. 104, 105.) Matters now began to assume a threatening aspect between Phraates and Pompey, who had deeply injured the former by refusing to give him his usual title of "king of kings." But although Phraates marched into Armenia, and sent ambassadors to Pompey to bring many charges against him, and Tigranes, the ARSACES.

Armenian king, implored Pompey's assistance, the Roman general judged it more prudent not to enter into war with the Parthians, alleging as reasons for declining to do so, that the Roman people had not assigned him this duty, and that Mithridates was still in arms. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 6, 7; Plut. Pomp. 36, 39.) Phraates was murdered soon afterwards by his two sons, Mithridates and Orodes. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 56.)

ARSACES XIII., MITHRIDATES III., the son of the preceding, succeeded his father apparently during the Armenian war. On his return from Armenia, Mithridates was expelled from the throne, on account of his cruelty, by the Parthian senate, as it is called, and was succeeded by his brother Orodes. Orodes appears to have given Medin to Mithridates, but to have taken it from him again; whereupon Mithridates applied to the Roman general, Gabinins, in Syria, n. c. 58, who promised to restore him to Parthia, but soon after relinquished his design in consequence of having received a great sum from Tepolco to place him upon the throne of Egypt. Mithridates, however, seems to have raised some troops; for he subsequently obtained possession of Babylon, where, after sustaining a long siege, he surrendered himself to his brother, and was immediately put to death by his orders. (Justin, xiii. 4; Dion Cass. xxxix. 50; Appian, Syr. 51; Joseph. B. J. i. 8, 7.)

ARSACES XIV., ORODES I., the brother of the preceding, was the Parthian king, whose general Surena defeated Cnæus and the Romans, in n. c. 53. [Cnæus.] The death of Cnæus and the destruction of the Roman army spread universal alarm through the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. Orodes becoming jealous of Surena, put him to death, and gave the command of the army to his son Pacorus, who was then still a youth. The Parthians, after obtaining possession of all the country east of the Euphrates, entered Syria, in n. c. 51, with a small force, but were driven back by Cassius. In the following year (n. c. 50) they again crossed the Euphrates with a much larger army, which was placed nominally under the command of Pacorus, but in reality under that of Osaces, an experienced general. They advanced as far as Antioch, but unable to take this city marched against Antiochensis, near which they were defeated by Cassius. Cnæus was killed in the battle, and Pacorus thereupon withdrew from Syria. (Dion Cass. xl. 28, 29; Cic. ad Att. v. 18, 21; Paus. xv. 1.) Bibulus, who succeeded Cassius in the command in the same year, induced Ormodoctes, one of the Parthian satraps, to revolt from Orodes, and proclaim Pacorus king (Dion Cass. xl. 30), in consequence of which Pacorus became suspected by his father and was recalled from the army. (Justin, xiii. 4.) Justin (l. c.) seems to have made a mistake in stating that Pacorus was recalled before the defeat of the Parthians by Cassius. On the breaking out of the war between Caesar and Pompey, the latter applied to Orodes for assistance, which he promised on condition of the cession of Syria; but as this was refused by Pompey, the Parthian king did not send him any troops, though he appears to have been in favour of his party rather than of Caesar's. (Dion Cass. xli. 55; Justin, l. c.) Caesar had intended to invade Parthia in the year in which he was assassinated, n. c. 44; and in the civil war which followed, Brutus and Cassius sent Labienus, the son of Caesar's general, T. Labienus, to Orodes to solicit his assistance. This was promised; but the battle of Philippi was fought, and Brutus and Cassius fell (n. c. 42), before Labienus could join them. The latter now remained in Parthia. Meanwhile Antony had obtained the East in the partition of the Roman world, and consequently the conduct of the Parthian war; but instead of making any preparations against the Parthians, he retired to Egypt with Cleopatra. Labienus advised the Parthian monarch to seize the opportunity to invade Syria, and Orodes accordingly placed a great army under the command of Labienus and Pacorus. They crossed the Euphrates in n. c. 40, overran Syria, and defeated Saxa, Antony's quæstor. Labienus penetrated into Cilicia, where he took Saxa prisoner and put him to death; and while he was engaged with a portion of the army in subduing Asia Minor, Pacorus was prosecuting conquests with the other part in Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine. These successes at length roused Antony from his inactivity. He sent against the Parthians Ventidius, the eldest of his legates, who soon changed the face of affairs. He defeated Labienus at Mount Tauros in n. c. 39, and put him to death when he fell into his hands shortly after the battle. By this victory he recovered Cilicia; and by the defeat shortly afterwards of Pharnaces, one of the Parthian generals, he also regained Syria. (Dion Cass. xliv. 24—41; Veil. Pat. ii. 76; Liv. Epit. 127; Flor. iv. 9; Plut. Anton. c. 53; Appian, B. C. v. 63.) In the following year, n. c. 38, Pacorus again invaded Syria with a still larger army, but was completely defeated in the district called Cyrrhestica. Pacorus himself fell in the battle, which was fought on the 9th of June, the very day on which Crassus had fallen, fifteen years before. (Dion Cass. xlix, 19, 20; Plut. Anton. c. 34; Liv. Epit. 128; Orat. vi. 18; Justin, l. c.) This defeat was a severe blow to the Parthian monarchy, and was deeply felt by the aged king, Orodes. For many days he refused to take food, and did not utter a word; and when at length he spoke, he did nothing but call upon the name of his dear son Pacorus. Weighed down by grief and age, he shortly after surrendered the crown to his son, Phraates, during his life-time. (Justin, l. c.; Dion Cass. xlix. 23.) The inscription on the annexed coin is ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΝ ΑΡΣΑΚΟΥ ΕΤΕΡΡΕΤΟΥ ΕΠΙ- ΦΑΝΟΥΣ ΦΑΛΑΣΙΝΟΥ.

ARSACES XV., PHRAATES IV., who is described as the most wicked of the sons of Orodes, commenced his reign by murdering his father, his thirty brothers, and his own son, who was grown up, that there might be none of the royal family whom the Parthians could place upon the throne in his stead. In consequence of his cruelty many of the Parthian nobles fled to Antony (n. c. 37). and among the rest Mnaeses, who was one of the most distinguished men in Parthia. At the instigation of Mnaeses, Antony resolved to invade Parthia, and promised Mnaeses the kingdom. Phraates, alarmed at this, induced Mnaeses to return to him; but Antony notwithstanding persevered in his intention of invading Parthia. It was not, however, till late in the year (n. c. 30) that he commenced his march, as he was unable to tear himself away from Cleopatra. The expedition was a perfect failure; he was deceived by the Armenian king, Artavasdes, and was induced by him to invade Media, where he laid siege to Piuspi or Pratna. His legate, Statius, meantime was cut off with 10,000 Romans; and Antony, finding that he was unable to take the town, was at length obliged to raise the siege and retire from the country. In his retreat through Media and Armenia he lost a great number of men, and with great difficulty reached the Araxes with a part of his troops. (Dion Cass. xiii. 25—31; Plut. Ant. cc. 37—51; Strab. xi. p. 523, &c.; Liv. Epit. c. 30.)

The breaking out of the civil war soon afterwards between Antony and Octavianus compelled the former to give up his intention of again invading Parthia. He formed, however, an alliance with the king of Media against the Parthians, and gave to the former part of Armenia which had been recently conquered. But as soon as Antony had withdrawn his troops in order to oppose Octavianus, the Parthian king overran both Media and Armenia, and placed upon the Armenian throne Artaxias, the son of Artavasdes, whom Antony had deposed. (Dion Cass. xiii. 44.)

Meantime the cruelties of Phraates had produced a rebellion against him. He was driven out of the country, and Tiridates proclaimed king in his stead. Phraates, however, was soon restored by the Scythians, and Tiridates fled to Augusta, carrying with him the youngest son of Phraates. Hereupon Phraates sent an embassy to Rome to demand the restoration of his son and Tiridates. Augustus, however, refused to surrender the latter; but he sent back his son to Phraates, on condition of his surrendering the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the war with Crassus and Antony. They were not, however, given up till three years afterwards (n. c. 29), when the visit of Augustus to the east appears to have alarmed the Parthian king. Their restoration caused universal joy at Rome, and was celebrated not only by the poets, but by festivals, the erection of a triumphal arch and temple, and other ornaments. Coins also were struck to commemorate the event, on one of which we find the inscription Signis Rex. (Dion Cass. li. 18, iii. 35, iv. 3; Justin, xiii. 5; Suet. Aug. 21; Hor. Epist. i. 18, 56; Curn. iv. 16, 6; Ovid. Trist. ii. 1. 228, Fast. vi. 467, Ar. Am. i. 179, &c.; Propert. ii. 10, iii. 4, iii. 5, 49, iv. 679; Eichk. vi. pp. 94—97.) Phraates also sent to Augustus as hostages his four sons, with their wives and children, who were carried to Rome. According to some accounts he delivered them up to Augustus, not through fear of the Roman power, but lest the Parthians should appoint any of them king in his stead, or according to others, through the influence of his Italian wife. Augustus then created a fifth son, Phraatoes. (Tac. Ann. ii. 1; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2, § 4; Strab. xvi. p. 748.) In A.D. 2, Phraates took possession of Armenia, and expelled Artavasdes, who had been appointed king by Augustus, but was compelled soon after to give it up again. (Dion Cass. iv. 11; Vell. ii. 101; Tac. Ann. ii. 4.) He was shortly afterwards poisoned by his wife Thermusa, and his son Phraates. (Joseph. l. c.)

The coin given under Arseses XIV. is assigned by most modern writers to this king.

Arsaces XVI., Phraates, reigned only a short time, as the murder of his father and the report that he committed incest with his mother made him hated by his subjects, who rose in rebellion against him and expelled him from the throne. The Parthian nobles then elected as king Orodès, who was of the family of the Arsacidae. (Joseph. l. c.)

Arsaces XVII., Orodès II., also reigned only a short time, as he was killed by the Parthians on account of his cruelty. Upon his death the Parthians applied to the Romans for Vonones, one of the sons of Phraates IV., who was accordingly granted to them. (Joseph. l. c.; Tac. Ann. ii. 1.)

Arsaces XVIII., Vonones I., the son of Phraates IV., was not more liked by his subjects than his two immediate predecessors. His long residence at Rome had rendered him more a Roman than a Parthian, and his foreign habits and manners produced general dislike among his subjects. They therefore invited Artabanus, king of Media, who also belonged to the family of the Arsacidae, to take possession of the kingdom. Artabanus was at first defeated, but afterwards drove Vonones out of Parthia, who then took refuge in Armenia, of which he was chosen king. But, threatened by Artabanus, he soon fled into Syria, in which province the Roman governor, Creticus Silanus, allowed him to reside with the title of king. (a. d. 15.) Two years afterwards he was removed by Germanicus to Pompeipolis in Cilicia, partly at the request of Artabanus, who begged that he might not be allowed to reside in Syria, and partly because Germanicus wished to put an affront upon Piso, with whom Vonones was very intimate. In the following year (a. d. 19) Vonones attempted to escape from Pompeipolis, intending to fly into Scythia; but he was overtaken on the banks of the river Pyramus, and shortly after put to death. According to Suetonius, he was put to death by order of Tiberius on account of his great wealth. (Joseph. l. c.; Tac. Ann. ii. 1—4, 56, 58, 69; Suet. Tiber. c. 49.)

Arsaces XIX., Artabanus III., obtained the Parthian kingdom on the expulsion of Vonones in A. D. 16. The possession of Armenia was the great cause of contention between him and the Romans; but during the life-time of Germanicus, Artabanus did not attempt to seize the country. Germanicus, on his arrival in Armenia in A. D. 18, recognized as king Zenon, the son of Polemon, whom the Armenians wished to have as their ruler, and who reigned under the name of Artaxias III.; and about the same time, Artabanus sent an embassy to Germanicus to renew the alliance with the Romans. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56, 58.)

After the death of Germanicus, Artabanus began to treat the Romans with contempt, placed Arsaces, one of his sons, over Armenia, and sent an embassy into Syria to demand the treasures which Vonones had carried with him out of Parthia. He also oppressed his subjects, till at length...
two of the chief men among the Parthians, Sin-naces, and the eunuch, Abedus, despatched an embassy to Tiberius in a. d. 35, to beg him to to send to Parthia Phraates, one of the sons of Phraates IV. Tiberius willingly complied with the request; but Phraates upon arriving in Syria was carried off by a disease, which was brought on by his disusing the Roman mode of living, to which he had been accustomed for so many years, and adopting the Parthian habits. As soon as Tiberius heard of his death, he set up Tirdates, another of the Arsacidæ, as a claimant to the Parthian throne, and induced Mithridates and his brother Phramanes, Iberian princes, to invade Armenia. The Iberians accordingly entered Armenia, and after bringing the servants of Arsaces, the son of Arta-bananus, to put him to death, they subdued the country. Orodos, another son of Artabanuus, was sent against them, but was entirely defeated by Phraamaenes; and soon afterwards Artabanuus was obliged to leave his kingdom, and to fly for refuge to the Hyrcanians and Carmanians. Hereupon Vitellius, the governor of Syria, crossed the Eufrates, and placed Tirdates on the throne.
In the following year (a. d. 36) some of the Parthian nobles, jealous of the power of Abageses, the chief minister of Tirdates, recalled Artabanuus, who in turn compelled Tirdates to fly into Syria. (Tac. Ann. vi. 31–37, 41–44; Dion Cass. ixii. 26; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. § 4.) When Tiberius received news of these events, he commanded Vitellius to conclude a peace with Arta-banuus (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 5), although Artabanuus, according to Suetonius (Tiber. c. 66), sent a letter to Tiberius uprising him with his crimes, and advising him to satisfy the hatred of his citizens by a voluntary death. After the death of Tiberius, Artabanuus sought to extend his king-don; he seised Armenia, and meditated an attack upon Syria, but alarmed by the activity of Vitel-lus, who advanced to the Eufrates to meet him,
he concluded peace with the Romans, and sacrificed to the images of Augustus and Caligula.
(Dion Cass. ix. 97; Suet. Vitali. 2, Caigil. 14, with Ernald's Excursus.)

Subsequently, Artabanuus was again expelled from his kingdom by the Parthian nobles, but was restored by the mediation of Izates, king of Adibene, who was allowed in consequence to wear his tara upright, and to sleep upon a golden bed, which were privileges peculiar to the kings of Parthia. Soon afterwards, Artabanuus died, and left the kingdom to his son Bardanes. Bardanes made war upon Izates, to whom his family was so deeply indebted, merely because he refused to assist him in making war upon the Romans; but when the Parthians perceived the intentions of Bardanes, they put him to death, and gave the kingdom to his brother, Gardanes. This is the account given by Josephus (Ant. xx. 3) of the reigns of Bardanes and Gardanes, and differs from that of Tacitus, which is briefly as follows.

ARSACES XXI., GARDANES, succeeded his fa-thor, Artabanuus III.; but in consequence of his cruelty, the Parthians invited his brother Bardanes to the throne. A civil war ensued between the two brothers, which terminated by Gardanes resigning the kingdom, to Bardanes, and retiring into Hyrcania. (Tac. Ann. xi. 8, 9.)

ARSACES XXII., BARDANES, the brother of the preceding, attempted to recover Armenia, but was deterred from his design by Viblius Marseus, the governor of Syria. He defeated his brother Gardanes, who had repeated of his resignation, and attempted to recover the throne; but his successes led him to treat his subjects with haughtiness, who accordingly put him to death while he was hunting, a. d. 47. His death occasioned fresh disputes for the crown, which was finally obtained by Gardanes; but as he also governed with cruelty,
The Parthians secretly applied to the emperor
Claudius, to beg him to send them from Rome Mecherdates, the grandson of Phraates IV. Claud-us complied with their request, and commanded the governor of Syria to assist Mecheraudes. Through the treachery of Agbarus, king of Edessa, the hopes of Mecheraudes were ruined; he was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gardanes, who died himself shortly afterwards, about a. d. 50. (Tac.
Ann. xi. 10, xii. 10–14.)

ARSACES XXII., VONONES II., succeeded to the throne on the death of Gardanes, at which time he was satrap of Media. His reign was short (Tac. Ann. xii. 14), and he was succeeded by ARSACES XXIII., VOLEGARES I., the son of Vonones II., but succeeded by Volesudes, according to Tacitus (Ann. xii. 14, 44); but according to Josephus, the son of Artabanuus III. (Ant. xx. 3. § 4.)
Soon after his accession, he invaded Armenia, took Artaxata and Tigranocerta, the chief cities of the country; and despoiled Rhadamasistus, the Iberian, who had usurped the crown. He then gave Armenia to his brother, Tirdates, having previously given Media to his other brother, Paeorus. These occurrences excited considerable alarm at Rome, as Nero, who had just ascended the throne (a. d. 55), was only seventeen years of age. Nero, however,
made active preparations to oppose the Parthians, and sent Domitius Corbulus to take possession of Armenia, from which the Parthians had meantime withdrawn, and Quadratus Ummidius to command in Syria. Volegares was persuaded by Corbulus and Ummidius to conclude peace with the Romans
and give as hostages the noblest of the Arsacids;
which he was induced to do, either that he might
the more conveniently prepare for war, or that he might remove from the kingdom those who were likely to prove rivals. (Tac. Ann. xii. 50, xiii.
5–9.) Three years afterwards (a. d. 58), the war at length broke out between the Parthians and the Romans; for Volegares could not endure Tirdates to be deprived of the kingdom of Armenia, which he had himself given him, and would not let him receive it as a gift from the Romans.
This war, however, terminated in favour of the Romans. Corbulus, the Roman general, took and destroyed Artaxata, and also obtained possession of Tigranocerta, which surrendered to him. Tiri-dates was driven out of Armenia; and Corbulus appointed in his place, as king of Armenia, the Cappadocian Tigranes, the grandson of king Archelaus, and gave certain parts of Armenia to the tributary kings who had assisted him in the war.
After making these arrangements, Corbulus retired into Syria, a. d. 60. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34–41, xiv. 23– 30; Dion Cass. Xlii. 19, 20.) Volegares, however, resolute to make another attempt to recover Armenia.
He made preparations to invade Syria himself, and sent Monasses, one of his generals, and Monorases, king of the Adiabenes, to attack Gardanes, and drive him out of Armenia. They accordingly entered Armenia and laid siege to Tigranocerta, but were unable to take it. As Vologeses also found that Corbulon had taken every precaution to secure Syria, he sent ambassadors to Corbulon to solicit a truce, that he might despatch an embassy to Rome concerning the terms of peace. This was granted; but as no satisfactory answer was obtained from Nero, Vologeses invaded Armenia, where he gained considerable advantages over Caesennimus Paetus, and at length besieged him in his winter-quarters. Paetus, alarmed at his situation, agreed with Vologeses, that Armenia should be surrendered to the Romans, and that he should be allowed to retire in safety from the country. A.D. 62. Shortly after this, Vologeses sent another embassy to Rome; and Nero agreed to surrender Armenia to Tridates, provided the latter would come to Rome and receive it as a gift from the Roman emperor. Peace was made on these conditions; and Tridates repaired to Rome, A.D. 63, where he was received with extraordinary splendour, and obtained from Nero the Armenian crown. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 1—18; 25—31.; Dion Cass. lxxi. 20—23; Ixiii. 1—7.)

In the struggle for the empire after Nero's death, Vologeses sent ambassadors to Vespasian, offering to assist him with 40,000 Parthians. This offer was declined by Vespasian, but he bore Vologeses send ambassador to the senate, and he secured peace to him. (Tac. Hist. iv. 51.) Vologeses afterwards sent an embassy to Titus, as he was returning from the conquest of Jerusalem, to congratulate him on his success, and present him with a golden crown; and shortly afterwards (A.D. 72), he sent another embassy to Vespasian to intercede on behalf of Antiochus, the deposed king of Commagene. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 5. § 2, 7; § 3; comp. Dion Cass. lixvi. 11; Suet. Ner. 57.) In A.D. 75, Vologeses sent again to Vespasian, to beg him to assist the Parthians against the Alani, who were then at war with them; but Vespasian declined to do so, on the plea that it did not become him to meddle in other people's affairs. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 15; Suet. Dom. 2; Joseph. B. J. vii. 7; § 4.) Vologeses found in the Euphrates, a little to the south of Babylon, the town of Vologesocerta. (Plin. H. N. vi. 30.) He seems to have lived till the reign of Donatian.

Arsaces XXIV, Pocorus, succeeded his father, Vologeses I., and was a contemporary of Donatian and Trajan; but scarcely anything is recorded of his reign. He is mentioned by Martial (ix. 30), and it appears from Pliny (Ey. x. 16), that he was in alliance with Deceleus, the king of the Deccans. It was probably this Pocorus who fortified and enlarged the city of Ctesiphon. (Ann. Mare. xxviii. 6.)

Arsaces XXV, Chosroes, called by Dion Cassius Ostrobus, a younger son of Vologeses I., succeeded his brother Pocorus during the reign of Trajan. Soon after his accession, he invaded Armenia, expelled Exceidus, the son of Tridates, who had been appointed king by the Romans, and gave the crown to his nephew Parthamarsis, the son of his brother Pocorus. Trajan hastened in person to the east, conquered Armenia, and reduced it to the form of a Roman province. Parthamarsis also fell into his hands. After concluding peace with Angoras, the ruler of Edeceus, Trajan overran the northern part of Mesopotamia, took Nisibis and several other cities, and, after a most glorious campaign, returned to Antioch to winter, A.D. 114. In consequence of these successes, he received the surname of Parthian from the soldiers and of Optimus from the senate. Parthia was at this time torn by civil commotions, which rendered the conquests of Trajan all the easier. In the spring of the following year, A.D. 115, he crossed the Tigris, took Ctesiphon and Seleucia, and made Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Babylonia, Roman provinces. After these conquests, he sailed down the Tigris to the Persian gulf and the Indian ocean; but during his absence there was a general revolt of the Parthians. He immediately sent against them two of his generals, Maximianus and Lusius, A.D. 116, the former of whom was defeated and slain by Chosroes, but the latter met with more success, and regained the cities of Nisibis, Edessa, and Seleucia, as well as others which had revolted. Upon his return to Ctesiphon, Trajan appointed Parthamaspates king of Parthia, and then withdrew from the country to invade Arabia. Upon the death of Trajan, however, in the following year (A.D. 117), the Parthians expelled Parthamaspates, and placed upon the throne their former king, Chosroes. But Hadrian, who had succeeded Trajan, was unwilling to engage in a war with the Parthians, and judged it more prudent to give them such conquests which Trajan had gained; he accordingly withdrew the Roman garrisons from Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Babylonia, and made the Euphrates, as before, the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. The exact time of Chosroes' death is unknown; but during the remainder of his reign there was no war between the Parthians and the Romans, as Hadrian cultivated friendly relations with the former. (Dion Cass. lxix. 17—38; Aurel. Vict. Caes. c. 13; Paus. v. 12; § 4; Spartan. Hadr. c. 21.)

Arsaces XXVII, Vologeses II., succeeded his father Chosroes, and reigned probably from about A.D. 122 to 149. In A.D. 135, Medea, which was then subject to the Parthians, was overthrown by a vast horde of Alani (called by Dion Cassius, Albanus), who penetrated as far as Armenia and Cappadocia, but were induced to retire, partly by the presents of Vologeses, and partly through fear of Arrian, the Roman governor of Cappadocia. (Dion Cass. lxix. 15.) During the reign of Hadrian, Vologeses continued at peace with the Romans; and on the accession of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 138, he sent an embassy to Rome, to present the new emperor with a golden crown, which event is commemorated on a coin of Antoninus. (Eckhel, vii. pp. 5, 10, 11.) These friendly relations, however, did not continue undisturbed. Vologeses solicited from Antoninus the restoration of the royal throne of Parthia, which had been taken by Trajan, but did not obtain his request. He made preparations to invade Armenia, but was deterred from doing so by the representations of Antoninus. (Capitol. Ant. Pius, c. 9.)

Arsaces XXVIII, Vologeses III., probably a son of the preceding, began to reign according to coins (Eckhel, iii. p. 538), A.D. 149. During the reign of Antoninus, he continued at peace with the Romans; but on the death of this emperor, the long threatened war at length broke out. In A.D. 162, Vologeses invaded Armenia, and cut to pieces a Roman legion, with its commander Severianus, at Eleugia, in Armenia. He then entered Syria, defeated Attidus Cordonianus, the governor of Syria, and laid waste every thing before him. Thereupon the emperor Verus proceeded to Syria, but when he reached Antioch, he remained in that city and gave the command of the army to Cassius, who soon drove Vologeses out of Syria, and followed up his success by invading Mesopotamia and Assyria. He took Seleucia and Caesiphon, both of which he sacked and set on fire, but on his march homewards lost a great number of his troops by diseases and famine. Meanwhile Statius Priscus, who had been sent into Armenia, was equally successful. He entirely subdued the country, and took Artaxata, the capital. (Dion Cass. lxx. 2, lxxi. 2; Lucian, Alex. Pseudom. c. 27; Capitol. M. Ant. Pau. cc. 8, 9, Verus, cc. 6, 7; Entrept. viii. 10.) This war seems to have been followed by the cession of Mesopotamia to the Romans.

From this time to the downfall of the Parthian empire, there is great confusion in the list of kings. Several modern writers indeed suppose, that the events related above under Vologeses III., happened in the reign of Vologeses II., and that the latter continued to reign till shortly before the death of Commodus (A.D. 192); but this is highly improbable, as Vologeses II. ascended the throne about A.D. 192, and must on this supposition have reigned nearly seventy years. If Vologeses III. began to reign in A.D. 149, as we have supposed from Eckhel, it is also improbable that he should have been the Vologeses spoken of in the reign of Caracalla, about A.D. 212. We are therefore inclined to believe that there was one Vologeses more than has been mentioned by modern writers, and have accordingly inserted an additional one in the list we have given.

ARSACIDAE.

Vologeses IV., probably ascended the throne in the reign of Commodus. In the contest between Pescennius Niger and Severus for the empire, A.D. 193, the Parthians sent troops to the assistance of the former; and accordingly when Niger was conquered, Severus marched against the Parthians. He was accompanied by a brother of Vologeses. His invasion was quite unexpected and completely successful. He took Caesiphon after an obstinate resistance in A.D. 199, and gave it to his soldiers to plunder, but did not permanently occupy it. Herodian appears to be mistaken in saying that this happened in the reign of Artabanus. (Herodian, iii. 1, 9, 10; Dion Cass. lxxv. 9; Spartan. Sever. cc. 15, 16.) Reimar (ad Dion Cass. t. c.) supposes that this Vologeses is the same Vologeses, son of Statius Priscus, king of Armenia, to whom Dion Cassius tells us, that Severus granted part of Armenia; but the account of Dion Cassius is very confused. On the death of Vologeses IV., at the beginning of the reign of Caracalla, Parthia was torn asunder by contests for the crown between the sons of Vologeses. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 12.)

Vologeses IV., was engaged, as already remarked, in civil war with his brother. It was against him that Caracalla made war in A.D. 215, because he refused to surrender Tiridates and Artabanes, he had fled to Parthia from the Romans, but did not prosecute it, since the Parthians through fear delivered up the persons he had demanded. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 19.) He appears to have been dethroned about this time by his brother Artabanus.

ARSACIDES.

Artabanus IV., the last king of Parthia, was a brother of the preceding, and a son of Vologeses IV. According to Herodian, Caracalla entered Parthia in A.D. 216, under pretence of seeking the daughter of Artabanus in marriage; and when Artabanus went to meet him unarmed with a great number of his nobility, Caracalla treacherously fell upon them and put the greater number to the sword; Artabanus himself escaped with difficulty. Dion Cassius merely relates that Artabanus refused to give his daughter in marriage to Caracalla, and that the latter laid waste in consequence the countries bordering upon Media. During the winter Artabanus raised a very large army, and in the following year, A.D. 217, marched against the Romans. Macrinus, who had meantime succeeded Caracalla, advanced to meet him; and a desperate battle was fought near Nisibis, which continued for two days, but without victory to either side. At the commencement of the third day, Macrinus sent an embassy to Artabanus, informing him of the death of Caracalla, with whom the Parthian king was chiefly engaged, and offering to restore the prisoners and treasures taken by Caracalla, and to pay a large sum of money besides. On these conditions a peace was concluded, and Artabanus withdrew his forces.

In this war, however, Artabanus had lost the best of his troops, and the Persians seized the opportunity of recovering their long-lost independence. They were led by Artaxerxes (Ardashir), the son of Sassan, and defeated the Parthians in three great battles, in the last of which Artabanus was taken prisoner and killed, A.D. 226. Thus ended the Parthian empire of the Arsacides, after it had existed 476 years. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 1, 2, 26, 27, lxxx. 9; Herodian, iv. 9, 11, 14, 15, vi. 2; Capitolin. Macro. cc. 6, 12; Aquifius, Hist. iv. 24; Synecclus, vol. i. p. 677, ed. Dindorf.) The Parthians were now obliged to submit to Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanides, which continued to reign till A.D. 651. [SASSANIDAE.] The family of the Arsacides, however, still continued to exist in Armenia as an independent dynasty. [ARSCIDES.]

ARSACES, the name of four Armenian kings. [ARSCIDES, pp. 536, 2, 536, 3, 534, 4.]

ARSACIDAE. 1. the name of a dynasty of Parthian kings. [ARSACES.]

2. The name of a dynasty of Armenian kings, who reigned over Armenia during the wars of the Romans with Mithridates the Great, king of Pon-tu, and with the Parthians. The history of this dynasty is involved in great difficulties, as the Latin and Greek authors do not always agree with the Armenian historians, such as Moses Chorenensis, Faustus Byzantius, and others. The Romans do not call the dynasty of the Armenian kings by the name of Arsacidæ; they mention several kings of the line of Arbaces and Ambash, who descended from the Parthian dynasty of the Arsacidæ, and they seem to have known several kings mentioned by the Armenian historians. On the other hand, the Armenian writers know but one dynasty reigning in Armenia during that period, and they do not mention several kings spoken of by the Romans;
or, if they mention their names, they do not consider them as kings. The consequence of this is, that every account based exclusively on Roman and Greek writers would be incomplete; they want to be compared with the Armenian historians, and thus only a satisfactory result can be obtained.
Several attempts have been made to reconcile the different statements of the western and eastern historians, as the reader may see from the notes of the brothers Whiston and the works of Vaillant, Du Four de Longuerue, Richter, and especially
St. Martin, which are cited below.

The expression "kings of Armenia" is in many instances vague, and leads to erroneous conclusions, especially with regard to the Arsacidæ. The transactions of the Romans with Armenia will present much less difficulties if the student will remember that he has to do with kings in Armenia, and kings of Armenian origin reigning in countries beyond the limits of Armenia. The history of the Ar-sacidæ cannot be well understood without a previous knowledge of the other dynasties before and after that of the Arsacidæ; for Armenian kings were known to the Greeks long before the accession of the Arsacidæ; and the annals of the Eastern empire mention many important transactions with kings of Armenia, belonging to those dynasties, which reigned in this country during a period of almost a thousand years after the fall of the Ar-sacidæ. But as any detailed account would be out of place here, we can give only a short sketch.

I. DYNASTY OF HAIG, founded by Haig, the son of Gathelas, who is said to have lived B.C. 2107.
Fifty-nine kings belong to this dynasty, and among them Zarmak, who, according to the Armenian historians, assisted the Trojans at the siege of their city, where he commanded a body of Assyrians; Dikran or Tigranes, a prince mentioned by Xenophon (Cyrop. iii. 1, v. 1, 8, vili. 3, 4); and Wahbe, the last of his house, who fell in a battle with Alexander the Great in B.C. 326.
The names of the fifty-nine kings, the duration of their reigns, and some other historical facts, mixed up with fabulous accounts, are given by the Armenian historians.

II. SEVEN GOVERNORS appointed by Alexander, and after his death by the Seleucidæ, during the period from 328 to 149 B.C.

III. DYNASTY OF THE ARSACIDÆ, from B.C.
149 to A.D. 428. See below.

IV. PERSIAN GOVERNORS, from A.D. 428 to 627.

V. GREEK AND ARABIAN GOVERNORS, from
A.D. 632 to 855.

VI. DYNASTY OF THE PAGRATIDÆ, from 855 to 1079. The Pagratiæ, a noble family of Jewish origin, settled in Armenia in B.C. 600, according to the Armenian historians. They were one of the most powerful families in Armenia. After they had come to the throne, they sometimes were compelled to pay tribute to the khalifs and to the em-perors of Constantinople, and in later times they lost a considerable part of Armenia. A branch of this family reigned at Ctesiphon for a considerable time after 1079. Another branch acquired the kingdom of Georgia, which it possessed down to the present day, when the last king, David, ceded his kingdom to Russia, in which country his descendants are still living. The princes of Bagration in Russia are likewise descended from the Pagratiæ, another branch of whom settled in Imerethin in the Caucasus, and its descendants still belong to the principal chiefs of that country.

VII. DYNASTY OF THE ARZHRUNIANS, said to have been descended from the ancient kings of Assyria. Several members of it were appointed governors of Armenia by the first khalif. In A.D.
855, this family became independent in the northern part of Armenia in the country round the upper part of the Euphrates. Arshman and Ambash, the last Arzhrunians, were killed in 1080 by the emperor Nicephorus Botaniates, who united their dominions with the Byzantine empire.

VIII. MOHAMMEDAN DYNASTIES. 1. Of Kurdish origin, from A.D. 984 to A.D. 1085. 2. Of Turkoman origin, from A.D. 1084 to A.D. 1312.
They resided in different places, and the extent of their dominions varied according to the military success of the khalifs of Egypt and the Seljukian princes.

IX. DYNASTIES OF DIFFERENT ORIGIN, from the eleventh to the fourteenth century. Some kings belonged to the Pagratiæ, among whom was the celebrated Bayton I or Bethon in 1224;
and some were Latin princes, among whom was Leo VI of Lesbiam, who was driven out by the khalif of Egypt, and died in Paris in 1388, the last king of Armenia. Otto, duke of Brunswick, from whom is descended the present house of Hanover, was crowned as king of Armenia in Germany, but he never entered the country.

THE DYNASTY OF THE ARSACIDÆ. (See above, No. III.) It has already been said, that there are considerable discrepancies between the statements of the Romans and those of the Armenians concerning this dynasty. The Romans tell us that Artaxias, governor of Armenia Magna for Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, made himself independent in his government B.C. 188; and that Zardanes became king of Armenia Minor, of which country he was praefect. The descendants of Ar-taxias became extinct with Tigranes III, who was driven out by Usus Carus, and among the kings who reigned after him, there are many who were not Arсидæ, but belonged to other Asiatic dynasties. The Armenians on the contrary say, that the dynasty of the Arsacidæ was founded by Valarsagas or Wagharsing, the brother of Mithridates Arsaces [Arsacides III.], king of Parthia, by whom he was established on the throne of Armenia in B.C. 149. A younger branch of the Arsacidæ was founded by Arsham or Ardsham, son of Ardashes (Artaxes) and brother of the great Tigranes, who reigned at Edessa, and whose desendants became masters of Armenia Magna after the extinction of the Arsacidæ in that country with the death of Tridates I, who was established on the throne by Nero, and who died most probably in a.d. 62. The Armenian historians have treated with particular attention the history of the younger branch; they speak but little about the earlier transactions with Rome; and they are almost silent with regard to those kings, the offspring of the kings of Pontus and Judæa, who were imposed upon Armenia by the Romans. From this we may conclude, that the Armenians considered themselves the successors of the Greeks as traders and political adventurers, and that the Arscacidae were the only legitimate dynasty. Thus they sometimes speak of kings unknown to the Romans, and who perhaps were but pretenders, who had succeeded in preserving an obscure independence in some inaccessible corner of the mountains of Armenia. On the other hand the Romans, with all the pride and haggishness of conquerors, consider their instruments or allies alone as the legitimate kings, and they generally speak of the Arscacidae as a family imposed upon Armenia by the Parthians. As to the origin of the Armenian Arscacids, both the Romans and Armenians agree, that they were descended from the dynasty of the Parthian Arscacids, a notion which was so generally established, that Procopius (De Antich. Iust. iii. 1) says, that nobody had the slightest doubt on the fact. But as to the origin of the earlier kings, who according to the Romans were not Arscacids, we must prefer the statements of the Armenians, who, as all Orientals, paid great attention to the genealogy of their great families, and who say that those kings were Arscacidae.

The Persian historians know this dynasty by the name of the Askenians, and tell us, that its founder was one Ashk, who lived at the time of Alexander the Great. But the Persian authors throw little light upon the history of the Arscacids. A series of the kings, according to the Romans, is necessary for understanding their historians. But as their statements are rather one-sided, they will be found insufficient not only for a closer investigation into the history of Armenia, but also for many other events connected with the history of the eastern empire. It has, therefore, been thought advisable to give first the series of the kings according to the Roman writers, and afterwards a series of these kings according to the Roman accounts combined with those of the Armenians. The chronology of this period has not yet been satisfactorily fixed, and many points remain vague.

The following is a series of the Arscacidae and other kings of Armenia according to the Romans.

Artaxias I.

Artavasdes I. the son of Tigranes I., taken prisoner by M. Antonius. Artavasdes I.

Artaxias II. the son of Artavasdes I., killed by his rebellious subjects. Artaxias II.

Tigranes II. the son of Artavasdes I., and the brother of Artaxias II., established in Armenia by order of Augustus, by Tiberius Nero. Tigranes II.

Artavasdes II. perhaps the son of Artaxias II., driven out by his subjects. Artavasdes II.

Tigranes III. the son of Tigranes II., the competitor of Artavasdes II., driven out by Caicus.

Tigranes III. He was the last of his race. Tigranes III.

Artabazanes. After Artavasdes II. and Tigranes III. had been driven out by the Romans, the choice of Augustus for a king of the Armenians fell upon one Artabazanes, a Median or Parthian prince, who seems not to have belonged to the dynasty of the Arscacids. As Artabazanes was the son of great talents and distinguished by bodily beauty, a quality which the eastern nations have always liked to see in their kings, the Armenians applauded the choice of Augustus. He died suddenly after a short reign in a.d. 2, according to the chronology of St. Martin. He left male issue, but the Armenians disliked his children, and chose Emtots their queen. She was, perhaps, the widow of Tigranes III. (Tac. Ann. iii. 4.)

Vonones. Emtots was deposed by the Armenians after a short reign, and the throne remained vacant for several years, till the Armenians at length chose Vonones as their king, the son of Phraates IV., and the exiled king of Parthia. (A.D. 16.) Vonones maintained himself but one year on the throne, as he was compelled to fly into Syria through fear of Artabazanes III., the king of Parthia. Artaxias XVIII.

Artaxias III. chosen king, a. d. 18, about two years after Vonones had fled into Syria. Artaxias III.

Arsaces I. the eldest son of Artabazus, king of the Parthians, was placed on the throne of Armenia by his father, after the death of Artaxias III. He perished by the treachery of Mithridates, the brother of Phraises, king of Iberia, who had bribed some of the attendants of Arscaces to kill their master. After his death, which happened in a.d. 32, Mithridates invaded Armenia and took its capital, Artaxata. Josephus (xxvii. 8. § 4.) calls this Armenian king Oolus, but this was the name of his brother, who, as we learn from Tacitus, was sent by the Parthian king to revenge his death. (Tac. Ann. vi. 31—33; Dion Cass. liv. 26.)

Mithridates. The aforesaid brother of Phraises, was established on the throne of Armenia by the emperor Tiberius, a.d. 35. He was recalled to Rome by Caligula, but sent into Armenia again by Claudius, about a.d. 47, where he continued to reign, supported by the Romans, till he was expelled and put to death by his nephew Rhadamistus, a.d. 52. (Tac. Ann. vi. 39, ix. 8, 9, xii. 44—47; Dion Cass. ix. 8.)

Rhadamistus, the son of Phraises, king of Iberia, was a highly gifted but ambitious youth, whom his old father tried to get rid of by exciting him to invade Armenia, for which purpose he gave him an army. (A.d. 59.) Rhadamistus, succeeded by the perfidy of the Roman praefect in Armenia, Pollio, succeeded in seizing upon the person of his uncle, whom he put to death with his wife and his children. Rhadamistus then ascended the throne; but Vologeses II., the king of the Parthians, took advantage of the distracted state of the country to send his brother Tiridates into Armenia, and proclaim him king. Tiridates advanced upon Tigranocerta, took this city and Artaxata, and compelled Rhadamistus to fly. Rhadamistus was subsequently killed by his father Phraises. (Tac. Ann. xii. 44—51, xiii. 5, 87.)

Tiridates I. the father of Vologeses I., king of the Parthians, was driven out of Armenia by Corbulo, who appointed in his place Tigranes IV, the grandson of king Archelaus, A. D. 60. [Tiggranes IV.] Tiridates subsequently received the crown as a gift from Nero, A. D. 65. [Arsaces XXIII., Tiridates I.]

Exedares (Arshades III.), an Arsacid of the younger Armenian branch, was driven out by Chosroes or Khosraw, king of the Parthians. (Dion Cass. Lxivii. 17.) According to Moses Chorennesian (ii. 44—57), Exedares, who is called Arshades III., was a mighty prince, who humbled the armies of Domitian, but was finally driven out by Trajan. Chosroes placed on the throne in his stead Parthamaspates, a Parthian prince. Exedares reigned during forty-two years, from A. D. 78 to 120, but was several times compelled to fly from his kingdom.

Parthamaspates, the son of Phraates (Arsaces XXIV.), king of Parthia, and the nephew of Chosroes, who supported him against Trajan. Parthamaspates, reduced to extremity, humbled himself before Trajan, and placed his royal diadem at the feet of the emperor, hoping that Trajan would restore it to him and recognize him as a subject king. But he was deceived in his expectation, and Armenia was changed into a Roman province. According to some accounts, he was put to death by Trajan. (Dion Cass. Lxivii. 17—20; comp. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 2; Ponto, Praep. Hist. p. 248, ed. Niebuhr.)

Parthamaspates, was appointed by Trajan king of Parthia, but after he had been expelled by the Parthians (Arsaces XXV.); he seems to have subsequently received the kingdom of Armenia from Hadrian. (Comp. Spartan, Hadri. co. 21, 5, where he is called Phasmatosiris.)

Acharnides, the son of Parthamaspates. There are some coins on which he is represented with the diadem, which seems to have been given to him by Antoninus Pius. (Iamblichus, op. Phot. Cod. 94. p. 75 b, ed. Bekker.)

Soesmus or Soesmoun (Soosmou), the son of Achemennides, was established on the throne by Phraedes, the lieutenant of Lucius (Martius) Verus, during the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus. (Iamb. Chr. ob. Phot. Cod. 116, ed. Bekker.) Moses Chorennesian (ii. 60—64), that the national king, who was supported by Vologeses II. of Parthia, was Dikran or Tigranes. Soesmus was an Arsacid. (Dion Cass. Prugia, lixii. p. 1201, ed. Reimar.)

Samostracons (Sarostaroskés), the son of Soesmus, as it seems, was established on the throne by Septimius Severus. According to Suidas, he was a man highly distinguished by his warlike qualities and many noble virtues. He seems to have been the king of Armenia mentioned by Dion Cassius, who was treacherously seized upon by Caracalla, about A. D. 212. The Armenian name of Samostracon is Samadrag. (Dion Cass. lixii. 9, lixvii. 12; Suidas, s. v. Sarostaroské; comp. Herodian, iii. 3.)

Vologeses, the son of Santraces, whom Dion Cassius (xxvii. 12) calls king of the Parthians. [Arsaces XXIX.] Vaillant thinks that he was the king seized upon by Caracalla. On the other hand, the Armenian historians tell us that Waghbash, in Greek Vologeses or Valarax, the son of Dikran (Tigranes), reigned over Armenia, or part of Armenia, from A. D. 178 to 198, and that he perished in a battle against the Khazars, near Derbent, in 198. It is of course impossible that he should have been seized by Caracalla, who succeeded his father Septimius Severus in 211. Nor do the Armenians mention any king of that name who was a contemporary either of Septimius Severus or Caracalla. (Moses Choren. ii. 65—68.)

Tiridates II., the son of Vologeses. [Tiridates II.]

Arshades IV., the brother of Artabanus IV., the last Arsacid in Parthia, by whom he was made king of Armenia in the first year of the reign of Alexander Severus, (A. D. 222—223.) When his brother was killed by Artaxerxes (Arshahur), the first Sassanid on the Persian throne, he resisted the usurper, and united his warriors with those of Alexander Severus in the memorable war against Arshades [Arsaces IV.] (Praecip. de Histor. Justin, i. 1; Dion Cass. lix. xxviii. 3, 4; Herodian, vi. 2, &c.; Agathias, pp. 65, 134, ed. Paris.)

Arsaces III., the ally of Sapor against the emperor Valerian, A. D. 260. (Trebell. Poll. Valerian. 6.)

Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ix. 8) mentions a Christian king of Armenia during the reign of Diocletian, who seems to have been the son of Arshaduses III. During the war of Diocletian with Nares, king of Persia, this king of Armenia joined the Roman army commanded by Galerius Caesar. After the accession of Maximinianus he was involved in a war with this emperor, who intended to abolish the Christian religion in Armenia. [Tiridates III.]

Arsaces III. (Tiranus), the son of Diran (Tiridates I.), ascended the throne either in the seventeenth year of the reign of Constantius, that is, in A. D. 354, or perhaps as early as 341 or 342, after his father had been made prisoner and deprived of his sight by Sapor I., king of Persia. After the reconciliation of Sapor with his captive Diran (Tiridates), Arsaces was chosen king, since his father, on account of his blindness, was unable to reign according to the opinion of the eastern nations, which opinion was also entertained by the Greeks of the Lower Empire, whence we so often find that when an emperor or usurper succeeded in making his rival prisoner, he usually blinded him, if he did not venture to put him to death. The ascension of Arsaces was approved by the emperor Constantius. The new king nevertheless took the part of Sapor in his war with the Romans, but soon afterwards made peace with the latter. He promised to pay an annual tribute, and Constantius allowed him to marry Olympias, the daughter of the prefect Ablavias, a near relation of the empress Constantia, and who had been betrothed to Consants, the brother of Constantius. Olympias was afterwards poisoned by a mistress of Sapor, an Armenian princess of the name of Pharinhasdem.

To punish the defection of Arsaces, Sapor invaded Armenia and took Tigranocerta. He was thus involved in a war with the emperor Julian, the successor of Constantius, who opened his famous campaign against the Persians (A. D. 363) in concert with Arsaces, on whose active co-operation the success of the war in a great measure depended. But Julian's sanguine expectations of overthrowing the power of the Sassanidae was destroyed by the pusillanimity, or more probably well calculated treachery, of Arsaces, who withdrew his troops from the Roman camp near Ctesiphon in the month of June, 363. Thence the disastrous retreat of the Romans and the death of Julian, who died from a wound on the 26th of the same month. Jovian, who was chosen emperor in the camp, saved the Roman army by a treaty in July, by which he renounced his sovereignty over the tributary kingdoms of Armenia and Iberia. Arseses, in the hope of receiving the reward of his treachery, ventured into the camp of Sapor. He was at first received with honour, but in the midst of an entertainment was seized by order of Sapor and confined in the tower of Oblivion at Ecbatana, where he was loaded with silver chains. He died there by the hand of a faithful servant, whom he implored to release him with his sword from the humiliation of his captivity. Arseses reigned tyrannically, and had a strong party against him, especially among the nobles. (Amm. Marc. xx. 11, xxxi. 6, xxii. 2, 3, xxvii. 7, xxvii. 12; Procop. de Bell. Pers. i. 5.)

PARA, the son of Arseses III. and Olympia. (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs.) No sooner had Sapor seized Arseses, than he put one Aspocures on the throne of Armenia. Para, the heir and successor of Arseses, was reduced to the possession of one fortress, Artogarassa (perhaps Artagarza, or Arda, towards the sources of the Tigris, above Dijıårıbek or Amida), where he was besieged with his mother Olympia by the superior forces of Sapor. The fortress surrendered after a gallant defence, Olympia fell into the hands of the conqueror, but Para escaped to Neosarsees, and implored the aid of the emperor Valens. The emperor ordered him to be well treated, and promised to assist him. Terentius, a Roman general, led the fugitive king back into Armenia with a sufficient force, and Para was acknowledged as king; and though attacked by Sapor, he continued to reign with the assistance of the Romans. Para was a tyrant. Misled by the intrigues of Sapor, he killed Cylaece and Ariamnus, two of his chief ministers. As Valens was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Armenian king, Terentius persuaded him to go to Cilicia, pretending that the emperor wished to have an interview with him. When Para arrived at Tarasus, he was treated with due respect, but so closely watched as to be little better than a prisoner. He escaped with a body of light cavalry, but afterwards being taken, he arrived safely in Armenia in spite of an ardent pursuit. He continued to show himself a friend of the Romans, but Valena distrusted him and resolved upon his death. Trajanus, a Roman dyk, or general, executed the emperor's secret order. He invited Para to a banquet, and when the guests were half intoxicated, a band of Roman soldiers rushed in and Para and his attendants were slain after a brave resistance, A. D. 374 or 377. The Armenian name of Para is Bab. (Amm. Marc. xvii. 12, xxx. 1.)

ARSESSES IV. (V. of Vaillant), the son of Para of Bab. According to Vaillant, he was the nephew of Para, being the son of one Arseses IV. (V. of Vaillant), who was the brother of Para; this opinion has been adopted by distinguished historians, but it seems untenable. Arseses IV. reigned a short time together with his brother Valences or Waghazarth, who died soon. In a war against an usurper, Warazad, the son of Anob, who was the brother of Arseses III., Arseses IV. showed such a want of character and energy that he owed his success merely to the bad conduct of the usurper, who was at first supported by the emperor Theodosius the Great. The weakness of Arseses being manifest, Theodosius and Sapor III. formed and carried into execution the plan of dividing Armenia. Arseses was allowed to reign as a vassal king of Constantinople in the western and smaller part of Armenia, while the larger and eastern part became the share of Sapor, who gave it to Chosroes or Khosrow, a noble belonging to the house of the Arsacidae, of which there were still some branches living in Persia. According to St. Martin this happened in 357. Procopius mentions one Tigranes, brother of Arseses, who reigned over eastern Armenia, which he ceded to Sapor. The whole history of the division of Armenia is very obscure, and the chief sources, Procopius and Moses Choreneus are in many cases contradictory. Arseses IV. died in 399, and his dominions were conferred by the emperor upon his general, Caspana, who was descended from the family of the Gamsaragans, which was a branch of the Arsacidae. It seems that this general was a most able diplomatist, and that his nomination was a plot concerted between him and Theodosius to bring all Armenia under the imperial authority; Caspana declared himself a vassal of Chosroes, and this vassal suddenly broke his allegiance towards Sapor, and submitted to Theodosius. On this Bahram IV., the successor of Sapor, invaded Armenia, seized Chosroes and put Bahram Shapur (Sapor) the brother of Chosroes, on the vassal throne of (eastern) Armenia, (392 A.D.). In 414, Chosroes was re-established by Yezezdeger I., the successor of Bahram IV., and after the death of Chosroes, in 415, Yezezdeger's son, Shapur or Sapor, became king. Sapor died in 419, and till 422 there was an interregnum in Armenia till Ardashirs (Artashes) ascended the throne. (Procopius, de Aedif. Justin. iii. 1. 5; De Bell. Pers. ii. 3; Moses Choreni. iii. 40, &c. 49, &c.)

ARTASHES, the last Arsacids on the throne of Armenia, the son of Bahram Shapur, and the nephew of Chosroes. Moses Choreneus tells us, that his real name was Ardashirs. (Artashes or Artaxaces.) He was made king of Armenia in 422, by Bahram IV., who ordered or requested him to adopt the name of Ardashirs (Artashes or Artaxaces). Yezezdeger was addicted to vices of every description, the people, or rather the nobles of Armenia, wished for another king. Since the conversion of prince Gregory (afterwards St. Gregory), the son of Anag, the Arsacids, to the Christian religion, in the time of Constantine the Great, the Armenians had gradually adopted the Christian religion; and there was a law that the patriarch should always be a member of the royal family of the Arsacids. During the reign of Artashes the office of patriarch was held by Isaac, to whom the nobles applied when they wished to choose another king; but Isaac aware that their choice would fall upon Bahram, the heathen king of Persia, refused to assist them. The nobles of Armenia applied straightway to Bahram, who invaded Armenia, deposed Artashes, and united his dominions to Persia, A. D. 428. From this time eastern Armenia was called Persarminia. (Procop. de Aedif. Justin. iii. 1, 5; Moses Choreni. iii. 63, &c.; Assamani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. para i. p. 396, &c.)

from St. Martin, and is founded upon the Armenian histories of Moses Chorenensis and Paustus Byzantus, compared with the Greek and Roman authors.

B. The second or younger Branch, at first at Edessa, and sometimes identified with the "Reges Oschoenenses", afterwards in Armenia Magna. B. c. 86. Arashing or Aratham, the Artaxes of Josephus. [Ant. Jud. ii. 2.] — B. c. 10. Mannus, his son. — B. c. 5. Abgarus, the son of Arashing, the Ushama of the Syrians. This is the celebrated Abgarus who is said to have written a letter to our Saviour. (Moses Chor. ii. 29.)

A. d. 32. Amane or Anamus, the son of Abgarus. — A. d. 36. Sanadrag or Samatruces, the son of a sister of Abgarus, usurps the throne. — A. d. 58. Erowant, an Arscid by the female line, usurps the throne; conquers all Armenia;cedes Edessa and Mesopotamia to the Romans. — A. d. 78. Ardashis or Artaxias II. (Exedares or Azdakes), the son of Sandrag, established by Vologeses I. king of the Parthians. — A. d. 120. Ardashis or Artavazt IV., son of Sandrag. — A. d. 245. Tiridates I., son of Mithridates of Armenia. — A. d. 121. Diran or Tirman, his brother. — A. d. 142. Dikran or Tigranes VI., driven out by Lucius (Martius) Verus, who puts Senocrates on the throne.

ARSA'MENES, ("Apafrodus"), the son of Dareius, the commander of the Utii and Myci in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 69.)

ARSA'MES, ("Aphofres") I. The father of Hystaspes and grandfather of Dareius. (Herod. i. 209, vii. 11, 224.)

2. Also called Arsames, the great grandson of the preceding, and the son of Dareius and Artsytone, the daughter of Cyrus, commanded in the army of Xerxes the Arabians and the Achiophians who lived above Egypt. (Herod. vii. 69.) Aeschylus (Pees 37, 300) speaks of an Arsames, who was the leader of the Egyptians from Memphis in the army of Xerxes.

3. An illegitimate son of Artaxerxes Mnemon, murdered by his brother Artaxerxes Ochus. (Plut. Artax. c. 30.)

4. Supposed on the authority of a coin to have been a king of Armenia about the time of Seleucus II., and conjectured to have been the founder of the dynasty of Arsamastes. (Eckhel, iii. p. 294, &c.)

ARSE'NIUS, ("Aphofres") I. Of Constantinople, surnamed Antonians, lived about the middle of the thirteenth century. He was educated in some monastery in Nicaea, of which he afterwards became the head. After he had held this office for some time, he led a private and ascetic life; and he appears to have passed some time also in one of the monasteries on mount Athos. At length, about A. d. 1253, the emperor Theodorus Lascaris the Younger raised him to the dignity of patriarch. In A. d. 1259, when the emperor died, he appointed Arsenius and Georgius Muulo guardians to his son Joannes; but when Musalo began to harbour treasonable designs upon the young prince, Arsenius, indignant at such faithless intrigues, resigned the office of patriarch, and withdrew to a monastery. In A. d. 1260, when the Greeks had recovered possession of Constantinople under Michael Palaeologus, Arsenius was invited to the imperial city, and requested to resume the dignity of patriarch. In the year following, the emperor Michael Palaeologus ordered prince Joannes, the son of Theodorus Lascaris, to be blinded; and Arsenius not only censured this act of the emperor publicly, but published him for it with excommunication. Michael in vain implored forgiveness; till at length, enraged at such presumption, he assembled a council of bishops, brought several fictitious accusations against his patriarch, and caused him to be deposed and exiled to Proconnesus. Here Arsenius survived his honourable disgrace for several years; but the time of his death is unknown. Fabricius places it in A. d. 1264. He was a man of great virtue and piety, but totally unfit for practical life. At the time when he was yet a monk, he wrote a synopsis of divine laws (Synopsis Canonum), collected from the writings of the fathers and the decrees of councils. The Greek original, accompanied by a Latin ARSINOÉ.

2. A Greek monk (Cave calls him Patricius Romanus), who lived towards the end of the fourth century of our era, was distinguished for his knowledge of Greek and Roman literature. The emperor Theodosius the Great invited him to his court, and entrusted to him the education of his sons Arcadius and Honorius, whose fatherArsinoé was called. At the age of forty, he left the court and went to Egypt, where he commenced his monastic life at Seccius in the desert of the Thebais. There he spent forty years, and then migrated to Troë, a place near Memphis, where he passed the remainder of his life, with the exception of three years, which he spent at Canopus. He died at Troë at the age of ninety-five. There exists by him a short work containing instructions and admonitions for monks, which is written in a truly monastic spirit. It was published with a Latin translation by Comberibus in his Liber ad Ecclesias Nomina. Paris, 1672, p. 301, &c. We also possess forty-four of his remarkable sayings (apophthegmata), which had been collected by his ascetic friends, and which are printed in Cotelierus, Monument. i. p. 533. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 80, ed. London; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 580, &c.)

ARSÉS, NARSE, or OARSES (Ἀρσές, Νάρσας, or Οὔρσας), the youngest son of king Ar- taraxeres III. (Ochus.) After the eunuch Bagos had poisoned Artarexes, he missed Arses to the throne, b. c. 339; and that he might have the young king completely under his power, he caused the king's brothers to be put to death; but one of them, Bisthanes, appears to have escaped the king's notice. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 19.) Arses, however, could but ill brook the indignities committed against his own family, and the bondage in which he himself was kept; and as soon as Bagos perceived that the king was disposed to take vengeance, he had him and his children too put to death, in the third year of his reign. The royal house appears to have been thus destroyed with the exception of the above-mentioned Bisthanes, and Bagos raised Dareius Codomannus to the throne. (Diod. xvii. 5; Strab. xv. p. 786; Plut. De Fort. Alex. ii. 5, Artaex. 1. Anab. ii. 14; Ctesias, Pers. p. 151, ed. Lion; Syncell. P. D. i. 390, 391; Anab. iii. 19.) Arses, however, could but ill brook the indignities committed against his own family, and the bondage in which he himself was kept; and as soon as Bagos perceived that the king was disposed to take vengeance, he had him and his children too put to death, in the third year of his reign. The royal house appears to have been thus destroyed with the exception of the above-mentioned Bisthanes, and Bagos raised Dareius Codomannus to the throne. (Diod. xvii. 5; Strab. xv. p. 786; Plut. De Fort. Alex. ii. 5, Artaex. 1. Anab. ii. 14; Ctesias, Pers. p. 151, ed. Lion; Syncell. P. D. i. 390, 391; Anab. iii. 19.)

ARSINOÉ (Ἀρσινόη). 1. A daughter of PhŒgeus, and wife of Alcmeon. As she disapproved of the murder of Alcmeon, the sons of PhŒgeus put her into a chest and carried her to Agapener at Tegena, where they named her of having killed Alcmeon herself. (Apollod. iii. 7, § 5; Alcmeon, Agenor.)

2. The nurse of Orestes, who saved him from the hands of his mother Clytemnestra, and carried him to the aged Strophus, the father of Pylades. (Pind. Pyth. xi. 25, 54.) Other traditions called this nurse Laodameia. (Schol. Fed. Pind. i. 25.)

3. A daughter of Leucippus and Philocles, and sister of Hiliaeus and Phoebe, the wives of the Dioscuri. By Apollo she became the mother of Eriopis, and the Messonian tradition regarded

Asclepius also as her son. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 3; Paus. ii. 26, § 6; Schol. Fed. Pind. i. 13; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 22.) At Sparta she had a sanctuary and was worshipped as a heroine. (Paus. ii. 12, § 7.)

ARSINOÉ (Ἀρσινόη). 1. The mother of Potelmy I, king of Egypt, was originally a concubine of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, and was given by Philip to Lagus, a Macedonian, while she was pregnant with Potelmy. Hence Potelmy was regarded by the Macedonians as the son of Philip. (Paus. iv. 6, § 2; Curt. ix. 3; Suidas, s. a. Odyss.

2. The daughter of Potelmy I. and Berenice, born about b. c. 316, was married in b. c. 300 to Lysimachus, king of Thrace, who was then far advanced in years. Lysimachus had put away Amastrias in order to marry Arsinoé, and upon the death of the former in b. c. 288 (Amastrias), Arsinoé received from Lysimachus the cities of Heraclia, Amastrias, and Dium, as a present. (Pint. Demetr. 31; Paus. iv. 10, § 3; Mommsen, op. cit. p. 225, a. 30, ed. Becker.)

Arsinoé, who was anxious to secure the succession to the throne for her own children, was jealous of her step-son Agathocles, who was married to her half-sister Lyanda, the daughter of Potelmy I. and Eurydice. Through the intrigues of Arsinoé, Agathocles was eventually put to death in b. c. 234. (Agathocles, p. 65, a.) This crime, however, led to the death of Lysimachus; for Lyanda fled her own children, to Scolens in Asia, who was glad of the pretext to march against Lysimachus. In the war which followed, Lysimachus lost his life (b. c. 281); and after the death of her husband, Arsinoé first fled to Ephesus, to which Lysimachus had given the name of Arsinoé in honour of her (Steph. Byz. a. e. Eteocles), and from thence (Polyen. viii. 57) to Cassandriea in Macedonia, where she shut herself up with her sons by Lysimachus. Some years after the death of Lysimachus, but he was assassinated, after a reign of a few months, by Potelmy Cenamus, the half-brother of Arsinoé, who had now obtained the throne of Macedonia. Potelmy was anxious to obtain possession of Cassandriea and still more of the sons of Lysimachus, who might prove formidable rivals to him. He accordingly made offers of marriage to Arsinoé, and concealed her real object by the most solemn oaths and promises. Arsinoé consented to the union, and admitted him into the town; but he had secretly obtained possession of the place, before he murdered the two young princes of Lysimachus in the presence of their mother. The whole house was conducted to Samothrace (Justin, xviii. 2, xxiv. 2, 8; Mommsen, op. cit. p. 226, b. 54); from whence she shortly after went to Alexandria in Egypt, b. c. 279, and married her own brother Potelmy II. Philadelphia. (Paus. i. 7, §§ 1, 8; Theocrit. Idyll. xx. 12, &c. with the Scholia; Athen. xiv. p. 621, a.) Though Arsinoé bore Potelmy no children, she was exceedingly beloved by him; she gave her name to several cities, called a district (vōdēs) of Egypt Arsinoitès and her, and honoured her memory in various ways. (Comp. Paus. l. a.; Athen. v. p. 318, b. xi. p. 497, d. e.) Among other things, he commanded the architect, Dinocrates, to erect a temple to Arsinoé in Alexandria, of which the roof was to be enriched with lodotheas, so that her statue made of iron might appear to float in the air; but the death of the architect and the king prevented its completion. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 42.) Coins were struck in her honour, one of which is figured below, representing her crowned with a diadem and her head partially veiled: the reverse contains a double cornucopia, which illustrates the statement of Athenaeus (xi. p. 497, b. c.), that Ptolemy Philadelphus was the first who had made the drinking-horn, called phaor, as an ornament for the statues of Arsinoë, which bore in the left hand such a horn, filled with all the fruits of the earth. It should, however, be remarked that the word occurs as early as the time of Demodesmus. (Diod. s. v. phaor.)

3. The daughter of Lysimachus and Nicaea, was married to Ptolemy II. Philadephus soon after his accession, n. c. 285. When Arsinoë, the sister of Ptolemy Philadelphus [see No. 2], fled to Egypt in n. c. 279, and Ptolemy became captivated by her, Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, in conjunction with Amyntas and Chrysippus, a physician of Rhodes, plotted against her; but her plots were discovered, and she was banished to Coptos, or some city of the Thebais. She had by Ptolemy three children, Ptolemy Euergetes, afterwards king, Lysimachus, and Berenice. (Schol. ad Theoc. Id. xvii. 129; Paus. l. 7. § 3; Polyl. xv. 25.)

4. The wife of Magas, king of Cyrene. In order to put an end to his disputes with his brother Ptolemy II. Philadephus, Magas had betrothed his only daughter, Berenice, to the son of Ptolemy, but died before the marriage took place. As Arsinoë disapproving of this connexion, she invited Demetrius the Fair, the son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, to Cyrene, in order to become the king of the place and the husband of Berenice. But his beautycaptivated Arsinoë; and her daughter indignant at the treatment she had received, excited a conspiracy against him, and caused him to be killed in the arms of his mother. Berenice then married the son of Ptolemy. (Justin, xxvi. 3.) It is not stated of what family this Arsinoë was. Niebuhr (Kleine Schriften, p. 280) conjectures that she was the same as the daughter of Lysimachus [No. 3], who after her banishment to Coptos went to Cyrene, and married Magas.

5. Called Eurydice by Justin (xxx. 1), and Cleopatra by Livy (xxvii. 4), but Arsinoë by Polybius, was the daughter of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, the wife of her brother Ptolemy IV. Philopator, and the mother of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, She was present with her husband at the battle of Raphia (n. c. 217), in which Antiochus, the Great, was defeated; but her profligate husband was induced towards the end of his reign, by the intrigues of Selusius, to order Philopator to put her to death. But after the death of Ptolemy Philopator, the female friends of Arsinoë revenged her murder; they broke into the house of Philimon, and killed him together with his son and wife. (Polyb. v. 83, 94, 87, xv. 23, 39, 38.)

6. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Aurelius, escaped from Caesar, when he was besieging Alexandria in n. c. 47, and was recognized as queen by the Alexandrians, since her brother Ptolemy XII. Dionysus was in Caesar's power. After the capture of Alexandria she was carried to Rome by Caesar, and led in triumph by him in n. c. 46, on which occasion she excited the compassion of the Roman people. She was soon afterwards dismissed by Caesar, and returned to Alexandria; but her sister Cleopatra persuaded Antony to have her put to death in n. c. 41, though she had fled for refuge to the temple of Artemis Leucophryne in Miletus. (Dion Cass. lxi. 39, &c., xlix. 19; Cass. B. C. iii. 112, B. Alex. 4, 33; Appian, B. C. v. 9, comp. Dion Cass. xlviii. 24.)

ARSTITES (Asterites), the satrap of the Hellespontine Phrygia when Alexander the Great invaded Asia. After the defeat of the Persians at the Granicus, Arstites retreated to Phrygia, where he put an end to his own life, because he had advised the satraps to fight with Alexander, instead of retiring before him and laying waste the country, as Memnon had recommended. (Arrian, Anab. l. 13, 17; Paus. l. 29. § 7.)

ARTABANUS (Artabanes), sometimes written Artabanes or Artanes. 1. A son of Hystaspes and brother of Dareius Hystaspes, is described by Herodotus (iv. 63) as dissuading his brother from the expedition against the Scythians. In the reign of Xerxes, the successor of Dareius, Artabanus appears occasionally again in the character of a wise and frank counsellor, and Herodotus introduces him several times as speaking. (Herod. vii. 10, 46—53.)

2. An Hyrcanian, who was commander of the body-guard of king Xerxes. In n. c. 465, Artabanes, in conjunction with a eunuch, whom some call Sopasteus and others Mithridates, assassinated Xerxes, with the view of setting himself upon the throne of Persia. Xerxes had three sons, Dareius, Artaxerxes, and Hystaspes, who was absent from the court as satrap of Bactria. Now as it was necessary for Artabanus to get rid of these sons also, he persuaded Artaxerxes that his brother Dareius was the murderer of his father, and stimulated him to avenge the deed by assassinating Dareius. This was done at the earliest opportunity. Artabanus now communicated his plan of usurping the throne to his sons, and his intention to murder Artaxerxes also. When the moment for carrying this plan into effect had come, he insidiously struck Artaxerxes with his sword; but the blow only levied the king slightly, and the struggle which ensued Artaxerxes killed Artabanus, and thus secured the succession to himself. (Diod. xi. 69.) Justin (iii. 1), who knows only of the two brothers, Dareius and Artaxerxes, gives a different account of the circumstances under which Artabazus was killed. (Comp. Ctesias, Pers, p. 38, &c. ed. Lion; Aristot. Pol. v. 10.)

3. A Greek historian of uncertain date, who wrote a work on the Jews (του Παλαισον), some of the statements of which are preserved in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stron. i. p. 149), the Chronicum Alexandrinum (p. 146), and Eusebius. (Proc. Evang. i. 10, 23, 27.)

4. I. II. III, IV. kings of Parthia. [Arsaces, III, VII, XIX, XXXI.] [LS.]

ARTABAZES (Ἀρταβάζης). 1. The eldest son of Dareius Hystaspis, also called Arta- bignes. [Artaignes.]

2. King of the people whom Polybius calls the Satrapels, and who appear to have inhabited that part of Asia usually called Media Atropatene. Artabazanes was the most powerful king of this part of Asia in the Great, and appears to have descended from Atropat, who founded the kingdom in the time of the last king of Persia, and was never conquered by the Macedonians. When Antiochus marched against Artabazanes, in B.C. 220, he made peace with Antiochus upon terms which the latter dictated. (Polyb. v. 65.)

ARTABAZES. [Artaignes.]

ARTABAZUS (Ἀρταβάζος). 1. A Median, who acts a prominent part in Xenophon's account of Cyrus the Elder, whose relative Artabazus pretended to be. He is described there as a friend of Cyrus, and advising the Medes to follow Cyrus, and remain faithful to him. Cyrus employed him on various occasions; when Araspes was on the point of violating Pantheim, the wife of Abradates, Cyrus sent Artabazus to protect her; in the war against Croesus, Artabazus was one of the chieftains of the infantry. Cyrus bestowed upon him various honours and presents for his faithful attachment. (Xen. Cyrop. i. 4, § 27, iv. 1, § 23, v. 1, §§ 29, 35, vi. 3, § 31, vii. 5, § 48, viii. 3, § 28, ix. 1, § 1, 2, 24.)

2. A distinguished Persian, a son of Pharnaces, who lived in the reign of Xerxes. In the expedition of this king to Greece, B.C. 480, Artabazus commanded the Parthians and Chosimans. (Herod. vii. 66.) When Xerxes quitted Greece, Artabazus accompanied him as far as the Helles- pont, and then returned with his forces to Pallen. As Potidae and the other towns of Pallen had revolted from the king after the battle of Salamis, Artabazus determined to reduce them. He first led siege to Olynthus, which he took; he butchered the inhabitants whom he had compelled to quit the town, and burned the place and the town to the Chalcidians. After this Artabazus began the siege of Potidae, and endeavoured to gain his end by bribes; but the treachery was discovered and his plans thwarted. The siege lasted for three months, and when at last the town seemed to be lost by the low waters of the sea, which enabled his troops to approach the walls from the sea-side, an almost wonderful event saved it, for the returning tide was higher than it had ever been before. The troops of Artabazus were partly overwhelmed by the waters and partly cut down by a sally of the Potidaeans. He now withdrew with the remants of his army to Thessaly, to join Mardonius. (viii. 126—130.)

beaux for his fidelity with the satrapy of Bactria. His daughter, Barsine, became by Alexander the mother of Heracles; a second daughter, Artocama, was given in marriage to Ptolemy; and a third, Antonis, to Eumenes. In b.c. 320, Artabanus, a man of very advanced age, resigned his satrapy, which was given to Cleitus. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 23, 29, viii. 4; Curtius, Hist. 13, v. 9, 12, vi. 5, vi. 8, vi. 1; Strab. xii. p. 570; comp. Droysen, Gesch. Alter. der Grosse, p. 497.) [F. L. S.]

ARTACAMA. [ARTABARZIS, No. 4.]

ARTACHAEES (Ἀρταχαῖος), a distinguished Persian, and the tallest man in the nation, superintended the construction of the canal across the isthmus of Athos. He died while Xerxes was with his army at Athos; and the king, who was deeply grieved at his loss, gave him a splendid funeral, and the whole army raised a mound. In the time of Herodotus, the Acarnians, in pursuance of an oracle, sacrificed to Artachaeas as a hero. (Herod. vii. 22, 117.) This mound appears to be the one described by Lieutenant Wolfe, who remarks: "About 1 mile to the westward of the north end of the canal (of Xerxes) is the modern village of Erso (on the site of Acarnania), which gives its name to the bay, situated on an eminence overhanging the beach: this is crowned by a remarkable mound, forming a small natural citadel." (Classical Museum, No. I. p. 83, Lond. 1843.)

ARTANES (Ἀρτάνης), a son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius Hystaspis, had given his only daughter and all his property to Dareius, and was afterwards one of the distinguished Persians who fought and fell in the battle of Thermopylae. (Herod. vii. 224.) [L. S.]

ARTAPANUS or ARTAPANES. [ARTABARZIS.]

ARTAPHERNES (Ἀρταφέρνης). 1. A son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius Hystaspis, who was appointed satrap of Sards. In the year b.c. 503, when the Athenians sought the protection of Sparta, they sent an embassy to Artaphernes. The satrap answered, that the desired alliance with Persia could be granted only on condition of their recognizing the supremacy of King Darius. When Hippias, the son of Peisistratus, had taken refuge in Asia, he endeavoured to induce Artaphernes to support his cause, and the Athenians, on being informed of his machinations, again sent an embassy to Artaphernes, requesting him not to interfere between them and Hippias. The reply of Artaphernes, that they should suffer no harm if they would recall their tyrant, shewed the Athenians that they had to hope nothing from Persia. In b.c. 501, Artaphernes avenged the insult laid by the Greeks upon them, and which Artaxerxes of Miletus held out to him, in trade, with the king's consent, 200 ships and a Persian force at the command of Artagastoras, for the purpose of restoring the Naxian exiles to their country. But the undertaking failed, and Artaphernes, unable to realise his promises, was driven by fear to causing the insurrection of the Ionians against Persia. When in b.c. 499 Artagastoras and his Athenian allies marched against Sards, Artaphernes, not expecting such an attack, withdrew to the citadel, and the town of Sards fell into the hands of the Greeks and was burnt. But the Greeks returned, fearing lest they should be overpowered by a Persian army, which might come to the relief of Artaphernes. In the second year of the Ionian war, b.c. 497, Artaphernes and Otanes began to attack vigorously the towns of Ionia and Aeolis. Cumae and Clazomenae fell into the hands of the Persians. Artaphernes was sharp enough to see through the treacherous designs of Histiaeus, and expressed his suspicions to him at Sards. The fear of being discovered led Histiaeus to take to flight. Some letters, which he afterwards addressed to some Persians at Sards, who were concerned in his designs, were intercepted, and Artaphernes had all the guilty Persians put to death. From this time Artaphernes disappears from history, and he seems to have died soon afterwards. (Herod. v. 25, 30—32, 100, 123, vi. 1, &c.; comp. Hircania, Hist. Artagastoras, Hist. Arslan.)

2. A son of the former. After the unsuccessful enterprise of Mardonius against Greece in b.c. 492, king Dareius placed Datis and his nephew Artaphernes at the head of the forces which were to chastise Athens and Eretria. Artaphernes, though superior in rank, seems to have been inferior in military skill to Datis, who was in reality the commander of the Persian army. The troops assembled in Cllicia, and here they were taken on board 600 ships. This fleet met, secured the Samos, and thence to the Cyclades. Naxos was taken and laid in ashes, and all the islands submitted to the Persians. In Euboea, Cerys and Eretria also fell into their hands. After this the Persian army landed at Marathon. Here the Persians were defeated in the memorable battle of Marathon, b.c. 490, whereupon Datis and Artaphernes sailed back to Asia. When Xerxes invaded Greece, b.c. 480, Artaphernes commanded the Lydians and Mysians. (Herod. vi. 94, 116, vii. 16. § 2, 74; Aeschylus, Pers. 21.)

3. A Persian, who was sent by king Artaxerxes I., in b.c. 425, with a letter to Sparta. While he passed through Elen on the Strymon, he was arrested by Arestes, the son of Archippus, and carried to Athens, where the letter of his king was opened and translated. It contained a complaint of the king, that owing to the many and discrepant messages they had sent to him, he did not know what they wanted; and he therefore requested them to send a fresh embassy back with Artaphernes, and to explain clearly what they wished. The Athenians thought this a favourable opportunity for forming connexions themselves with Persia, and accordingly sent Artaphernes in a galley, accompanied by Athenian ambassadors, to Ephesus. On their arrival there they received intelligence of the death of king Artaxerxes, and the Athenians returned home. (Thuc. iv. 50.) [L. S.]

ARTAS. [ARTAPANUS. Time: (Apostles, Demetrius, and Suidas), a prince of the Messapians in the time of the Peloponnesian war. Thucydidcs (vii. 33) relates that Demosthenes in his passage to Sicily (b.c. 413) obtained from him a force of 150 dartmen, and renewed with him an old-existing friendly connexion. This connexion with Athens is explained by the long enmity, which, shortly before, was at its height, between the Messapians and the Lacedemonian Tarcentum. (Comp. Niebuhr, i. p. 148.) The visit of Demosthenes is, probably, what the comic poet Demetrias alluded to in the lines quoted from his "Sicily" by Athenaeus (ii. p. 109), who tells us further, that Polemon wrote a book about him. Possibly, however, as Polemon and Demetrias both flourished about 500 B.C., this may be a second Aris. The name is found also in Hesychius, who quotes from the lines of Demetrius, and in Suidas, who refers to Ptolemaios.

ARTAVASDES. [Arsacidas, p. 364, b.]

ARTAVASDES (Arsacidas or 'Arsacadés), or ARTAVAZES (Arsacidas), called by the Armenian historians, Artawatz. 1. King of the Greater Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes I (II). In the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians in B.C. 54, Artavasdes was an ally of the Romans; but when Orodes, the king of Parthia, invaded Media, and Artavasdes was unable to obtain assistance from the Romans, he concluded a peace with the Parthian king, and gave his sister or daughter in marriage to Pacorus, the son of Orodes. Whereupon the Christian church subsequently invaded Syria. In B.C. 51, Artavasdes threatened a descent upon Cappadocia; and Cicero, who was then governor of Cilicia, made preparations to meet him; but the defeat of Pacorus put an end to his designs. (Plut. Crass. 19, 21, 22, 33; Dion Cass. xii. 16; Cic. ad Att. v. 20, 21, ad Rom. xvi. 2, 3.)

We next hear of Artavasdes in Antony's campaign against the Parthians in B.C. 36. Artavasdes joined the Romans, as he wished to injure his namesake Artavasdes, king of Media, with whom he was at enmity. He accordingly persuaded Antony to invade Media, but then treacherously deserted him and returned with all his forces to Armenia. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25, 31; Plut. Ant. 39, 30; Strab. xi. p. 594.) The desertion of the Armenian king was one of the main causes of the failure of the Roman expedition [see p. 216, a.]; and Antony accordingly determined to be revenged upon Artavasdes. After deferring his invasion of Armenia for a year, he entered the country in B.C. 34, and contrived to entice Artavasdes into his camp, where he was immediately seized. The Armenians thereupon set upon the throne his son Artaxias [Artaxias II.]; but Artavasdes himself, with his wife and the rest of his family, was carried to Alexandria, and led in triumph in golden chains. He remained in captivity till B.C. 30, when Cleopatra had him killed, after the battle of Actium, and sent his head to his old enemy, Artavasdes of Media, in hopes of obtaining assistance from him in return. (Dion Cass. xix. 33, 39, 40, I. 1, ii. 5; Plut. Ant. 59; Liv. Epit. 131; Vell. Pat. ii. 82; Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Strab. xi. p. 532; Joseph, Ant. xvi. 4 § 3, B. J. i. 18, § 5.)

This Artavasdes was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote tragedies, speeches, and historical works, some of which were extant in Plutarch's time. (Plut. Crass. 33.)

ARTAVASDES II., perhaps the son of Artaxias II., was placed upon the Armenian throne by Augustus after the death of Tigranes II. He was however deposed by the Armenians; and C. Caesarius, who was sent into Armenia to settle the affairs of the country, made Ariobarzanes, a Mede, king. (Tac. Ann. ii. 3, 4.)

There was another king of the name of Artavasdes in the later history of Armenia, respecting whom see Arsacidas, p. 363, b.

ARTAVASDES, king of Media, Atropatene, and an enemy of Artavasdes I., king of Armenia. Antony invaded his country in B.C. 36, at the instigation of the Armenian king, and laid siege to his capital, Phraasia. After Antony, however, had been obliged to retreat from Media with great loss, Artavasdes had a serious quarrel with the Parthian king, Phraates, about the booty which had been taken from the Romans. In consequence of this dispute, and also of his desire to be revenged upon the king of Armenia, Artavasdes offered peace and alliance to Antony, through means of Ptolemy, king of Pontus. This offer was gladly accepted by Antony, as he too wished to punish the Armenian king on account of his desertion of him in his campaign in Media. After Antony had conquered Armenia in B.C. 34, the alliance between him and Artavasdes was rendered still closer by the latter giving his daughter, Iotope, in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. Artavasdes further engaged to assist Antony with troops when necessary. Artavasdes finally promised the Median king help against the Parthians. With the assistance of the Roman troops, Artavasdes was for a time enabled to carry on the war with success against the Parthians and Artaxias II., the exiled king of Armenia; but when Antony recalled his forces in order to oppose Octavianus, Artavasdes was defeated by Artaxias, and taken prisoner. Artavasdes recovered his liberty shortly afterwards. Plutarch (Ant. 61) mentions Median troops at the battle of Actium; but these might have been sent by Artavasdes before his captivity. After the battle of Actium, Octavianus restored to Artavasdes his daughter Iotope, who had married Antony's son. Artavasdes died shortly before B.C. 20. (Dion Cass. xlix. 28, 30, 41, i. 1, ii. 16, liv. 9; Plut. Ant. 38, 52.)

ARTAVASDES or ARTABASDES (Arsacidas), emperor of Constantinople, was probably descended from a noble Armenian family. During the reign of Constantine V. Copronymus (A.D. 741—775), he was appointed Corepalatus, and married Anna, a daughter of this emperor. Constantine, as his nick-name Caballinus indicates, would have made an excellent groom, but was a bad emperor; excited by fanaticism, he was active in the destruction of images in the churches, and thus acquired the name of the new Mohammad. Artavasdes, an adherent of the worship of images, profited from the discontent of the people against Constantine, and during a campaign of the emperor against the Arabs, prepared a revolt in Phrygia. Constantine, doubtful of his fidelity, demanded the sons of Artavasdes as hostages for the good conduct of their father, who refused to give them up, and suddenly surprised his master at the head of an army. Constantine was defeated, and fled into Phrygia Pocotiana, where he assembled his troops. Meanwhile, the rebel had won over the patrician Theophanes Menotes and Anastasius, the patriarch of Constantinople, to his cause. Both these men had great influence among the people, whom they persuaded that Constantine was dead; and thus Artavasdes was proclaimed emperor. He and Constantine both tried to obtain the aid of the Arabs, but they assisted neither, and showed hostility to both. Artavasdes re-established the worship of images. He conferred the title of emperor upon his eldest son, Nicephorus; and he sent his second son, Nicetas, with an army into Armenia. Constantine found assistance among the warlike inhabitants of Isauria, and early in 743 opened a campaign against Artavasdes, which terminated in the fall of the usurper. In May, 743, Artavasdes was defeated near Sardia; and in August, 743, his son Nicetas was routed at Comopolia in Bithynia:
this battle fell Tigranes, a noble Armenian, the cousin of Artavasdes. The usurper fled to Ken-stantinople, which was besieged by the imperial forces; and while this city was exposed to the horrors of famine, Nicetus was taken prisoner next Nicomedea. On the 2nd of November, 743, the besiegers took Constantinople by storm.
Artavasdes, his sons, and his principal adherents, had their eyes put out, were conducted through the city on asses, with the tails in their hands, and were afterwards all put to death. Artavasdes was recognized as emperor by pope Zacharias. (Ced-reuma, i, pp. 795-83, ed. Bonn.; Zonaras, ii, pp. 107, 108, ed. Paris;Procopius, de Bell. Pers. l, 2, &c.; ARTAXERXES or ARTAXERXES (Ἀρτά-ξέρξης or Ἀρτάξερξης) is the name of three Persian kings, and signifies, according to Herodotus (v, 28), "the great warrior" (μέγας ἀρπάξας).
The word is compounded of Arta, which means "honoured" [see p. 284, a.], and Xerxes, which is probably the same as the Zend, ksatara, and the Sanscrit, kṣaṭāra, "a king:" consequently Artaxerxes would mean "the honoured king."
ARTAXERXES I., surnamed Longipinnus (Ma-ρχόθης) from the circumstance of his range being longer than his left (Plut. Artax. x.), was king of Persia for forty years, from b. c. 465 to
b. c. 425. (Diod. xi. 69, xii. 64; Thuc. iv. 50.)
He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I., had been murdered by Artabanus, and after he himself had put to death his brother Darius on the instigation of Artabanus. (Justin. iii. 1; reign is characterized by Plutarch and Diodorus
(xii. 71) as wise and temperate, but it was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps. At the time of his accession his only remaining brother Hystaspes was satrap of Bactria, and Artaxerxes had scarcely punished Artabanus and his associates, before Hystaspes attempted to make himself independent. After putting down this insurrection and disposing several other satraps who refused to obey his commands, Artaxerxes turned his attention to the regulation of the financial and military affairs of his empire. These beneficent exertions were interrupted in b. c. 462, or, according to Clinton, in a. c. 460, by the insurrection of the Egyptians under Inarus, who was supported by the Athenians. The first army which Artaxerxes sent under his brother Achae-menes was defeated, and Achaemenes slain.
After a useless attempt to incite the Spartans to a war against Athens, Artaxerxes sent a second army under Artabanus and Megabyzus into Egypt.
A remnant of the forces of Achaemenes, who were still besieged in a place called the white castle (λευκὴν τέχνης), near Memphis, was relieved, and the fleet of the Athenians destroyed by the Athenians themselves, who afterwards quitted Egypt.
Inarus, too, was defeated in b. c. 456 or 455, but Amyraeus, another chief of the insurgents, maintained himself in the marshes of lower Egypt. (Thuc.
iv. 104, 106; Diod. xi. 7, 74; iii. 14.) In
b. c. 449, Cimon sent 60 of his decked 300 ships to the assistance of Amyraeus, and with the rest deceived to wrest Cyprus from the Persians.
Notwithstanding the death of Cimon, the Athenians gained two victories, one by land and the other by sea, in the neighbourhood of Salamis in Cyprus. After this defeat Artaxerxes is said to have commanded his generals to conclude peace with the Greeks on any terms. The conditions on which this peace is said to have been concluded are as follows:—that the Greek towns in Asia should be restored to perfect independence; that no Persian satrap should approach the western coast of Asia nearer than the distance of a three days' journey; and that no Persian ship should sail through the Bosporus, or pass the town of Phasaelis or the Chelidonian islands on the coast of Lycia.
(Diod. xii. 4; comp. Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, iii.
p. 57, &c.) Thucydides knows nothing of this humiliating peace, and it seems in fact to have been fabricated in the age subsequent to the events to which it relates. Soon after these occurrences Megabyzus revolted in Syria, because Artaxerxes had put Inarus to death contrary to the promise which Megabyzus had made to Inarus, when he made him his prisoner. Subsequently, however, Megabyzus became reconciled to his master.
(Ctesias, ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 50, &c.; comp. Magabyzus, Inarus.) Artaxerxes appears to have passed the latter years of his reign in peace.
On his death in b. c. 425, he was succeeded by his son Xerxes II. (Clinton, Fast. Hell. ii, sub anno, 455, and p. 380.)
ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Mithravon (Μιθρά-βων) from his good memory, succeeded his father, Da-reus II., as king of Persia, and reigned from b. c.
485 to b. c. 462. (Diod. xiii. 104, 108.) Cyrus, the younger brother of Artaxerxes, was the favourite of his mother Parysatis, and she endeavoured to obtain the throne for him; but Dareius gave to Cyrus only the satrapy of western Asia, and Artaxerxes on his accession confirmed his brother in that satrapy, on the request of Parysatis, although he suspected him. (Xenoph. Anab. i. 1, § 3; Plut. Artax. 3.) Cyrus, however, revolted against his brother, and supported by Greek mercenaries invaded Upper Asia. In the neighbourhood of Cunaxa, Cyrus gained a great victory over the far more numerous army of his brother, b. c. 491,
but was slain in the battle. [Cyrus.] Tissaphernes was appointed satrap of western Asia in the place of Cyrus (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 1, § 3), and was actively engaged in wars with the Greeks. [This-bron; Darevliades; Agesilas.] Notwithstanding these perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself
by the disunion among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented and kept up by Persian money. The peace of Antalcidas, in a. c. 366, gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they had possessed before. [Antalcidas.]
But the empire was suffering from internal disturbances and confusion: Artaxerxes himself was a weak man; his mother, Parysatis, carried on his herrors at the court with truly oriental cruelty; and slaves and eunuchs wielded the reins of government. Tributary countries and satraps deceived, under such circumstances, to make themselves independent, and the exertions which it was necessary to make against the rebel examples brought the empire. Artaxerxes thus had to maintain a long struggle against Evagors of Cyprus, from b. c. 385 to b. c. 376, and eyet all he could gain was to confine Evagors to his original possession, the town of Salamis and ithe vicinity, and to compel him to pay a moderate tribute. (Diod. xv. 9.) At the same time he had to carry on war against the Carduans, on the shores of the Caspian sea; and after his numerous army was with great difficulty saved from total destruction he concluded a peace without gaining any advantages. (Diod. xvi. 9, 10; Plut. Arat. 24.) His attempts to recover Egypt were unsuccessful, and the general insurrection of his subjects in Asia Minor failed only through treachery among the insurgents themselves. (Diod. xv. 90, &c.) When Artaxerxes felt that the end of his life was approaching, he endeavoured to prevent all quarrels respecting the succession by fixing upon Dareius, the eldest of his three legitimate sons (by his concubines he had no less than 115 sons, Justin, x. 1), as his successor, and granted to him all the outward distinctions of royalty. But Dareius soon after fell out with his father about Aspasia, and formed a plot to assassinate him. But the plot was betrayed, and Dareius was put to death with many of his accomplices. (Plut. Arat. 26, &c.; Justin, l. c.) Of the two remaining legitimate sons, Ochus and Ariaspes, the former now hoped to succeed his father; but as Ariaspes was beloved by the Persians on account of his gentle and amiable character, and as the aged Artaxerxes appeared to prefer Arsames, the son of one of his concubines, Ochus contrived by intrigues to drive Ariaspes to despair and suicide, and had Arsames assassinated. Artaxerxes died of grief at these horrors in b. c. 362, and was succeeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne under the name of Artaxerxes III. (Plut. Life of Arat- axerxes; Diod. xv. 93; Phot. Bibl. pp. 42—44, ed. Bekker; Clinton, Fast. Helmin. ii. p. 381, &c.) Artaxerxes III, also called Ochus, succeeded his father as king of Persia in b. c. 362, and reigned till b. c. 339. In order to secure the throne which he had acquired by treason and murder, he began his reign with a merciless extremity of the members of his family. He himself was a cowardly and reckless despot; and the great advantages which the Persian arms gained during his reign, were owing only to his Greek generals and mercenaries, and to traitors, or want of skill on the part of his enemies. These advantages consisted in the conquest of the revolted satrap Artabazus [Artabaz, No. 4], and in the reduction of Phoenicia, of several revolted towns in Syria, and of Egypt. (Diod. xviii. 29, 33, 34; Plut. Cris. 6.) From this time Artaxerxes withdrew to his seraglio, where he passed his days in sensual pleasures. The reins of the government were entirely in the hands of the eunuch Bagoas, and of Mentor, the Rhodian, and the existence of the king himself was kept by his subjects only in the bloody commands which he issued. At last he was killed by poison by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son, Artaxias. (Diod. xvi. 5; Plut. De Is. et Os. 11; Asiod, V. H. iv. 8, vi. 8, H. A. x. 28; Justin, x. 3; comp. Clinton, Fast. Helmin. ii. p. 382, &c.) Respecting Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanids, see Sassanides. [L.S.]

ARTAXIAS (Arọgriola) or ARTAXES (Ar- taycet) is the name of the first king of Artaxias.

1. The founder of the Armenian kingdom, was one of the generals of Antiochus the Great, but revolted from him soon after his peace with the Romans in b. c. 188, and became an independent sovereign. (Strab. xi. pp. 529, 531, 532.) Hannibal took refuge at the court of Artaxias, when Antiochus was no longer able to protect him, and he superintended the building of Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, which was so called in honour of Artaxias. (Strab. xi. p. 532; Plut. Lecull. 31.) Artaxias was included in the peace made between Eumenes and Pharnaces in b. c. 179 (Polyb. xxvi. 6), but was conquered and taken prisoner by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes towards the end of his reign, about b. c. 165. (Appian, Syr. 45, 66.)

II. The son of Artavasdes I, was made king by the Armenians when his father was taken prisoner by Antony in b. c. 34. He risked a battle against the Romans, but was defeated and obliged to fly into Parthia. But with the help of the Parthians he regained his kingdom soon afterwards, and defeated and took prisoner Artavasdes, king of Media, who had opposed him. [Artyavasdes.] On his return to Armenia, he put to death all the Romans who had remained behind in the country; and in consequence of that, Augustus refused to restore his relatives, when he sent an embassy to Rome to demand them. When the Armenians in b. c. 20 complained to Augustus about Artaxias, and requested as king his brother Tigranes, who was then at Rome, Augustus sent Tigranes with a large army into Armenia, in order to depose Artaxias and place Tigranes upon the throne; but Artaxias was put to death by his relatives before Tigranes reached the country. Tigranes was now proclaimed king without any opposition; but Tigranes took the credit to himself of a successful expedition; whence Homai (Epit. i. 19 25) says, "Claudius virtute Nerones Armenia occidi." (Dio. Cass. xlix. 39, 40, 41, l. 16, liv. 9; Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Vell. Pat. ii. 94; Joseph. Ant. xv. 4, § 3; Strut. Tiber. 9.) Velleius Paterculus (l. c.) calls this king Artyavasdes, and Dion Cassius in one passage (liv. 9) names him Artahas, but in all the others Artaxas.

III. The son of Polemon, king of Pontus, was proclaimed king of Armenia by Germanicus in a. d. 18, at the wish of the Armenians, whose favour he had gained by adopting their habits and mode of life. His original name was Zenon, but the Armenians called him Artyaxias on his accession. Upon the death of Artaxias, about a. d. 35, Arseses, the son of the Parthian king, Artabanus, was placed upon the Armenian throne by his father. (Dio. Cass. xlii. 56, xi. 21.)

ARTAYCTES (Artyagettys), a Persian, the son of Cherasmes, commanded the Macrones and Mosynoced in the expedition of Xerxes into Greece. He was at the time governor of the town of Sestus and its territory on the Hellespont, where he ruled as an arbitrary and reckless tyrant. When Xerxes passed through Sestus, Artayctes induced the king by fraud to give him the tomb and sacred land of the hero Protelesius, which existed at Elaeus near Sestus; he then pillaged the tomb, and made profane use of the sacred land. This sacrilegious act was not forgiven him by the Greeks. He did not expect to see an enemy at such a distance from Athens; when, therefore, in b. c. 479, Xanthippus appeared in the Hellespont with a fleet, Artayctes not being prepared for a siege. However the town was strongly fortified and able to resist a besieging army. Xanthippus continued his siege during the whole winter, but on the approach of spring the famine in the town became insupportable; and Artayctes and Oeobazus, a Persian of high rank, succeeded in making their escape through the lines of the besiegers. As soon as the Greek inhabitants of Sestus heard of the flight of their govern-nor, they opened their gates to the Athenians. The two fugitives were pursued, and Artayctes and his son were overtaken and brought before Xanthippus. Artayctes offered 100 talents to the inhabitants of Eleusis as an atonement for the outrage he had committed against the tomb of Prophesia, and 200 more as a ransom for himself and his son. But the inhabitants would not accept any other atonement than his life, and Xanthippus was obliged to give him up to them. Artayctes was then nailed to a cross, and his son stoned to death before his eyes. (Herod. vii. 33, 78, ix. 116, 118—120; Paus. i. 4. § 5.)

ARTAYCTES (Ἀρταγάντα), a daughter of Maestias, the brother of Xerxes I. Xerxes gave her in marriage to his son Dareius, but he himself was in love with her, and on one occasion was obliged, by his own imprudent promise, to give her a robe which he had received as a present from his wife Amastria. Thus the king’s paramour became known, and Amastria, fancying that the affair would bring misfortune to the state, took the most cruel vengeance upon her. (Herod. ix. 108—110.) Maximus Tyrrus (xxvi. 7) confounds the two women, Amastria and Artayc. (Comp. Tzetz. Chil. ii. 6.)

ARTAYCTES (Ἀρταγάντα), one of the generals in the army of Xerxes. When Xerxes had returned to Asia after the battle of Salamis, Artayctes, Itiammites, and some other generals, sailed to Samos in order to watch the Ionians, and in the hope that the land-force under Mardonius in northern Greece might still be successful. But after the battles of Platane and Mycale, in b. c. 479, Artayctes and Ithamites took flight. While Artayctes was passing through Asia, he was met by Maestias, the brother of Xerxes, who concealed him severely for his cowardly flight. Artayctes, enraged, drew his sword and would have killed Maestias, but he had not been saved by Xingona, a Greek, who seized Artayctes at the moment and threw him on the ground, for which act he was liberally rewarded. (Herod. viii. 130, ix. 102, 107.)

ARTEMBARES (Ἀρτέμμαρης), a Median of noble rank, whose son, according to the story about the youth of the great Cyrus, was one of the playmates of Cyrus. Cyrus chastised him for his want of obedience in their play; and Artembares, indignant at the conduct of Cyrus, who was believed to be a mere shepherd’s boy, complained to king Astyages, and thus became the means of discovering that Cyrus was the son of Mandane and the grandson of Astyages. (Herod. i. 114—116.) Two Persians of this name occur in Herodotus (ix. 122), and Aeschylus. (Poes. 29, 294.)

ARTEMISIA. [CLEISM.]

ARTEMIDORUS (Ἀρτέμιδωρος). 1. Sur- named Aristophilus, and also Pseudo-Aristo-philus, from his being a disciple of the celebrated grammarians Aristophanes, of Byzantium at Alexandria. Artemidorus himself was, therefore, a contemporary of Aristarchus, and likewise a grammnarian. He is mentioned by Athenaeus (iv. p. 162) as the author of a work περὶ Δωδοκῶν, the nature of which is not clear, and of λέξεως χρηστοτέλεος, that is, a dictionary of technical terms and expressions used in the art of cookery. (Athen. i. p. 5, ii. p. 387, xiv. pp. 682, 683; Suidas, s. v., Ἀρτέμιδωρος καί Τυρεύς; Eran. in Λαγιά.) Some MSS. of Thesaurus contain, under the name of Artemidorus, an epigram of two lines on the collection of heklos poems, which perhaps belongs to our grammarian. (Theocr. p. 806, ed. Kiessling; Anthol. Graec. ix. ii. 205.)

2. Of ASCALON, wrote a history of Bithynia, and is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἀσκαλὼν) as one of the distinguished persons of that place.

3. Of NIDUS, a son of Theopompos, and a friend of Julius Caesar (Strab. xiv. p. 656), was a rhetorician, and taught the Greek language at Rome. At the time when the plot was formed against the life of Caesar, n. c. 43, Artemidorus, who had heard of it, cautioned Caesar by a letter, and urged him to take care of himself; but the warning was not heeded. (Plin. Chas. 65; Zo- manes, vol. i. p. 191, ed. Paris.)

4. DALDIANUS, was a native of Ephesus, but is usually called Daldianus (Δαλδίανος), to distinguish him from the geographer Artemidorus, whose works (Padon, 22), since his mother was born at Daldia or Daldis, a small town in Lydia. Artemidorus himself also preferred the surname of Daldianus (Onesirc. iii. 66), which seems to have been a matter of pride with him, as the Daldian Apollo Mystes gave him the especial commission to write a work on dreams. (Onesirc. ii. 70.) He lived at Rome in the reign of Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius, as we may infer from several passages of his work (i. 28, 66, iv. 1), though some writers have placed him in the reign of Constantine, and others identify him with the friend of Pliny the younger, and son-in-law of Mounius. (Plin. Epist. iii. 11.) But the passages of Artemi-dorus’s own work cited above, place the question beyond all doubt. Artemidorus is the author of a work on the interpretation of dreams (Ὀνειρολογία), in five books, which is still extant. He collected the materials for this work by very extensive reading (he asserts that he had read all the books on the subject, on his travels through Asia, Greece, Italy, and the Grecian islands. (Onai. Prooem. lib. i.) He himself intimates that he had written several works, and from Suidas and Eudocius we may infer, that one was called διωνυσιακώς, and the other χειροσυνώς. Along with his occupations on these subjects, he also practised as a physician. From his work on dreams, it is clear that he was acquainted with the principal productions of more ancient writers on the subject, and his object is to prove, that in dreams the future is revealed to man, and to clear the science of interpreting them from the abuses with which the fashion of the time had surrounded it. He does not attempt to establish his opinion by philosophical reasoning, but by appealing to facts partly recorded in history, partly derived from oral tradition of the people, and partly from his own experience. On the last point he places great reliance, especially as he believed that he was called to his task by Apollo. (ii. 70.) This makes him convicted, and raises him above all fear of censure. The first two books are dedicated to Cassius Maximus. The third and fourth are inscribed to his son. The fifth book is, properly speaking, an independent work, the title of which is unknown; for we are not acquainted with the work, which contains a collection of interesting dreams which were believed to have been realized. The style of the work is simple, correct, and elegant; and this, together with the circumstance that Artemidorus has often occasion to allude to or explain ancient manners and usages, give it a peculiar value. The work has also great interest, because it shows us in what manner the ancients symbolized and interpreted certain events of ordinary life, which, when well understood, throws light on various points of ancient mythology. The first edition of the Oneirocritica is that of Aldus, Venice, 1518, 8vo; the next is that of Rigaltus (Paris, 1603, 4to), which contains a valuable commentary; however, it goes down only to the 68th chapter of the second book. The last edition is that of J. G. Reiff, Leipzig, 1805. 2 vols. 8vo. It contains the notes of Rigaltus, and some by Reiseke and the editor.

5. A MEGRICUS philosopher, who, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 53), wrote a work against Chrysippus.

6. Of Ephesus, a Greek geographer, who lived about B.C. 100. He made voyages round the coasts of the Mediterranean, in the Red Sea, and apparently even in the southern ocean. He also visited Iberia and Gaul, and corrected the accounts of Eratosthenes respecting those countries. We know that in his description of Asia he stated the distances of places from one another, and that the countries beyond the river Tanais were unknown to him. The work in which he gave the results of his investigations, is called by Marcianus of Heraclein, a Περίπτοσις, and seems to be the same as the one more commonly called τὰ γεωγραφικά, or τὰ τῆς γεωγραφίας βιβλία. It consisted of eleven books, of which Marcianus afterwards made an abridgment. The original work, which was highly valued by the ancients, and is quoted in innumerable passages by Strabo, Stephanus of Byzantium, Pliny, Isidorus, and others, is lost; but we possess many small fragments and some larger ones of Marcianus’ abridgment, which contain the pepthius of the Pontos Euxinius, and accounts of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. The loss of this important work was to some degree remedied, not only by an account of the geographical information which it contained, but also because the author entered into the description of the manners and costumes of the nations he spoke of. The fragments of Artemidorus were first collected and published by D. Hoeschel in his Geographica, Aug. Vindel. 1600, 4to. The best collection is that in Hudson’s Geographie Minores, vol. i. Two small fragments, not contained in Hudson, have been published by Van Goen in his edition of Phorrhurus’ Autobai Nymphaeum, p. 67, and a third, containing a description of the Nile is printed in Arretin’s Beträge zur Gesch. und Lit. vol. i. p. 49, &c. (Veitliefer, de Hist. Act. xiii. p. 182, vol. vii. p. 311, Wermuth.) Athenaeus (iii. p. 111) alludes to this Artemidorus a work entitled Θρακαί πνευματα. (Comp. Ubert, Geogr. der Griech. u. Röm. L 2, p. 141, &c., 250.)

7. A son-in-law of Musonius, the philosopher, was himself likewise a philosopher, and a friend of Pliny, the younger, one of whose letters (iii. 11) is full of his praise.

8. Of Parion, an astronomer, whose views of his science are recorded by Seneca. (Quaest. Nat. L 4, vil. 13.)

9. Of Tarus, a grammarian, whom Strabo (xiv. p. 675) mentions as one of the distinguished persons of that place. It is not impossible that he may be the same as the one to whose grammatical or lexicographical works reference is made by the Schoioli on Aristophanes (Fesp. 1139, 1164, 1243; Comp. Phot. s. v. τευτώνω, Eutyn. M. s. v. δρασσάμενος and ἄρμεν), though the work or works here referred to may also belong to No. 1.

10. Of Tarlles, a celebrated paganist, who lived about A.D. 69. (Paus. vi. 14, § 1; Martyal, vil. 77.)

11. The author of elegies on love. (Ποιήσεως, Eratosth. Calist. 31.) There are many more persons of the name of Artemidorus who are mentioned in ancient writers; but as nothing is known about them, we refer to the list in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. v. p. 263), to which some supplements are given by Van Goen. (l. c.)

ARTEMIDORUS (Ἀρτεμιδώρος). 1. A Greek physician, quoted by Caellus Aurelianus (De Morb. Aust. ii. 31, iii. 14, 15, pp. 146, 224, 227), who was a native of Side in Pamphylia, and a follower of Erasistratus. He must have lived some time between the third century B.C. and the second century after Christ. He may perhaps be the person quoted by Galen without any distinguishing epithet (De Comp. Med. Medicin. sect. Lec. viii. p. 828), but he is probably not the same person as the Artemidorus οἰσιωτής who is mentioned by the same author. (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Rat. Voc. in Morb. Ac.” i. 15. vol. xv. p. 444.)

2. ARTEMIDORUS CAPITO (Ἀρτεμιδώρος ὁ Καπίτος), a Greek physician and grammarian at Rome, in the reign of the emperor Hadrian, A. D. 117—138, who published an edition of the works of Hippocrates, which Galen tells us (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” vol. xv. p. 21) was not only much valued by the emperor himself, but was also much esteemed even in Galen’s time. He is, however, accused of making considerable changes in the text, and of altering the old readings and modernizing the language. He was a relation of Dioscorides, who also edited the works of Hippocrates, and he is frequently mentioned by Galen. (Comment. in Hippocr. “De Humor.” vol. xvi. p. 2; Gloss. Hippocr. vol. xix. p. 85, &c.) He may perhaps be the person sometimes quoted simply by the name of Capito. [Capito.]

3. ARTEMIDORUS CORNELIUS, a physician, who was born at Perga in Pamphylia, or, according to some editions of Cicero, at Pergamus in Mysia. He was one of the unprincipled agents of Verres, whom he first assisted in his robbery of the temple of Diana at Perga, when he was legatus to Cn. Dolabella in Cilicia, b. c. 79 (Cic. 2 Verr. i. 20, iii. 21); and afterwards attended him in Sicily during his praetorship, b. c. 72—69, where, among other infamous acts, he was one of the judges (vocatores) in the case of Nympho. His original name appears to have been Artemidorus; he was probably at first a slave, and afterwards, on being freed by his master, (perhaps Cn. Cornelius Dolabella,) took the name of Cornelius. Cicero calls him in one place “Cornelius medicus” (2 Verr. iii. 11), in another “Artemidorus Pergaeus” (c. 21), and in a third “Artemidorus Cornelius” (c. 49); but it is plain that in each passage he refers to the same individual, though Eruciæus had in his Index Historiarum considered them as three different persons. [W. A. G.]

784 ARTEMIDORUS.
ARTEMIS. (Ἀρτέμις), one of the great deities of the Greeks. Her name is usually derived from θρέφεσθαι, uninjured, healthy, vigorous; according to which she would be the goddess who is herself inviolate and also grants strength and health to others. (Plat. Cret. p. 406, b.; Strab. xiv. p. 635; Eustath. ad Homer. pp. 32, 377, 1732.) According to the Homeric account and Hesiod (Theog. 918) she was the daughter of Zeus and Leto, whence Aeschylus (Sept. 148) calls her ἀληθευής. She was the sister of Apollo, and was born with him at the same time in the island of Delos. According to a tradition which Pausanias (viii. 37. § 3) found in Aeschylus, Artemis was a daughter of Demeter, and not of Leto, while according to an Egyptian story (Herod. ii. 156) she was the daughter of Dionysus and Isis, and Leto was only her nurse. But these and some other legends are only the results of the identification of the Greek Artemis with other local or foreign deities. The place of her birth is for the same reason not the same in all traditions: some say that it was the grove of Ortygia near Ephesus (Tact. Annal. iii. 61; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 1), others that it was Crete (Diod. v. 72), and others again, that she was the sister of Apollo, but born somewhat earlier, so that she was able to assist Leto in giving birth to Apollo. (Orph. Hymn. 34. 5; Spanoudem, ad Callim. p. 476, &c.) In the description of the nature and character of this goddess, it is necessary to distinguish between the different points of view from which the Greeks regarded her, and also between the real Greek Artemis and certain foreign deities, who for some resemblance or other were identified by the Greeks with their own Artemis.

1. Artemis as the sister of Apollo, is a kind of female Apollo, that is, she as a female divinity represented the same idea that Apollo did as a male divinity. This relation between the two is in many other cases described as the relation of husband and wife, and there seems to have been a tradition which actually described Artemis as the wife of Apollo. (Eustath. ad Homer. p. 1197.) In the character of sister of Apollo, Artemis is like her brother armed with a bow, quiver, and arrows, and sends plague and death among men and animals: she is a θεή δεσπότων. Sudden deaths, but more especially those of women, are described as the effect of her arrows. (Hom. Il. vi. 295, 427, &c., xix. 50, xiii. 483, &c.; Od. xi. 172, &c., 324, xv. 470, xviii. 202, xx. 61, &c., v. 124, &c.) She also acts sometimes in conjunction with her brother. (Od. xv. 410; H. i. 406.) As Apollo was not only a destructive god, but also averted the evils which it was in his power to inflict, so Artemis was at the same time a θεή σώτηρος; that is, she cared and alleviated the sufferings of mortals. Thus, for instance, she healed Aeneas, when he was wounded and carried into the temple of Apollo. (H. v. 447.) In the Trojan war she sided, like Apollo, with the Trojans. The man whom she looked graciously upon was prosperous in his fields and flocks, his house was thrifty, and he died in old age. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 129, &c.) She was more especially the protectress of the young, whom the epithets παρθένοις, κορασίοις, and φιλομενίκης (comp. Diod. v. 78); and Aeschylus (Agam. 142) calls her the protectress of young suckling-animals, and of the game ranging through the forests of the mountains. Artemis thus also came to be regarded as the goddess of the flocks and the chase: she is the huntress among the immortals; she is called the stag-killer (Λύκοκτονα), the hunter of the fawn (βιρίδακτρα), and κυνήγιστρα. (U. xlii. 511, 485, &c.; Hom. Hymn. in Dion. 10.) Artemis is moreover, like Apollo, unmarried; she is a maiden-divinity never conquered by love. (Soph. Elect. 1220.) The priests and priestesses devoted to her service were bound to live pure and chaste, and transgressions of their vows of chastity were severely punished. (Paus. vii. 19. § 1. viii. 13. § 1.) She was worshipped in several places together with her brother; and the worship of both deities was believed to have come from the Hyperboraeans, and Hyperborlean maidens brought sacrifices to Delos. (Herod. ii. 92, 95.) The laurel was sacred to both deities, and both were regarded as the founders and protectors of towns and streets. (Paus. i. 38. § 6, iii. 24. § 6, viii. 36, in fin.; Aeschyl. Sept. 450; Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 34.)

There are, however, some points also, in which there is no resemblance between Artemis and Apollo: she has nothing to do with music or poetry, nor is there any trace of her having been regarded as an oracular divinity like Apollo. Respecting the real and original character of Artemis as the sister of Apollo, we encounter the same difficulties as those mentioned in the article APOLLO, viz. as to whether she was a purely spiritual and ethical divinity, as Müller thinks, or whether she was the representative of some power in physical nature; and the question must be decided here in the same manner as in the case of Apollo. When Apollo was regarded as identical with the sun or Helios, nothing was more natural than that his sister should be regarded as Selene or the moon, and accordingly the Greek Artemis is, at least in later times, the goddess of the moon. Butmann and Hermann consider this idea of Artemis being the moon as the fundamental one from which all the others are derived. But, at any rate, the idea of Artemis being the goddess of the moon, must be confined to Artemis the sister of Apollo, and is not applicable to the Arcadian, Taurian, or Ephesian Artemis.

2. The Arcadian Artemis is a goddess of the nymphs, and was worshipped as such in Arcadia in very early times. Her sanctuaries and temples were more numerous in this country than in any other part of Greece. There was no connexion between the Arcadian Artemis and Apollo, nor are there any traces here of the ethical character which is so prominent in Artemis, the sister of Apollo. These circumstances, together with the fact, that her surnames and epithets in Arcadia are nearly all derived from the mountains, rivers, and lakes, shew that here she was the representative of some part or power of nature. In Arcadia she hunted with her nymphs on Taygetas, Brymanthus, and Maenalus; twenty nymphs accompanied her during the chase, and with sixty others, daughters of Oceanus, she held her dances in the mountains. Her bow, quiver, and arrows, were made by Hephaestus, and Pan provided her with dogs. Her chariot was drawn by four stags with golden antlers. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 18, 81, 90, &c.; Apollod. ii. 5. § 3; Pind. Ol. iii. 51.) Her temples and sanctuaries in Arcadia were usually near lakes or rivers, whence she was
3. The Taoean Artemis. The legends of this goddess are mystical, and her worship was organic and connected, at least in early times, with human sacrifices. According to the Greek legend there was in Tauris a goddess, whom the Greeks for some reason identified with their own Artemis, and to whom all strangers that were thrown on the coast of Tauris, were sacrificed. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 36.) Iphigenia and Orestes brought her image from thence, and landed at Aegina in Attica, whence the goddess derived the name of Brauronia. (Paus. i. 23. § 9, 33. § 1, iii. 16, in fin.) The Brauronian Artemis was worshipped at Athens and Sparta, and in the latter place the boys were scarred at her altar in such a manner that it became sprinkled with their blood. This cruel ceremony was believed to have been introduced by Lycurgus, instead of the human sacrifices which had until then been offered to her. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Βρευρονία and Ακμαστηγίσεως.) Her name at Sparta was Orthea, with reference to the phalus, or because her statue stood erect. According to another tradition, Orestes and Iphigenia concealed the image of the Taoean goddess in a bundle of bushwood, and carried it to Aulis in Latium. [Arigina.] Iphigenia, who was at first to have been sacrificed to Artemis, and then became her priestess, was afterwards identified with the goddess (Herod. iv. 103; Paus. i. 43. § 1), who was worshipped in some parts of Greece, as at Hermione, under the name of Iphigenia. (Paus. ii. 33. § 1.) Some traditions stated, that Artemis made Iphigenia immortal, in the character of Hecate, the goddess of the moon. [Hecate.] A kindred divinity, if not the same as the Taoean Artemis, is Artemis Ῥωσώδης, whose worship was connected with bloody sacrifices, and who produced madness in the minds of men, at least the chorus in the Ajax of Sophocles, describes the madness of Ajax as the work of this divinity. In the legends about the Taoean Artemis, it seems that separate local traditions of Greece are mixed up with the legends of some Asiatic divinity, whose symbol in the heaven was the moon, and on the earth the cow.

4. The Ephesian Artemis was a divinity totally distinct from the Greek goddess of the same name. She seems to have been the personification of the fruitful and all-nourishing powers of nature. It is an opinion almost universally adopted, that she was an ancient Asiatic divinity whose worship the Greeks found established in Ionia, when they settled there, and that, for some resemblance they discovered, they applied to her the name of Artemis. As soon as this identity of the Asiatic goddess with the Greek Artemis was recognised, other features, also originally part of the Asiatic Artemis, were transferred to her; and thus she is called a daughter of Leto, who gave birth to her in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. Her original character is sufficiently clear from the fact, that her priests were eunuchs, and that her image in the magnificent temple of Ephesus represented her with many breasts (πολυμαστή). The whole figure of the goddess resembled a mummy; her head was surmounted with a mural crown (corona aurea), and the lower part of her body, which ended in a point, like a pyramid upside down, was covered with figures of mythical animals. (Strab. xiv. p. 641; Paus. iv. 31. § 6, viii. 5. § 2.) The symbol of this divinity was a bee, and her high-priest bore the name of king (ἄγαμος). Her worship was said to have been established at Ephesus by the Amazons. (Paus. ii. 7. § 4, viii. 12. § 1; Hesych. and Suid. s. v. ἄγαμος.)

Respecting some other divinities, or attributes of divinities, which were likewise regarded as identical with Artemis in Greece, see Biritomartis, Dictynna, and Eleutheria. The Romans identified their goddess Diana with the Greek Artemis, and at a comparatively early time they transferred to their own goddess all the peculiar features of the Greek Artemis. [Diana.] The worship of Artemis was universal in all Greece, in Delos, Crete, Sicily, and southern Italy, but more especially in Arcadia and the whole of the Peloponnesus. The sacrifices offered to the Brauronian Artemis consisted of stags and goats; in Thessaly dogs were offered to Artemis. Among the animals sacred to the Greek Artemis we may mention the stag, boar, dog, and others; the fir-tree was likewise sacred to her.

It is impossible to trace the various relations in which Artemis appears to us to one common source, or to one fundamental idea: the very manner in which such a complicated mythus was formed renders the attempt futile, or, to say the least, forced. In the case of Artemis, it is evident, that new elements and features were added in various places to the ancient local mythus; the worship of one divinity is identified with that of another, and the legends of the two are mixed up into one, or those of the one are transferred to the other, whose legends then sink into oblivion.

The representations of the Greek Artemis in works of art are different accordingly as she is represented either as a huntress, or as the goddess of the moon; yet in either case she appears as a youthful and vigorous divinity, as becomes the sister of Apollo. As the huntress, she is tall, nimble, and has small hips; her forehead is high, her eye glancing freely about, and her hair tied up behind in such a manner, that some locks float down her neck. Her breast is covered, and the legs up to the knees are naked, the rest being covered by the chlamys. Her attributes are the bow, quiver, and arrows, or a spear, stag, and dogs. As the goddess of the moon, she wears a long robe which reaches down to her feet, a veil covers her head, and above her forehead rises the crescent of the moon. In her hand she often appears holding a torch. (Mitscheleich, de Diana Scopta, Götttingen, 1821; Müller, Dionis, book ii. c. 9; Museo Pio-Clement. i. 39; Hist. Mythol. Bilderk. i. p. 37.) [L.S.]

ARTEMISIA (Ἀρτεμίσια). 1. A queen of Halicarnassus, Cos, Nisyros, and Calydia, who ruled over these places as a vassal of the Persian empire in the reign of Xerxes I. She was a daughter of LYGORGUS. After the death of her husband, she succeeded him as queen. When Xerxes invaded Greece, she voluntarily joined his fleet with five beautiful ships, and in the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480) she distinguished herself by her prudence, courage, and perseverance, for which she was afterwards highly honoured by the Persian king. (Herod. vii. 99, viii. 68, 87, &c., 93, 101, &c.; Polyaen. viii. 53; Paus. iii. 11 § 3.) According to a tradition preserved in Photius (Bibl. p. 153, a. ed. Bekker), she put an end to her life in a romantic manner. She was in love, it is said, with Dardanus, a youth of Abydos, and as her passion was not returned, she avenged herself by putting his eyes out while he was asleep. This excited the anger of the gods, and an oracle commanded her to go to Leucas, where she threw herself from the rock into the sea. She was succeeded by her son Pisidella. Respecting the import of the phrase in regard to lovers, "to leap from the Leucadian rock," see SAPPHO.

2. The sister, wife, and successor of the Carian prince Menelaus. She was the daughter of Ece- donmus, and after the death of her husband, she reigned for two years, from B.C. 352 to B.C. 350. Her administration was conducted on the same principles as that of her husband, whence she supported the oligarchical party in the island of Rhodes. (Diod. xvi. 36, 45; Dom. de Rhodi. Lib. i. pp. 193, 197, 198.) She is renowned in history for her extraordinary grief at the death of her husband, and has been the subject of much discussion. She is said to have mixed her ashes in her daily drink, and to have gradually died away in grief during the two years that she survived him. She induced the most eminent Greek rhetoricians to proclaim his praises in their oratory; and to perpetuate his memory she built at Halicarnassus the celebrated monument, Mausoleum, which was regarded as one of the seven wonders of the world, and whose name subsequently became the generic term for any splendid sepulchral monument. (Cic. Tusc. iii. 21; Strabo, xiv. p. 656; Galliuss. x. 18; Plin. H. N. xxv. 36, xxxvi. 4 § 9; Val. Max. iv. 6. ext. 1; Suid. Harpocr. s.v. Ἀρτέμιδα καὶ Μαυσόλους.) Another celebrated monument was erected by her in the island of Rhodes, to commemorate her success in making herself mistress of the island. The Rhodians, after recovering their liberty, made it inaccessible, whence it was called in later times the Αἴσετον. [Vitr. iii. 8. [L. S.] ARTEMISIUS, a physician who was quoted by Marcilus Empiricus (De Medicina. c. 36. p. 410), and who must therefore have lived some time in or before the fourth century after Christ. He seems most probable that he is the same person who is called by a late writer another physician Artemisius. (Vitruv. i. 6. 298.) [W. A. G.] ARTEMISIUS, ANASTASIIUS. [ANASTASIIUS II.]

A'TREMON ('Ατρέμων). 1. Of Cassandria, a learned grammarians, who seems to have lived about B.C. 316. He is mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 515) as the author of—Περὶ οἰκουμνήσεως (according to others ἀναγωγής) βιβλίαν, which would either be on collecting books, or on assigning books to their proper authors. 2. Περὶ βιβλίων χρησῆς, οἱ Περὶ χρήσεως τῶν περὶ τὰς συναγωγὰς θεομορίας. (Athen. xiv. p. 694.) He is perhaps the same as the author of a work Περὶ τὴν ὁριστικόν συντήρησας, quoted by Athenaeus (xiv. pp. 636, 637), without any distinctive epithet. There is also a work on sublistes (Περὶ τῇρωτήτων) which is ascribed to one Artemon. (Harporcrat. s. v. Παράγυνστος.) Fabricius is inclined to believe, that our Artemon of Cassandra is the one of whom Demetrius (de Elocut. 231) speaks as the person who collected letters of Aristotle.

A'TREMON. 2. Of Clazomenae, is mentioned by Aselian (Hist. An. xi. 38) as the author of ἑορκος Ἀκαίρῳ, in which he mentioned that, at one time, the territory of Clazomenae was ravaged by a winged sow. Suidas (s. v. Ἀρέμων) ascribes to him a work on Homer (περὶ Ὀμήρου), of which, however, not a trace is now extant.

3. A HERETIC, who seems to have lived about the beginning of the third century of our era. It is also probable that he resided in or near Rome, since we read in Photius (Bibl. p. 12, a. ed. Bekker), that the celebrated presbyter Calus (about A.D. 210) wrote against Artemon and his heresies. From the synodal letter of the bishops assembled at Antioch in a. p. 209, who deposed the heretic Paul of Samosote (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), it seems clear that Artemon was regarded in the East as the precursor of the heresies of Paul, and perhaps also that Artemon was then still alive; at any rate, however, that his sect was still in existence. Artemon and his friend Theodotus denied the divinity of Christ, and asserted, that he was merely a prophet raised by his virtues above all others, and that God had made use of him for the good of mankind. (Euseb. H. E. v. 28; Theodoret. Hecat. fam. Epist. ii. 4.) These opinions were probably supported by Artemon and his followers, the Aretamonites, by philosophical arguments; for Eusebius states, that they occupied themselves very much with philosophy and mathematics, and that they made use of them in their interpretation of Scripture. They are charged with having introduced forged readings into the text of the Bible, and to have omitted certain passages from the copies they used. These accusations, however, rest on rather weak grounds. (C. H. Stemmler Diatriba de Scola Aretamonitarum, Leipzig, 1730; Schaffhausen, Historia Aretamonit et Aretamonitarum, Leipzig, 1737, 4to.)

4. A LAECEPAMONIAN, who built the military engines for Pericles in his war against Samos in n. c. 441. (Plut. Peric. 27; Diod. xii. 28; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ach. 802.) There was a celebrated statue of this Artemon made by Polyclitus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 18 § 2.) Servius (ad Aen. ix. 505) confounds him with Artemon of Clazomenae.

5. Of Magnesia, is known only as the author of a work on the virtues of women (περὶ τῶν κατὰ στέιμανας πεπραγμένων ἄνδρονων), of which Sopater made an abstract (Phot. Bibl. p. 103, a.) but both the original and the abstract are lost.

6. Called Mêostôs, from his being a melic poet, appears to have been a contemporary of the comic poet Aristophanes. (Acharn. 830, with the Schol.; Suid. s. v. Μηστης.) It is usually believed, that he is the author of the two epigrams still extant in the Anthologia Graeca. (xii. 55. 124.)

7. Of Milesius, wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams (ὄνωσις θρεπτικῶν), in twenty-two books, which is now lost. (Artemid. Onotos. ii. 49.; Eustath. ad Hom. H. ii. xvi. p. 1119.; Tertull. de Anim. 46.; Fulgent. i. 15.)

8. Of Perigamus, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote a history of Sicily, which is now lost, but is often mentioned by the grammarians. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 1, 32, iii. 48; O. ii. 16, V. 1; Isod. ii. Argum.; Schol. ad Lyceoph. 177.)

9. A RHETORICIAN, who seems to have lived during the early period of the Roman empire, and is mentioned several times by Seneca, who has also preserved some fragments of his. (Senec. Ssaes. 1; Contro. i. 6, 7, ii. 9, 11, i. 30, iv. 25, v. 30, 33.)

10. A Syrian of royal descent, who lived in and after the reign of Antiochus the Great. He resembled the king so much, that, when in B.C. 187, Antiochus was killed, the queen Laodice put Artemon into a bed, pretending that he was the king, and dangerously ill. Numbers of persons were admitted to see him; and all believed that they were listening to their king when they recommended to them Laodice and her children. (Plin. H. N. vii. 10; Val. Max. i. 14, ext. 1.) [L. S.]

ARTYBIUS (Ἀρτυβίος), a Persian general in the reign of Dareius Hystaspis, who, after the Ionian revolt had broken out, sailed with a fleet to Cyprus to conquer that island. He was killed in battle on Cesylos, the principal among the chiefs of Cyprus. (Herod. v. 108—110.) [L. S.]

ARTYSTO'NE (Ἀρτυστόνη), a daughter of the great Cyrus, was married to Dareius Hystaspis, who loved her more than any other of his wives, and had a golden statue made of her. She had by Darius a son, Arsames or Arsecaspis. (Herod. iii. 88, vii. 69.) [ARSAMES.]

[ARDY.] ARV'NA, a cognomen of the Cornella gens.

1. A. CORNELIUS P. P. A. N. Cossus ARVINA, whom Livy sometimes calls A. Cornelius Cossus, and sometimes A. Cornelius Arvina, was master equum in B.C. 353, and a second time in 349. (Liv. vii. 19, 36.) He was consul in B.C. 343, the first year of the Samnite war, and was the first Roman general who invaded Samnium. While advancing through the fertile posses of Samnium, his army was surprised in a valley by the enemy, and was only saved by the heroism of P. Decius, who seized with a body of troops a height which commanded the road. The consul then conquered the Samnites, and triumphed on his return to Rome. (vii. 28, 32, 34—35, x. 31; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. iii. p. 200, &c.) Arvina was consul again in B.C. 323 (A. Cornelius iterum, Liv. vii. 17), and dictator in 320, in the latter of which years he defeated the Samnites in a hard-fought battle, though some of the ancient authorities attributed this victory to the consuls of the year. (Liv. viii. 38, 40; Niebuhr, Hist. iii. p. 200, &c.)

2. A. CORNELIUS ARVINA, the father, sent to restore to the Samnites the prisoners who had been set free by them after the battle of Caudium, B.C. 321. (Liv. ix. 10.)

3. P. CORNELIUS A. P. P. N. ARVINA, apparently a son of No. 1, consul B.C. 306, commanded in Samnium. He was censor in B.C. 294, and consul a second time in 288. (Liv. ix. 42, &c., x. 47; Fest.)

ARULE'NUS RUSTICUS. [Rusticenus.]

ARUNS. 1. The son of Demeratus of Corinth, and the brother of Lucumo, afterwards L. Tarquinius Priscus, died in the life-time of his father. (Liv. i. 34; Dionys. ii. 46.)

2. The brother of L. Tarquinius Superbus, married to the younger Tullia, was murdered by his wife, who despised her husband's want of ambition and was anxious to marry his brother. (Liv. i. 46.)

3. The son of Tarquinius Superbus, went with Brutus to consult the oracle at Delphi, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins killed, and was at the same time killed by Brutus in battle. (Liv. i. 36, ii. 6; Cic. Tusc. iv. 22.)

4. The son of Porsena, accompanied his father to the Roman war, and was afterwards sent to besiege Aricia, before which he fell in battle. (Liv. ii. 14; Dionys. v. 36, vii. 5, 6.)

5. Of Clusium, according to the legend, invited the Gauls across the Alps. He had been guardian to a wealthy Lucumo, who, when he grew up, seduced the wife of Aruns. The husband in revenge carried wine, oil, and figs, across the Alps, and by these tempted the Gauls to invade Italy. (Liv. i. 33; Plut. Carth. 15.)

AR'ANTIUS. [Arnuntius.]

ARUSIANUS, MEISSUS or MEFFSUS, a Roman gymnasiarch, who lived under one of the later emperors. He wrote a Latin phrase-book, entitled "Quadriga, vel Exempia Exequionem ex Virgilio, Sallustio, Terentio, et Cicerone per litteras digesta." It is called Quadriga from its being composed from four authors. The work is valuable as preserving many passages from some of Cicero's lost writings, and from Sallust's History. He first gives a phrase generally, then an example, thus: "Firmatus illius rei, Sallust. Hist. iii. Ad Cyp- erum pervexit firmatus eunum. — Prudentius illarum rerum, Sall. Hist. i. Prudentius omnis quoam servavit esse eunecrat.

"The following words he arranges under the letter K: —Katai, karoico, katotes, khuo (abl. of times) kussae, klaucius, kalio, kalco, kauatu, kias.

In some MSS, the work is called "M. Frontonis Exempla Elocuendi," &c.; in others, "Arusianii (or Volusianii) Messae Quaestiones."

On the latter, and according to the MSS, it has often passed under the name of Fronto, and under his name it was published by Angelo Mai, from a MS. much mutilated, especially in the latter part. But after what Fronto says on Cicero and other authors, it seems highly improbable that he would have employed himself in composing such a work from these authors. He would have chosen some of his favourite writers, Ennui, &c. It is possible that the work may be an extract from Arusianus from a larger work by Fronto, which larger work would have been composed from a greater number of authors, including those which Fronto most admired. The best edition is that by Lindemann, in his Corpus Graecoromanum Latum. Text vol. i. p. 199, from a MS. in the Wolfenbüttel collection, in excellent condition, and which, with the exception of a few passages, gives the work complete. It contains more than half as much again as Malt's edition. This new part contains many of the most valuable passages, those from Cicero's lost writings and from Sallust's History. The transcriber has prefixed the following remark: — "In aliquibus Codicibus pro Arusiani Messi male irrepit Cornelli Frontoni." Lindemann gives in the notes the exact references to the passages which in the MS. are referred to only by the book. [Fronto.] (Nebhui, in his edit. of Fronto, Berlin, 1816, p. xxxi., &c.; Lindemann, Praefat. in Corp. Graec. Lat. Tit. i. p. 201, &c.)

[ A. A. ]

ARYANES (Ἀρυάνης), a Persian, who was appointed by Cambyses governor of Egypt. During his administration Pherecydes, the mother of Arse- chilus of Cyrene, is said to have come to Aryandes as a supplicant, and to have solicited his assistance in avenging the death of her son, who had been murdered at Barea, as she pretended, because he had been a friend of the Persians. Aryandes ac- cordingly placed an army and a fleet at her command. Herodotus thinks that this whole affair was a mere pretext under which the Persian satrap concealed his desire of conquering Libya. After the conquest of Barea, some of the Persians wanted to take possession of Cyrene also, but before they came to any determination, Aryandes sent a messenger to call the troops back to Egypt. Darius Hystaspes wished to perpetuate his own memory in a manner in which no king had yet done, and for this purpose he struck gold coins of the purest metal. Aryandes imitated the king by coining money of the purest silver; but Darius, ignant at such presumption, had him put to death. (Herod. iv. 165—167, 200—203.) [ I. S. ]

ARYBAS or ARYMBAS. [Arribas.]

ARYENIS. [ASYENIS.]

ASANDER (Ἀσανδέρ). 1. A son of Philo- tas and brother of Parmenon, Alexander the Great appointed him in B.C. 334, governor of Ly- dia and the other parts of the satrapy of Spithri- dates, and also placed under his command an army strong enough to maintain the Macedonian author- ity. (Arrian, Anab. i. 18.) In the beginning of the year B.C. 323, Asander and Nearchus led a number of Greek mercenaries to Alexander, who was then staying at Zariaesp. (iv. 7.) In the division of the empire after the death of Alexander, in B.C. 323, Asander obtained Caria for his satrapy, in which he was afterwards confirmed by Antipa- ter. (Philo. Hist. p. 64, a, 69, b, 75, a ed. Bekk.; Diod. xviii. 5, 83, who in these and other passages uses the name of Cassander instead of Asander, and those who followed him. Lucian, Iulius, i. 11; Justin, xiii. 4; Curtius, x. 10.) At the command of Antipater he fought against Attalus and Aelas, both partizans of Perdiccas (Philo. Hist. p. 72, b.), but was conquered by them. In B.C. 317, while Antigonus was engaged in Persia and Media, Asander increased his power in Asia Minor, and was undoubtedly a member of the confederacy which was formed by Ptolemy Lagi and Cassander of Macedonia against Antigonus, although he is not mentioned by Diodorus (xix. 57) on account of the above mentioned confusion with Cassander. In B.C. 315, when Antigonus began his operations against the confederates, he sent one Ptolemy, a nephew of his, to Caria, with an army to relieve Asander, and to expel from Cappadocia the army which Asander had invaded that country; but as Asa-nder was supported by Ptolemy Lagi and Cassander (Diod. xix. 69, 68), he maintained himself until B.C. 313, when Antigonus himself marched against him, and compelled him to conclude a treaty by which he was bound to surrender his whole army, to restore the Greek towns on the coast to free- dom, to regard his satrapy of Caria as the gift of Antigonus, and to give his brother Agathion as hostage. But after a few days Asander broke this humiliating treaty: he contrived to get his brother out of the hands of Antigonus, and sent ambassad- ors to Ptolemy and Seleucus for assistance. An- tigonus indignant at these acts, immediately sent out an army to restore the Greek towns to freedom by force of arms. Caria seems to have been conquered, and Asander from this time disappears from history. (Diod. xix. 75.)

2. A man of high rank in the kingdom of the Bosporus. He first occurs in history as a general of Pharnaces II. of the Bosporus, whose sister Dynamis was the wife of Asander. In B.C. 47, he revolted against his brother-in-law who had appointed him regent of his kingdom during his war against Cn. Domitius Calvinus. Asander hoped by thus deserting his brother-in-law to win the favour of the Romans, and with their assist- ance to obtain the kingdom for himself. When, therefore, Pharnaces was defeated by the Romans and took refuge in his own dominions, Asander had him put to death. Asander now usurped the throne, but was unable to maintain himself upon it. For Julius Caesar commanded Mithridates of Pergamus, on whom he conferred the title of king of the Bosporus, to make war upon Asander. (Dion Cass. xlii. 48—48, iv. 24; Appian, Mithrid. 120; Caesar, de Bello Alex. 78.) The result of this undertaking are not mentioned, but if we may believe the authority of Lucian (Maeol. 17) Asan- der was deprived of his kingdom and afterwards restored by Augustus. He died of voluntary starva- tion at the advanced age of ninety-three, from despair at seeing his troops desert to Scythians, Strabo (vii. p. 311) speaks of a wall or a ditch which Asander constructed across the Isthmus of the Crimea, of 360 stadia in length, to protect the peninsula against the incursions of the nomadic tribes. (Munnert, Geogr. der Griech. u. Röm. iv. p. 293.)

[LS]

ASIAEAEUS ('Aσαιαρας'), a surname of Zeus, the protector of the sanctity of oaths. It was derived from a well, Asiamaeon near Tyana, in Cappadocia, the water of which was said to be beneficial and pleasant to honest persons, but pestilential to those who were guilty of perjury. When perchured persons drank of the water, it produced a disease of the eyes, dropsy, and leucorrhoea, so that the guilty persons were unable to walk away from the well, and were obliged to own their crime. (Philostr. Vit. Apol. i. 6.; Pseudo-Aristot. Mirab. Auscult. 168; Ammian. Marcellin. xxiii. 6.)

[LS]

ASIOLUS (Ασιόλος), a contour, whom Hesiod (Sot. Hym. 185) calls δωναμώτης, probably from his skill in observing or prophesying from the flight of birds. He fought against the Lapithae at the nuptials of Peirithous, and was subsequently nailed to a cross by Heracles, who is said to have made an epitaph upon him, which is preserved in Pseudo-Aristotle. (Her. xix. § 17; comp. Tzetz. Chil. v. 22.)

[LS]

ASIALABUS (Ασιαλάβας), a son of Mische. When Demeter on her wanderings in search of her daughter Persephone came to Mische in Attica, the goddess was received kindly, and being exhausted and thirsty, Mische gave her something to drink. As the goddess emptied the vessel at one draught, Ascalabus laughed at her, and ordered a whole cask to be brought. Demeter indignant at his conduct, sprinkled the few remaining drops from her vessel upon him and thereby changed him into a lizard. (Antonin. Lib. 24; Ov. Met. v. 447, where a similar story is related, though without the name either of Mische or Ascalabus; Weleker, Das Kunst-Museum zu Bonn, p. 74, &c.) For different current legends respecting what happened to Demeter on her arrival in Attica, see Baudou, Iamb., and Metaphr.

ASCALAPIUS (Ασκαλάπιος). 1. A son of Ares and Astyoche, and brother of Ialmenus, together with whom he led the Minyans of Orchomenos against Troy, in thirty ships. (Hom. H. ii. 511, &c.) In the war against Troy, he was slain by the hand of Deiphobus, at which Ares was filled with anger and indignation. (Il. xii. 519, &c., xv. 110, &c.; comp. Paus. i. 37. § 3.) According to Apollodorus (1. 9. § 16, iii. 10. § 8) Ascalaphus was one of the Argonauts, and also one of the suitors of Helen. Hyginus in one passage (Fab. 97) calls Ascalaphus and Ialmenus sons of Lycurgus of Argos, while in another (Fab. 159) he agrees with the common account. One tradition described Ascalaphus as having gone from Troy to Samoera, and as having been buried there by Ares. The name of Samoera itself was derived from this occurrence, that is, from σάμια or σάμη and 'Aρης. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1009.)

2. A son of Acheron by Gorgyra (Apollod. i. 5. § 3) or by Orphne. (Ov. Met. v. 540.) Servius (ad Aen. iv. 462) calls him a son of Styx. When Persephone was in the lower world, and Pluto gave her permission to return to the upper, provided she had not eaten anything, Ascalaphus declared that she had eaten part of a pomegranate. Demeter (according to Apollodorus, l. c., ii. 5. § 12) punished him by burying him under a huge stone, and when subsequently this stone was removed by Heracles, she changed Ascalaphus into an owl. According to Ovid, Persephone herself changed him into an owl by sprinkling him with water of the river Phlegyas. There is an evident resemblance between the myths of Ascalaphus and that of Ascalaphus. The latter seems to be only a modification or continuation of the former, and the confusion may have arisen from the resemblance between the words δακαλαδός, a lizard, and δακαλάνως, an owl. (LS)

ASCALAPIUS (Ασκαλάπιος), a son of Hymenaeus, and a king of the Lydian king Aegeus. It is said he built the town of Ascalon in Syria. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Ασκαλάνως.)

[LS]

ASCALAPIUS (Ασκαλαπίος), a son of Aeneas by Creusa (Virg. Aen. ii. 669), or by Lavinia. (Liv. i. 1, 3; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 760.) From Livy it would seem that some traditions distinguished between an earlier and a later Ascanius, the one a son of Creusa, and the other of Lavinia. After the fall of Troy, Ascanius and some Phrygian allies of the Trojans were sent by Aeneas to the country of Daseylithis, whose inhabitants made Ascanius their king; but he soon returned to Troy, and ruled there after the death of his father, who, according to some traditions, had likewise returned to Troy. (Dionys. Hal. i. 47. 53.) Another legend made Ascanius found a new kingdom at Scopae in Troas, in conjunction with Scamandrius, the son of Hector. (Strab. xiii. p. 607.) Others again, according to whom his original name was Euryleon, made him accompany his father to Italy and succeed him as king of the Latins. (Dionys. i. 65.) Livy states that on the death of his father Ascanius was yet too young to undertake the government, and that after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Lavinium in the hands of his government, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. According to Dionysius (l. 70.), Silvius was a younger brother of Ascanius, and disputed the succession with Julius, a son of Ascanius. The dispute was decided in favour of Silvius. Servius (ad Aen. i. 271) states, that Ascanius was also called Ius, Julius, Daranus, and Leontodamus. The gens Julia at Rome traced its pedigree up to Julius and Ascanius. (Hoyne, Eccles. viii., ad Aen. i.) In the stories about Troy there occur three other personages of the name Ascanius. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5; Hom. H. ii. 882, xiii. 792.)

ASCARUS (Ασκαρός), a Thbean statuary, who made a statue of Zeus, dedicated by the Thessalians at Olympia. (Paus. v. 24. § 1.) Thiersch (Epochen der bild. Kunst, p. 160, &c. Anm.) endeavours to show that he was a pupil of Aglabas of Siegeon. (Aegelebas.) (C. P. M.)

ASCALAPICO, a physician of Patrae, in Achaea, who attended on Cicero's freedman, Tito, during an illness of C. Cilicius ad Parn. v. 7. 9.) Cicero was so much pleased by his kindness and his medical skill, that he wrote a letter of recommendation for him to Servius Sulpicius, b. c. 47. (xiii. 20.)

ASCLEPIADAE, ASCLEPIADUS. (Aσκληπιάδαι, Aσκληπιάδας.) 1. Of Alexandria, seems to have been a grammarian, as the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Nub. 37) quotes him as an authority on the meaning of the word ἐπίγειος.

2. Of ANAZARA in Cilicia, is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (σ. v. Ἀνάζαρα) as the author of many works, of which however only one, on rivers (πεδίνα ποταμών), is specified.

3. A son of AREIUS, wrote a work on Demetrius Phalerus. (Athen. xiii. p. 567.) It is not quite certain whether he is the same as Asclepiades of Myreia, who is also called a native of Nicaea. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Nicaea.)

4. A Cynic philosopher, a native of Philus, and a contemporary of Crates of Thebes, who must consequently have lived about 250 B.C. (Diog. Laert. vi. 91; Tertull. c. Nat. ii. 14.) Whether he is the same as the one whom Cicero (Tusc. v. 39) states to have been blind, is uncertain.

5. A Cynic philosopher, who is mentioned along with SServinian and Clytian, and lived in the reign of Constantius and Julianus, about A.D. 360. (Julian, Orat. c. Herod. Cyn. p. 224; Ammian. Marc. xxii. 13.)

6. Of CYRUS, wrote a work on the history of his native island and Phoenicia, of which a fragment is preserved in Porphyrius. (De Abstin. iv. 15; comp. Hieronym. ad Josue. 2.)

7. An EGYPTIAN, possessed, according to Suidas (comm. Ἑράκλειον), a profound knowledge of Egyptian theology, and wrote hymns on his native gods. He also composed a work upon the agreement among the different religions, a second on the history of Egypt, and a third on Ogyges. Of the history of Egypt the sixtieth book is quoted by Athenaeus. (iii. p. 83.) There seems to be little doubt that this Asclepiades is the same as the one whom Suetonius (Aug. 94) calls the author of Θεολογογίας, and of whom he quotes a fragment. This Θεολογογίας, moreover, seems to be the same work as that on the agreement among the different religions. Suetonius calls him Asclepiades Mendes, which seems to be derived from the name of a town in Egypt. (Comp. Schol. ad Hom. R. vii. p. 147; Consab. ad Sacr. L.; Suidas, de Hist. Graec. p. 406, ed. Westermann.)

8. Another EGYPTIAN poet. Under the name of Asclepiades the Greek Anthology contains upwards of forty epigrams; but it is more than probable that they are not all the productions of the same poet. Some of them undoubtedly belong to Asclepiades of Samos, who is mentioned as a teacher of Theocritus, and said to have written bucolic poetry. (Schol. ad Theocrit. vii. 21, 40; Meleager. l. 46; Theocrit. vii. 40; Moschus, iii. 96.) Others may be the productions of Asclepiades of Aidamytium, who lived at an earlier time. (Jacobs, ad Athol. xiii. p. 864.)

9. A LYRIC poet, from whom a certain species of verse, resembling the chorobatic, is said to have derived its name; but the ancients themselves were not agreed whether the Asclepiadic verse was invented by Asclepiades, or whether he used it only more frequently than others. He lived after the time of Alcæus and Sappho. (Hephaest. Euchar. p. 34; Attilius Fortunatianus, p. 2700, ed. Putsch.)

11. Of MYREIA in Bithynia, or of Nicaea, a son of Diodamus. He was a pupil of Apollonius Rhodius, and lived about the time of Pompey the Great. Suidas places him nearly a century earlier, from which some modern critics have inferred, that there must have been two Asclepiades of Myreia, the one of whom was perhaps a son or grandson of the other. The younger taught grammar at Rome, and is supposed to be the same as the one who for some time resided in Spain as a teacher of grammar, and wrote a description of the tribes of Spain (περιγραφὴ τῶν Θρακῶν), to which Strabo occasionally refers. (iii. p. 157, &c.) Asclepiades of Myreia is also mentioned as the author of several other works, of which, however, we possess only a few fragments. 1. On grammarians or grammars (περὶ γραμματιστῶν), Suidas, s. v. Ὁρτάτης; Anonym. Vit. Arati; S. Empir. adv. Grammat. 47, 72, 252.)

12. Of TRAULOS in Thrace, a contemporary and disciple of Isocrates. (Phot. Bibl. p. 486, b. ed. Bekker.) He is called a tragic writer, but was more probably a sophist or a grammarian. He was the author of a work called περὶ γραμματισμοῦ, in six books, which treated on the subjects used by the Greek tragic writers, and on the manner in which they dealt with their myths. (Plut. Vit. X. Orest. p. 387; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τρύγλος; Athen. x. p. 456; Harpocrat. s. v. Δυσταλῆς; Hesych. s. v. ἕπαρσις; comp. Wredor, l. c. p. 489, where the fragments of the περὶ γραμματισμοῦ are collected.)

13. A bishop of TRALLES, who lived about A.D. 464. A letter of his and Ion anachusmatism against Pullos are printed with a Latin translation in several volumes of the Greek Anthology; and another letter of his is still extant in the Vienna and Vatican libraries in MS. (Fac. Bibli. Graec. xi. p. 583.) This Asclepiades must be distinguished from another Christian writer of the same name, who is mentioned by Lactantius. (vii. 4.)

ASCLEPIADES (Ἀσκληπιάδης), the name of several physicians, some of whom probably assumed this appellation either as a sort of honorary title in allusion to the ancient family of the Asclepiades, or in order to signify that they themselves belonged to it. A list of the physicians who bore this name is given by Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 87, &c. ed. vet.; O. C. Gurner, Asclepiides Bithyni Frangmenta, Vinar. 1794, 1vo, p. 3, &c.; C. F. Harless, De Medicis Veteribus "Asclepiades" Dieta, Bonn. 1828, 4to.

1. ASCLEPIADES BITHYNUS, a very celebrated physician of Bithynia, who acquired a considerable degree of popularity at Rome at the beginning of the first century B.C., which he maintained through life, and in a certain degree transmitted to his successors. It is said that he first came to Rome as a teacher of rhetoric (Plin. H. N. xxvi. 7), and that it was in consequence of his not being successful in this profession, that he turned his attention to the study of medicine. From what we learn of his ASCLEPIADES.

history and of his practice, it would appear that he may be fairly characterized as a man of natural talents, acquainted with human nature (or rather with human weakness), possessed of considerable shrewdness and address, but with little science or professional skill. He began (upon the plan which is so generally found successful by those who are conscious of their own ignorance) by vitifying the principles and practice of his predecessors, and by asserting that he had discovered a more comprehensive and effective method of treating diseases than had been before known to the world. As he was ignorant of anatomy and pathology, he decreed the labours of those who sought to investigate the structure of the body, or to watch the phenomena of disease, and he is said to have directed his attacks more particularly against the writings of Hippocrates. It appears, however, that he had the discretion to refrain from the use of very active and powerful remedies, and to trust principally to the efficacy of diet, exercises, bathing, and other circumstances of this nature. A part of the great popularity which he enjoyed depended upon his prescribing the liberal use of wine to his patients (Plin. H. N. vii. 37, xxi. 29), and upon his not only attending in all cases, with great assiduity, to everything which contributed to their comfort, but also upon his flattering their prejudices and indulging their inclinations. By the due application of these means, and from the state of the people among whom he practised, we may, without much difficulty, account for the great eminence at which he arrived, and we cannot fail to recognise in Asclepiades the prototype of more than one popular physician of modern times. Justice, however, obliges us to admit, that he seems to have possessed a considerable share of acuteness and discernment, which on some occasions he employed with advantage. It is probable that to him we are indebted, in the first instance, for the arrangement of diseases into the two great classes of acute and chronic (Quel. Aurel. De Morb. Chronic. iii. 8. p. 469), a division which has a real foundation in nature, and which still forms an important feature in the most improved modern nosology. In his philosophical principles Asclepiades is said to have been a follower of Epicurus, and to have adopted his doctrine of atoms and pores, on which he attempted to build a new theory of disease, by supposing that all morbid action might be reduced into obstruction of the pores and irregular distribution of the atoms. This theory he accommodated to his division of diseases, the acute being supposed to depend essentially upon a constriction of the pores, or an obstruction of them by a superfluity of atoms, and the chronic to a relative insufficiency of pores, or a deficiency of the atoms. Nothing remains of his writings but a few fragments, which have been collected and published by Gumpricht in the little work mentioned above. There is a poem containing directions respecting health (ψυκτικον παραγελιαστον) which is ascribed to Asclepiades of Bithynia, and which was first published by R. von Welz, Wurzburg, 1842; but a writer in the Rheinisches Museum (p. 444 in the vol. of 1843) has shewn, that this poem could not have been written before the seventh century after Christ.

The age at which Asclepiades died and the date of his death are unknown; but it is said that he laid a wager with Fortune, engaging to forfeit his charmer as a physician if he should ever suffer from any disease himself. Phiny, who tells the anecdote (H. N. vii. 37), adds, that he won his wager, for that he reached a great age and died at last from an accident.

Further information respecting the medical and philosophical opinions of Asclepiades may be found in Sprengel's Hist. de la Med.; Isenece, Gesch. der Med.; Ann. Coeleh, Discorsi Prime sopra Asclepiade, Firenze, 1758, 4to.; G. F. Bianchini, La Medicina d'Asclepiade per ben curare le Malattie Acute, raccolta da Vario Frumentio Greci e Latino, Venezia, 1769, 4to.; K. F. Burdach, Asclepiades und John Brown, eine Parallele, Leipzig, 1800, 8vo.; I. Sciripolus de Asclepiade Index, Lips. 1800, 4to.; Bostock's Hist. of Med., from which work part of the preceding account has been taken.

2. ASCLEPIADES PHARMACION (Φαρμακιας) or JUNIOR, a physician who must have lived at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century after Christ, as he quotes Andromachus, Dioscorides, and Sebionius Largus (Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. vii. 2, x. 2, vol. xiii. pp. 51, 33, 342; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vii. 6, vol. xiii. p. 960), and is himself quoted by Galen. He derived his surname of Pharmacion from his skill and knowledge of pharmacy, on which subject he wrote a work in ten books, five on external remedies, and five on internal. (Gal. hist. vol. xiii. p. 442.) Galen quotes this work very frequently, and generally with approbation.

3. M. ARTORIIUS ASCLEPIADES. [Artorius.]

4. ASCLEPIADES PHILOPHYSICUS (Φιλοφυσικς), a physician, who must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Galen, who has preserved some of his medical formulæ. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. vii. 5, viii. vol. xiii. pp. 102, 172.)

5. L. SCRIBIOMUS ASCLEPIADES, whose name occurs in a Latin inscription of unknown date, is supposed by Rhodius (ad Serb. Long. p. 4) to be a Scribonius Largus Designatus [Largus], but this is very doubtful.

6. ASCLEPIADES TITIENIUS, a physician, who must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Cadvius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Acut. iii. 5. p. 201.)

7. ASCLEPIADES JUNIOR (δ Νεωτερος), a physician quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. i. 1. vol. xii. p. 410), who is the same person as Asclepiades Pharmacion.

8. ARKUS ASCLEPIADES (Ἀρκυς) is sometimes inscribed in the list of physicians of the name of Asclepiades, but this appears to be a mistake, as in the passage of Galen where the names occur (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. viii. 5, vol. xii. p. 189), the name Αρκυς Ἀσκληπιαδου we should probably read Αρεύς Ἀσκληπιαδου. [Arkus.]

9. M. GALLUS ASCLEPIADES seems to be a similar mistake, as in Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. viii. 5, vol. xii. p. 179, instead of Γαλλου Μαρκου του Ασκληπιαδου we should probably read Γαλλου Μαρκου του Ασκληπιαδου. [Gallus.]

There are several other physicians of the name of Asclepiades mentioned in inscriptions, of whom nothing worth recording is known. A list of them is given in the works mentioned above. [W.A.G.]

ASCLEPIODYDORUS (Ἀσκληπιοδότωρ). 1. A Macedonian, son of Timander, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and after the conquest of Syria was appointed by Alexander satrap of that country. In n. c. 228, he led reinforcements from Syria to Alexander in eastern Asia, and there became involved in the conspiracy which was formed by Hermonias against the life of the king. (Arr. Anat. iv. 13, Ind. 18; Curtius, vi. 10, An. 1.) He seems to have been the same whom Antigonus in n. c. 317, made satrap of Persia (Diod. xix. 48); but he must be distinguished from an Asclepiodorus, a general of Cassander, mentioned by Diodorus. (xix. 60.)

2. The author of a small work on tactics (τακτικὴ κεφάλαια), who is in some MSS. called Asclepiodotus. His work exists in several MSS. at Leyden, Paris, and Rome, but has not yet been published. [L. S.]

ASCLEPIODOTUS. 1. An Athenian painter, a contemporary of Apelles, who considered him to excel himself in the symmetry and correctness of his drawing. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 16, a. 36, § 21.) Plutarch (de Gloria Athen. 2) ranks him with Ephraunor and Nicias.

3. A grammarian and lexicographer of the Platonic school. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19, § 86.) [C. P. M.]

2. Of Alexandria, the most distinguished among the disciples of Proclus, and the teacher of Damascius. He was one of the most zealous champions of Paganism. He wrote a commentary on the Timaeus of Plato, which however is lost. (Olympiod. Meteorolog. 4; Suidas, s. v. Ἀσκληπιοδότις; Damascius, Vit. Isid. op. Phot. pp. 344, b. 345, b.)

3. An author who lived in the time of Diocletian, and seems to have written a life of this emperor. (Vopisc. Auct. 44.) He seems to be the same as the one who is mentioned as a general in the reign of Probus. (Vopisc. Pror. 22.)

4. A pupil of Posidonius, who, according to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vi. 17), wrote a work called "Quaestiones Naturalium causae."

5. A commander of the Gallic mercenaries in the army of Perses, king of Macedonia. (Livy xiii. 51, xiv. 2.) [L. S.]

ASCLEPIODOTUS (Ἀσκληπιοδότος), a physician, who was also well versed in mathematics and music, and who grew famous for reviving the use of white hellock, which in his time had grown quite out of vogue. He lived probably about the end of the fifth century after Christ, as he was the pupil of Jacobus Psychreustes, and is mentioned by Damascius. (Damascius, op. Phot. Cod. 242, p. 344, b., ed. Bekker; Suidas, s. a. Σοφάνως; Fried's Hist. of Physic.) [W. A. G.]

ASCLEPIODOTUS, CAISSUS, a man of great wealth among the Bithynians, shewed the same respect to Soranus, when he was under Nero's displeasure, as he had when Soranus was in prosperity. He was accordingly deprived of his property and driven into exile, A. D. 67, but was restored by Galba. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 39; Dion Cass. xii. 60.)

ASCLEPIUS (Ἀσκληπιός). 1. A fabulous physician, said to have been a disciple of Hermes, the Egyptian Thot, who was regarded as the father of all wisdom and knowledge. There existed in antiquity a Greek dialogue (λόγος τέλεως) between Asclepius and Hermes on God, man, and the universe; we now possess only a Latin translation of it, which in former times used to be attributed to Appuleius. It is entitled Hermetis Trismegisti Asclepii, seu de Natura rerum Dialogorum, and is evidently the production of a very late time, that is, of the age in which a reconciliation was attempted between the polytheism of antiquity and Christianity through the medium of the views of the New Platonists. (Bosscha in Oudendorp's edition of Appuleius, iii. p. 517; Hildbrand, de Vita et Script. Apollon., p. 28, &c.) To the same Asclepius is also ascribed a work still extant, entitled Προς Ἀσκληπιον πρὸς Ἄμμαν τὶς ἵππως, which is printed together with a Latin translation by A. Turnebus in his edition of the Poenamander ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus (Paris, 1554, &c.), and in F. Patricius's Nova de Universis Philosophiis, Ferrara, 1591, fol. The Latin translation of the work is contained in vol. ii. of the works (Opera) of Marsilius Ficinus, Basel, 1561.

2. A Greek grammatician of uncertain date, who wrote commentaries upon the orations of Demosthenes and the history of Thucydides; but both works are now lost. (Ulpian, de Dom. Philip. 1; Schol. Bavar. ad Dom. de Jacto, leg. pp. 375, 378; Marcellin. Vit. Thucyd. 57; Schol. ad Theogn. i. 56.)

3. Of Tralles, a Periplotic philosopher and a disciple of Ammonius, the son of Hermias. He lived about A. P. 500, and wrote commentaries on the first six or seven books of Aristotle's Metaphysics and on the ὅστις ἦκε of Nicomachus of Gerasa. These commentaries are still extant in MS., but not a portion of them has yet been printed in Brandis, Scholia Graeca in Aristot. Metaphys. 518, &c.; comp. Fabr. Bibli. Graec. iii. p. 236; St. Croix in the Magazin. Eucalog. Conspectus Annalis, vol. iii. p. 339. [L. S.]

ASCLEPIUS (Ἀσκληπιός), a physician, who must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galen. (De Differ. Morb. c. 9, vol. vi. p. 869.) A person of the same name is quoted by the Scholast on Hippocrates (Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 458, n. 470, n.) as having written a commentary on the Aphorisms, and probably also on most of the other works of Hippocrates, as he is said to have undertaken to explain his writings by comparing one part with another. (Ibid.; Lütte, Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 125.) Another physician of the same name is said by Fabrioris to be mentioned by Aelian. [W. A. G.]

ASCLERTARIO, an astrologer and mathematician in the time of Domitian. On one occasion he was brought before the emperor for some offence. Domitian tried to put the knowledge of the astrologer to the test, and asked him what kind of death he was to die, whereupon Asclertario answered, "I know that I shall soon be torn to pieces by the dogs." To prevent the realisation of this assertion, Domitian ordered him to be put to death immediately, and to be buried. When his body lay on the funeral pile, a vehement wind arose, which carried the body from the pile, and seven dogs, which had been near immediately began devouring the half-roasted body. Domitian, on being informed of this, is said to have been more moved and perplexed than he had ever been before. This tale, which is related in all its sim-simplicity by Saturnius (Domin. 15), is much distorted in the accounts which Cedrenus, Constantius, Manaeus, and other grammarians give. [L. S.]

Q. ASCONIUS PEDIA'NUS, who holds the first place among the ancient commentators of Cicero, seems to have been born a year or two before the commencement of the Christian era, and there is some reason to believe that he was a native of Padua. It appears from a casual expression in his notes on the speech for Scaccus, that these were written after the consulsip of Largus Caecina and Claudius, that is, after a. d. 42. We learn from the Ensebian chronicle that he became blind in his seventy-third year, during the reign of Vespasian, and that he attained to the age of eighty-five. The supposition that there were two Asconii, the one the companion of Virgil and the ex-pander of Cicero, the other an historian who flourished at a later epoch, is in opposition to the clear testimony of antiquity, which recognises one only. He wrote a work, now lost, on the life of Sullust; and another, which has likewise perished, against the cenurers of Virgil, of which Donatus and other grammarians have availed themselves in their illustrations of that poet; but there is no ground for ascribing to him the tract entitled "Origio gentis Romanae," more commonly, but with as little foundation, assigned to Aurelius Victor.

But far more important and valuable than the above was his work on the speeches of Cicero; and fragments of commentaries, bearing his name, are still extant, on the Divinatio, the first two speeches against Verres and a portion of the third, the speeches for Cornelius (i. ii.), the speech In toga candida, for Scaccus, against Piso, and for Milo. The remarks which were drawn up for the instruction of his sons (Comm. in Milon. 14) are conveyed in very pure language, and refer chiefly to points of history and antiquities, great pains being bestowed on the illustration of those constitutional forms of the senate, the popular assemblies, and the courts of justice, which were fast falling into oblivion under the empire. This character, however, does not apply to the notes on the Verine orations, which are of a much more grammatical cast, and exhibit not unfrequently traces of a declining Latinity. Hence, after a very rigid and minute examination, the most able modern critics have decided that these last are not from the pen of Asconius, but must be attributed to some grammarian of a much later date, one who may have been the contemporary or successor of Servius or Donatus. It is impossible here to analyse the reasoning by which this conclusion has been satisfactorily established, but those who wish for full information will find everything they can desire in the excellent treatise of Madvig. (De Asconii Pediani, &c. Commentarior, Hafniae, 1828, 8vo.)

The history of the preservation of the book is curious. Poggio Bracciolini, the renowned Rienzi, then attending the council of Constance in the year 1416, discovered a manuscript of Asconius in the library of St. Mary at Milan, which was transcribed by him, and about the same time by Bartolomeo di Montepulciano, and by Sozomen, a canon of Pistoia. This three copies were taken, and are still in existence, but the original has long since disappeared. All the MSS. employed by the editors of Asconius seem to have been derived from the transcript of Poggio exclusively, and their discrepancies arise solely from the conjectural emendations which have been introduced from time to time, for the purpose of correcting the numerous corruptions and supplying the frequently-recurring blanks. Poggio has left no description of the archetype, but it evidently must have been in bad order, from the number of small gaps occasioned probably by edges or corners having been torn off, or words rendered illegible by damp. Indeed the account given of the place where the monks had deposited their literary treasures is sufficient to account fully for such imperfections, for it is represented to have been "a most foul and dark dungeon at the bottom of a tower, into which not even criminals convicted of capital offences would have been thrust down."

The first edition of Asconius was taken directly from the transcript of Poggio, and was published at Venice in 1477, along with sundry essays and dissertations on the speeches of Cicero. The work was frequently reprinted in the early part of the sixteenth century, and numerous editions have appeared from time to time, either separately or attached to the orations themselves; but, notwithstanding the labours of many excellent scholars, the text is usually exhibited in a very corrupt and interpolated form. By far the best is that which is to be found in the fifth volume of Cicero's works as edited by Orelli and Baiter; but many improvements might yet be made if the three original transcripts were to be carefully collated, instead of reproducing mere copies of copies which have been disfigured by the carelessness or presumption of successive editors.

ASCUS ("Ascos"), a giant, who in conjunction with Lycurgus chained Dionysus and threw him into a river. Hermes, or, according to others, Zeus, rescued Dionysus, conquered (ἐδεικνύω) the giant, flayed him, and made a bag (ἀρνος) of his skin.

From this event the town of Damascus in Syria was believed to have derived its name. (Etym. M. and Steph. Byz. s. v. Δαμασκός.) [L. S.]

AŚDRUBAL. [HADRUBAL.]

ASELLIO, P. SEPROM'ONIUS, was tribune of the soldiers under P. Scipio Africanus at Numantia, n. c. 133, and wrote a history of the affairs in which he had been engaged. (Gell. li. 13.) His work appears to have commenced with the Punic wars, and continued a very full account of the times of the Gracchi. The exact title of the work, and the number of books into which it was divided, are not known. From the great superiority which Asellio assigns to history above annals (op. Gell. v. 18), it is pretty certain that his own work was not in the form of annals. It is sometimes cited by the name of libro verum gestarum, and sometimes by that of historiarum; and it contained at least fourteen books. (Gell. xii. 3, 21; Chorius. ii. p. 195.) It is cited also in Gell. l. 13, iv. 9, xiii. 3, 21; Priscian, v. p. 688; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. xii. 121; Nonius, s. v. gliscitor.

Cicero speaks (de Leg. i. 2) slightly of Asellio. P. Sempromion Asellio should be carefully distinguished from Q. Sempromius Tadamianus, with whom he is often confounded. (Tuditanus.) Comp. Krause, Vitae et Fregia. Historian Latininorum, p. 216, &c.

ASELLUS, a cognomen in the Amnian and Claudian gentes. The Amnia gens was a plebeian one; and the Aselli in the Cornelia gens were also plebeians.
ASINIA. 385

1. C. or P. ANNIA ASELLUS, a senator, who had not been included in the census, died, leaving his only daughter his heir. The property, however, was seized by Verres, the praetor urbanus, on the ground that such a bequest was in violation of the lex Voconia. (Cic. in Ferr. i. 41, &c., comp. i. 58, ii. 7; Dict. of Ant. s. v. VoconiaLex.)

2. TL. CLAUDIUS ASELLUS, tribune of the soldiers in the army of the consul, C. Claudius Nero, b. c. 207, praetor in b. c. 266, when he obtained Sardinia as his province, and plebeian aedile in b. c. 204. (Liv. xxi. 41, xxvii. 10, xxix. 11.)

Appian (de Bell. Annii. iii. 37), relates an extraordinary adventure of this Claudius Aesselus in b. c. 212.

3. TL. CLAUDIUS ASELLUS, of the equestrian order, was deprived of his horse, and reduced to the condition of an aerarian, by Scipio Africanus, the younger, in his censorship, b. c. 142. When Aesselus boasted of his military services, and complained that he had been degraded unjustly, Scipio replied with the proverb, "Agas aelsum," i. e., "Agas aelsum, si loyem non agere quena." (Cic. de Orat. ii. 64), which it is impossible to translate so as to preserve the point of the joke; it was a proverbial expression for saying, that if a person cannot have as good a station as he wishes, he must be content with a lower. When Aesselus was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 139, he accused Scipio Africanus before the people (Gell. iii. 4); and Gellius (ii. 20) makes a quotation from the fifth oration of Scipio against Aesselus, which may have been delivered in this year. Among other charges which Aesselus brought against Scipio, was, that the lustrum had been insidious (because it had been followed by a pestilence); and Gellius (iv. 17) has preserved two verses of Lucullus referring to this charge:

"Scipiadiæ magno improbō objiciēbat Aesselus Lustrum, illo censore, malum inflinxque suisse."

Scipio replied, that it was not surprising that it should have been so, as his colleague, L. Munnius, who had performed the lustrum, had removed Aesselus from the aerariams and restored him to his former rank. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 66; comp. Val. Max. vi. 4. § 2; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 58, where the opposition of Munnius to Scipio is alluded to.) This Claudius Aesselus seems to be the same who was poisoned by his wife, Lecinia. (Val. Max. vi. 3. § 8.)

ASIA ('Asia). 1. A surname of Athena in Colchis. Her worship was believed to have been brought from thence by Castor and Polydeuces to Lacinum, where a temple was built to her at Las. (Paus. iii. 24. § 5.)

2. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who became by Japetus the mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. (Hesiod. Theog. 359; Apollod. i. 2. § 2, &c.) According to some traditions the continent of Asia derived its name from her. (Herod. iv. 45.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 2; Tzetzes, ad Lyoph. 1277.) [L. S.]

ASIAL TICUS, a surname of the Scipios and Valerii. [Scipio; Valerius.]

ASINA, a surname of the Scipios. [Scipio.]

ASINIA, the daughter of C. Asinius Pollio, consul b. c. 40, was the wife of Marcellus Asen- ninus, and the mother of Marcellus Aseni- numus, the younger, who was instructed in rhetoric by his grandfather Asinius. (Sann. Epit. Cons. lib. iv. praef.; Tac. Ann. iii. 11, xiv. 49; Suet. Oct. 43.)

ASINIA GENS, plebeian. The Asini came from Teate, the chief town of the Marrucini (SIL. ital. xvii. 453; Liv. Epit. 73; Catull. 12), and their name is derived from asius, which was a cognomen of the Scipios, as aelsum was of the Anni and Claudii. The Herici, spoken of by Silius Italicus (l.c.) in the time of the second Punic war, about b. c. 218, was an ancestor of the Asini; but the first person of the name of Asinius, who occurred in history, was Hericius Asinius, in the Marsic war, b. c. 90. [ASINUS.] The cognomina of the Asini are AGIRPA, CELEI, DENTIO, GALLUS, POLIO, SALONINUS. The only cognomina which occur on coins, are GALLUS and POLIO. (Eckeh., p. 144.)

ASINUS I. HERIUS ASINIUS, of Teate, the commander of the Marrucini in the Marsic war, fell in battle against Marius, b. c. 90. (Liv. Epit. 73; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Appian, B. C. i. 40; Butot, v. 3.)

2. CN. ASINUS, only known as the father of C. Asinius Pollio. [POLIO.]

3. ASINUS, a friend of Antony, who surreptitiously rode the good sedan after the death of Caesar. b. c. 44. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 13.)

ASINUS QUADRATUS. [QUADRATUS.]

ASIUS ('Asios). 1. A son of Hyrtacus of Ariste, and father of Acamas and Phaenops. He was one of the allies of the Trojans, and brought them auxiliaries from the several towns over which he ruled. He was slain by Idomeneus. (Hom. R. ii. 833, xii. 140, xiii. 389, &c., xvii. 562.)

2. A son of Dymas and brother of Heceabe. Apollo assumed the appearance of this Asi, when he wanted to stimulate Hector to fight against Patroclus. (Hom. R. xvi. 713, &c.; Æschyl. p. 1063.) According to Dicytus Cretensis (iv. 12), Asius was slain by Ajax. There are two more mythical personages of this name, which is also used as a surname of Zeus, from the town of Assos or Oasos in Crete. (Virg. Aen. x. 123; Tzetzes, ad Lyoph. 355; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Asos.)

ASIUS ('Asios), one of the earliest Greek poets, who lived, in all probability, about b. c. 700, though some critics would place him at an earlier and others at a later period. He was a native of Samos, and Athenæus (iii. p. 125) calls him the old Samian poet. According to Pausanias (vii. 4. § 2), his father's name was Amphitiopius. Asius wrote epic and elegiac poems. The subject or subjects of his epic poetry are not known; and the few fragments which we now possess, consist of genealogical statements or remarks about the Samians, whose luxurious habits he describes with great relâve and humour. The fragments are preserved in Athenæus, Pausanias, Strabo, Apollodorus, and a few others. His elegies were written in the regular elegiac metre, but all have perished with the exception of a very brief one which is preserved in Athenæus. (l. c.) The fragments of Asius are collected in N. Roth, Cath. Tyriaca et Asiâ Samit quatuor secrutat, &c., Leipzig, 1831, 8vo.; in Dibner's edition of Hesiod, &c., Paris, 1840, and in Dümter, Die Fragm. der Epik, s. v. 'Asios, b. c. 66, &c., Nachtrag, p. 81. [L. S.]

ASOPIS ('Asios)., two mythological personages, one a daughter of Thespios, who became by Heracles the mother of Mentor (Apollod. ii. 7. 2 c ASPASIA.

§ 8, and the other a daughter of the river-god Asopus. (Diod. iv. 72.)

ASOPUS (Ἀσόπος). 1. Father of Phoroneion (Thuc. i. 64), called Asopichus by Pausanias. (i. 24. § 12.)

2. Son of Phoroneion, was, at the request of the Acarnanians who wished to have one of Phoroneion's family in the command, sent by the Athenians in the year following his father's naval victories, n. c. 428 (the 4th of the Peloponnesian war), with some ships to Naupactus. He fell shortly after in an unsuccessful attempt on the Leonidian coast. (Thuc. iii. 7.) [A. H. C.]

ASOPPODO'RUŚ, a statuary, possibly a native of Argos (Thierack, Epochen. d. bild. Kunst. p. 275, Anm.), was a pupil of Polycletus. (Plin. xxxiv. 2. s. 19.) [C. P. M.]

ASOPUS (Ἀσόπος), the god of the river Asopus, was a son of Oceanus and Tethys, or according to others, of Poseidon and Pero, of Zeus and Eurynome, or lastly of Poseidon and Cegluse. (Pind. H. i. 16; Paus. ii. a. § 2. 15, 23.)

He was married to Metope, the daughter of the river god Ladon, by whom he had two sons and twelve, or, according to others, twenty daughters. Their names differ in the various accounts. (Apoll. l. c.; Diod. iv. 72.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vi. 144; Islam. viii. 37; Paus. ix. 1. § 2; Herod. ii. 51; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 278.) Several of these daughters of Asopus were carried off by gods, which is commonly believed to indicate the colo-

cies established by the people inhabiting the banks of the Asopus, who also transferred the name of Asopus to other rivers in the countries where they settled. Aegina was one of the daughters of Asopus, and Podare in very old times the river of the same name in Aegina. (Nest. iii. 4, with the Schol.) In Greece there were two rivers of this name, the one in Achaea in Peloponnesus, and the other in Boeotia, and the legends of the two are frequently confounded or mixed up with each other. Hence arose the dif-

cent accounts about the descent of Asopus, and the difference in the names of his daughters. But as these names have, in most cases, reference to geographical circumstances, it is not difficult to perceive to which of the two rivers gods this or that particular daughter originally belonged. The more celebrated of the two is that of Peloponnesus. When Zeus had carried off his daughter Aegina, and Asopus had searched after her everywhere, he was at last informed by Siliphus of Corinth, that Zeus was the guilty party. Asopus now revolts against Zeus, and wanted to fight with him, but Zeus struck him with his thunderbolt and confined him to his original bed. Pieces of charcoal which were found in the bed of the river in later times, were believed to have been produced by the lightning of Zeus. (Paus. ii. § 5. § 1, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.) According to Pausanias (ii. 12. § 5) the Peloponnesian Asopus was a man who, in the reign of Amy, discovered the river which was subsequently called by his name. [L. S.]

ASPALLA'THION, a daughter of Argoles, coming from an interesting legend preserved in Antoninus Liberalis. (13.) [L. S.]

ASPAR, a Numidian, sent by Jugurtha to Boccus in order to learn his designs, when the latter had sent for Sulla. He was, however, deceived by Boccus. (Sall. Jug. 108, 112.)

ASPASIA (Ἀσπασία). 1. The celebrated Milesian, daughter of Axiochus, came to reside at Athens, and there gained and fixed the affections of Pericles, not more by her beauty than by her high mental accomplishments. With his wife, who was a lady of rank, and by whom he had two sons, he seems to have lived unhappily; and, having parted from her by mutual consent, he attached himself to Aspasia during the rest of his life as closely as was allowed by the law, which forbade marriage with a foreign woman under severe penalties. (Plut. Peric. 24; Demosth. c. Neor. p. 1350.) Nor can there be any doubt that she acquired over him a great ascendancy; though this perhaps comes before us in an exaggerated shape in the statements which ascribe to her influence the war with Samos on behalf of Miletus in n. c. 440, as well as the Peloponnesian war itself. (Plut. Peric. l. c.; Aristoph. Acharn. 497, &c.; Schol. ad loc.; comp. Aristoph. Pax, 587, &c.; Thuc. i. 115.) The con-exion, indeed, of Pericles with Aspasia appears to have been a favourite subject of attack in Athenian comedy (Aristoph. Acharn. l. c.; Plut. Peric. 24; comp. Plut. Mor. 95); and it is a matter of certain writers of philosophical dialogues, between whom and the comic poets, in respect of their abusive propensities, Athenaeus remarks a strong family likeness. (Athen. v. p. 292; Casan. ad loc.) Nor was their bitterness satisfied with the vent of satire; for it was Hermippus, the comic poet, who brought against Aspasia the double charge of impiety and of infamous pandering to the vices of Pericles; and it required all the personal influence of the latter with the people, and his most earnest entreaties and tears, to procure her acquittal. (Plut. Peric. 32; Athen. xiii. p. 589, e, &c.; comp. Thirlw. Greece, vol. iii. p. 97, &c., and Appendix. ii.) The latter part of her life was greatly envied by the highest literary and philosophical society of Athens, nor was the seclusion of the Athenian matrons so strictly preserved, but that many even of them resorted thither with their husbands for the pleasure and improvement of her conversation (Plut. Peric. 24); so that the intellectual influence which she exercised was undoubtedly considerable, even though we reject the story of her being the preceptor of Socrates, on the probable ground of the irony of those passages in which such statement is made (Plut. Menex. pp. 253, 249; Xen. Oecon. iii. 14, Memor. ii. 6. § 36; Herm. de Soc. magistr. et diss. juven.; Schleiermacher's Introct. to the Menexen); for Plato certainly was not appro-ver of the administration of Pericles (Gory, p. 515, d. &c.), and thought perhaps that the refinement introduced by Aspasia had only added a new temptation to the licentiousness from which it was not disconnected. (Athen. xiii. p. 569, f.) On the death of Pericles, Aspasia is said to have attached herself to one Lysicles, a dealer in cattle, and to have made him by her instructions a first-rate orator. (Aesch. op. Plut. Peric. 24; Schol. ad Plut. Menex. p. 235.) For an amusing account of a suphistical argument ascribed to her by Aeschines the philosopher, see Cie. de Invent. l. 81; Quintil. Inst. Orat. v. 11. The son of Pericles by As-pasia was capitulinated by a special decree of the people, and took his father's name. (Plut. Peric. 37.) He was one of the six generals who were put to death after the victory at Arginum. (Comp. Jacobs, Vorn. Schrift., vol. iv. pp. 349—387.)

2. A Phocæan, daughter of Hermotimus, was carried away from her country to the seraglio of Cyrus the Younger, so admired, not her beauty only, but her superior qualities of mind and character, that he made her his favourite wife, giving her the name of "wise." She is said to have frequently aided him with her advice, the adoption of which he never regretted; and they lived together with great mutual affection till the death of the prince at the battle of Cannaxa. She then fell into the hands of Artauxes, and became his wife. (Plut. Peric. 24; Artoc. 26; Ael. V. H. xii. 1; Xen. Anab. i. 10, § 2.) When Dareius, son of Artauxes, was appointed successor to the throne, he asked his father to surrender Aspasia to him. The request, it seems, could not be refused, as coming from the king elect; Artauxes, therefore, gave her up, on finding that she herself consented to the transfer; but he soon after took her away again, and made her priestess of a temple at Ecbatana, where strict celibacy was requisite; and this gave rise to that conspiracy of Dareius against his father, which was detected, and cost him his life. (Plut. Artae. 27—39; Just. x. 2.) Her name is said to have been "Millo," all for instance called her "Aspasia," after the mistress of Pericles (Plut. Peric. 24; Athen. xiii. p. 576, d.); but "Millo" itself seems to have been a name expressive of the beauty of her complexion. (Ael. V. H. xii. 1, where we are favoured with a minute description of her appearance.)

ASPASIUS (Ἀσπασίος). 1. Of Byllus, a Greek sophist, who according to Suidas (s. v. Ἀσπασίος) was a contemporary of the sophists Diogenes and Aristides, and who consequently lived in the reign of M. Antoninus and Commodus, about A. D. 180. He is mentioned among the commentators on Demosthenes and Aeschines; and Suidas ascribes to him a work on Pyhna, meditations, theoretical works on rhetoric, declamations, an encomium on the emperor Hadrian, and some other writings. All these are lost with the exception of a few extracts from his commentaries. (Ulpian, ad Demost. Leg. p. 11; Phot. Bibl. p. 492, a., ed. Bck.; Schol. ad Homog. p. 260, &c.; Schol. ad Aesch. c. Tim. p. 105.)

2. A PERIPATETIC philosopher, who seems to have lived during the latter half of the first century after Christ, since Galen (vol. vi. p. 532, ed. Paris), who lived under the Antonines, states, that he heard one of the pupils of Aspasia. Boethius, who frequently refers to his works, says that Aspasia wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle. The following commentators are expressly mentioned: De Interpretatione, the Physica, Metaphysica, Categoriae, and the Neomachiene Ethic. A portion of the commentary on the last-mentioned work of Aristotle (viz. on books 1, 2, 4, 7, and 8) are still extant, and were first printed by Aldus Manutius, in his collection of the Greek commentators on the Neomachiene Ethic. (Venice, 1536, fol.) A Latin translation by J. B. Felicianus appeared at Venice in 1541, and has often been reprinted. From Porphyry, who also states that Aspasia wrote commentaries on Plato, we learn that his commentaries on the works of Plato were used in the school of Plotinus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 364, &c.; Buhele, Aristot. Op. i. p. 296.)

3. Of RAYVENA, a distinguished sophist and rhetorician, who lived about A. D. 225, in the reign of Alexander Severus. He was educated by his father Dametrius, who was himself a skilful rhetorician; afterwards he was also a pupil of Pausanias and Hippodromus, and then travelled to various parts of the ancient world, as a companion of the emperor and of some other persons. He obtained the principal professorship of rhetoric at Rome, which he held until his death at an advanced age. At Rome he also began his long rhetorical controversy with Philostratus of Lemnos, which was afterward continued by other disputants in Ionia. Aspasia was also secretary to the emperor, but his letters were censured by his opponent Pausanias, for their declamatory character and their want of precision and clearness. He is said to have written several orations, which, however, are now lost. They are praised for their simplicity and originality, and for the absence of all pompous affectation in them. (Philol. Vit. Soph. ii. 35; Budoc. p. 66; Suidas, s. v. Ἀσπασίος.)

4. Of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and historian of uncertain date, who, according to Suidas (s. v. Ἀσπασίος), wrote a history of Epeirus and of things remaining in that country, in twenty-five theoretical works on rhetoric, and some others. (Comp. Budoc. p. 66.)

ASPATHINIDES (Ἀσπαθίνη), one of the seven Persian chiefs, who conspired against the Magi. He was wounded in the thigh, when the latter were put to death. (Herod. iii. 70, &c. 78.) He was the father of Praxaspes. (vii. 87.)

ASPHER, AEMILIUS, a Roman grammian, who wrote commentaries on Terence (Schoopen, de Terentio et Donato, &c. p. 82; Bonn, 1821) and Virgil. (Macrobi. iii. 5; Hoyne's account of the ancient Commentators on Virgil, prefixed to his edition of Virgil.) Asper is also quoted in the Scholiæ of Tzetzes, and of A. v. Al. (Virgil. Interp. Vet. Mediol. 1815.) This Asper must be distinguished from another grammian of the same name, usually called Asper Junior, but who is equally unknown. The latter is the author of a small work entitled "Ars Grammatic," which has been printed in the collections of Grammatici Illustres XII., Paris, 1516; Tres Artis Graec. Grammat. Authors, Lips. 1527; Grammat. Lat. Auctores, by Putzschus, Hanov. 1608; Corpus Grammat. Lat. by Lindemann, vol. i. Lips. 1851.

ASPHER, JULIUS, had been raised to the consulsipate, as had also his sons, by Caracalla, but was afterwards, without any apparent cause, deprived of all his honours, and driven out of the state by the same emperor, A. D. 212. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 5.) We learn from an inscription (op. Polit. p. 494), that the consuls in A. D. 212 were both of the name of Julius Augustus. Either the father or one of his sons was appointed governor of Asia by Macrinus, but was deprived of this dignity on his journey to the province, on account of some inelegant words which offended the emperor. It is usually stated, on the authority of Dion Cassius, that Asper was killed by Elagabalus; but Dion Cassius does not say this. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 22, lxxix. 47.)

ASPICA, SIC, a centurion, one of the conspirators against Nero, A. D. 66, met his fate with great firmness, when he was put to death after the detection of the conspiracy. (Tac. Ann. xv. 49, 50, 68; Dion Cass. lxxii. 24.)

ASPHALTEUS or ASPHALIUS (Ἀσφάλτευς or Ἀσφάλειος), a surname of Poseidon, under which he was worshipped in several towns of Greece. It describes him as the god who grants safety to ports and to navigation in general. (Stab. i. p. 57; Paus. vii. 21. § 3; Plut. Thes. 35; Sud. s. e.) [L. S.]

ASPLEDON (Ἀσπελέων), a son of Poseidon and the nymph Medea (Chersias, ap. Paus. ix. 39. § 6); according to others, he was a son of Orco- menus and brother of Clymenus and Amphitritus (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ασπελέων), or a son of Prefeion and Sterope (Bustan. ad Hom. p. 272.) He was regarded as the founder of Aspledon, an ancient town of the Minyans in Bocotia. [L. S.]

ASPRENAS, a surname of the Nomii, a consular family under the early emperors. (Comp. Plin. H. N. xxx. 20.) 1. C. NONIUS ASPRENAS, was a performer in the Tragia lusus under Augustus, and in consequence of an injury which he sustained from a fall in the game, he received a golden chain from Augustus, and was allowed to assume the surname of Torquatus, both for himself and his posterity. (Suet. Oct. 43.)

2. A. ASPRENAS, a legate under his maternal uncle, Varus. He served the Roman army from total destruction after the death of Varus. (Dion Cass. i. 22; Vell. Pat. ii. 120.) He is probably the same as the L. NONIUS ASPRENAS who was consul a. d. 6, and as the L. ASPRENAS mentioned by Tacitus, who was proconsul of Africa at the death of Augustus, a. d. 14, and who, according to some accounts, sent soldiers, at the command of Tiberos, to kill Sempronius Gracchus. (Tit. Ann. i. 53.) He is mentioned again by Tacitus, under a. d. 29. (Ann. iii. 13.)

3. P. NONIUS ASPRENAS, consul, a. d. 38. (Dion Cass. lix. 9; Florus, de Aquaecl. c. 13.)

4. L. NONIUS ASPRENAS and P. NONIUS ASPRENAS are two curators frequently introduced in the Controversiarum (1-4, 8, 10, 11, &c.) of M. Scaevola.

ASPLINAS, CALPURNIUS, appointed governor of Galatia and Paphlagonia by Galba, a. d. 70, induced the partisans of the counterfeit Nero to put him to death. (Tac. Hist. ii. 9.)

ASSAON. [NOMI.]

ASSAULUS, A Roman sculptor, whose name is found upon an extant statue of Aesculapius by him, of the merit of which Winckelmann (Gesch. d. K. viii. 4. § 5) speaks slightly. [C. P. M.]

ASSA/RACUS (Ἀσσαράκος), a son of Tros and Callirhoë, the daughter of Scamander. He was king of Troy, and husband of Hecomeme, by whom he became the father of Cypya, the father of Anchises. (Hom. ii. xx. 282, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12. § 2; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iii. 35; Aen. viii. 139.) [L. S.]

ASSEISIA ('Asesisia), a surname of Athena, derived from the town of Assesius in Ionia, where she had a temple. (Herod. i. 19.) [L. S.]

ASSTEAS or ASTEAS, a painter, whose name is found upon a vase of his workshop, discovered at Paestum, and now preserved in the Royal Museum at Naples. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. K. iii. Ann. 778.) [C. P. M.]

ASTACUS (Ἀστάκος).

1. A son of Poseidon and Thetis, from whom the town of Astacus in Bithynia, which was afterwards called Nicomedea, derived its name. (Arrian. ap. Steph. Byz. s. v.; Paus. vi. 12. § 5; Strab. xii. p. 563.)

2. The father of Iamarus, Leades, Asphodelus, and Melanippus, whence Ovid calls the last of these heroes Astacides. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; Ovid, Ibis, 515.) [L. S.]

ASTARTE, [Ἀπροδίτη and SYRIA DRA.] ASTRÆA ('Asstraēa), a daughter of the Titan Ceus (according to Hygin. Fab. Prof. of Polus) and Phoebe. She was the sister of Leto, and, according to Hesiod (Theog. 409), the wife of Perses, by whom she became the mother of Hecate. Circe (de Nat. Deor. vi. 16) makes her the mother of the fourth Hercules by Zeus. But according to the genuine and more general tradition, she was an inhabitant of Olympus, and beloved by Zeus. In order to escape from his embraces, she got metamorphosed into a quail (ἀρνί), threw herself into the sea, and was here metamorphosed into the island Asteria (the island which had fallen from heaven like a star), or Ortygia, afterwards called Deles. (Apollod. i. 2. § 2, 4. § 1; Athen. ix. p. 392; Hygin. Fab. 53; Callimach. Hymn. in Del. 37; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 73.) There are several other mythical personages of this name,—one a daughter of Alcyoneus (Ἀλκυωνίδης); a second, one of the Danaids (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5); a third, a daughter of Leucippus (Hesiod, Theog. 25); and, perhaps, Asteria (to be read); a fourth, a daughter of Hydus, who became by Bellerophon the mother of Hydissus, the founder of Hydissus in Caria. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Θησεία.) [L. S.]

ASTERION or ASTERIUS (Ἀστερίως or 'Asteripous). 1. A son of Teutamus, and king of the Cretans, who married Europa after she had been carried to Crete by Zeus. He also brought up the three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus whom she had by the father of the gods. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, 3; Diod. iv. 60.)

2. A son of Cometes, Pyremon, or Priscus, by Antigone, the daughter of Phereas. He is mentioned as one of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 38; Paus. v. 17. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 14; Val. Max. i. 355.) There are two more mythical personages of this name, one a river-god (Ἀκράης), and the second a son of Minos, who was slain by Theseus. (Paus. ii. 31. § 1.) [L. S.]

ASTERION ('Asteriōn), a statuary, the son of a man named Aesycleus. Pausanias (vi. 3. § 1) mentions a statue of Charees, a Sicynian pupilist, which was of his workmanship. [C. P. M.]

ASTERIUS ('Asteriōs), a son of Ann and grandson of Go. According to a Milian legend, he was buried in the small island of Lade, and his body measured ten cubits in length. (Paus. i. 25. § 5, vi. 2. § 3.) There are four other mythical personages of this name, who are mentioned in the following passages: Apollod. iii. 1. § 4; Apollon. Rhod. i. 176; Apollod. i. 9. § 9; Hygin. Fab. 170. [L. S.]

ASTERIUS (Ἀστερίως), succeeded Eulius as bishop of Amasia in Pontus, in the latter part of the fourth century. He had been educated in his youth by a Scythian slave. Several of his homilies are still extant, and extracts from others, which have perished, have been preserved by Photius. (Cod. 271.) He belonged to the orthodox party in the Arian controversy, and seems to have lived to a great age.

Fabricius (Bill. Graec. i. p. 518, &c.) gives a list of 25 other personages of this same name, many of whom were dignitaries of the church, and lived about the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century. Among them we may notice Asterius, a Cappadocian, who embraced Christianity, but apostatized in the persecution under Diocletian and Maximian (about A. D. 304). He subso-

ASTYAGES (ᾠστυαγ'ας), king of Medæa, (called by Ctesias Ἀστυαγ'αζ, and by Diodorus Ἀστυαγ'αζας), was the son and successor of Cyaxares. The accounts of this king given by Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon, differ in several important particulars. We learn from Herodotus (i. 74), that in the compact made between Cyaxares and Alyattes in c. 610, it was agreed that Astyages should marry Arnyes, the daughter of Alyattes. According to the chronology of Herodotus, he succeeded his father in c. 595, and reigned 35 years (i. 130). His grandson was Artaxerxes (c. 123). Alarmed by a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyses, a Persian of good family (i. 107.) Another dream induced him to send Harpagus to destroy the offspring of this marriage. The child, the future conqueror of the Medes, was given to a herdswoman to expose, but he brought it up as his own. Years afterwards, circumstances occurred which brought the young Cyrus under the notice of Astyages, who, on inquiry, discovered his parentage. He inflicted a cruel punishment on Harpagus, who waited his time for revenge. When Cyrus had grown up to maturity, Astyages was induced by the Persians to revolt, and, having been appointed general of the Median forces, he deserted with the greater part of them to Cyrus. Astyages was taken prisoner, and Cyrus mounted the throne. He treated the captive monarch with mildness, but kept him in confinement till his death.

Ctesias agrees with Herodotus in making Astyages the last king of the Medes, but says, that Cyrus was in no way related to him till he married his daughter Amytis. When Astyages was attacked by Cyrus, he fled to Ecbatana, and was concealed in the palace by Amytis and her husband. Spitamenes, but discovered himself to his pursuers, to prevent his daughter and her husband and children from being put to the torture to induce them to reveal where he was hidden. He was loaded with chains by Oesibas, but soon afterwards was liberated by Cyrus, who treated him with great respect, and made him governor of the Bactrian, a Parthian people on the borders of Hyrcania. Spitamenes was subsequently put to death by the orders of Cyrus, who married Amytis. Some time after, Amytis and Cyrus being desirous of seeing Astyages, a eunuch named Petacaces was sent to escort him from his satrapy, but, at the instigation of Oesibas, left him to perish in a desert region. The crime was revealed by means of a dream, and Amytis took a cruel revenge on Petacaces. The body of Astyages was found, and buried with all due honours. We are told that, in the course of his reign, Astyages had waged war with the Bactrians with doubtful success. (Ctes. ap. Phot. Cod. 72. p. 36, ed. Bekker.)

Xenophon, like Herodotus, makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says, that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyaxares II., on whose death Cyrus succeeded to the vacant throne. (Cyrop. i. 5. § 2.) This account seems to tally better with the notices contained in the book of Daniel, (v. 31, vi. 1, ix. 1.) Dareius the Medæa, mentioned there and by Josephus (x. 11. § 4,) is apparently the same with Cyaxares II. (Compare the account in the Cypriotea (of the joint expedition of Cypriotes and Cyrus against the Assyrians.) In that case, Ahasuerus, the father of Dareius, will be identical with Astyages. The existence of Cypriotes II. seems also to be recognized by Aeschylus, Pers. 766. But the question is by no means free from difficulty. [C. P. M.]

ASTYAGES, a grammarian, the author of a commentary on Callimachus, and some other treatises on grammatical subjects. (Suidas, s. v. Eu- doch, p. 64.) [C. P. M.]

ASTYANASSA (Ἀστυάνασσα), said to have been a daughter of Muses, and a slave of Helen, and to have composed poems on immoral subjects. (Suidas, s. v.; Photius, Biblioth. p. 142, ed. Bekker.) Her personal existence, however, is very doubtful. [C. P. M.]

ASTY'ANAX (Ἀστυάναξ), the son of Hector and Andromache; his more common name was Semnandrias. After the taking of Troy the Greeks hurried him down from the walls of the city to prevent the fulfillment of a decree of fate, according to which he was to restore the kingdom of Troy. (Hom. Il. v. 400, &c.; Ov. Met. xiii. 415; Hygin. Fab. 109.) A different mythical person of the name occurs in Apollodorus. (ii. 7, § 6.) [L. S.]

ASTY'DAMAS (Ἀστυδάμας), 1. A tragic poet, the son of Mornimus and a sister of the poet Aeschylus, was the pupil of Isocrates, and according to Suidas (s. v. Ἀστυδάμας) wrote 240 tragedies and gained the prize fifteen times. His first tragedy was brought upon the stage in Ol. 35. 2. (Diod. xiv. p. 676.) He was the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (Anth. iii. 320), which gave rise to the proverb Συνή σαφείς ἄστυδαμᾶς ἐστὶν Ἀστυδάμιδος πατέρα. (Suidas, s. v. Συνή κ. η.; Diod. Laert. ii. 45.)

2. A tragic poet, the son of the former. The names of some of his tragedies are recorded by Suidas (s. v. Ἀστυδάμας). [C. P. M.]

ASTY'DAMEIA (Ἀστυδάμεια), a daughter of Anytus, king of the Dolopians in Thessaly, by Cleobule. She became by Heracles the mother of Theopomus. (Pind. Ol. vii. 24, with the Schol.) Other accounts differ from Pindar, for Hyginus (Fab. 162) calls the mother of Theopomus Astyoeche, and Apollodorus (ii. 7, § 8) calls the son of Astydamia Ctesippus. (Comp. Muncker, ad Hygin. l. c.) The Astydamia mentioned under Acastus and Antigone, No. 2, is a different personage. [L. S.]

ASTY'LYUS, a seer among the centaurs, who is mentioned by Ovid (Met. xii. 306) as dissuading the centaurs from fighting against the Lapithae. But the name in Ovid seems to be a mistake either of the poet himself or of the transcriber for Asbolus. (Hes. Sent. Her. 185; ASBOLUS.) [L. S.]

ASTYME'DES (Ἀστυμέδης), a Rhodian of distinction. On the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Persia (B.C. 171), he advised his countrymen to side with the former. (Polyb. xxvii. 6, § 3.) After the war, when the Rhodians were threatened with hostilities by the Romans, Astymedes was sent as ambassador to Rome to depurate their anger. The tenor of his speech on the occasion is censured by Polybius. (xxx. 4, s; Livy. xlv. 21-25.) Three years afterwards, he was again sent as ambassador to Rome, and succeeded in bringing about an alliance between the Romans and his countrymen. (Polyb. xxxi. 6, 7.) In B. C. 152, on the occasion of the war with Crete, we find him appointed admiral, and again sent as ambassador to Rome. (Polyb. xxxiii. 14.) [C. P. M.]

ASTY'NONE (Ἀστυνόμη), the daughter of Chrysea (whence she is also called Chryseis), a priest of Apollo. She was taken prisoner by Achilles in the Hycleanm Thebe of or in Lyrmenus, whether she had been sent by her father for protection, or, according to others, to attend the celebration of a festival of Artemis. In the distribution of the booty she was given to Agammenon, who, however, was obliged to restore her to her father, to soothe the anger of Apollo. (Hom. II. i. 378; Enestath. ad Hom. pp. 77, 118; Dictys Cret. ii. 17.) There are two more mythical personages of this name, one a daughter of Niobe, and the other a daughter of Talaus and mother of Cepæan. (Hygin. Fab. 70.) [L. S.]

ASTY'NOMUS (Ἀστυνόμος), a Greek writer upon Cyprus. (Plin. H. N. v. 35; Stephan. Bryz. s. v. Κύπρος.)

ASTY'NOUS (Ἀστυνόος), a son of Protaios, a Trojan, who was slain by Neoptolemus. (Hom. II. xv. 455; Paus. x. 26, § 1.) A second Astynous occurs in Apollodorus. (iii. 14, § 3.) [L. S.]

ASTY'OCHE or ASTY'OCHEIA (Ἀστυόχη or Ἀστυόχεια). 1. A daughter of Actor, by whom Ares begot two sons, Ascalaphus and Ialmenus. (Hom. II. i. 512, &c.; Paus. ix. 37, § 8.)

2. A daughter of Phylus, king of Ephyra, by whom Heracles, after the conquest of Ephyra, begot Theopomus. (Apollod. ii. 7, §§ 3, 6; Hom. II. 658, &c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 24; ASTYDAMEIA.)

3. A daughter of Laomedon by Strymo, Placia, or Leucippe. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 3.) According to other traditions in Enestathia (ad Hom. p. 1697) and Dictys (ii. 2), she was a daughter of Priam, and married Telephus, by whom she became the mother of Eurypylus. Three other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. iii. 12, § 2, 3, 5 &c.; Hygin. Fab. 117. [L. S.]

ASTY'OCUS (Ἀστυόχος), succeeded Melan- ciridas as Lacedaemonian high admiral, in the summer of 412, n. c., the year after the Syracusan defeat, and arrived with four ships at Chios, late in the summer. (Thuc. viii. 20, 23.) Lesbo was now the seat of the contest: and his arrival was followed by the recovery to the Athenians of the whole island. (Ib. 23.) Astyocus was eager for a second attempt; but compelled, by the refusal of the Chians and their Spartan captain, Pedaritus, to forego it, he proceeded, with many threats of revenge, to take the general command at Mileta. (21—33.) Here he renewed the Persian treaty, and remained, notwithstanding the entreaties of Chios, then hard pressed by the Athenians, wholly inactive. He was at last starting to relieve it, when he was called off, about mid-winter, to join a fleet from home, bringing, in consequence of complaints from Pedaritus, commissioners to examine his proceedings. Before this (ἐπὶ δὲ δότα τῷ Ἑρακλείῳ καὶ Ἄρτα, 36—42), Astyocus it appears had sold himself to the Persian interest. He had received, perhaps on first coming to Mileta, orders from home to put Alkiabides to death; but finding him in refuge with the satrap Tissaphernes, he not only gave up all thought of the attempt, but on receiving private intelligence of his Athenian negoti- tions, went up to Magnesia, betrayed Phrynichus his informant to Alkiabides, and there, it would seem, pledged himself to the satrap, (cc. 45 and 50.) Henceforward, in pursuance of his patron’s policy, his efforts were employed in keeping up the forces inactive, and inducing submission to the reduction in their Persian pay. The acquisition of Rhodes, after his junction with the new fleet, he had probably little to do with; while to him, must, no doubt, be ascribed the neglect of the opportunities afforded by the Athenian disensions, after his return to Miletus (cc. 60 and 63), 411 B.C. The discontent of the troops, especially of the Syracusans, was great, and broke out at last in a riot, where his life was endangered; shortly after which his successor Mindarus arrived, and Astyochus sailed home (cc. 64, 65), after a command of about eight months. Upon his return to Sparta he bore testimony to the truth of the charges which Heroclitus, the Syracusan, brought against Tissaphernes. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 31.) [A. H. C.]

ASTYPOLEA (Ἀστυπόλεα), a daughter of Phoenix and Perimede, the daughter of Oeneus. She was a sister of Europe, and became by Poseidon the mother of the Argonaut Aeneas and of Euryphylus, king of the island of Cos. The island Astypolea among the Cyclades derived its name from her. (Apollod. ii. 7 § 3; Paus. vii. 4 § 3; Apollod. Rhod. ii. 660; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

ASYCHIS (Ἀσυχίς), a king of Ephesos, who, according to the account in Herodotus (ii. 198), succeeded Mytilenianus (about B.C. 12 according to Larcher’s calculation), and built the propylaean on the east side of the temple of Hephaestus which had been begun by Menes, and also a pyramid of brick. Herodotus likewise gives laws of his for the regulation of money transactions. [C. P. M.]

ATABYRIUS (Ἀταβύριος), a surname of Zeus derived from mount Atabyris or Atabyrium in the island of Rhodes, where the Cretan Alcaenæus was said to have built a temple to him. (Apollod. ii. 3 § 1; Appian, Mithrid. 26.) Upon this mountain there were, it is said, brazen bulls which roared when anything extraordinary was going to happen. (Schol. ad Pind. O. vii. 159.) [L. S.]

ATAULPHUS (Αταυλφος), a son of Vercentius, in the ancient text various surnames or epithets, which refer partly to his, partly to his occupant. The chapel and monastery of his name was represented on the chest of Cypselus holding a bind, and by her side stood Melianon. She also appeared in the pediment of the temple of Athene Alea at Tegae among the Cycladion hunters. (Paus. v. 19. § 1, viii. 45. § 4; Comp. Muller, Orchom. p. 214.)

ATAULPHUS (Αταυλφος), the sister of Perdicas, married Ataulph, and was murdered a few days after her brother, Perdicas. (Diod. xviii. 57.)

ATAURHIA (Ἀταορία), mentioned several times by O. Curtius (v. 2, vii. 1, viii 1), with a slight allusion to her supposed name. She was in the wars of Alexander the Great, appears to have been the same who was sent by Cassander with a part of the army to oppose Aesaces, king of Epeiros, in B.C. 317. (Diod. xii. 36.)

ATAULPHUS, ATAUULPHUS, ADAULPHUS (c. a. Athaulf, “sworn helper,” the same name as that which appears in later history under the form of Adolff or Adeolhus), brother of Alaric’s wife. (Olympid. ap. Phot. Cod. 80, p. 57, a, ed Bekk.) He first appears as conducting a reinforcement of Goths and Huns to aid Alaric in Italy after the termination of the first siege of Rome. (A. a. 409.) In the same year he was after the ATAULPHUS. second siege raised by the mock emperor Atalalus to the office of Count of the Domestics; and on the death of Alaric in 410, he was elected to supply his place as king of the Visigoths. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 32.) From this time the accounts of his history vary exceedingly. The only undisputed facts are, that he retired with his nation into the south of Gaul,—that he married Placidia, sister of Honorius,—and that he finally withdrew into Spain, where he was murdered at Barcelona. According to Jornandes (de Reb. Got. 32), he took Rome a second time after Alaric’s death, carried off Placidia, formed a treaty with Honorius, which was cemented by his marriage with Placidia at Forum Livii or Cornelii, remained a faithful ally in Gaul, and went into Spain for the purpose of suppressing the agitations of the Suevi and Vandals against the empire. But the other authorities for the time agree on the whole in giving a different representation. According to them, the capture of Placidia had taken place before Alaric’s death (Philostorg. xii. 4; Olympiod. l. c.; Marcellin. Chronicon); the treaty with the empire was not concluded till after Ataulphus’s retreat into Gaul, where he was implicated in the insurrection of Jovinus, and set up Ataulus, whom he detained in his camp for a musician, as a rival emperor; he then endeavoured to make peace with Honorius by sending him the head of the usurper Sebastian, and by offering to give up Placidia in exchange for a gift of corn; on this being refused, he attacked Massilia, from which he was repulsed by Bonifacius; finally, the marriage with Placidia took place at Narbo (Idat. Chronicon), which so exasperated her lover, the general Constantius, as to make him drive Ataulphus into Spain. (Orso-sia, vii. 43; Idat. Chronicon; Philostorg. xii. 4.) He was remarkable as being the first independent chief who entered into alliance with Rome, not for pay, but from respect. His original ambition had been (according to Orsoisia, vii. 43, who appears to record his very words), “that what was now Romania should become Gothia, and what Caesar Augustus was now, that for the future should be Ataulphus, but that his experience of the evils of lawlessness and the advantages of law had changed his intention, and that his highest aim now would be to be known in after ages as the defender of the empire.” And thus his marriage with Placidia—the first contracted between a barbarian chief and a Roman princess—was looked upon by his contemporaries as a marked epoch, and as the fulfilment of the prophecy of Daniel, that the king of the North should wed the daughter of the king of the South. (Idat. Chronicon.)

He was a man of striking personal appearance, and of middle stature. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 32.) The details of his life are best given in Olympiodorus (ap. Plut.), who gives a curious description of the scene of his capture with Placidia in the house of Ingenuus of Narbo (p. 59, b. ed. Bekker).

His death is variously ascribed to the personal anger of the assassin Vernulf or (Olympiod. p. 60, a.) Dobulius (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 52), to the intrigues of Constansioff (Philostorg. xii. 4.), and to a conspiracy occasioned in the camp by his having put to death a rival chief, Sarus (Olympiod. p. 68, b.) It is said to have taken place in the palace at Barcelona (Idat. Chronicon), or whilst, according to his custom, he was looking at his stables. (Olympiod. p. 109, a.) His first wife was a Saranaitis, who was divorced to make way for Placidia (Philostorg. xii. 4), and by whom he had six children. The only offspring of his second marriage was a son, Theodosius, who died in infancy. (Olympiod. p. 59, b.)

ATE (Ate), according to Hesiod (Theog. 230), a daughter of Eris, and according to Homer (H. xix. 91) of Zeus, was an ancient Greek divinity, who led both gods and men to rash and unforeseen actions and to suffering. She once induced Zeus, at the birth of Heracles, to take an oath by which Hera was afterwards enabled to give to Eurytheus the power which had been destined for Heracles. When Zeus discovered her rashness, he hurled Ate from Olympus and banished her for ever from the abodes of the gods. (Hom. H. xix. 126, &c.) In the tragic writers Ate appears in a different light: she avenges evil deeds and inflicts just punishments upon the offenders and their posterity (Aeschyl. Choep. 381), so that her character here is almost the same as that of Nemesis and Epimetheus. She appears most prominent in the dramas of Aeschylus, and least in those of Euripides, with whom the idea of Dike (justice) is more fully developed. (Blümner, Ueber die Idee des Schicksals, &c. p. 64, &c.) [L.S.] ATEIUS, surnamed Procurator, and also Philologus, the latter of which surnames he assumed in order to indicate his great learning, was born at Athens, and was one of the most celebrated gram- marians at Rome, in the latter half of the first century B.C. He was a freeman, and was perhaps originally a slave of the jurist Aeius Capito, by whom he was characterized as a rhetorician among grammarians, and a grammarian among rhetoricians. He taught many of the Roman nobles, and was particularly intimate with the historian Sallust, and with Asinius Pollio. For the former he drew up an abstract of Roman history (Breviarium rerum omnium Romanarum), that Sallust might select from it for his history such subjects as he chose; and for the latter he compiled precepts on the art of writing. Asinius Pollio believed that Aeius collected for Sallust many of the peculiar expressions which we find in his works, which had in some measure been denied by Suetonius. The commentaries of Aeius were exceedingly numerous, but only a very few were extant even in the time of Suetonius. (Sueton. de Cl. Lit. 10; comp. Ossian, Analecta Crit. p. 64, &c.; Madvig, Opuscula Academica, p. 97, &c.)

ATEIUS CAPITO. [CAPITO.]

ATEIUS SANCTUS. [SANCTUS.]

ATERIanus, JULIUS, wrote a work upon the Thirty Tyrants (A. D. 239—268), or at least upon one of them, Victorinus. Trebellius Pollio (Trig. Tyr. 6) gives an extract from his work.

A. ATERIUS or ATERIUS consul b. c. 4544 b. c. 454. A. T. Tarpeia. (Liv. iii. 31.) The consulship is commemorate for the passing of the Lex Ateriana Tarpeia. (Dict. of Ant. &c.) Aterius was subsequently in b. c. 448, one of the patrician tribunes of the people, which was the only time that patricians were elected to that office. (Liv. vii. 65.)

ATERIUS, or HATERIUS, a Roman juris-consult, who was probably contemporary with Cicero, and gave occasion to one of that great ora-ATHANARIUS, the son of Rhodestus, was king, or according to Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 5), "Judex" of the West Goths during their stay in Dacia. His name became first known in A.D. 367, when the Goths were attacked by the emperor Valens, who first encamped near Daphne, a fort on the Danube, from whence, after having laid a bridge of boats over this river, he entered Dacia. The Goths retired and the emperor retreated likewise after having performed but little. He intended a new campaign, but the swollen waters of the Danube inundated the surrounding country, and Valens took up his winter quarters at Marcianopolis in Moesia Inferior, and defeated Athanarius who wished for peace, and who was invited by Valens to come to his camp. Athanarius excused himself, pretending that he had made a vow never to set his foot on the Roman territory, but he promised to the Roman ambassadors, Victor and Arintheus, that he would meet with the emperor in a boat on the Danube. Valens having agreed to this peace was concluded on that river, on conditions not very heavy for the Goths, for they lost nothing; but their commerce with Moesia and Thrace was restricted to two towns on the Danube. Thence probably the title "Gothicus," which Eutropius gives to Valens in the dedication of his history.

In 373, Athanarius, who belonged to the orthodox party, was involved in a feud with Fritigern, another "judge" of the West Goths or Thervingi, who was an Arian, and oppressed the Catholic party. In 374, the Gothic empire was invaded by the Huns. Athanarius defended the passages of the Dnieper, but the Huns crossed this river in spite of his vigilance and defeated the Goths, whereupon Athanarius retired between the Pruth and the Danube, to a strong position which he fortified by lines. His situation, however, was so dangerous, that the Goths sent ambassadors, among whom probably was Ulphilas, to the emperor Valens, for the purpose of obtaining dwelling places within the Roman empire. Valens received the ambassadors at Antioch, and promised to receive the West Goths as "foderae." Thus the West Goths (Thervingi) settled in Moesia, but, faithful to his vow, refused to accompany them and retired to a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia. There he defended himself against the Huns, as well as some Gothic chiefs, who tried to dislodge him, till in 380 he was compelled to fly. Necessity urged him to forget his oath, he entered the Roman territory and retired to Constantinople, where the emperor Theodosius treated him with great kindness and all the respect due to his rank. He died in 391. (Amm. Marc. xxviii. 5, xxx. 3; Themistius, Orat. in Valentin.; Zosimus, iv. 54, 55; Sozomen. vi. 57; Idatius, in Fastis, Syagrius et Eucherio Cosi; Eunapius, Eustr. p. 18, 19, ed. Pauly; ]

ATHANARIUS (Athanasius), a Greek historian, the author of a work on Sicily, quoted by Plutarch (Timol. 23, 37) and Diodorus. (xv. 94.) He is probably the same with Athanarius, a writer mentioned by Atheneaus (i. p. 98), who also wrote a work on Sicily. (Göller, de Situs, c. Syracusarum, p. 16.)

ATHANASIANUS (Athanasios), a. ST., archbishop of Alexandria, was born in that city, a few years before the close of the third century. The date of athanasius.

his birth cannot be ascertained with exactness; but it is assigned by Mountfoucon, on grounds sufficiently probable, to a. d. 296. No particulars are recorded of the lineage or the parents of athanasius. The dawn of his character and genius seems to have given fair promise of his subsequent eminence; for alexander, then primate of Egypt, brought him up in his own family, and superintended his education with the view of dedicating him to the Christian ministry. We have no account of the studies pursued by athanasius in his youth, except the vague statement of Gregory Nazianzen, that he devoted comparatively little attention to general literature, but acquired an extraordinary knowledge of the scriptures. His early proficiency in biblical knowledge is credible enough; but though he was much inferior in general learning to such men as clemens alexandrinus, origen, and eusebius, his oration against the greeks, itself a juvenile performance, evinces no contemptible acquaintance with the literature of heathen mythology. While a young man, athanasius frequently visited the celebrated hermit st. antony, of whom he eventually became the biographer; and this early acquaintance laid the foundation of a friendship which was interrupted only by the death of the aged recluse. [antonus, st.] at what age athanasius was ordained a deacon is nowhere stated; but he was young both in years and in office when he vigorously supported alexander in maintaining the orthodox faith against the earliest assaults of the arians. He was still only a deacon when appointed a member of the famous council of nice (a. d. 325), in which he distinguished himself as an able opponent of the arian doctrine, and assisted in drawing up the creed that takes its name from that assembly. In the following year alexander died; and athanasius, whom he had strongly recommended as his successor, was raised to the vacant see of alexandria, the voice of the people as well as the suffrages of the ecclesiastics being decisively in his favour. The manner in which he discharged the duties of his new office was highly exemplary; but he had not long enjoyed his elevation, before he encountered the commencement of that long series of trials which darkened the eventful remainder of his life. About the year 331, arius, who had been banished by constantine after the condemnation of his doctrine by the council of nice, made a professed submission to the catholic faith, which satisfied the emperor; and shortly after, athanasius received an imperial order to admit the heresarch once more into the churches of alexandria. The archbishop had the courage to disobey, and justified his conduct in a letter which seems, at the time, to have been satisfactory to constantine. Soon after this, complaints were lodged against athanasius by certain enemies of his, belonging to the obscure sect of the melitians. One of the charges involved nothing short of high treason. Others related to acts of sacrilege alleged to have been committed in a church where a priest named ischyras or ischirion officiated. It was averred that macarius, a priest acting under the orders of athanasius, had forcibly entered this church while ischyras was performing divine service. He tore down the altar, overturned the communion-table, burned the sacred books, demolished the pulpit, and razed the edifice to its foundations. Athanasius made his defence before the emperor in person, and was honourably acquitted. With regard to the pretended acts of sacrilege, it was proved that ischyras had never received regular orders; that, in consequence of his unduly assuming the priestly office, athanasius in one of his episcopal visitations had sent macarius and another ecclesiastic to inquire into the matter; that these had found ischyras ill in bed, and had contented themselves with advising his father to dissuade him from all such irregularities for the future. ischyras himself afterwards confessed with tears the groundlessness of the charges preferred against macarius; and gave athanasius a written disavowal of them, signed by six priests and seven deacons. Notwithstanding these proofs of the primate's innocence, his enemies renewed their attack in an aggravated form; accusing athanasius himself of the acts previously imputed to macarius, and charging him moreover with the murder of arseneus, bishop of hyspeia in upper egypt. To give colour to this latter accusation arseneus absconded, and lay concealed for a considerable time. The emperor before whom the charges were laid, already knew that those relating to ischyras were utterly baseless; he accordingly offered it to his brother dalmatius, the censor, to inquire into the alleged murder of arseneus. Dalmatius wrote to athanasius, commanding him to prepare his defence. The primate was at first inclined to leave so monstrous a calumny to its own fate; but finding that the anger of the emperor had been excited against him, he instituted an active search after arseneus, and in the end learned that he had been discovered and identified at tyre. The arians meanwhile had urged the conviction of a council at caesarea, for the purpose of inquiring into the crimes imputed to athanasius. But he, unwilling to trust his cause to such a tribunal, sent to the emperor a full account of the exposure of the pretended homicide. On this, constantine ordered dalmatius to stay all proceedings against athanasius, and commanded the arian bishops, instead of holding their intended synod at caesarea, to return home. Undeterred by this failure, the enemies of athanasius, two years after, prevailed upon constantine to summon a council at tyre, in which they repeated the old accusations concerning ischyras and arseneus, and urged new matter of condemnation. The pretended sacrilege in the church of ischyras was disproved by the bishops who were present from egypt. The murder of arseneus was satisfactorily disposed of by producing the man himself alive and well, in the midst of the council. The adversaries of the primate succeeded, however, in appointing a commission to visit egypt and take cognizance of the matters laid to his charge. The proceedings of this commission are described by athanasius as having been in the highest degree corrupt, iniquitous, and disorderly. On the return of the commissioners to tyre, whence athanasius had meanwhile withdrawn, the council deposed him from his office, interdicted him from visiting alexandria, and sent copies of his sentence to all the bishops in the christian world, forbidding them to receive him into their communion. On a calm review of all the proceedings in this case, it may be admitted that the condemnation of the action of athanasius was flagrantly unjust, and was entirely provoked by his uncompromising opposition to the tenets of the arians, who had secured a ma-Cappadocia was advanced in his stead. The new primate entered on his office (A.D. 341) amidst scenes of atrocious violence. The Christian population of Alexandria were loud in their complaints against the removal of Athanasius, and Philagrius, the prefect of Egypt, who had been sent with Gregory to establish him in his new office, let loose against them a crowd of ferocious assailants, who committed the most frightful excesses. Athanasius fled to Rome, and addressed to the bishops of every Christian church an energetic epistle, in which he details the cruel injuries inflicted upon himself and his people, and entreats the aid of all his brethren. At Rome he was honourably received by Julius, who despatched messengers to the ecclesiastical opponents of Athanasius, summoning them to a council to be held in the imperial city. Apparently in dread of exposure and condemnation, they refused to comply with the summons. When the council met (A.D. 342), Athanasius was heard in his own vindication, and honourably restored to the communion of the church. A synodical letter was addressed by the council to the Ariam clergy, severely reproving them for their disobedience to the summons of Julius and their unrighteous conduct to the church of Alexandria.

In the year 347, a council was held at Sardica, at which the Arians at first designed to attend. They insisted, however, that Athanasius and all whom they had condemned should be excluded. As it was the great object of this council to decide upon the merits of that very case, the proposition was of course rejected, and the Arians left the assembly. The council, after due investigation, affirmed the innocence of those whom the Arians had deposed, restored them to their offices, and condemned their adversaries. Synodical epistles, exhibiting the decrees of the council, were duly prepared and issued. Delegates were sent to the emperor Constantius at Antioch, to notify the decision of the council of Sardica; and they were also entrusted with a letter from Constans to his brother, in which the cause of the orthodox clergy was strongly recommended. At Antioch an infamous plot was laid to blast the reputation of the delegates. Its detection seems to have wrought powerfully upon the mind of Constantius, who had hitherto remained neutral. He recalled those of the orthodox whom he had banished, and sent letters to Alexandria forbidding any further molestation to be offered to the friends of Athanasius.

In the following year (A.D. 349), Gregory was murdered at Alexandria; but of the occasion and manner of his death no particulars have reached us. It prepared the way for the return of Athanasius. He was urged to this by Constantius himself, whom he visited on his way to Alexandria, and on whom he made, for the time, a very favourable impression. He was once more received at Alexandria with over flattering signs of gladness and affection. Restored to his see, he immediately proceeded to correct the errors of the Arians with great severity; and they, on their side, renewed against him the charges which had been so often disproved. Constans, the friend of Athanasius, was now dead; and though Constantius, at this juncture, professed great friendliness for the primate, he soon attached himself once more to the Ariam party. In a council held at Arles (A.D. 353), and another at Milan (A.D. 355), they succeeded by great exertions in procur-

* Gibbon ascribes the sentence to reasons of policy. "The emperor was satisfied that the peace of Egypt would be secured by the absence of a popular leader; but he refused to fill the vacancy of the archiepiscopal throne; and the sentence, which, after long hesitation, he pronounced, was that of a jealous ostracism, rather than of an ignominious exile."
the first three years of the administration of Valens, the orthodox party seem to have been exempt from persecution. In the third year of his reign Athanasius wrote the life of St. Antony,summarizing ideas on the doctrine of the Trinity. In the year 367, Valens issued an edict for the deposition and banishment of all those bishops who had returned to their see at the death of Constantius. After a delay occasioned by the importunate prayers of the people on behalf of their beloved teacher, Athanasius was for the fifth time expelled from Alexandria. His last exile, however, was short. In the space of a few months, he was recalled by Valens himself, for reasons which it is now impossible to penetrate; and from this time to the date of his death, A.D. 373, he seems to have remained un molested. He continued to discharge the inordinate duties of his office with unabated energy to the last; and after holding the primacy for a term of forty-six years, during which he sustained unexamined reverses with heroic fortitude, and prosecuted the great purpose of his life with singular sagacity and resolution, he died without a blemish upon his name, full of years and covered with honour.

The following eulogy was extorted by his merits from the pen of an historian who seldom lavishes praise upon ancient or modern defenders of orthodoxy—"Amidst the storms of persecution, the Archbishop of Alexandria was patient of tribulation, jealously guarding the lamp of safety; and though his mind was tainted by the contagion of fanaticism, Athanasius displayed a superiority of character and abilities, which would have qualified him, far better than the degenerate sons of Constantine, for the government of a great monarchy. His learning was much less profound and extensive than that of Eusebius of Caesarea, and his rude eloquence could not be compared with the polished oratory of Gregory or Basil; but whenever the primate of Egypt was called upon to justify his sentiments or his conduct, his unpremeditated style, either of speaking or writing, was clear, forcible, and persuasive." (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. ii. pp. 351, 352, Milman's edition.) Erasmus's opinion of the style of Athanasius seems to have been that of discriminating him from Gibbon:—"Erat vir ille sacculo tam similis, simo dignus, dedisset nobis egregios ingenii facundiae succo fructus. Habet enim vero domum illam, quam Paulus in Episcopo putat esse praecipuam, to ἐξαιρετικὸν; adeo dilucidus est, acutus, sobrias, aduentus, breviter omnibus modis ad commendum oppositus. Nihil habet durum, quod offendit in Tertulliano; nihil ἐκκένωσις, quod vidimus in Hieronymo; nihil operosum, quod in Hilario; nihil haenio, quod est in Augustino, atque eadem Chrysostomo: nihil insensatos numeros aut Lysice compositionem radiosam, quod est in Gregorio Nazianzeno: sed totus est in explicandis rebus."

The most important among the works of Athanasius are the following:—"Oratio contra Gentes," "Oratio de Incarnatione," "Encyclogia ad Episcopos Epistola;" "Apologia contra Arianos;" "Epistola de Nicaenus Decretis;" "Epistola ad Episcopos Aegypti et Libyae;" "Apologia ad Imperatorem Constantium;" "Apologia de Fuga sua;" "Historia Arianorum ad Monachos;" "Orationes quatuor contra Arianos;" "Epistola quattuor ad Serapionem;" "Epistola de SYNODO ARIMINI et Seleuciae;" "Vita Antonii;" "Libri de Incarnatione Del Verbi et c. Arianos."
The earliest edition of the collected works of Athanasius appeared, in two volumes, folio, at Heidelberg, ex officina Cummanniana, A. D. 1600. The Greek text was accompanied by the Latin version of Peter Nicaeus of Nicaea; and in the following year an appendix issued from the same press, containing notes, various readings, indices, &c., by Peter Folekmann. Those who purchase this edition should take care that their copies contain the appendix. The Paris edition of 1627, and the Leipzig of 1686 (which professes, but untruly, to have been published at Cologne), are not held in much estimation; and the latter is very inaccurately printed. The valuable Benedictine edition of Athanasius was published at Paris, A. D. 1698, in three volumes, folio. The learned editor, Montfaucon, was at first assisted in preparing it by James Lopprinus; but his coadjutor dying when no more than half of the first volume was finished, the honour of completing the edition devolved upon Montfaucon. Many of the epistles of Athanasius were printed, for the first time, in the second volume of Montfaucon’s ‘Collectio Nova Patrum et Scriptorum Graecorum,’ Paris, A. D. 1706. The most complete edition of the works of Athanasius is that published at Padua, A. D. 1777, in four volumes, folio. The first three volumes contain all that is comprised in the valuable Benedictine edition of 1698; the last includes the supplementary collections of Montfaucon, Wolf, Maffei, and Antonelli. The following list includes the principal English translations from the works of Athanasius:—St. Athanasius’s Four Orations against the Arians; and his Oration against the Gentiles. Translated from the original Greek, by Mr. Sam. Parker.” Oxfor.d, 1713. Athanasius’s intire Treatise of the Incarnation of the Word, and of his bodily appearance to us, translated into English by W. Whiston, in his “Collection of ancient Monuments relating to the Trinity and Incarnation.” London, 1713. The same collection also contains a translation of Athanasius’s Life of Antony the Monk, which was first published in 1687. The Epistles of Athanasius in defence of the Nicene definition, and on the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, together with his first Oration against the Arians, have been recently translated, with notes, by the Rev. J. H. Newman, Oxford, 1842. The other three Orations, translated by the same writer, are shortly to appear; and other works of Athanasius on the Arian controversy are advertised as preparing for publication.

For a complete list of the genuine, doubtful, and supposed works of Athanasius, see Fabricius, Bibl. Graecae, vol. viii. pp. 104—215, ed. Haries. The most important of his genuine writings are those (both historical and doctrinal) which relate to the Arian controversy. It is hardly necessary to observe that the creed commonly called Athanasian was not composed by the archbishop of Alexandria. (See Gerardi Vossii, Dissertatio de Symbolo Athanasiano, Opp. vol. vi. pp. 516—522; W. E. Tentzelii, Justiniani eruditorum de Symbolo Athanasiano.) It has been ascribed to Vincentius the Paphian, Vincent of Lerins, Hilary of Poitiers, and others; but its real author is unknown. The “Synopsis Sacrae Scripturae,” which is included in the writings of this eminent father, has no claim to be considered his; though, in itself, it is a valuable relic of antiquity.

The chief sources of information respecting the life of Athanasius are found in his own writings; next to these, in the ecclesiastical histories of Sozomen, Sozomen, and Theodoret. The materials afforded by these and other writers have been collected, examined, and digested with great learning and fidelity by Montfaucon, in his “Vita Saceti Athanasii,” prefixed to the Benedictine edition of the works of this father, and by Titilmon, in his Mémoires pour servir à l’Histoire Ecclesiastique, vol. viii., Paris edition of 1713. [J. M. M.]

ATHANAUSIUS (Ἀθανασίος), of Alexandria, a presbyter of the church in that city, was a son of Isidora, the sister of Cyril of Alexandria. He was deprived of his office and driven out of Alexandria and Egypt by the bishop, Diocletian, from whom he suffered much persecution. There is extant a small work of his, in Greek, against Diocletian, which he presented to the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. (Concil. vol. iv. p. 405.)

There were various other ecclesiastical writers of the name of Athanasius, of whom a list is given in Fabric. Bibl. Graecae, vol. viii. p. 174.

ATHANAUSIUS SCHOLASTICUS. 1. A Graeco-Roman jurist, who practised as an advocate at Emea, and was contemporary with and survived Justinian. He published in Greek an epitome of Justinian’s Novella; and this work, long known to the learned to exist in manuscript in the royal libraries of Vienna and Paris, was first given to the world by G. E. Heimbach, in the first volume of his ‘Archdor, Leipzig, 1830. It was probably the same Athanasius who wrote a book de Criminalibus, of which there was a manuscript in the library of Ant. Augustinians. (G. E. Heimbach, De Basiliacvm Origine Fustulols Scholcès, &c., Leipzig, 1825, p. 4.)

Athena.

As the protectress of agriculture, Athena is represented as the inventor of the plough and rake: she created the olive tree, the greatest blessing of Attica, taught the people to yoke oxen to the plough, took care of the breeding of horses, and instructed men how to tame them by the bridle, her own invention. Allusions to this feature of her character are contained in the epithets βοιοεις, βουκολη, ἄρνησα, ἠρόπη, ἱερίως, or χαλκοτρίγης (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1076; Tzetza, ad Lycop. 526; Hesych. s. v. Αθηνα); and Paus. i. 42.; Aeschin. iv. 402; Pind. O1. xiii. 79.) At the beginning of spring thanks were offered to her in advance (προχειρωτηρία, Suid. s.v.) for the protection she was to afford to the fields. Besides the inventions relating to agriculture, others also connected with various kinds of science, industry, and art, are ascribed to her, and all her inventions are not of the kind which men make by chance or accident, but such as require thought and meditation. We may notice the invention of numbers (Liv. vii. 5), of the trumpet (Büech, ad Pind. p. 341), the chariot, and navigation. (Arist.) In regard to all kinds of useful arts, she was believed to have made men acquainted with the means and instruments for practising them, such as the art of producing fire. She was further believed to have invented nearly every kind of work in which women were employed, and she herself was skilled in such work: in short Athena and Hephaestus were the great patrons both of the useful and elegant arts. Hence she is called ἔρωτη (Paus. i. 34. § 3), and later writers make her the goddess of all wisdom, knowledge, and art, and represent her as sitting on the right hand side of her father Zeus, and supporting him with her counsel. (Hom. Od. xxxii. 160, xviii. 190; Hymn. in Ven. 4, 7, &c.; Plat. Ovid. Fast. iii. 800; Orph. Hymn. xxxi. 8; Schol. on Callim. p. 613; Horæ. Cæsar. i. 12. 19; comp. Dict. of Ant. under Αθηνα and Χαλκοτριγή. As the goddess who made so many inventions necessary and useful in civilized life, she is characterized by various epithets and synonyms, expressing the keenness of her sight or the power of her intellect, such as ἐνοίξιτης, ἐφαυλάμενης, ἐξωρείνης, γαλακτωπίας, πολιθεουσας, πολύλογης, and μηχανετής.

As the patron divinity of the state, she was at Athens the protectress of the phratries and houses which formed the basis of the state. The festival of the Apatouria had a direct reference to this particular point in the character of the goddess. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Απατούρια.) She also maintained the authority of the law, and justice, and order, in the courts and the assembly of the people. This notion was as ancient as the Homeric poems, in which she is described as assisting Odysseus against the lawless conduct of the suitors. (Od. xxxii. 394.) She was believed to have instituted the ancient court of the Areiopagus, and in cases where the votes of the judges were equally divided, she gave the casting vote in favour of the accused. (Lysych. Deum. 755; comp. Paus. i. 28. § 5.) The epithets which have reference to this part of the goddess's character are δεσπότινα, the avenger (Paus. iii. 15. § 4), βουλαία, and διευθυνή. (iii. 11. § 6.)

As Athena promoted the internal prosperity of the state, by encouraging agriculture and industry, and by maintaining law and order in all public transactions, so also she protected the state from outward enemies, and thus assumes the character of a warlike divinity, though in a very different sense from Ares, Eris, or Enyo. According to Homer (H. i. 726, &c.), she does not even bear arms, but borrows them from Zeus; she keeps men from slaughter when prudence demands it (H. i. 180, &c.), and repels Ares's savage Ares of war, and conquers him. (v. 840, &c., xxi. 406.) She does not love war for its own sake, but simply on account of the advantages which the state gains in engaging in it; and she therefore supports only such warlike undertakings as are begun with favour, and are likely to be followed by favourable results. (v. 244, &c.) The epithets which she derives from her warlike character are διενεχεισα, λοιπρά, δυναμεική, λαόκοσαν, and others. In times of war, towns, fortresses, and harbours are under her especial care, whence she is designated as προστάτισσα, δωλοεμπνευσμένη, πολίτη, πολιορχῶ, διαρμή, δαιμί, λογόφυτος, περιστασιοφάρμακος, διευθυντική, λοιπρός, and others. In the war of Zeus against the giants, she assisted her father and her sisters with her counsel, and also took an active part in it, for she buried Enceladus under the island of Sicily, and slew Pallas. (Apollod. l. 6. § 1, &c.; comp. Spanheim, ad Callim. p. 643; Horat. Carm. i. 12. 19.) In the Trojan war she sided with the more civilised Greeks, though on their return home she visited them with storms, on account of the manner in which the Locrian Ajax had treated Cassandra in her temple. As a goddess of war and the protector of heroes, she usually appears in armour, with the aegis and a golden staff, with which she bestows on her favourites youth and majesty. (Hom. Od. xvi. 172.)

The character of Athena, as we have here traced it, holds a middle place between the male and female, whence she is called in an Orphic hymn (xxx. 10) ἀγρίνθιον καὶ φῶς, and hence also she is a virgin divinity (Hom. Hymn. ix. 3), whose heart is inaccessible to the passion of love, and who shuns matrimonial connexion. Teiresias was deprived of his sight for having seen her in the bath (Callim. Hymn. pp. 546, 589), and Hephastus, who made an attempt upon her chastity, was obliged to flee. (Apollod. iii. 6. §§ 14, 15; Hom. H. ii. 547, &c.; comp. Tzetes, ad Lyogphr. 111.) For this reason, the ancient traditions always describe the goddess as dressed; and when Ovid (Heroid. v. 36) makes her appear, naked before Paris, he abandons the usual.off story. Her statue also was always dressed, and when it was carried about at the Attic festivals, it was entirely covered. But, notwithstanding the common opinion of her virgin character, there are some traditions of late origin which describe her as a mother. Thus, Apollo is called a son of Hephastus and Athena—a legend which may have arisen at the time when the Ionians introduced the worship of Apollo into Attica, and when this new divinity was placed in some family connexion with the ancient goddess of the country. (Müller, Dor. ii. 2. § 13.) Lycurgus also is called a son of Hephastus and Athena. (Spanheim, ad Callim. p. 644.)

Athena was worshipped in all parts of Greece, and from the ancient towns on the lake Copis her worship was introduced at a very early period into Attica, where she became the great national divinity of the city and the country. Here she was afterwards regarded as the ζεύς ἐνεκηρυκτής, ὕλεσα, and παναι, and the serpent, the symbol of perpetual renovation, was sacred to her. (Paus. i. 28. § 3, 31. § 3, 2. § 4.) At Lindus in Rhodes her worship was likewise very ancient. Respecting its introduction into Italy, and the modifications which her character underwent there, see Minerva. Among the things sacred to her we may mention the owl, serpent, cock, and olive-tree, which she was said to have created in her contest with Poseidon concerning the possession of Attica. (Plut. de Is. et Os.; Paus. vi. 26. §§ 1, 24. § 3; Hygin. Fab. 164.) At Corone in Messenia her statue bore a crown in its hand. (Paus. iv. 54. § 5.) The sacrifices offered to her consisted of bulls, whence she probably derived the surname of τιβοβιδες (Suid. s. v.), rams, and cows. (Hom. H. ii. 550; Ov. Met. iv. 754.) Eustathius (ad Hom. l. c.) remarks, that only female animals were sacrificed to her, but no female lambs. In Ilion, Locrian maidens or children are said to have been sacrificed to her every year as an atonement for the crime committed by the Locrian Ajax upon Cassandra; and Suidas (s. v. ποιεῖσθ) states, that these human sacrifices continued to be offered to her down to b. c. 346. Respecting the great festivals of Athena at Athens, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Panatheneus and Archeophoria.

Athena was frequently represented in works of art; but those in which her figure reached the highest ideal of perfection were the three statues by Phidias. The first was the celebrated colossal statue of the goddess, of gold and ivory, which was erected on the acropolis of Athens, and which was a still greater beauty than that made out of the spoils taken by the Athenians in the battle of Marathon; the third was a small bronze statue called the beautiful or the Lemnian Athena, because it had been dedicated at Athens by the Lemnians. The first of these statues represented the goddess in a standing position, bearing in her hand a Nike four cubits in height. The shield stood by her feet; her robe came down to her feet, on her breast was the head of Medusa, in her right hand she bore a lance, and at her feet there lay a serpent. (Paus. i. 24. § 7, 23. § 2.) We still possess a great number of representations of Athena in statues, colossal busts, reliefs, coins, and in vase-paintings. Among the attributes which characterise the goddess in these works of art, we mention—1. The helmet, which she usually wears on her head, but in a few instances carries in her hand. It is usually ornamented in the most beautiful manner with griffins, heads of rams, horses, and sphinxes. (Comp. Hom. H. vi. v. 743.) 2. The aegis. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Aegis.) 3. The round Argive shield, in the centre of which is represented the head of Medusa. 4. Objects sacred to her, such as an olive branch, a serpent, an owl, a cock, and a lance. Her garment is usually the Spartan tunic without sleeves, and over it
4. Of Slenecus, a philosopher of the Peripatetic school, mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 670) as a contemporary of his own. He was for some time the leading demagogue in his native city, but afterwards came to Rome and became acquainted with L. Licinius Varro Murmene. On the discovery of the plot which the latter, with Fannius Caepio, had entered into against Augustus, Athenaeus accompanied him in his flight. He was retaken, but pardoned by Augustus, as there was no evidence of his having taken a more active part in the plot. He is perhaps the same with the writer mentioned by Diodorus. (I. 20.)

5. A stoic philosopher, mentioned by Porphyrius in his life of Plotinus. (c. 20.) There was also an Epicurean philosopher of this name (Diod. Laert. x. 129. 12.)

ATHENAEUS (Athênaeōs), a native of Naukratis, a town on the left side of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, is called by Suidas Ἀθηναίων, a term which may be best rendered into English, an literary man. Suidas places him in the "times of Marcus," but whether by this is meant Marcus Aurelius is uncertain, as Caracalla was also Marcus Antoninus. We know, however, that Oppian, who wrote a work called Haliaeetica inscribed to Caracalla, was a little anterior to him (Athen. i. p. 13.), and that Commodus was dead when he wrote (s. p. 537), so that he may have been in the reign of Aurelius, but thenceforward under his successors. Part of his work must have been written after a.d. 228, the date given by Dion Cassius for the death of Ulpian the lawyer, which event he mentions. (xv. p. 686.)

His extant work is entitled the Deipnosophistae, i.e. the Banquet of the Learned, or else, perhaps, as has lately been suggested, The Convivial Leasts. It may be considered one of the earliest collections of what are called Ana, being an immense mass of anecdotes, extracts from the writings of poets, historians, dramatists, philosophers, orators, and physicians, of facts in natural history, criticisms, and discussions on almost every conceivable subject, especially on Astronomy, upon which noble science he mentions a work (now lost) of Archestratus [Aristarchus of Samos]. One place his own 15 books have probably supplied. It is in short a collection of stories from the memory and common-place book of a Greek gentleman of the third century of the Christian era, of enormous reading, extreme love of good eating, and respectable ability. Some notion of the materials which he had amassed for the work, may be formed from the fact, which he tells us himself, that he had read and made extracts from 800 plays of the middle comedy only. (vii. p. 336.)

Athenaeus represents himself as describing to his friend Timocrates, a banquet given at the house of Laurentius (Aesoporum), a noble Roman, to several guests, of whom the best known are Galen, a physician, and Ulpian, the lawyer. The work is in the form of a dialogue, in which these guests are the interlocutors, related to Timocrates: a double machinery, which would have been inconvenient to an author who had a real talent for dramatic writing, but which in the hands of Athenaeus, who had none, is wholly unmanageable. As a work of art the failure is complete. Unity of time and dramatic probability are utterly violated by the supposition that so immense a work is the record of the conversation at a single banquet, and by the absurdity of collecting at it the produce of every season of the year. Long quotations and intricate discussions introduced apropos of some trifling incident, entirely destroy the form of the dialogue, so that before we have finished a speech we forget who was the speaker. And when in addition to this confusion we are suddenly brought back to the tiresome Timocrates, we are quite provoked at the clumsy way in which the book is put together. But as a work illustrative of ancient manners, as a collection of curious facts, names of authors and fragments, which, but for Athenaeus, would utterly have perished; in short, as a body of amusing antiquarian research, it would be difficult to praise the Deipnosophists too highly.

The work begins, somewhat absurdly, considering the difference between a discussion on the Imortality of the Soul, and one on the Pleasures of the Stomach, with an exact imitation of the opening of Plato's Phaedo.—Athenaeus and Timocrates being substituted for Phaedo and Echecrates. The praises of Laurentius are then introduced, and the conversation of the savans begins. It would be impossible to give an account of the contents of the book; a few specimens therefore must suffice. We have anecdotes about Quintus, the second of the three illustrious gluttons of that name, who is said to have spent many thousands on his stomach, and to have lived at Minturnae in the reign of Tiberius, whence he sailed to Africa, in search of good lobsters; but finding, as he approached the shore, that they were no longer than those which he ate in Italy, he turned back without landing. Sometimes we have anecdotes to prove assertions in natural history, e.g., it is shown that water is nutritious (1), by the statement that it nourishes the tettiga, and (2) because fluids generally are so, as milk and honey, by the latter of which Democritus of Abdera allowed himself to be kept alive over the Thermophoria (though he had determined to starve himself), in order that the mourning for his death might not prevent his maidservants from celebrating the festival. The story of the Pinna and Pinnuctor (πιννόφωκα καὶ πιννοτηρίδα) is told in the course of the disquisitions on shell-fish. The pinnon is a bivalve shell-fish (βαστερος), the pinnuctor a small crab, which inhabits the pinnon's shell. As soon as the small fish on which the pinnon subsists have swum in, the pinnuctor bites the pinnon as a signal to him to close his shell and secure them. Grammatical discussions are mixed up with gastronomy; e.g., the account of the ςώρατη begins with the laws of its accentuation; of eggs, by a parody into the spelling of the name μαναδον; of oysters, again; of the name τρίχωμα. Quotations are made in support of each, and we are told that αδων was formerly the same as απορρα, from which fact he deduces an explanation of the story of Helen's birth from an egg. This suggests to him a quotation from Eriphus, who says that Leda produced goose's eggs; and so he wanders on through every variety of subject connected with eggs. This will give some notion of the discursive manner in which he extracts all kinds of facts from the vast stores of his erudition. Sometimes he connects different pieces of knowledge by a mere similarity of sounds. Cynicus, one of the great scholars, was called (ἐπόρος), but however for Areus king of the Messenians: "and then we are led back from Areus the king to Areus the elephant, and from that to salted meats, which brings in a grammatical discussion on the word τάφρος, whether it is masculine in Attic or not. Sometimes antiquarian points are discussed, especially Homeric. Thus, he examines the times of day at which the Homeric poets took place, and the genuineness of some of the lines in the Iliad and Odyssey, as αὐτήματος δ ο ηδέτα μηνίς του μονής.

His etymological conjectures are in the usual style of ancient philology. In proving the religious duty of drunkenness, as he considers it, he derives διονυσος from θεως υμνην ονομασθηναι, and μεκαναι from μετα το δίνουν. We often obtain from him curious pieces of information on subjects connected with ancient art, as that the kind of drinking-cup called κούρον was first devised by Ptelemy Philomelus as an ornament for the statues of his queen, Arsinoe. (Arsinoe, No. 2.) At the end of the work is a collection of scholia and other songs, which the savans recite. One of these is a real curiosity,—a song by Aristotle in praise of ἐρήμων.

Among the authors, whose works are now lost, from whom Athenaeus gives extracts, are Alcmen, Agathon the tragic poet, Antisthenes the philosopher, Archilochus the inventor of iambics, Menander and his contemporary Diphilus, Epimenes of Crete, Empedocles of Agrigentum, Cratinus, Eupolis (Hor. Sat. i. 4.1), Alcman, Epicles (whom he represents as a wasteful glutton), and many others whose names are well known. In all, he cites nearly 300 authors and more than 1200 separate works. Athenaeus was also the author of a lost book τει παν τον ἐν δείκτη βασιλευοῦντος, which probably, from the specimen of it in the Deipnosophists, and the obvious unfitness of Athenaeus to be a historian, was rather a collection of anecdotes than a connected history.

Of the Deipnosophists the first two books, and parts of the third, eleventh, and fifteenth, exist only in an Epitome, whose date and author are unknown. The original work, however, was rare in the time of Eustathius (latter part of 12th cent.), for Bentley has shown, by examining nearly a hundred of his references to Athenaeus, that his only knowledge of him was through the Epitome. (Phileas, p. 180, &c.) Perizonius (preface to Aelian quoted by Schweighäuser) has proved that Aelian transcribed large portions of the work to his Various Histories (middle of 3rd cent.), a robbery which he was committed almost in the life-time of the pillagers. The Deipnosophists also furnished to Macrobius the ideas and much of the matter of his Satyrata (end of 4th cent.); but no one has availed himself so largely of Athenaeus's erudition as Eustathius.

Only one original MS. of Athenaeus now exists, called by Schweighäuser the Codex Veneto-Parisiiensis. From this all the others which we now possess are copies; so that the text of the work, especially in the poetical parts, is in a very unsettled state. The MS. was brought from Greece by cardinal Bejarron, and after his death was placed in the library of St. Mark at Venice, whence it was taken to Paris by order of Napoleon, and there for the first time collated by Schweighäuser's son. It is probably of the date of the 10th cen-
The subterfuge is always placed instead, of under, the vowel with which it is connected, and the whole is written without contractions.

The first edition of Athenaeus was that of Aldus, Venice, 1514; a second published at Baze, 1535; a third by Casanov at Genoa, 1577. The first Latin version is by David Chalmers (James Dalechamp of Cuen), and a commentary published in 1600; a fourth by Schwighäuser, Straubing, 14 vols. 8vo. 1801-1807, founded on a collection of the above-mentioned MS. and also of a valuable copy of the Epitome; a fifth by W. Dindorf, 3 vols. 8vo., Leipsic, 1827. The last is the best, Schwighäuser not having availed himself sufficiently of the suavity of previous critics in amending the text, and being himself apparently very ignorant of metrical laws. There is a translation of Athenaeus into French by M. Lefevre de Villebrune, under the title "Banquet des Savans, par Athenas," 1789-1791, 5 vols. 4to. A good article on Schwighäuser's edition will be found in the Edinburgh Review, vol. 1. 1808. [G. E. L. J.]

Athenaeus (Ἀθηναίος), a celebrated physician, who was the founder of the sect of the Pneumatia. He was born in Cilicia, at Attaleia, according to Galen (De Element. ex Hippocr. i. 6, vol. i. p. 457); Diogen. Laert. proem. vol. xii. pp. 347, 356; De Trnn. Pulmp, &c. c. 6. vol. v. p. 609; De Differ. Puls. 1v. vol. vii. p. 749; or at Tarsus according to Caecilius Aurelianus. (De Morf. Aetn. ii. 1. p. 34.) The exact years of his birth and death are unknown, but as Agathinus was one of his followers (Agathinus), he must have lived in the first century after Christ. (Gal. De Diæmnum. Puls. i. 3. vol. vii. p. 787.) He was tuctor to Theodorus (Diog. Laert. ii. 104), and appears to have practised at Rome with great success. Some account of his doctrines and those of the Pneumatia is given in the Diæm of Ant. s. c. Pneumatiou, but of his personal history no further particulars are known. He appears to have been a voluminous writer, as the twenty-fourth volume of one of his works is quoted by Galen (De Caus. Symptom. ii. 3. vol. vii. p. 165), and the twenty-ninth by Orisiasius. (Col. Medic. ix. 5. p. 366.) However, nothing remains but the titles, and some fragments preserved by Orisiasius. (Col. Medic. i. 2. p. 206, v. 5. p. 263, ix. 12. pp. 306, 307.) For further information the reader may consult Le Clerc's Histo. de la Méd.; Halier's Biblisk. Med. Prat. vol. i. p. 190; Osterhansen, De Sei Oeummatirion Historicis Attor. 1701, 3vo.; and Synopgie. Hist. de la Méd. There is in the Royal Library at Paris a Greek MS. of the sixteenth century, containing a treatise on Urtica, Περί Τροπον Σύρεωσις, by a person of the name of Athenaeus, but it is not known for certain whether he is the same individual as the founder of the Pneumatiou. [W. A. G.]

Athenaeus, a statue of distinction, who flourished about the 153th Olympiad. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 3. s. 19.) [C. P. M.]

Athenaigoras (Ἄθηναγόρας) delivers in Thucydides (vi. 35-40) the speech which represents the common feeling of the democratic party at Syracuse, and is the earliest report of the intended expedition from Athens, p. 115. He is called ἦσθιν πριταγής, who, in Syracuse and other Dorian states, appears to have been an actual magistrate, like the Roman tribunus plebis. (Miller, Dor. iii. 9. § 1.) [A. H. C.]

Athenaigoras (Ἀθηναῖογορας). 1. A Samian, the son of Archestratus, was one of the ambassadors sent by the Samians to Lestychides shortly before the battle of Mycale, b.c. 479. (Herod. ix. 50.) 2. A Milesian, was sent by Poltemy at the head of some mercenary troops to the assistance of the Rhodians, when they were attacked by Demetrios Poliorcetes (b.c. 305), and commanded the guard of the counter-mine which was dug by the Rhodians. Demetrios attempted to bribe him, but he disclosed his overtures to the Rhodians, and enabled them to make prisoner Alexander, an officer of high rank in the service of Demetrios. (Diod. xx. 94.)

3. An officer in the service of Philip, king of Macedonia, b.c. 200. His name occurs not unfrequently in the history of the war between that prince and the Romans. (Liv. xxxi. 27, 53, 45, xxvii. 5, xxxii. 7; Polyb. xvii. 5.)

4. There was an officer of the same name in the service of Persians, who commanded at Thessalonica in 444 in the war with the Romans, b.c. 103. (Liv. xiv. 32.)

There were several other persons of this name, among whom we may mention a native of Cumea, spoken of by Cicero (pro Flacco, c. 7); a Platonic philosopher, to whom Boethius dedicated his work την παίαν (Philos. Bod. 155); and a bishop of Byzantium. (Philipp. Cyp. Chron. p. 4; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 101.) [C. P. M.]

Athenaigoras (Ἄθηναγόρας), a Grecian philosopher converted to the Christian religion, flourished in the second century of our era. His name is unaccountably passed over by Eusebius and Jerome, and the only ancient biographical notice that is contained in a fragment of Philippus Sideres, published by Henry Dodwell along with his Dissertations in Irenicus. In this document it is stated, that Athenaeoraz was the first master of the catechetical school at Alexandria, and that he flourished in the days of Hadrian and Antoninus, to whom he addressed an Apology on behalf of the Christians. It is added that he had, before Celsus, intended to write against the Christians; but when he examined the Holy Scriptures with this view, he became a convert to the faith he had purposed to destroy. It is further asserted by this writer, that Clemens Alexandrinus was the disciple of Athenaeogoras, and Pantaenus the disciple of Clemens. The authority of Philippus Sideres was lightly esteemed, even in ancient times; and there are some manifest inaccuracies in the foregoing statement. Athenaeogoras's defence of the Christians was certainly not addressed to Hadrian and Antoninus. It has been contended by some modern scholars, that it was presented to Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus; but it has been shewn by irrefragable proofs, that the emperor to whom it was addressed was Marcus Aurelius and his son Commodus. In this view Barnius, Petavius, Tillotson, Marmus, Fabrichius, Lumper, and many others concur. It is certain, again, that Clemens Alexandrinus was the pupil, not the master, of Pantaenus. And it is very improbable that Athenaeogoras was in any way connected with the celebrated catechetical school of Alexandria. All that we know respecting him is, that he was an Athenian by birth, a proselyte to Christianity, and the author of the above-mentioned Apology, and of a treatise in defence of the tenet of the resurrection. Both of those are written with considerable ability and elegance, and in a pure Attic style. In the first, he vigorously combats the charges of netherion, profligacy, and cannibalism, which were preferred against the early Christians. In the second, he shews with no little ingenuity, that the presumptive arguments against the Christian doctrine of the resurrection are inconclusive.

The best edition of the works of Athenagoras is that of the Benedictines, superintended by Maranus, and published, together with the writings of Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hermas, in one volume,folio, Paris, 1742. The other chief work of Athenagoras are these: H. Stephani, 1537, reprinted at Zurich in 1559, and at Cologne in 1686; Bishop Pell’s, Oxford, 1682; Reichenbar’s, Leipzig, 1684–85; Dechmann’s, Oxford, 1706. The works are also given in the edition of Justin Martyr, published at Paris in 1615, and in the collections de la Bigne, Galland, and Oberthier. J. G. Lindner’s notes to his edition of the Apology for the Christians (Longs. 1774–75) deserve particular recommendation. The writings of Athenagoras, with fragments from other ancient authors, were translated into English by David Humphreys, London, 1714. There is an old translation of the treatises on the Resurrection by Richard Ponder, London, 1573. See T. A. Clarisse, Commentatio de Athenagorae Vita et Scriptis, Lugd. Batav. 1819; Polycarp Leyer, Dissertatio de Athenagorae Lips. 1786. [J. M. M.]

Athenaides (Athenaides) ['Athenaides], a physician, the author of an unedited treatise on the Pulse and on Urine, of which there is a Latin MS. of the eleventh century in the Royal Library at Paris. Some bronze coins struck at Smyrna in honour of a person named Athenagoras were thought by Dr. Mead (in his Dissert. de Nummis gabulatis a Smyrnaeis in Mediocritum Honorea percussis, Lond. 1724, 4to) to refer to the physician of this name; but this is now generally considered to be a mistake. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Medecin.) A work on Agriculture by a person of the same name is mentioned by Varro (De Re Rust. i. 1. § 9) and Columella (De Re Rust. i. 1. § 10). [W. A. G.]

Athenais (Athénais). 1. A Sibyl in the time of Alexander the Great, born at Erythea. (Strab. xiv. p. 645.)

2. Surnamed Philostratus (Φιλοστράτου), the wife of Ariobarzanes II., king of Cappadocia, and the mother of Ariobarzanes III. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 4; Echeccl. iii. p. 200.) It appears from an inscription (Echeccl. iii. p. 199), that the wife of Ariobarzanes I. was also called Athenais.

3. The daughter of Leontios. [Entoia.] ATHYPON (Athypow). 1. A Cilician, who in the second seditious war in Sicyon, by the aid of his wealth and pretended neurological knowledge, procured himself to be chosen leader of the insurgents in the western part of the island. After a fruitless attack upon Litybaemum, he joined Salvius, the king of the rebels, who, under the influence of a suspicion jealousy, threw him into prison, but afterwards released him. Athenion fought with great bravery in a battle with L. Licinius Lucullus, and was severely wounded. On the death of Salvius, he succeeded to his title of king. He maintained his ground for some time successfully, but in B. C. 101 the Romans sent against him the consul M.'
ATHENODORUS, instructed in the doctrines of the Stoics. He afterwards went to Apollonia, where he taught, and attracted the notice of Octavianus, whom he followed to Rome. He stood high in the favour of the emperor, and was permitted to offer him advice, which he did on some occasions with considerable freedom. (Dion. Cass. lxi. 36, lv. 45; Zonaras, p. 544, b.) Zosimus (i. 6) tells us, that the government of Augustus became milder in consequence of his attending to the advice of Athenodorus. The young Claudius was placed under his instruction. (Suet. Claud. 4.) In his old age he returned to Tarsus, which was at that time misgoverned by Boethius, a favourite of Antonius. Athenodorus procured his expulsion and that of his party, and restored order. Through his influence with Augustus, he procured for his native city a remission of the vectigalia. He died at the age of eighty-two, and his memory was honored by an annual festival and sacrifice. (Strab. xiv. p. 674; Lucian. Macrov. 21; Cic. ad Fam. iii. 7, ad Att. xvi. 14.) He was the author of a work against the Catoques of Aristotle (Polyph. in Cato. p. 21, a.; Simplex. Cato. p. 15, b.; Scolaeus, Serm. 33) attributed by some to Athenodorus Cordylius; of an account of Tarsus (Steph. Ait. Pag.) of a work addressed to Octavius (Plut. Poplic. 17); of one ἱστορίας ναὶ παιδείας (Athen. xii. 519); of a work called Περίπατος (Diog. Laërt. iii. 5, v. 36), and of some others. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 545; Hoffmann, Dissert. de Athen. Tarsensi, Lips. 1782; Sevin, in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Ins. xiv. 177.)

4. Surained Cordylius (Κόρδυλλος), a Stoic philosopher, born at Tarsus. He was the keeper of the library at Pergamus. And in his anxiety to preserve the doctrines of his sect in their original purity, used to cut out from the works of the Stoic writers such parts as appeared to him erroneous or inconsistent. He removed from Pergamus to Rome, and lived with M. Cato, at whose house he died. (Strab. xiv. p. 674; Diog. Laërt. vii. 341; Plut. Cat. Min. 10; Seneca. de Tranqull. Anim. c, 3, Ep. x. 4.)

5. An ERETRIAN, the author of a work entitled ἡμικύρων. (Phoebus, Cod. 119.)

6. Of RHODOS, a rhetorical spoken of by Quintilian. (El. 17.)

7. Of SOLL, a disciple of Zenon. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 38, 121.) He maintained, in opposition to the other Stoics, that all offenses were not equal.

8. Of Tarsus. [See Nos. 3 and 4.]

9. Of THASO, a player on the cithara, was one of the performers who assisted at the festivals celebrated at Susa in B. C. 324, on the occasion of the marriage of Alexander with Statira. There was also a tragedian of the same name, whose services were called into requisition on the same occasion. (Athen. xii. p. 538.)

ATHENODORUS (Ἀθηνοδόρος), a Greek physician in the first century after Christ or the beginning of the second. He was probably a contemporary of Plutarch, by whom the first book of his treatises On Epidemic Diseases, Ἐρυθημάς, is quoted. (Sympos. viii. 9, § 1.) [W. A. G.]

ATHINEOGENES (Ἀθηνόγενης), a statue, a native of Cnidus in Arcadia, executed statues of Zeus and Apollo, which were dedicated by the Laedomenians at Delphi after the battle of Aegae-potami. He was also famed for his statues of distinguished women. He was a pupil of the elder Polycleitus, and flourished at the end of the fifth century B. C. (Paus. x. 9, § 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 13, init., and § 36.)

2. A sculptor, the son and pupil of Agesander of Samos, who is mentioned in existing group of Laocoon. [AGESANDER, 1. [C. T. M.]]

ATHENOGENES (Ἀθηνόγενης), the author of a work, probably a poem, entitled Cephalion. (Athen. 1. p. 164, a.)

ATHENOGENES (Ἀθηνόγενης), a Christian martyr, of whom nothing more is known with certainty than that, when he was proceeding to the stake, he left, as a parting gift to his friends, a hymn in which the divinity of the Holy Spirit was acknowledged. We learn this fact from St. Basil, by whom it is incidentally recorded. (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 28.) On the supposed authority of this testimony, some have erroneously attributed Athenoegenes the morning hymn (μωσας ήμνος) beginning Δόξα καί Πνεύμα Θεός, and the evening hymn (μωσας ευεκτρούς) beginning Φαίηνος ἀκαφής. (For the hymns themselves, see Uschi, Diss. de Symbolo-Apostolico, &c. p. 33; Thomas Smith's Miscellanea priora, p. 152; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. pp. 171-2.) But Basil in this passage makes no mention whatever of the morning hymn, while he expressly distinguishes the evening hymn from that of Athenoegenes, and says that he does not know who was its author. Cave falls into the above-mentioned error in the first volume of his Historia Literaria (ed. 1680), but corrects it in the dissertation de Libris et Officulis Ecclesiasticis Graecorum, appended to the second volume, published in 1690. Le Moyne makes Athenoegenes contemporary with Clemens Alexandrinus, and represents him as suffering under the emperor Severus. In this chronology Cave and Jumel concurred. Garnier, in a note upon the above-cited passage in Basil, identifies this Athenoegenes with one whom the martyrlogies represent as suffering under Diocletian. Baronius and Tillenau strangely suppose that Athenoegenes is one and the same with Athenagoras, whose apology for the Christians was addressed to M. Aurelius Antoninus and his son Commodus. (Le Moyne, Varia Sacra, ii. pp. 1095-6; Tillenau, Mémoires, &c. ii. p. 652; Lumper, Historia Theoligico-Critica, &c. iv. pp. 39, 40; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. pp. 170-82.) [J. M. M.]

ATHIOUS (Ἀθίος), a surname of Zeus, derived from mount Athos, on which the god had a temple. (Hygin. s. n.; Aeschyl. Agam. 276.) [L. S.]

ATHRYAILATUS (Ἀθρυιάλατος), a Greek physician of Thasos, introduced by Plutarch as one of the speakers in his Symposiumas (iii. 4), and who must therefore have lived at the end of or the first or the beginning of the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ATHYMBRUS (Ἀθυμβρός), ATHYMBRADIUS (Ἀθυμβράδος), and HYDYPHRUS (Ὑδύφρος), three brothers, who came from Lacedaemon, and founded cities in Lydia, which were called by their names. These cities were afterwards deserted by their inhabitants, who founded together the town of Nysa, whence the latter regarded Athymbrus as its founder. (Strab. xiv. p. 650; Steph. Byz. s. v. Athymbrus.)

ATIA, the daughter of M. Atius Balbus of Aricia, and of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar. She was married to C. Octavius, and became by him the mother of Augustus Caesar. (Suet. Oct. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 59.) She pretended that Augustus ATILICINUS, a Roman jurist, who probably lived about the middle of the first century of the Christian era. He seems to have been attached to the sect of Proculus (Heinec. Hist. Juv. Rom. § 280), to whom he addressed a letter, which is contained in the Digest in an extract from Proculus. (Dig. 23. tit. 4. s. 17.) He is several times referred to in the Digest, and is also cited in the Institutes (2. tit. 5. pr.) as an authority; but there is no direct extract from him, and the whole of his works have not been preserved, though Buch (Hist. Juv. Rom. p. 411) seems to infer from Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 7. pr. that he published responsa. [J. T. G.] than, the former; and this would be a sufficient reason why Sedilius classed him among the comic poets, though he has recourse to the impious conjecture of Weichert (Poet. Lat. Reliquiae, p. 139), that he had turned the Electra of Sophocles into a comedy. Among his other plays we have the titles of the following: Mādravou (Cic. Tusc. Disp. iv. 11), Bovcici (Var. L. L. vi. 39, ed. Müller), "Argopouoi, and Communateis. (Var. ap. Gall. iii. 3.) According to another reading the last three are attributed to a poet Aquilinus. Without the exception of a line quoted by Cicero (ad Att. xiv. 20), and a few words preserved in two passages of Varro (L. l. vii. 106), nothing of Attilius has come down to us. Cicero (ad Att. i.e. c.) calls him poeta burlesus, and Lichius describes him as ferens scriptor. (Cic. de Fin. i.e.)

ATILIIUS. FORTUNATIANUS. [Fortunatianus]

ATILLA, the mother of Lucan, was accused by her own son, in a.d. 66, as privy to the conspiracy against Nero, but escaped punishment, though she was not acquitted. (Tac. Ann. xv. 56, 71.)

ATIMETUS, a freedman and paramour of Domitia, the aunt of Nero, accused Agrippina of plotting against her son Nero, a.d. 56. Agrippina, however, on this occasion, obtained from Nero the punishment of her accusers, and Atimetus according to Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 19, 21, 22.)

ATIMETUS, P. ATTIUS, a physician, whose name is preserved in an ancient inscription, and who was physician to Augustus. Some writers suppose that he is the same person who was a contemporary of Scebonius Langus, in the first century after Christ, and who is said by him (De Compos. Medica. c. 29. § 120) to have been the slave of a physician named Cassius, and who is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medica. etc. Locos. iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 771), under the name of Atimetus (Arius.)

A physician of the same name, who is mentioned in an ancient inscription with the title Archistor, is most probably a different person, and lived later than the reign of Augustus. (Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. xii. p. 94, ed. wet.; Rhodius, Notae on Scribon. Larg. pp. 188-9.)

The place of burial on Claudia Homonoea, the wife of an Atimetus, who is described as the freedman of Pamphilus, the freedman of the emperor Tiberius, which has been published by Burnmann (Anth. Lat. vol. ii. p. 90), Meyer (Anth. Lat. n. 1274), and Wernsdorf (Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 213), and is in the form of a dialogue, partly in Latin and partly in Greek, between Homonoea and her husband. This Atimetus is supposed by some writers to have been the same as the slave of Cassius, mentioned by Scribonius (Wernsdorf, vol. iii. p. 139); and Lipsius (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19) imagines both to be the same as the freedman of Domitia spoken of above; but we can come to no certain conclusion on the point.

ATINIA GENS, plebeian. None of the members of this gens ever attained the consulship; and the first who held any of the higher offices of the state was C. Atinius Labelo, who was praetor b. c. 138. All the Atini were called the cognomen Labelo.

ATIUS. 1. L. ATIUS, the first tribune of the second legion in the war with the Istri, b. c. 178. (Liv. xii. 7.)

2. C. ATIUS, the Pelignum, belonged to the Pompeian party, and had possession of Salumno, when Caesar invaded Italy, b. c. 49. Caesar deposed M. Antony against the town, the inhabitants of which opened the gates as soon as they saw Antony's standards, while Atius cast himself down from the wall. At his own request he was sent to Caesar, who dismissed him unhurt. (Cas. B. C. i. 13.) Cicero writes (ad Att. viii. 4) as if Atius himself had surrendered the town to Antony.

ATLAS (Ἀτλας), according to Hesiod (Theog. 507, &c.), a son of Jupetus and Clymene, and a brother of Menestheus, Prometheus, and Epimetheus; according to Apollodorus (1. 2. § 8), his mother's name was Asia; and, according to Hyginus (Fab. 193), he was a son of Aether and Gea. For other accounts see Diad. iii. 60, iv. 27; Plat. Crit. i. p. 114; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 347. According to the description of the Homeric poems, Atlas knows the depth of all the sea, and bears the long columns which keep asunder, or carry all around (diapla ἔκπορται), earth and heaven. (Od. i. 52.) Hesiod only says, that he bore heaven with his head and hands. (Comp. Aeschyl. Proo. 347, &c.; Paus. v. 18. § 11, 12. § 2.)

In these passages Atlas is described either as bearing heaven alone, or as bearing both heaven and earth; and several modern scholars have been engaged in investigating which of the two notions was the original one. Much depends upon the meaning of the Homeric expression diapla ἔκπορται; if the signification is "the columns which keep asunder heaven and earth," the columns (mountains) must be conceived as being somewhere in the middle of the earth's surface; but if they mean "bear or support all around," they must be regarded as forming the circumference of the earth, upon which the vault of heaven rests apparently. In either case, the meaning of keeping asunder is implied. In the Homeric description of Atlas, the idea of his being a superhuman or divine being, with a personal existence, seems to be blended with the idea of a mountain. The idea of heaven-bearing Atlas is, according to Latoiron, a mere personification of a cosmicurgical notion, which arose from the views entertained by the ancients respecting the nature of heaven and its relation to the earth; and such a personification was further developed and easily connected with other myths, such as that of the Titans. Thus Atlas is described as the leader of the Titans in their contest with Zeus, and, being conquered, he was condemned to the labour of bearing heaven on his head and hands. (Hesiod, l. c.; Hygin. Fab. 150.) Still later traditions distort the original idea still more, by putting rationalistic interpretations upon it, and make Atlas a man who was metamorphosed into a mountain. Thus Ovid (Met. iv. 390, &c., comp. ii. 296) relates, that Persaeus came to him and asked for shelter, which he refused, whereupon Persaeus, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into mountain Atlas, on which rested the world; and this further, and represent Atlas as a powerful king, who possessed great knowledge of the courses of the stars, and who was the first who taught men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as a mere figurative mode of speaking. (Diod. iii. 60, iv. 27; Paus. iv. 20. § 3; Serv. ad Aen. i. 745; Tact. ad Lycor. 373.) At first, the story of Atlas referred to one mountain only, which was believed to exist on the extreme boundary of the earth; but, as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was transferred to other places, and thus we read of a Mauritanian, Italian, Arcadian, and even of a Caucasian, Atlas. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Dionys. i. 61; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 134.)

The common opinion, however, was, that the heaven-bearing Atlas was in the north-western part of Africa, and the range of mountains in that part of the world bears the name of Atlas down to this day. Atlas is said to have been the father of the Pleiades by Pleione or by Hesperis, of the Hyades and Hesperides by Aethra, and of Oceanus and Mnemos by Stereo. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Diod. iv. 27; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 150.) Pleione and Clymopyle, and Hyas and Hesperides, are likewise called his children. (Hom. Od. vii. 245; Hygin. Fab. 83.) Atlas was painted by Panamons on the parapet surrounding the statue of the Olympic Zeus (Paus. v. 11. § 2); on the chest of Cypselus he was seen carrying heaven and holding in his hands the golden apples of the Hesperides; and on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae he was likewise represented. (Paus. v. 18. § 1, iii. 18. § 7; comp. Hefftter, in the Allgemeine Schulzeitung for 1852, No. 74, &c.; E. Gerhard, Archäologisches and die Hesperiden, Berlin, 1858; Kunstblatt for 1838, No. 64, &c.; G. Hermann, Die Künstler in Athens, Lips. 1828.) [L. S.]

ATTOSSA, (Soph. § 455, 1598.)

The wife successively of her brother Cambyse, of Smerdis the Magian, and of Darius Hystaspis, over whom she possessed great influence. Excited by the description of Greece given her by Democedes [Democedes], she is said to have urged Darius to the invasion of that country. She bore Darius four sons, Xerxes, Masistes, Achaemenes, and Hystaspis. (Herod. iii. 68, 88, 133, 134, vii. 2, 3, 64, 82, 87; Aeschyl. Pers.)

A tale related by Aratus (ad Aristot. Ethic. p. 124), Atossa was killed and eaten by her son Xerxes in a fit of distraction.

Hellanicus related (Tudiam, c. 630, ii. 307, ed. Par. 1629), that Atossa was the first who wrote tragedies. This statement is received by Bentley (Phalaris, p. 395, &c.), and is employed by him as one argument against the authenticity of the pretended epistles of Phalaris. [C. P. M.]

ATRATUS, a family-name of the Scythian gens. The Attrituni were patricians, and were distinguished in the early history of the republic; but after the year b.c. 380, no member of the family is mentioned till b.c. 34.

1. ASEMOPRUS ATRATUS, consul b.c. 497. (Liv. ii. 21; Dionys. vi. 1.) He had the charge of the city when the battle of the lake Regillus was fought (Dionys. vi. 9), which is variously placed in 496 and 496. [See p. 35, b.]

He was consul again in 491, when he exerted himself with his colleagues in obtaining a supply of corn for the people. (Liv. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 20.)

In the war with the Hernians and Volscians in 487, Atinus was again entrusted with the care of the city. (Dionys. viii. 54.) He was interrex in 482. (Dionys. viii. 50.)

2. ASEMOPRUS A. F. ATRATUS, son of No. 1, consul tribune b.c. 444, the year in which this office was first instituted. In consequence of a defect in the auspices, he and his colleagues resigned, and consuls were appointed in their stead. (Liv. iv. 7; Dionys. xi. 61; Diod. xii. 33.)

3. L. SEMPRONIUS A. F. ATRATUS, son of No. 1, consul b.c. 444. He was censor in the following year with L. Papinius Magillanus, and they were the first who held this office. (Dionys. xi. 62, 63; Liv. iv. 7, 8.; Cic. ad Fam. iv. 21.)

4. ASEMOPRUS L. F. A. N. ATRATUS, son of No. 3, was consul tribune three times, in b.c. 425, 429, and 416. (Liv. iv. 35, 44, 47.; Diod. xii. 81, xiii. 9.)

5. C. SEMPRONIUS A. F. L. A. N. ATRATUS, son of No. 2, whence he is called by Livy (iv. 44) the "patruelis of No. 4, was consul b.c. 423, and had the conduct of the war against the Volscians. Through his negligence and carelessness the Roman army was nearly defeated, and was saved only through the exertions of Sex. Temporinus, one of the officers of the cavalry. The battle was undecided, when night put an end to it; and both armies abandoned their camps, considering it lost. The conduct of Atratus excited great indignation at Rome, and he was accordingly accused by the tribune L. Hortensius, but the charge was dropped in consequence of the entreaties of Temporinus and three others of his colleagues, who had served under Attunius, and had been elected tribunes. It was revived, however, in 420, and Atratus was condemned to pay a heavy fine. (Livy. iv. 37.—42, 44; Val. Max. vi. 5, § 2.)

6. L. SEMPRONIUS ATRATAM, master of the horse to the dictator, T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, b.c. 390. (Liv. vi. 28.)

7. ASEMOPRUS ATRATUS, the accuser of M. Caelius, whom Cicero defended. (Comp. Suet. de Clar. Rhet. 2.) In his speech which he has come down to us, Cicero speaks highly of Atratus. (Proc. Cael. 1, 3, 7.)

This Attratus is apparently the same as the consul of n. 34, elected in the place of M. Antony, who resigned in his favour. (Dion Cass. xlix. 39.)

ATRAX (Arpax), a son of Peneius and Bura, from whom the town of Atrax in Messenia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. a. e.) He was the father of Hippodamia and Caenis, the latter of whom by the will of Poseidon was changed into a man, and married Caenis. (Anton. Lib. 17; Or. Mæt. xii. 100, &c.) [L. S.]

ATRIDEIS (Arpemy), a patronymic from Atratus, to designate his sons and descendants. When used in the singular, it commonly designates Agamennon, but in the plural it signifies the two brothers, Agamennon and Menelaus. (Hom. Il. i. 12, &c.; Hor. Carm. iv. 4, 7, &c.) [L. S.]

ATREUS (Arpês), a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, a grandson of Tantalus, and a brother of Thystes and Nicippus. [PROBES.] He was first married to Clossia, by whom he became the father of Pleisthenes; then to Aépro, the widow of his son Pleisthenes, who was the mother of Agamennon, Menelaus, and Amazibis, either by Pleisthenes or by Atren [Agamennon]; and lastly to Pelopis, the daughter of his brother Thystes. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 5; Soph. Af. 1271; Hygin. Fab. 83, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 452.)

The tragic fate of the house of Tantalus gave ample materials to the tragic poets of Greece, but the often the subjects were handled, the greater the harder were the changes and modifications which the legends underwent; but the main points are collected in Hyginus. The story of Atrues begins with a crime, for he and his brother Thystes were induced by their mother Hippodamia to kill their step-brother Chrysippus,
The son of Pelops and the nymph Axios in or Danae. (Hyg. Fab. 85; Schol. ad Hom. II. ii. 104.) According to the Scholiast on Thucydidcs (i. 9), who seems himself to justify the remark of his commentator, it was Pelops himself who killed Chrysippus. Atreus and Thyestes hereupon took to flight, dreading the consequences of their deed, or, according to the tradition of Thucydidcs, to escape the fate of Chrysippus. Sthenelus, King of Mycenae, and husband of their sister Nicippe (the Schol. on Thucyd. calls her Astydamia) invited them to come to Midea, which he assigned to them as their residence. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6.) When afterwards Eurythems, the son of Sthenelus, marched out against the Herculeids, he entrusted the government of Mycenae to his uncle Atreus; and after the fall of Eurythems in Attica, Atreus became his successor in the kingdom of Mycenae. From this moment, crimes and calamities followed one another in rapid succession in the house of Tantalus. Thyestes seduced Alcme, the wife of Atreus, and robbed him also of the lamb with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 184.) For this crime, Thyestes was expelled from Mycenae by his brother, but from his mixed descent from Pleisthenes, the son of Atreus, whom he had brought up as his own child, commanding him to kill Atreus. Thyestes however slew the emissary, without knowing that he was his own son. This part of the story contains a manifest contradiction; for if Atreus killed Pleisthenes under these circumstances, his wife Alcme, whom Thyestes had seduced, cannot have been the widow of Pleisthenes. (Hyg. Fab. 86; Schol. ad Hom. ii. 249.) In order to obtain an opportunity for taking revenge, Atreus feigned to be reconciled to Thyestes, and invited him to Mycenae. When the request was complied with, Atreus killed the two sons of Thyestes, Tantalus and Pleisthenes, and had their flesh prepared and placed it before Thyestes as a meal. After Thyestes had eaten some of it, Atreus ordered the arms and bones of the children to be brought in, and Thyestes, struck with horror at the sight, cursed the house of Tantalus and fled, and Helios turned away his face from the frightful scene. (Aeschyl. Agam. 1589; Soph. Ag. 1266.) The kingdom of Atreus was now visited by scarcity and famine, and the oracle, when consulted about the means of averting the calamity, advised Atreus to call back Thyestes. Atreus, who went out in search of him, came to King Thesprotus, and as he did not find him there, he married his third wife, Pelipso, the daughter of Thyestes, whom Atreus believed to be a daughter of Thesprotus. Pelipso bore him the same time with child by his father, and after having given birth to a boy (Agisthus), she exposed him. The child, however, was found by shepherds, and suckled by a goat; and Atreus, on hearing of his existence, sent for him and educated him as his own child. According to Asclepius (Agam. 1605), Agisthus, when yet a child, was banished with his father Thyestes from Mycenae, and did not return thither until he had grown up to manhood. Afterwards, when Agamemnon and Menelaus had grown up, Atreus sent them out in search of Thyestes. They found him at Delphi, and led him back to Mycenae. Here Atreus had him imprisoned, and sent Agisthns to put him to death. But Agisthus was recognised by his father; and, returning to Atreus, he pretended to have killed Thyestes, and slew Atreus himself, who was just offering up a sacrifice on the sea-coast. (Hyg. Fab. 88.) The tomb of Atreus still existed in the time of Pausanias. (Paus. ii. 6. § 5.) The treasury of Atreus and his sons at Mycenae, which is mentioned by Pausanias (L.c.), is believed by some to exist still (Müller, Ordon, p. 289); but the ruins which Müller there describes are above ground, whereas Pausanias calls the building συγγενεσί. [L. S.] Q. ATRIUS, was left on the coast in Britain to take care of the ships, n. c. 94, while Caesar himself marched into the interior of the country. (Caes. B. G. v. 9, 10.) P. ATRIUS, a Roman knight, belonged to Pompey's party, and was taken prisoner by Caesar in Africa, n. c. 47, but his life was spared. (Caes. B. Afr. 68, 89.)

ATROMETUS. [Aeschines, p. 86, b.] ATROPATES (Ἀτροπάτης), called Atropates by Diodorus (viii. 4), a Persian satrap, apparently of Media, had the command of the Medes, together with the Cadiusii, Albanii, and Scesstine, at the battle of Ganges, n. c. 331. After the death of Dareius, he was made satrap of Media by Alexander. (Diod. i. 77.) His daughter was married to Persiccas in the nuptials celebrated at Susa in n. c. 324; and he received from his father-in-law, after Alexander's death, the province of the Greater Media. (Arrin. vii. 4; Justin. xvii. 4; Diod. i. 77.) In the northern part of the country, called after him Media Atropatene, he established an independent kingdom, which continued to exist down to the time of Strabo. (Strab. x. 523.) It was related by some authors, that Atropates on one occasion presented Alexander with a hundred women, said to be Amazons; but Arrian (vii. 13) disbelieved the story.

ATROPOS. [Mohar.] ATTA, T. QUINCTIUS, a Roman comic poet, of whom very little more is known than that he died at Rome in n. c. 78, and was buried at the second milestone on the Pannonina road. (Hieronym. in Exod. Carom. Col. 175, 3.) His surname Atta was given him, according to Festus (s. v.), from a defect in his feet, to which circumstance many commentators suppose that Horace alludes in the lines (Ep. ii. 1. 79), but the joke is so poor and far-fetched, that we are unwilling to father it upon Horace. It appears, however, from this passage of Horace, that the plays of Atta were very popular in his time. Atta is also mentioned by Fronte (p. 95, ed. Rom.); but the passage of Cicero (pro Sestio, 51), in which his name occurs, is evidently corrupt.

"Recte, neone, ercanum floresque parvulum Attae Fabula, si dubitatis;"

The comedies of Atta belonged to the class called by the Roman grammarians τοιχατα ταυραωραμεια (Diomedes, iii. p. 487, ed. Putsch), that is, comedies in which Roman manners and Roman persons were introduced. The titles and a few fragments of the following plays of Atta have come down to us: Aedilesicia (Gell. vii. 9; Diomed. iii. p. 487); Aquae Caldaeae (Gell. iii. p. 183, 11, 193. 7); Cancellatio (Gell. vii. 9); Lacratatio (Gell. vii. 9); Materleria, though this was probably written by Afranius, and is wrongly ascribed to Atta (Schol. Crat. to I. 98, ii. 1. 80); Mogrilemes (Serv. ad Virg. Est. vii. 38); Scirra (Pison. vii. 764); Supplicatio (Macrobius, Sat. ii. 14);

marriage of his niece, Attalus, when the guests were heated with wine, called upon the company to beg of the gods a legitimate (γραφής) successor to the throne. This roused the wrath of Alexander who was present, and a brawl ensued, in which Philip drew his sword and rushed upon his son.
Alexander and his mother Olympia withdrew from the kingdom (Plut. Alex. 7; Justin, ix. 7; Athen.
xxii. p. 557, e. c.); but though they soon afterwards returned, the influence of Attalus does not appear to have been weakened. Philip's connexion with Attalus not only thus involved him in family dissensions, but eventually cost him his life. Attalus had inflicted a grievous outrage upon Pausanias, a youth of noble family, and one of Philip's bodyguard. Pausanias complained to Philip; but, as he was unable to obtain the punishment of the offender, he resolved to have revenge upon the king himself, and accordingly assassinated him at the festival at Aegae in B.C. 386. [Philip.] (Arist.
Pol. v. 8. § 10; Dio. lxvi. 93; Plut. Alex. 10; Justin, ix. 6.) Attalus was in Asia at the time of Philip's death, as he had been previously sent thither, along with Parmenion and Amyntas in the command of some troops, in order to secure the Greek cities in Western Asia to the cause of Philip. (Dio. lxvi. 91; Justin, ix. 5.) Attalus could have little hope of obtaining Alexander's pardon, and therefore entered very readily into the proposition of Demostenes to rebel against the new monarch.
But, mistrusting his power, he soon afterwards endeavoured to make terms with Alexander, and sent him the letter which he had received from Demostenes. This, however, produced no change in the purpose of Alexander, who had previously sent Hecataeus into Asia with orders to arrest At-alus, and convey him to Macedon, or, if this could not be accomplished, to kill him secretly. Hecataeus thought it safer to adopt the latter course, and had him assassinated privately. (Dio. vii. 2, 3, 5.)

2. Son of Andromenes the Stymphaeans, and one of Alexander's officers, was accused with his brothers, Amyntas and Simias, of having been engaged in the conspiracy of Philoctetes, B.C. 350, but was acquitted, together with his brothers. [Amytas, No. 4.] In B.C. 328, Attalus was left with Polyperchon and other officers in Thrace with part of the troops, while the king himself marched against the Segobrini. (Arrian, iv. 16.) He accompanied Alexander in his expedition into India, and was employed in several important duties.
(Arrian, iv. 27, v. 12.) In Alexander's last illness, B.C. 323, he was one of the seven chief officers who passed the night in the temple of Serapis at Babylon, in order to learn from the god whether Alexander should be carried into the temple. (Ar-rian, vii. 26.)

After the death of Alexander, Attalus joined Perdiccas, whose sister, Atalante, he had married.
He accompanied his brother-in-law in his unfortunate campaign against Egypt in B.C. 321, and had the misfortune to lose it; but later, when Perdiccas, his all friends were condemned to death by the army; Atalante, who was in the camp, was immediately executed, but Attalus escaped his wife's fate in consequence of his absence with the fleet at Pelusium. He forthwith sailed to Tyre, where the treasures of Perdiccas had been deposited. These, which amounted to as many as 800 talents, were surrendered to him by Archelaus, with the latter, who had done their utmost to bring about a peace between him and Achaeus (Polyb. iv. 49), but he was unable to render them any effective assistance. In n. c. 218, with the aid of a body of Gaulish mercenaries, he recovered several cities in Aeolis and the neighbouring districts, but was stopped in the midst of his successes by an eclipse of the sun, which so alarmed the Gauls, that they refused to proceed. (Polyb. v. 77. 70.) In n. c. 216, he entered into an alliance with Antiochus the Great against Achaeus. (v. 107.) In n. c. 211, he joined the alliance of the Romans and Aetolians against Philip and the Achaeans. (Liv. xxvi. 24.) In 209, he was made praetor of the Aetolians conjointly with Pyrrhus, and in the following year joined Sulpicius with a fleet. After wintering at Aegina, in 207 he overran Pcaparethus, assisted in the capture of Oreus, and took Opus. While engaged in collecting tribute in the neighbourhood of this town, he narrowly escaped falling into Philip's hands; and hearing that Prusias, king of Bithynia, had invaded Pergamus, he returned to Asia. (Liv. xxviii. 29, 30, 33, xxviii. 3—7; Polyb. x. 41. 42.)

In n. c. 202, he acceded to an injunction of the Sibylline books, the Romans sent an embassy to Asia to bring away the Idaean Mother from Pessinus in Phrygia. Attalus received them graciously and assisted them in procuring the black stone which was the symbol of the goddess. (Liv. xxxix. 10, 11.) At the general peace brought about in 204, Prusias and Attalus were included, the former as the ally of Philip, the latter as the ally of the Romans. (xxix. 12.) On the breaking out of hostilities between Philip and the Rhodians, Attalus took part with the latter; and in n. c. 201, Philip invaded and ravaged his territories, but was unable to take the city of Pergamus. A sea-fight ensued, off Chios, between the fleet of Philip and the combined fleets of Attalus and the Rhodians, in which Philip was in fact defeated with considerable loss, though he found a pretext for claiming a victory, because Attalus, having incautiously pursued a Macedonian vessel too far, was compelled to abandon his own, and make his escape by land. After another ineffectual attempt upon Pergamus, Philip retired. (Polyb. xvi. 1—8; Liv. xxxii. 33.)

In 200, Attalus, at the invitation of the Athenians, crossed over to Athens, where the most flattering honours were paid him. A new tribe was created and named Attalids after him. At Athens he met a Roman embassy, and war was formally declared against Philip. (Polyb. xvi. 25, 26; Liv. xxxi. 14, 15; Paus. i. 5. § 5, 6. § 1.) In the same year, Attalus made some ineffectual attempts to relieve Abydos, which was besieged by Philip. (Polyb. xvi. 25, 30—34.) In the campaign of 199, he joined the Romans with a fleet and troops. Their combined forces took Oreus in Euboea. (Liv. xxxi. 44—47.) Attalus then returned to Asia to repel the aggressions of Antiochus III, who had taken the opportunity of his absence to attack Pergamus, but was induced to desist by the remonstrances of the Romans. (Liv. xxxi. 45—47, xxxii. 8, 27.)

In 198, Attalus again joined the Romans, and, after the campaign, wintered in Aegina. In the spring of 197, he attended an assembly held at Thebes for the purpose of detaching the Boeotians from the cause of Philip, and in the midst of his speech was struck with apoplexy. He was con-
ATTALUS.

Veyed to Pergamus, and died the same year, in the seventy-second year of his age, after a reign of forty-four years. (Liv. xxxvi. 16, 19, 23, 24, 33, xxviii. 2, 21; Polyb. xvii. 2, 8, 16, xviii. 24, xxxi. 2, &c.) As a ruler, his conduct was marked by wisdom and justice; he was a faithful ally, a generous friend, and an affectionate husband and father. He encouraged the arts and sciences. (Diod. Laec. iv. 81; Athen. p. 697; Plin. H. N. vii. 74, xxxix. 19, § 24, xxxv. 49.) By his wife, Apollonia or Apollonis, he had four sons: Eumenes, who succeeded him, Attalus, Philometor, and Athenaeus.

11. Surnamed Philometor, was the son of Eumenes II. and Stratonice, daughter of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia. While yet a boy, he was brought to Rome (n. c. 159), and presented to the senate at the same time with Alexander Balas. He succeeded his uncle Attalus I. n. c. 138. He is known to us chiefly for the extravagance of his conduct and the murder of his relations and friends. At last, seized with remorse, he abandoned all public business, and devoted himself to sculpture, statuary, and gardening, on which he wrote a work. He died n. c. 133 of a fever, with which he was seized in consequence of exposing himself to the sun's rays while engaged in erecting a monument to his mother. In his will, he made the Romans his heirs. (Strab. xiii. p. 624; Polyb. xxxvii. 16; Justin. xxxvi. 14; Diod. xxxiv. Exc. p. 601; Varro, R. R. Piae; Columell. i. § 8; Plin. H. N. xviii. 5; Liv. Epit. 58; Plut. Th. Gracchae. 14; Veill. Pat. ii. 4; Florus, ii. 20; Appian. Mithr. 62, Bell. Cis. iv. 4.) His kingdom was claimed by Attalus (Arist., Histor., c. 127), and by C. F. M. on behalf of the West for one year (a. p. 409, 410), the first raised to that office purely by the influence of barbarians. He was born in Ionia, brought up as a Pagan (Philost., xii. 3), and received baptism from an Arian bishop. (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 9.) Having become senator and praefect of the city at the time of Alaric's second siege of Rome, he was, after the surrender of the place, declared emperor by the Gothic king and his army, in the place of Honorius, and conducted by them in state to Ravenna, where he sent an insulting message to Honorius, commanding him to vacate the throne, amputate his extremities, and retire to a desolate island. (Philost., xii. 3.) But the union of pride and folly which he had shewn in the first days of his reign, by proposing to reconquer Egypt and the East to the empire (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 8), and later by adopting measures without Alaric's advice, induced the Gothic chief to depose him on the plain of Ariminum. (Zosimus, vi. 6—13.) After the death of Alaric, he remained in the camp of Ataulphus, whom, as emperor, he had made count of the domestics, and whose partisans with Placidia he celebrated as a musician. He was again put forward by Ataulphus as a rival emperor, during the insurrection of Jovius, but on being abandoned by him (Olympod. aped Phot. p. 58), was taken prisoner, and on being brought before the tribunal of Honorius, was condemned to a sentence with which he had himself threatened Honorius in his former prosperity, viz. the amputation of his thumb and forefinger, and perpetual banishment to the island of Lipari. A. D. 416. (Philost., xii. 4, with Godfroy's Dissertations.)

There is in the British Museum a silver coin of this emperor, once in the collection of Cardinal Albani, and supposed to be unique. It is remarkable as exceeding in size all known ancient silver coins, and weighs about 1203 grains, and in the usual numismatic language would be represented by the number 163.

The obverse is, PRISCUS. ATTALVS. P. F. AUG., a protome of Atalus, turned to the right, wearing a fillet ornamented with pearls round his forehead, and the pseudopentandria fastened across the right shoulder with the usual lattis.

The reverse is, INVICTA. ROMA. AETERNA. R. M. Rome, helmeted and draped to the feet, sit-ATTALUS, literary. 1. A Stoic philosopher in the reign of Tiberius, who was deified by his property by Sejanus, and reduced to the ground. (Sene. Epist. 2. p. 17, ed. Bip.) He taught the philosopher Senece (Ep. 108), who frequently quotes him, and speaks of him in the highest terms. (Comp. Nat. Quaest. ii. 50, Ep. 9, 63, 67, 72, 81, 109.) The elder Senece describes him (Senea. loc.) as a man of great eloquence, and by far the acutest philosopher of his age. We have mention of a work of his on lightning (Nat. Quaest. ii. 48); and it is supposed that he may be the author of the Παπωυα referred to by Hesychius (s. v. Κερφνουρ) as written by one Attalus.

2. A Sophist in the second century of the Christian era, the son of Polemon, and grandfather of the Sophist Hermocrates. (Philol. Vid. Soph. ii. 25, § 2.) His name occurs on the coins of Smyrna, which are figured in Oecolus's edition of Philostratus (p. 600). They contain the inscription ΑΤΤΑΛΟΣ ΣΟΥΡΙ. ΤΑΙΣ ΠΑΤΡΙΕΙ ΣΜΥΡΝΑ, ΛΑΟΩΚ, which is interpreted, "Attalus, the Sophist, to his native cities Smyrna and Laodicea." The latter is conjectured to have been the place of his birth, the former to have adopted him as a citizen.

ATTALUS (Ἀτταλός), a physician at Rome in the second century after Christ, who was a pupil of Soranus, and belonged to the sect of the Methodist. He is mentioned by Galen (de Med. Med. xii. 15. vol. x. p. 910, &c.) as having mistreated the disease of which the Stoic philosopher Theagenes died. [W. A. G.]

ATTALUS (Ἀτταλός), an Athenian statues, the son of Andryathus. Panetius (i. 19, § 8) mentions a statue of Apollo Lykeios, in the temple of that god at Argos, which was made by him. His name has been found on a statue discovered on the site of the theatre at Argos (Böckl. Corp. Ins. No. 1148), and on a bust. (Welecker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 62.) [C. P. M.]

ATTIS or ATTIS (Ἄττις or Ἀττις), a daughter of Cranaus, from whom Attius, who was before called Actaeus, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 2, § 5.) The two birds into which Philomel and her sister Proce were metamorphosed, were likewise called Attis. (Martian. i. 54, 9, v. 67, 2.) [L. S.]

ATTIUS, CAEILUS, a Roman knight, was the tutor, and afterwards the intimate friend, of Hadrian. On the death of Trajan, Attius, in conjunction with Plotina, caused Hadrian to be proclaimed emperor; and the latter after his accession enrolled Attius in the senate, made him praefectus praetorio, and conferred upon him the insignia of the consulship. He subsequently fell, however, under the displeasure of the emperor. (Spart. Hist. i. 4, 9, 15; Dion Cass. lxxi. 1.) ATTICUS, [Ἀττικὸς, ΑΤΤΙΚΟΣ, ΑΤΤΙΝ], a Roman rhetorician of the age of Senece and Quintilinian. (Senece, Sta. 2. p. 19, ed. Bip.) [L. S.]

ATTICUS, bishop of CONSTANTINOPLE, was born at Sebaste, now Sivas, in Armenia Minor. He was educated in the ascetic discipline of the Macedonian monks, under the eye of Eustathius, a celebrated bishop of that sect. However, when Atticus reached the age of manhood, he confirmed to the orthodox church. He was ordained a presbyter at Constantinople; and in the violent contentions between the friends and the enemies of the famous Chrysostom, he sided with the latter. After the death of Arsenius, who had been elevated to the see of Constantinople on occasion of the second banishment of Chrysostom, Atticus succeeded to the office, although the illustrious exile was still living. The ecclesiastical historians, Socrates and Sozomen, describe Atticus as a man of great natural prudence, and both of them testify that he administered the affairs of the church with wisdom and success. His learning seems to have been respectable; his preaching, we are told, was not attractive. His general manner was extremely winning, and he was particularly distinguished for his liberality to the poor. On hearing that distress amounting almost to famine prevailed at Nicæa, he sent a large sum of money for the relief of the suffering population, accompanied by a letter to Callipius, the bishop of the place, which is extant in the Ecclesiastical History of Sozomen. In his treatment of heretics, he is said to have exhibited a judicious combination of kindness and severity. He spoke charitably of the Novatians, and commended their inflexible adherence to the true faith under the persecutions of Constantius and Valens, though he condemned their terms of communion as being in the extreme of rigour. It is recorded, however, by Marius Mercator that when Coelestinus, the well-known disciple of Pelagius, visited Constantinople, Atticus expelled him from the city, and sent letters to the bishops of various sees, warning them against him. He was himself laid under sentence of excommunication by the western bishops for refusing to insert the name of the deceased Callipius in the list of acclamations. In the end, Atticus complied with the demand, and was again received into the communion of the western churches. He is said by Socrates to have forsook his own death: the prophecy, however, amounted to no more than this—that he told his friend Callipius that he should not survive the ensuing autumn; and the event corresponded with his prognostication. He died in the twenty-first year of his episcopate. Gennadius informs us that he wrote, in opposition to the Nestorian doctrine, an excellent treatise de Fide et Virginitate, which he dedicated ad Regiones, that is, to the daughters of the eastern emperor, Areadius. This work has perished; and nothing from the pen of Attius has survived, except the following short pieces: 1. A letter to Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, through whom it is thought he followed his own example, and insert the name of Chrysostom in the sacred tables. This is preserved, in the Church History of Nicephorus Callistus. 2. The above-mentioned letter to Callipius. 3. A few inconsiderable fragments extant in the writings of Marius Mercator and Theodoret.
and the appendix to the acts of the council of Chalcedon. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 20, viii. 25; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. viii. 27; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 3; Marius Mercator, Opera, ed. Baluz, pp. 133, 134, 185; Gemmadius, de Viris Illustribus, c. 52; Nicephorus Callistus, xiv. 26.) [J. M. M.]

ATTICUS, CURTIUS, a Roman knight, was one of the few companions whom Tiberius took with him when he retired from Rome to Capreae in A. D. 26. Six years afterwards, A. D. 32, Atticus fell a victim to the arts of Sejanus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, vi. 10.) He is supposed by Lipsius to be the same as the Atticus to whom two of Ovid's Epistles from Pontus (ii. 4, 7) are addressed.

ATTICUS, DIONYSIUS, of Pergamus, a pupil of the celebrated Apollodorus of Pergamus, who was also the teacher of Augustus. [APOLLODORUS, No. 22.] He was himself a teacher of rhetoric, and the author of several works, in which he explained the theory of his master. It would appear from his surname that he resided at Athens. (Strab. xiii. p. 625; Quinctii. Hist. iii. 10.)

ATTICUS HERODES, an Athenian. CLAUDIUS, the most celebrated Greek rhetorician of the second century of the Christian era, was born about A. D. 104, at Marathon in Attica. He belonged to a very ancient family, which traced its origin to the fabulous Aeacidae. His father, whose name was likewise Atticus, discovered on his estate a hidden treasure, which at once made him one of the wealthiest men of his age. His son Atticus Herodes afterwards increased this wealth by marrying the rich Annia Regilla. Old Atticus left in his will a clause, according to which every Athenian citizen was to receive yearly one mina out of his property; but his son entered into a composition with the Athenians to pay them once for all five minas each. As Atticus, however, in paying the Athenians, deducted the debts which some citizens owed to his father, they were exasperated against him, and, notwithstanding the great benefits he conferred upon Athens, bore him a grudge as long as he lived.

Atticus Herodes received a very careful education, and the most eminent rhetoricians of the time, such as Scopelianus, Favorinus, Secundus, and Polomen, were among his teachers: he was instructed in the Platonic philosophy by Taurus Tyrius, and in the critical study of eloquence by Theagenes of Cnidus and Munatius of Tralles. After completing his studies, he opened a school of rhetoric at Athens, and afterwards at Rome also, where Marcus Aurelius, who ever after entertained a warm esteem for him, was among his pupils. In A. D. 143 the emperor Antoninus Pius raised him to the consulship, together with C. Bellicius Torquatus; but as Atticus cared more for his fame as a rhetorician than for high offices, he afterwards returned to Athens, whither he was followed by a great number of young men, and whither L. Verus also was sent as his pupil by the emperor M. Aurelius. For a time Atticus was entrusted with the administration of the free towns in Asia; the exact period of his life when he held this office is not known, though it is believed that it was A. D. 123 when he himself was little more than twenty years of age. At a later time he performed the functions of high priest at the festivals celebrated at Athens in honour of M. Aurelius and L. Verus. The wealth and influence of Atticus Herodes did not fail to raise up enemies, among whom Theodotos and Demostanes made themselves most conspicuous. His public as well as his private life was attacked in various ways, and numerous calumnies were spread concerning him. Theodotos and Demostanes wrote speeches to irritate the people against him, and to excite the emperor's suspicion respecting his conduct. Atticus Herodes, therefore, went secretly to the father of Simanus, where M. Aurelius was staying; he, refined the accusations of the Athenian deputies, and only some of his freedmen were punished. These annoyances at last appear to have induced him to retire from public life, and to spend his remaining years in his villa Cephalia, near Marathon, surrounded by his pupils. The emperor M. Aurelius sent him a letter, in which he assured him of his unaltered esteem. In the case of Atticus Herodes the Athenians drew upon themselves the just charge of ingratitude, for no man had ever done so much to assist his fellow-citizens and to embellish Athens at his own expense. Among the great architectural works with which he adorned the city, he may mention the race-course and the white Pentelic marble, of which ruins are still extant; and the magnificent theatre of Regilla, with a roof made of cedar-wood. His liberality, however, was not confined to Attica: at Corinth he built a theatre, at Olympia an aqueduct, at Delphi a race-course, and at Thermopylae a hospital. He further restored with his ample means several decayed towns in Peloponnesus, Boeotia, Eubea, and Epeiros, provided the town of Cnossus in Italy with water, and built Triopium on the Appian road. It also deserves to be noticed, that he intended to dig a canal across the isthmus of Corinth, but as the emperor Nero had entertained the same plan without being able to execute it, Atticus gave it up for fear of exciting jealousy and envy. His wealth, generosity, and still more his skill as a rhetorician, spread his fame over the whole of the Roman world. He is believed to have died at the age of 76, in A. D. 180.

If we look upon Atticus Herodes as a man, it must be owned that there scarcely ever was a wealthy person who spent his property in a more generous, noble, and disinterested manner. The Athenians appear to have felt at last their own ingratitude; for, after his death, when his freedmen wanted to bury him, according to his own request, at Marathon, the Athenians took away his body, and buried it in the city, where the rhetorician Adrianus delivered the funeral oration over it. Atticus's greatest ambition was to shine as a rhetorician; and this ambition was indeed so strong, that on one occasion, in his early life, when he had delivered an oration before the emperor Hadrian, who was then in Pannonia, he was on the point of throwing himself into the Danube because his attempt at speaking had been unsuccessful. This failure, however, appears to have proved a stimulus to him, and he became the greatest rhetorician of his century. His success as a teacher is sufficiently attested by the great number of his pupils, most of whom attained some degree of eminence. His own orations, which were delivered extempore and without preparation, are said to have exceeded those of all his contemporaries by the dignity, fulness, and elegance of the style. (Gell. i. 2, ix. 2, xix. 12.) Philostratus praises his oratory for his pleasant and harmonious flow, as well as for its simplicity and
The loss of the works of Atticus renders it impossible for us to form an independent opinion, and if we try to form one by the authority of others, we shall probably judge of them as favourably as the ancients did; for we know, that although he did not neglect the study of the best Attic orators, yet he took Critias as his great model. Among his numerous works the following only are specified by the ancients: 1. Λόγος ἀφροδίτης, or speeches which he had delivered extemporaneously. 2. Αλέξεις, treatises or dialogues, one of which was probably the one mentioned in the Epyromenos magnesium (v. a. Æsculapius) περὶ γᾶμων συμβουλέως. 3. Ερωμεθές, or dialogues. 4. Εσπασκα. All these works are now lost. There exists an oration περὶ πολείταις, in which the Thebans are called upon to join the Peloponnesians in preparing for war against Archelaus, king of Macedon, and which has come down to us under the name of Atticus Herodes. But the genuineness of this declamation is very doubtful; at any rate it has very little of the character which the ancients attribute to the oratory of Atticus. The "Defensive Palamedes," a declamation usually ascribed to Gorgias the Sophist, has lately been attributed to Atticus Herodes by H. E. Fos in his dissertation De Gorgio Leontino, &c. Halae, 1828, Θνα, p. 100, &c.; but his arguments are not satisfactory. The declamation περὶ πολείταις is printed in the collections of the Greek orators, and also by R. Fiorillo in his Heros Attic quoque supersedunt, excipitontur annectitur, Lipsig, 1801, Θνα, which work contains a good account of the life of Atticus Herodes. (Compare Philostratus, Vit. Soph. ii. 1; Strid. a. c. Hiphon, Westermann, Geath. der Griech. Beredtsch. § 90.) At the beginning of the sixteenth century, 1607, two small columns with inscriptions, and two others of Pentelic marble with Greek inscriptions, were discovered on the site of the ancient Triopium, the country seat of Atticus, about three miles from Rome. The two former are not of much importance, but the two latter are of considerable interest. They are written in hexameter verse, the one consisting of thirty-nine and the other of fifty-nine lines. Some have thought, that Atticus himself was the author of these versified inscriptions; but at the head of one of them there appears the name Μακρέων, and, as the style and diction of the other resemble that of the former, it has been inferred, that both are the productions of Marcellus of Sida, a poet and physician who lived in the reign of M. Aurelius. These inscriptions, which are known by the name of the Triopian inscriptions, have often been printed and discussed, as by Visconti (Inscriptiones grecce Triopae, con versioni ed observazioni, Rome, 1794, fol.), Fiorillo (c.), in Brunck's Analecta (iii. 302), and in the Greek Anthology. (Append. 50 and 51, ed. Tauchnitz.)

ATTICUS, NUMERIUS, a senator and a man of praetorian rank, who swore that after the death of Augustus he saw the emperor ascending up to heaven (Dio Cass. iv. 46; Suet. Aug. 100.)

ATTICUS, a Platonist, and is placed in the second century of the Christian era, under the emperor M. Aurelius. (Synecch. vol. i. p. 666, ed. Dindorf.) Eusebius has preserved (Procop. Ev. xiv. 4—9, &c.) some extracts from his works, in which he defends the Platonic philosophy against Aristotle. Porphyry (Vit. Plato. c. 14) makes mention of the ισομετρης of a Platonic Atticus, but they may have been written by Herodes Atticus.

ATTICUS, T. POMPONIIUS, was born at Rome, b. a. 109, three years before Cicero, and was descended from one of the most ancient equestrian families in the state. His proper name after his adoption by Q. Caecilius, the brother of his mother, was Q. Caecilius Q. F. Pompeoninus Atticus, by which name Cicero addressed him when he congratulated him on his accession to the inheritance of his uncle. (Ad Att. iii. 20.) His surname, Atticus, was probably given him on account of his long residence in Athens and his intimate acquaintance with the Greek language and literature.

His father, T. Pomponius, was a man of cultivated mind; and as he possessed considerable property, he gave his son a liberal education. He was educated along with L. Torquatus, the younger C. Marius, and M. Cicero, and was distinguished above all his school-fellows by the rapid progress which he made in his studies. His father died when he was still young; and shortly after his father's death the first civil war broke out. Atticus was connected by ties both of affinity and friendship with the Marius party; for his cousin Anica had married the brother of the tribune, P. Sulpius Rufus, one of the chief opponents of Sulla, and Atticus himself was a personal friend of his old school-fellow, the younger Marius. He resolved, however, to take no part in the contest; and accordingly withdrew to Athens in b. a. 85, with the greater part of his movable property, under the pretext of prosecuting his studies. The determination which he came to on this occasion, he steadily adhered to for the rest of his life. Contented with his equestrian rank, he abstained from suing for public honours, and would not mix himself up with any of the political parties into which all classes were divided for the next fifty years. But notwithstanding this, he lived on the most intimate terms with the most distinguished men of all parties; and there seems to have been a certain charm in his manners and conversation which captivated all who had intercourse with him. Though he had assisted the younger Marius with money in his flight, Sulla was so much pleased with him on his visit to Athens in b. a. 84, after the Mithridatic war, that he wished to take him with him to Rome; and on Atticus desiring to remain in Athens, Sulla presented him with all the presents he had received during his stay in that city. Atticus enjoyed also the friendship of Caesar and Pompey, Brutus and Cassius, Antony and Octavianus. But the most intimate of all his friends was Cicero, whose correspondence with him, beginning in the year 68 and continued down to Cicero's death, supplies us with various particulars respecting the life of Atticus, the most important of which are given in the article Cicero. Atticus did not return to Rome till b. a. 65, when political affairs had become more settled; and the day of his departure was one of general mourning among the Romans. He then returned to Athens, where he assisted with loans of money, and benefitted in various ways. During his residence at Athens, he purchased an estate at Bathrotum in Epeirus, in which place, as well as at Athens and afterwards at Rome, he spent the greater part of his time, engaged in literary pursuits and commercial undertakings. He died in b. a. 32, at the age of 77, of...

ATTICUS, a member of the equestrian order, was able to invest large sums of money in the various corporations which farmed the public revenues; and he also derived great profits from advancing his own money on interest. In addition to this, he was economical in all his habits; his monthly expenditure was small, and his slaves brought him in a considerable sum of money. He had a large number carefully educated in his own house, whom he employed in transcribing books. He was thus enabled to procure a library for himself at a comparatively small cost, and to supply the public with books at a profit. Atticus, in fact, neglected no means of making money. We read, for instance, of his purchasing a set of gladiators, in order to let them out to magistrates and others who wished to exhibit games. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 4, 6.)

ATTICUS, C. QUINTICIUS, consul successions from the first of November, A.D. 65, declared in favour of Vespasian at Rome, and with the other partisans of Vespasian seized the Capitol. Here they were attacked by the soldiers of Vitellius; the Capitol was burnt down, and Atticus, with most of the other leaders of his party, taken prisoner. Atticus was not put to death by Vitellius; and probably in order to obtain the pardon of the emperor, he admitted that he had set fire to the Capitol, as Vitellius was anxious that his party should not bear the odium of this deed. (Tac. Hist. iii. 73—75; Dion Cass. lxxv. 17.)

ATTICUS, M. VESTINUS, was consul in the year (A.D. 65) in which the conspiracy of Piso was formed against Nero. Atticus was a man of firm character, and possessed great natural talents; Piso was afraid lest he might restore liberty or proclaim some one emperor. Although innocent he was put to death by Nero on the detection of the conspiracy. Atticus had been very intimate with the emperor, but had incurred his hatred, as he had taken no pains to disguise the contempt in which he held the emperor. He had still further increased the emperor’s hatred by marrying Statilia Messallina, although he knew that Nero was among her lovers. (Tac. Ann. xv. 48, 52, 68, 93.)

ATTICUS, VIPSANIUS, a disciple of Apollodorus of Pergamus. (Sueton. Const. ii. 13, p. 184.) As he is mentioned only in this passage of Seneca, his name has given rise to considerable dispute. Spalping (ad Quintil. iii. 1 § 18) conjectures that he was the son of M. Vipsanius Agrrippa, who married the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, and that he had the surname of Atticus in honour of his grandfather. Branden (M. Vipsanius Agrrippa, p. 228), on the other hand, supposed him to have been the father of Vipsanius Agrrippa. But both of these conjectures are unsupported by any evidence, and are in themselves improbable. We are more inclined to adopt Weichert’s opinion (Cas. August., 6. Religions, p. 89), that, considering the imperious state of Seneca’s text, we ought to read Dionysius in this passage instead of Vipsanius. (Attic., Diod. Cass., vii. 20, ed. Deuffler, De Apollodoro Pergamen, 6. 16, 49.) voluntary starvation, when he found that he was attacked by an incurable illness. His wife Pilin, to whom he was married on the 12th of February, B.C. 56, when he was fifty-three years of age, bore him only one child, a daughter, Pomponia or Caecilia, whom Cicero sometimes calls Attica and Attica. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 5, xii. 1, xiii. 5, &c.)

Through the influence of Antony, Pomponia was married in the lifetime of her father, probably in B.C. 36, to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, the minister of Augustus; and the issue of this marriage, Vipsania Agrippina, was married to Tiberius, afterwards emperor, by whom she became the mother of Drusus. The sister of Atticus, Pomponia, was married to Q. Cicer, the brother of the orator; but the marriage was not a happy one, and the quarrels of Pomponia and her husband gave considerable trouble and vexation to Atticus and M. Cicero.

The life of Atticus by Cornelius Nepos, of which the greater part was composed while Atticus was still alive (Nepos, 19), is to be regarded rather as a panegyric upon an intimate friend (Nepos, 13, &c.; comp. Cic. ad Att. xxi. 6, 14), than strictly speaking a biography. According to Nepos, the personal character of Atticus was faultless; and though we cannot trust implicitly to the partial statements of his panegyrist, yet Atticus could not have gained and preserved the affection of so many of his contemporaries without possessing amiable qualities of no ordinary kind.

In philosophy Atticus belonged to the Epicurean sect, and had studied it under Phaedrus, Zenon, and Patroon, in Athens, and Samos, in Rome. His studies, however, were by no means confined to philosophy. He was thoroughly acquainted with the works of Greek and Roman literature; he spoke and wrote Greek like a native, and was a thorough master of his own language. So high an opinion was entertained of his taste and critical acumen, that many of his friends, especially Cicero, were accustomed to send him their works for revision and correction, and were most anxious to secure his approbation and favour. It is therefore the more to be regretted that none of his own writings have come down to us. Of these the most important was one in a single book, entitled Annales, which contained an epitome of Roman history from the earliest period to his own time, arranged according to years. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 26, Orat. 54; Asom. in Pison. p. 18, in Cornel. p. 79, ed. Orelli; Nepos, Han. 18, Atic. 8.) This work was particularly valuable for the history of the ancient Roman families; and he had such an intimate acquaintance with this subject, that he was requested by many of his contemporaries to draw up genealogical tables of their families, specifying with dates the various public offices which each had held. He accordingly drew up such tables for the Junii, Marcelli, Fabii, Aemilii, and others; and he also wrote inscriptions in verse to be placed under the statues of distinguished men, in which he happily described in four or five lines their achievements and public offices. In addition to these, we have frequent mention of his letters, and of a history of Cicero’s consulsip, in Greek, written in a plain and inartificial style. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 1.)

Atticus was very wealthy. His father left him two millions of sesterces, and his uncle Caecilius about ten (Nepos, 5, 14); and this property he greatly increased by his mercantile speculations, as being the most formidable of the invaders of the Roman empire, and (except Radagaisus) the only one of them who was not only a barbarian, but a savage and a heathen, and as the only conqueror of ancient or modern times who has united under his name and Scythian nations. He was the son of Manduzuk, descended from the ancient kings of the Huns, and with his brother Bleda, in German Büdell (who died, according to Jornandes, by his hand, in A. D. 445), attained in A. D. 434 to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China (see Desguinex, Histoire des Huns, vol. ii, pp. 295-301), and to the command of an army of at least 500,000 barbarians. (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. cc. 33, 37, 49.) In this position, partly from the real terror which it inspired, partly from his own endeavours to invest himself in the eyes of Christendom with the dreadful character of the predicted Antichrist (see Herbert, Attila, p. 389), and in the eyes of his own countrymen with the invincible attributes attendant on the possessor of the miraculous sword of the Scythian god of war (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 53), he gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of "the Scourge of God." The words seem to have been used generally at the time to denote the barbarian invaders, but it is not applied directly to Attila in any author prior to the Hungarian Chronicles, which first relate the story of his receiving the name from a hermit in Gaul. The earliest contemporary approaches to it are in a passage in Isidore's Chronicle, speaking of the Hunnic "virgo" Deba, and in a passage in one of the old Latin writings short time before the siege in 451 (see Herberdt, Attila, p. 486), in which they are described as "imminenta pecatorium flagella."

His career divides itself into two parts. The first (A. D. 445-450) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic and the negotiations with Theodosius II., which followed upon it, and which were rendered remarkable by the resistance of Azimus (Priscus, cc. 33, 39), by the embassy from Constantinople to the royal village beyond the Danube, and the discovery of the treacherous design of the emperor against his life. (Ib. 67-72.) They were ended by a treaty which ceded to Attila a large territory south of the Danube, an annual tribute, and the claim of which he made for the surrender of the deserters from his army. (Ib. 34-37.)

The invasion of the Western empire (A. D. 450-453) was grounded on various pretexts, of which the chief was the refusal of the Eastern emperor, Marcellinus, the successor of Theodosius II., to pay the above-mentioned tribute (Priscus, 39, 72), and the rejection by the Western emperor Valentinian III. of his proposals of marriage to his sister Honorina. (Jornandes, Regmi, Soc. 97, Rob. Geet. 42.) Its particular direction was determined by his alliance with the Vandals and Franks, whose dominion in Spain and Gaul was threatened by Attila and Theodoric. With an immense army composed of various nations, he crossed the Rhine at Strasburg, which is said to have deserved its name from his having made it a place of thoroughfare (Klemm, Attila, p. 175), and marched upon Orleans. From hence he was driven, by the arrival of Ætius, to the plains of Chalon on the Marne, where he was defeated in the last great battle ever fought by the Romans, and in which there fell 280,000 (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 42) or 500,000 men. (Isidius and Isidore.) He retired by way of Troyes, Orléans, and Tours, with his usual collection of his cities on the march, and having there recruited his forces, crossed the Alps in A. D. 451, laid siege to Aquileia, then the second city in Italy, and at length took and utterly destroyed it. After ravaging the whole of Lombardy, he was then preparing to march upon Rome, when he was suddenly diverted from his purpose, partly perhaps by the diseases which had begun to waste his army, partly by the fear instilled into his mind that he, like Alaric, could not survive an attack upon the city, but ostensibly and chiefly by his celebrated interview with Pope Leo the Great and the senator Arleunus at Peschiera or Governole on the banks of the Minus. (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 42.) The story of the apposition of St. Peter and St. Paul rests on the authority of an ancient MS. record of it in the Roman church, and on Paulus Diaconus, who wrote in the eighth century, and who mentions only St. Peter. (Baronius, Ann. Eccl. a. D. 452.)

He accordingly returned to his palace beyond the Danube, and (if we except the doubtful story in Jornandes, de Rob. Geet. 43, of his invasion of the Alban and repulse by Thorismund) there remained till on the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, Myochth, the last of his innumerable wives, possibly by her hand (Marcellin, Chronicon), but probably by the bursting of a blood-vessel, he suddenly expired, and was buried according to the ancient and savage customs of his nation. (A. D. 454.) The instantaneous fall of his empire is well symbolized in the story that, on that same night, the emperor Marcellinus at Constantinople dreamed that he saw the bow of Attila broken asunder. (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 49.)

In person Attila was, like the Mongolian race in general, a short thickset man, of stately gait, with a large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald with the exception of a few white hairs, his eyes small, but of great brilliancy and quickness. (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 11; Priscus, 58.) He is distinguished from the general character of savage conquerors only by the gigantic nature of his designs, and the critical era at which he appeared,—unless we add also the meagreness which he showed to the innocent ambassador of Theodosius II. on discovering the emperor's plot against his life, and the nave with which he was inspired by the majesty of Pope Leo and of Rome. Among the few personal traits recorded of him may be mentioned the humorous order to invent the picture at Milan which represented the subjugation of the Scythians to the Caesars (Suidas, s.v. Κόρης); the command to burn the poem of Marullus at Padua, who had referred his origin to the gods of Greece and Rome (Hungarian Chronicles, as quoted by Herbert, Attila, p. 500); the readiness with which he saw in the flight of the storks from Aquileia a favourable omen for the approaching end of the siege (Jornandes, Rob. Geet. 43; Procop, Bel. Vandal. 4); the stern simplicity of his diet, and the immovable firmness with which he sat on the uparch of his wild court, unbending only to caress and pinch the cheek of his favourite boy, lnsa (Priscus, 49-70); the preparation of the funeral pile on which to burn himself, had the Romans forced his camp at Chalons (Jomardes, \textit{Rev. Get.} 40); the saying, that a fortress could exist in the empire, if he wished to raze it; and the speech at Chalons, recorded by Jomardes (\textit{Rev. Get.} 39), which contains parts too characteristic to have been forged.

The only permanent monuments of his career, besides its destructiveness, are to be found in the great mound which he raised for the defence of his army during the siege of Aquileia, and which still remains at Udiene (Herbert, \textit{Attilla}, p. 489); and indirectly in the foundation of Venice by the Italian nobles who fled from its ravages in A.D. 451. The partial descent of the Hungarians from the remnant of his army, though maintained strenuously by Hungarian historians, has been generally doubted by later writers, as resting on insufficient evidence.

The chief historical authority for his life is Priscus, either as preserved in \textit{Epist. de Legat.} 33-76 (in the Byzantine historians), or retailed to us through Jomardes. (\textit{Rev. Get.} 32-50.) But he has also become the centre of three distinct cycles of tradition, which, though now inseparably blended, furnish glimpses of historical truth. 1. The Hungarian Legends, which are to be found in the life of him by Dalmatinus and Nicolaus Oláhus, the Emneads of Sabellicus and the Decades of Bonfinius,—none of which are earlier, in their present form, than the twelfth century. 2. The Ecclesiastical Legends, which relate to his invasion of Gaul, and which are to be found in the lives of St. Anianus, St. Servatius, St. Genovefa, St. Lupus, and St. Ursula, in the Acta Sanctorum. 3. The German Legends, which depart more entirely from history, and are to be found in the Nibelungen Lied, in a Latin poem on Attila, published by Fischer, and, as Mr. Herbert supposes (p. 536), in the romances about Arthur. See also W. Grimm's \textit{Heidenagen}.

In modern works, a short account is given in Gibbon (cc. 34, 35), Rotteck (in Erich and Gruber's \textit{encyclopaedia}), and a most elaborate one in the notes to Mr. Herbert's poem of \textit{Attila}, 1838, and in Klemm's \textit{Attila}, 1827, Comp. ATYNAES (\textit{Aravas}), the son of Hippocrates, a native of Draburytium, conquered in battle in the Olympic games, n. c. 72. He was afterwards killed by pirates. (Pliogen. \textit{Trull. op. Fot. Cod. 97, p. 83, b., 40, ed. Boekk. \textit{di. pro Placu. c. 15.}) ATYMNIIUS (\textit{Atymios or Atymhos}), a son of Zeus and Cassiopeia, a beautiful boy, who was beloved by Seraphon. (Apollon. \textit{iii. i. $\S$ 2.) Others call him a son of Phoenix. (Schoil. \textit{ed. Apollon. ii. 178.) He seems to have been worshipped at Gortyn in Crete together with Europa. (Hück, \textit{Creta, i. p. 105.)} Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Quint. Smyrn. iii. 500, and Hom. \textit{H. xvi. 317, &c.} [J. L. S.]

ATYS. ATYSES, ATTIS, or ATTIN (\textit{Atys, Atius, Atteis, Atis or Athen.) 1. A son of Num, and a beautiful shepherd of the Phrygian town, Celaenae. (Theoc. xx. 40; Philostr. \textit{Epist.} 39, 'Tertul. de Nat. 1.) His story is related in different ways. According to Ovid (Fast. iv. 221), Cybele loved the beautiful shepherd, and made her own priest on condition that he should preserve his chastity inviolate. Atys broke the covenant with a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Sangarius, and was thrown by the goddess into a state of madness, in which he unmanneth himself. When in consequence he wanted to put an end to his life, Cybele changed him into a fir-tree, which henceforth became sacred to her, and she commanded that, in future, her priests should be eunuchs. (Compare Arnob. \textit{adv. Cont.} v. 4, and \textit{Aegidius.}) Another story relates, that Atys, the priest of Cybele, fled into a forest to escape the voluptuous embraces of a Phrygian king, but that he was overtaken, and in the ensuing struggle unmanned his pursuer. The dying king avenged himself by inflating the same calamity upon Atys. Atys was found by the priests of Cybele under a fir-tree, at the moment he was expiring. They carried him into the temple of the goddess, and endeavoured to restore him to life, but in vain. Cybele ordained that the death of Atys should be bawled every year in solemn lamentations, and that henceforth her priests should be eunuchs. (\textit{Viklou, Guttus, ev Aon.} xi. 116; comp. Lobeck's \textit{Phrygik} p. 273.) A third account says, that Cybele, mourning over her father, and Phrygian king Mose, was fed by panthers and brought up by shepherdes, and that she afterwards secretly married Atys, who was subsequently called Papas. At this moment, Cybele was recognised and kindly received by her parents; but when her connexion with Atys became known to them, Mose ordered Atis, and the shepherdes among whom she had lived, to be put to death. Cybele, maddened with grief at this act of her father, traversed the country amid loud lamentations and the sound of cymbals. Phrygia was now visitied by an epidemic and scarcity. The oracle commanded that Atis should be buried, and divine honours paid to Cybele; but as the body of the youth was already in a state of decomposition, the funeral honours were paid to an image of him, which was made as a substitute. (Diod. iii. 58, &c.) According to a fourth story related by Pausanias (vii. 17. $\S$ 5), Atys was a son of the Phrygian king Calaus, and by nature incapable of propagating his race. When he had grown up, he went to Lydia, where he introduced the worship of Cybele. The grateful goddess conceived such an attachment for him, that Zeus in his anger at it, sent a wild boar into Lydia, which killed many of the inhabitants, and among them Atys also. Atys was believed to be buried in Pessinus under mount Agdistis. (Paus. i. 4. $\S$ 5.) He was worshipped in the temples of Cybele in common with this goddess. (vii. 20. $\S$ 2; \textit{Agdistis; Hesych. z. v. "Atys."}) In works of art he is represented as a shepherd with flute and staff. His worship appears to have been introduced into Greece at a comparatively late period. It is an ingenious opinion of Böttiger (\textit{Amathus.} i. p. 353, &c.), that the myths of Atys represents the two

AVENTINENSIS.

2. A son of Aulus, king of the Macenians, from whose son Lydus, his son and successor, the Maecenians were afterwards called Lydians. (Herod. i. 7, vii. 74.) Herodotus (i. 94, comp. Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 26, 28; Tacit. Annal. i. 45) mentions Tyrrhenians as another son of Atya, and in another passage (iv. 45), he speaks of Cottys as the son of Manes, instead of Atya.

3. A Latin chief, the son of Alba, and father of Capys, from whom the Latin gens Atia derived its origin, and from whom Augustus was believed to be descended on his mother's side. (Virg. Aen. v. 569; Liv. i. 8; Suet. Aug. 4.)

AUVDATA (Adi$ara), an Illyrian, the first wife of Philip of Macedon, by whom he had a daughter, Cynna. (Athen. xiii. p. 537, c.)

AUDENTIUS, a Spanish bishop, of whom Gennadius (de Vitis Illustribus. c. 14) records, that he wrote against the Manichaeans, the Sabellians, the Arians, and with especial energy, against the Photiniacs. The work was entitled de Fide adversus Haereticos. Its object was to show that the second person in the Trinity is co-eternal with the Father. Audientius is styled by Trithemius (de Script. Ecol. cl.) “vir in divinis scripturis exercitatum habens ingenium.” Cave supposes him to have flourished about A.D. 200. [J. M. M.]

AUDOLEON (A$o$e$0v or A$o$e$0v), a king of Paonies, was the son of Agie. He was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, and was the father of Ariston, who distinguished himself at the battle of Guagamela, and of a daughter who married Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. In a war with the Autolitans he was reduced to great straits, but was succoured by Cassander. (Diod. xx. 19.) [C. P. M.]

AVENTINENSIS, the name of a plebeian family of the Geminian gens. The name was derived from the hill Aventine, which was the quarter of Rome peculiar to the plebeians. The family was descended from the tribune Cn. Geminus, who was murdered in B.C. 473.

1. L. Geminus M. F. Cn. n. Aventinensis, consul B.C. 363, and again in 362, was killed in battle against the Hernicans in the latter of these years, and his army routed. His defeat and death caused the patricians great joy, as he was the first consul who had marched against the enemy with plebeian auspices. (Liv. vii. 1, 4, 6; Diod. xiv. 90, xvi. 4; Eutrop. ii. 4; Oros. iii. 4; Lyd. de Mag. i. 46.)

2. Cn. Geminus M. F. M. n. Aventinensis, consul B.C. 363, in which year the senate was chiefly occupied in endeavouring to appease the anger of the gods. (Liv. vii. 3; Diod. xvi. 2.)

3. L. Geminus (Aventinensis), tribune of the plebs, B.C. 342, probably belonged to this family. He brought forward a law for the abolition of usury, and was probably the author of many of the other reforms in the same year mentioned by Livy. (vii. 42.)

4. L. Geminus (L. F. M. N.) Aventinensis, consul B.C. 308. (Liv. x. 1; Diod. xx. 102.)

AVENTINUS, a son of Hercules and the priestess Aricia. (Virg. Aen. vii. 656.) Servius on this passage, in his Commentaries on Virgil, a king of the Aborigines, who was killed and buried on the hill afterwards called the Aventine. [L. S.]

AVENTINUS, one of the mythical kings of Alba, who was buried on the hill which was afterwards called by his name. He is said to have reigned thirty-seven years, and to have been succeeded by Procas, the father of Amulius. (Liv. i. 3; Dionys. i. 71; Ov. Fast. iv. 51.)

AVERNUS, properly speaking, the name of a lake in Campania, which the Latin poets describe as the entrance to the lower world, or as the lower world itself. Here we have only to mention, that Avernus was also regarded as a divine being; for Servius (ad Virg. Geor. ii. 101) speaks of a statue of Avernus, which perspired during the storm after the unseating of the Juno Boeotia in her lake, and to which expiatory sacrifices were offered. [L. S.]

AVERRUNCUS. [Apotropae.]

AUFFIDIA GENS, plebeian, was not known till the later times of the republic. The first member of it, who obtained the consulship, was Cn. Auffidius Orestes, in B.C. 71. Its cognomina are LUKUO and ORESTES: for those who occur without a family-name, see AUFFIDUS.

AUFFIDINUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

CN. AUFFIDIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 176, accused C. Lucretius Galbus on account of his oppression of the Chalcidians. (Liv. xliii. 10.)

CN. AUFFIDIUS, a learned historian and perhaps a jurist, is celebrated in some of the extant works of Cicero for the equanimity with which he bore blindness; and we find from St. Jerome (in Epist. a. Nepotiani, Opr. vol. iv. P. ii. p. 356, ed. Benedict.), that his patience was also recounted in the lost treatise de Consolationibus. His corporeal blindness did not quench his intellectual vision. Bereaved of sight and advanced in age, he still attended his duties, and spoke in the senate, and found means to write a Grecian history. Cicero states (Tues. Disp. v. 38), that he also gave advice to his friends (see anec. delibervantus deor); and, on account of this expression, he has been ranked by some legal biographers among the Roman jurists. In his old age, he adopted Cn. Aurelius Orestes, who consequently took the name of Auffidius in place of Aurelius. This precedent has been quoted (Cic. pro Dom. 19) to shew that the power of adopting does not legally depend on the power of Auffidius. And the younger Auffidius, B.C. 119, tribunus plebs, B.C. 114, and finally praetor B.C. 108, about two years before the birth of Cicero, who, as a boy, was acquainted with the old blind scholar. (De Fin. v. 19.) [J. T. G.]

SEX. AUFFIDIUS, was warmly recommended by Cicero to Cornificius, proconsul of Africa, in B.C. 43. (Ad Fam. xii. 26, 27.)

T. AUFFIDIUS, a jurist, the brother of M. Virgilius, who accused Sulla B.C. 86. It was probably the jurist who was quaestor B.C. 84, and who was afterwards praetor of Asia. (Cic. pro Flacc. 19.) He may also have been the Auffidius once talked of as one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship, B.C. 63. (Cic. ad Att. i. 1.) In pleading private causes, he imitated the manner of T. Ju-ventius and his disciple, P. Orbius, both of whom were sound lawyers and shrewd but unpersuaded speakers. Cleerex, in whose lifetime he died at a very advanced age, mentions him rather slickly as a good and harmless man, but no great orator. [Drues, 48.]

T. AUFIDUS, a physician, who was a native of Sicily and a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia, and who therefore lived in the first century B.C. (Steph. Byz. s. e. Ἀφρίδαυς.) He is probably the same person who is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus by the name of Titus only, and who wrote a work On the Soul and another On Chronic Diseases, consisting of at least two books. (Auct. Morb. ii. 29, p. 144; Morb. Chron. i. 5, p. 339.) [W. A. G.]

AUFIDUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

AUFIDUS CHIUSI, a jurist, who is known only from the so-called Vaticanus Fragmenta, first published by Mai in 1829 along with fragments of Symmachus and other newly-discovered remains of antiquity. In Pat. Prag. § 77, an opinion of Athenaeus is cited from Ath. and the Chian. He here states that it is plain that this Aufidius could be neither Namusa nor Taucen, the disciples of Servius, for they lived long before Attilicus. The Chian may possibly be identified with Titus or Titus Aufidius, who was consul under Hadrian, and is mentioned in the preamble of a senatusconsultum which is cited in Dig. 5. tit. 3. s. 20 [22]. § 6. (Bruns, Quod condit Vaticanus Fragmenta ad melius cognoscendum f. Romanum, p. 16, Tubingae, 1842.) [J. T. G.]

AUFIDUS NAMUSA. [Namusa.]

AUFIDUS TUCCA. [Tucca.]

AUGABUS. [Acharus.]

AUGE or AUGELIA (Αὔγη or Αὔγελια), a daughter of Aleus and Neaera, was a priestess of Athena, and having become by Hercules the mother of a son, she concealed him in the temple of the goddess. In consequence of this profanation of the sanctuary, the country was visited by a scarcity; and when Aleus was informed by an oracle that the temple of Athena was profaned by something unholy, he searched and found the child in it, and ordered him to be exposed on Mount Parthenion, where he was suckled by a stag (ἄλφασος), when the boy derived the name of Telephus. Auge was surrendered to Nauplius, who was to kill her, but he gave her to Teuthras, king of the Myrians, who made her his wife. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 4, iii. 9. § 1.) The same story is related with some modifications by Pausanias (viii. 4. § 6, 48. § 5), Diodorus (iv. 33), Hyginus (Fab. 90), and Tzetzes (ad Lyceph. 206). Respecting her subsequent residence with her son Teuthras, see Telephus. Her tomb was shown in the time of Pausanias (viii. 4. § 6) at Pergamus in Myria. Auge was represented by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (x. 28. § 4.) Another mythical personage of this name, one of the Horae, occurs in Hyginus. (Fab. 183.)

AUGEAS or AUGELIAS (Αὔγεας or Αὔγελιας), a son of Phorbas and Hermoine, and king of the Epeians in Elis. According to some accounts he was a son of Echion or Helios or Poseidon. (Paus. v. 1. § 7; Apollod. ii. 5. § 5; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 172.) His mother, too, is not the same in all traditions, for some call her Iphiboë or Naupidane. (Tzetz. ad Lyceph. 41; Hygin. Fab. 1. 21.) Augeas is mentioned among the Argonauts, but he is more celebrated in ancient story on account of his connexion with Hercules, one of whose labours, imposed upon him by Eurystheus, was to clear in one day the stables of Augeas, who kept in them a large number of oxen. Hercules was to have the tenth part of the oxen as his reward, but when he had accomplished his task by leading the rivers Alpheus and Penes through the stables, Augeas refused to keep his promise. Hercules, therefore, made war upon him, which terminated in his death and that of his sons, with the exception of one, Phyleus, whom Hercules placed on the throne of his father. (Apollod. l. c.; ii. 7. § 2; Dion. iv. 13, 33; Theocrit. Idyll. 25.) Another tradition preserved in Pausanias (v. 3. § 4, 4. § 1) represents Augeas as dyimg a natural death at an advanced age, and as receiving heroic honours from Oxyyns. [L. S.]

AUGEAS or AUGELIAS (Αὔγεας or Αὔγελιας), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy. Suidas (s. e.) and Eudocia (p. 69) mention the following plays of his: Αὔγελεας, Αὔγειας, Καρπόδημεος, and Ναυφόεας. He appears likewise to have written epic poems, and to have borrowed from Antimachus of Teos. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 425; [C. P. M.]}

AUGURINUS, the name of families in the Genucia and Minucia gentes. The word is evidently derived from augur.
part in the defence of Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in this year, but was unable to obtain his acquittal. (Liv. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 20, 27—32, 38, 60, 61.) In the victorious approach of Coriolanus to Rome at the head of the volucchini army, Augurius was one of the embassy sent to intercede with him on behalf of the city. (Dionys. viii. 22, 23.)

2. P. MINUCIUS AUGURIUS, consul b. c. 492, was chiefly engaged in his consulship in obtaining a supply of corn from different countries, on account of the famine at Rome. (Liv. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 1; Oros. ii. 5.)

3. L. MINUCIUS P. P. M. N. ESQUILINUS AUGURIUS, consul b. c. 458, carried on the war against the Aequians, but through fear shut himself up in his camp on the Albis, and allowed the enemy to surround him. He was delivered from his danger by the dictator L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, who compelled him, however, to resign his consulship. In the Fasti Capitolini we have one of the invasions which are so common in Roman history: in the Fasti, Augurius is represented as consul subject to the city of one whose name is lost, instead of being himself succeeded by another. (Liv. ii. 25—29; Dionys. x. 22; Dion Cass. Frg. xxxiv. 27, p. 140, ed. Reimar; Val. Max. ii. 7; § 7, v. 2; § 2; Flor. i. 11; Zonar. vii. 17; Nicoburu, Rom. Hist. ii. n. 604.)

4. Q. MINUCIUS P. P. M. N. ESQUILINUS AUG-
URINUS, brother of No. 3, consul b. c. 457, led the conduct of the war against the Sabines, but could not do more than ravage their lands, as they shut themselves up in their walled towns. (Liv. iii. 30; Dionys. x. 26, 30.)

5. L. MINUCIUS AUGURIUS, was appointed praefect of the corn-market (praefectus cauponae) in b. c. 439, in order to regulate the price of corn and obtain a supply from abroad, as the people were suffering from grievous famine. Sp. Maelius, who distinguished himself by his liberal supplies of corn to the people, was accused by the patriots of aiming at the sovereignty; and Augurius is said to have disclosed his treasonable designs to the senate. The ferment occasioned by the assassination of Maelius was appeased by Augurius, who is said to have gone over to the pleas from the patriots, and to have been chosen by the tribunes one of their body. It is stated, indeed, that he was elected an eleventh tribune, as the number of tribunes was full; but this seems incredible. That he passed over to the pleas, however, is confirmed by the fact, that we find subsequently members of his family tribunes of the pleas. Augurius also lowered the price of corn in the following years, so long as the maximum was as for a modius. The people, in their gratitude, pre-Agented with him with an ox having its horns gilt, and erected a statue to his honour outside the Porta deny that they open a very important chapter in the history of human nature. When Augustin was still very young, he fell into a dangerous disorder, which induced him to wish for baptism; but on his recovery, the rite was delayed. He tells us that he was exceedingly delighted, from his childhood, with the fabulous stories of the Latin poets; but the difficulty of learning Greek inspired him with a great disgust for that language. He was sent, during his boyhood, to be educated at the neighbouring town of Madaura, and afterwards removed to Carthage in order to prosecute the study of rhetoric. Here he fell into vicious practices; and before he was eighteen, his concubine bore him a son, whom he named Adeodatus. He applied, however, with characteristic ardour, to the study of the great masters of rhetoric and philosophy. In particular, he describes in strong terms the beneficial effect produced upon him by reading the Hortensius of Cicero. Soon after this, he embraced the Manichean heresy,—a wild and visionary system, repugnant alike to sound reason and to Scripture, but not without strong fascinations for an ardent and imaginative mind undisciplined in the lessons of practical religion. To this pernicious doctrine he adhered for nine years, during which he unhappily seduced others into the adoption of the same errors.

After teaching grammar for some time at his native place, he returned to Carthage, having lost a friend whose death affected him very deeply. At Carthage he became a teacher of rhetoric, and in his twenty-seventh year published his first work, entitled, "de apto et pulchro," which he dedicated to Hierius, a Roman orator, known to him only by his high reputation. Of the fate of this work the author seems to have been singularly careless; for when he wrote his Confessions, he had lost sight of it altogether, and says he does not remember whether it was in two or three books. We agree with Lord Jeffery (Enchirid. Brit. and Beaux) in lamenting the loss of these of Carthage, where the schools were often scenes of gross and irrepressible disorder. At Rome he had a dangerous illness, from which however he soon recovered; and after teaching rhetoric for a few months, he left the imperial city, in disgust at the fraudulent conduct of some of his students, and went to Milan, designing to pursue his profession in that city. At that time Ambrose was bishop of Milan, and his conversation and preaching made a good impression upon Augustin. He was not, however, converted to Christianity at once, but fell, for a time, into a state of general uncertainty and scepticism. The great mystery of all, the origin of evil, especially perplexed and tormented him. By degrees his mind acquired a healthier tone, and the reading of some of the Platonic philosophers (not in the original Greek, but in a Latin version) disposed him still more favourably towards the Christian system. From these he turned, with a delight unfelt before, to the Holy Scriptures, in the perusal of which his earlier doubts and difficulties gave way before the self-evidencing light of divine truth. He was greatly benefited by the religious conversations which he held with Simplician, a Christian presbyter, who had formerly instructed Ambrose himself in theology. After deep consideration, and many struggles of feeling (of which he has given an interesting record in the eighth and ninth books of his Confessions), he resolved on making a public profession of Christianity, and was baptized by Ambrose at Milan on the 25th of April, A. D. 387. His fellow-townsmen and intimate friend, Alypius, and his natural son, Adeodatus, of whose extraordinary genius he speaks with fond enthusiasm, were baptized on the same occasion. His mother Monica, who had followed him to Milan, rejoiced over this happy event as the completion of all her desires on earth. She did not long survive it; for shortly after his conversion, Augustin set out with her to return to Africa, and at Oads, on the banks of the Tibur, his mother died, after an illness of a few days, in the fifty-sixth year of her age. Her son has given, in the ninth book of his Confessions (cc. 8—11) a brief but deeply interesting account of this excellent woman. Augustin remained at Rome some time after his mother's death, and composed his treatises de Mortibus Ecclesiarum Catholicarum et de Moribus Manichaeorum, de Quaestio Animae, and de Libero Arbitrio. The latter, however, was not finished until some years after.

In the latter part of the year 388, Augustin returned by way of Carthage to Tagaste. He sold the small remains of his paternal property, and gave the proceeds to the poor; and passed the next three years in seclusion, devoting himself to religious exercises. At this period of his life he wrote his treatises de Genesi contra Manicheos, de Musicæ, de Magistro, (addressed to his son Adeodatus), and de Vera Religione. The reputation of these works and of their author's personal excellence seems to have been speedily diffused, for in the year 391, Augustin, against his own wishes, was ordained a priest by Valerian, then bishop of Hippo. On this, he spent some time in retirement, in order to qualify himself by the special study of the Bible for the work of preaching. When he entered on this public duty, he discharged it with great acceptance and success. He did not, however, abandon his labours as an author, but wrote his tractate de Utilitate credendi, inscribed to his friend Honoratus, and another entitled de duabus Animabus contra Manicheos. He also published an account of his disputation with Fortunatus, a distinguished teacher of the Manichean doctrine. In the year 393, he was appointed, though still only a presbyter, to deliver a discourse upon the creed before the council of Hippo. This discourse, which is still extant, was published at the solicitation of his friends.

In the year 395, Valerian exerted himself to obtain Augustin as his colleague in the episcopal charge; and though Augustin at first urged his unwillingness with great sincerity, his scruples were overcome, and he was ordained bishop of Hippo. He performed the duties of his new office with zealous fidelity, and yet found time amidst them all for the composition of many of his ablest and most interesting works. His history, from the time of his elevation to the see of Hippo, is so closely implicated with the Donatistic and Pelagian controversies, that it would be impracticable to pursue its details within our prescribed limits. For a full and accurate account of the part which he took in these memorable contentions, the reader is referred to the life of Augustin contained in the fourteenth volume of the Benedictine edition of his works, and to the thirteenth volume of Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique,"—a quarto of 1075 pages devoted entirely to the life and writings of this eminent father. Of those of his numerous works which we have not already noticed, we mention the three following, as especially interesting and important: His Confessions, in thirteen books, were written in the year 397. They are addressed to the Almighty, and contain an account of Augustin's life down to the time when he was deprived of his mother by death. The last three books are occupied with an allegorical explanation of the Mosaic account of the creation. His autobiography is written with great genius and feeling; and though the interspersed addresses to the Deity break the order of the narrative, and extend over a large portion of the work, they are too fine in themselves, and too characteristic of the author, to allow us to complain of their length and frequency. The celebrated treatise, de Civitate Dei, commenced about the year 413, was not finished before A. D. 426. Its object and structure cannot be better exhibited than in the author's own words, taken from the 47th chapter of the second book of his Retractations: "Interes Roma Gothorum irruptione, aetatium sub rege Alarico, atque impetu magna cladei dextra est: cujus eversionem deum falsorum moliturque cultores, quos usitato nomine Paganos vocamus, in Christianiam religionem referre conantur, solito acerbibus et aemarius Deum verum blasphemare coeperunt. Unde ex aurum exsecro zelo domus Dei, adversus eorum blasphemiam vel errores, libros de Civitate Dei scribere institui. Quod opus per aliquot annos me tenuit, eo quod alia multa intercurrebant, quae divinum non opusserat, et me proprium ad solvendum necessitatem invitasset. Et tamen de Civitate Dei, grande opus tandem viatui dum sunt libris est terminatum. Quorum quinque primi cos refellunt, qui res humanas ita prosperari voluerunt, ut ad hoc moliturum deorum cultum, quos Pagano colore consuerunt, necesse est abire; et quia prohibitur, malis ista exoriri atque abandonee contendunt. Sequentes autem quinque adversus eos loquentur, qui fatentur hae malae, nec desilue unquam, nec defutura mortalibus: et ea nunc magna, nunc parva, locis, temporibus, personis, varietati: sed deorum multorum cultum, quae eis sacrificatae, propter vitam post mortem futuam, esse utile disputant. His ergo decem libros duae istae vanae opinions Christianum religionis adversaeae refellunt. Sed ne quisquam nos aliem tantum redarguamus, non autem nostra assensum, reprehenderet, id agit pars altera operis hujus, quae decem in libris continetur. Quamquam, ubi opus est, et in prioribus decem quae nostra sunt assensum, et in decem posteriores redarguamus adversa. Decemdecim ergo librorum sequentium, primi quattuor continent exordium duarum Civitatum, quarum est una Dei, altera hujus mundi. Secundum quattuor excursum earum sive producunt. Tertii vero, qui et postremi, debitos fines. Ita omnes vagituri et duo libri cum sint de utraque Civitate conscripti, titulum tamen meliore acceperrunt, ut de Civitate Dei potius vocarentur." The learning displayed in this remarkable work is extensive rather than profound; its contents are too miscellaneous and desultory, and its reasons are often more ingenious than satisfactory. Yet, after every due abatement has been made, it will maintain its reputation as one of the most extraordinary productions of human intellect and industry. The Retractationes of Augustin, written in the year 428, deserve notice as evincing the singular candor of the author. It consists of a review of all his own productions; and besides explanations and qualifications of much that he had written, it unfrequently presents acknowledgments of downright errors and mistakes. It is one of the noblest sacrifices ever laid upon the altar of truth by a majestic intellect acting in obedience to the purest conscientiousness.

The life of Augustin closed amid scenes of violence and blood. The Vandals under the ferocious Genseric invaded the north of Africa, A. D. 429, and in the following year laid siege to Hippo. Full of grief for the sufferings which he witnessed and the dangers he forebode, the aged bishop prayed that God would grant his people a deliverance from these dreadful calamities, or else supply them with the fortitude to endure their woes: for himself he besought a speedy liberation from the flesh. His prayer was granted; and in the third month of the siege, on the 28th of August, 430, Augustin breathed his last, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. The character of this eminent man is admitted on all hands to have been marked by conspicuous excellence after his profession of the Christian faith. The only faults of which he can be accused are an occasional excess of severity in his controversial writings, and a ready acquisitiveness in the persecution of the Donatists. His intellect was in a very high degree vigorous, acute, and comprehensive; and he possessed to the last a fund of ingenious sensibility, which gives an indescribable charm to most of his compositions. His style is full of life and force, but deficient both in purity and in elegance. His learning seems to have been principally confined to the Latin authors; of Greek he knew but little, and of Hebrew nothing. His theological opinions varied considerably even after he became a Christian; and it was during the later period of his life that he adopted those peculiar tenets with regard to grace, predesposition, and free-will, which in modern times have been called Augustinian. His influence in his own and in every succeeding age has been immense. Even in the Roman Catholic Church his authority is professedly held in high esteem; although his later theological system has in reality been proscribed by every party in that communion, except the learned, philosophic, and devout fraternity of the Jansenists. The early Reformers drank deeply into the spirit of his speculative theology; and many even of those who recoil most shrinkingly from his doctrine of predestination, have done ample justice to his surpassing energy of intellect, and to the warmth and purity of his religious feelings.

The earliest edition of the collected works of Augustin is that of the celebrated Amstelich, which appeared in nine volumes folio, at Basle, 1566, and was reprinted at Paris in 1515. This edition did not, however, contain the Epistolae, the Sermones, and the Enarrationes in Psalmos, which had been previously published by Amerbach. In 1529, the works of Augustin were again published at Basle, from the press of Frobenius, and under the editorship of Erasmus, in ten volumes folio. This edition, though by no means faultless, was a considerable improvement upon that of Amerbach. It was reprinted at Paris in 1531—32; at Venice, with some improvements, in 1552, and again in 1570; at Lyons in 1501—63, and again in 1571. It was also issued from the press of Frobenius at Basle, with various alterations, in 1545, in 1556, in 1593, and also at Paris in 1577—80. The edition of Augustin prepared by the learned divines of Louvain, was published at Antwerp, by Christopher Plantin, in ten volumes folio. It far surpasses in critical exactness all the preceding editions; and though, on the whole, inferior to that of the Benedictines, it is still held in high estimation. No fewer than sixteen of the "Theologoi Lovanienses" were employed in preparing it for publication. It has been very frequently reprinted: at Geneva in 1536; at Cologne in 1616; at Lyons in 1664; at Paris in 1688, in 1693, in 1699, in 1704, in 1706, and in 1708. The Benedictine edition of the works of Augustin, in ten volumes folio, was published at Paris in 1678—1700. It was severely handled by Father Simon; but its superiority to all the former editions of Augustin is generally acknowledged. The first volume contains, besides the Retractions and the Confessions, the greater part of the works written by Augustin before his elevation to the episcopal dignity. The second comprises his letters. The third and fourth include his exegetical writings, the fourth being entirely filled up with his Commentary on the Psalms. The fifth volume contains the sermons of Augustin. The sixth embraces his Opera Moralia. The seventh consists of the treatise De Civitate Dei. The eighth comprehends his principal works against the Manicheans, and those against the Arians. The ninth comprises his controversial writings against the Donatists. The tenth consists of his treatises on the Pelagian controversy. Each of these volumes contains an appendix consisting of works falsely attributed to Augustin, &c. The eleventh volume is occupied with the life of Augustin, for the preparation of which Tillemont lent the sheets of his unpublished volume upon this father. This valuable edition was reprinted at Paris, in eleven thick imperial octavo volumes, 1636—39. The edition of Le Clerc (who calls himself Joannes Phereponus) appeared (professedly at Antwerp, but in reality at Amsterdam, in 1700—03. It is a republication of the Benedictine edition, with notes by Le Clerc, and some other supplementary matter; besides an additional volume containing the poem of Prosper de Ingratis, the Commentary of Pelagius on the Epistles of Paul, and some modern productions referring to the life and writings of Augustin.

Of the numerous editions of the separate works of Augustin the following are all that we have space to enumerate:—De Civitate Dei: editio princeps, e monasterio Sublacensi, 1467, fol.; Moguntiae per Petrr. Schoeffer, cum commentariis Thomae Valois et Nic. Triveth, 1473, fol., reprinted at Basle in 1479 and again in 1515; commentarii illustratissimo studio et labore Jo. Lud. Vivis, Basileae, 1522, 1535, 1570, fol.; cum commentariis Leon.
AUGUSTUS.

Augustus, the first emperor of the Roman empire, was born on the 23rd of September of this year (B.C. 63), in the consulship of M. Tullius Cicero and C. Antonius. He was the son of C. Octavius by Atia, a daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar, who is said to have been descended from the ancient Latin hero Atys. His real name was, like that of his father, C. Octavius, but for the sake of brevity, and in order to avoid confusion, we shall call him Augustus, though this was only an hereditary surname which was given him afterwards by the senate and the people to express their veneration for him, whence the Greek writers translate it by Αὐγούστος. Various wonderful signs, announcing his future greatness, were subsequently believed to have preceded or accompanied his birth. (Suet. Aug. 94; Dion Cass. xlv. 1, &c.) Augustus lost his father at the age of four years, whereinon his mother married L. Marcus Philippus, and at the age of twelve (according to Nicolaus Damascenius, De Vit. Aug. 3, three years earlier) he delivered the funeral eulogium on his grandmother, Julia. After the death of his father his education was conducted with great care in the house of his grandmother, Julia, and at her death he returned to his mother, who, as well as his step-father, henceforth watched over his education with the utmost vigilance. His talents and beauty, and above all his relationship to C. Julius Caesar, drew upon him the attention of the most distinguished Romans of the time, and it seems that J. Caesar himself, who had no male issue, watched over the education of the promising youth with no less interest than his parents. In his sixteenth year (N. Damascene erroneously says his fifteenth) he received the toga virilis, and in the same year was made a member of the college of pontiffs, in the place of L. Domitius, who had been killed after the battle of Pharsalia. (N. Damasc. l. c. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 59; Suet. Aug. 94; Dion Cass. xlv. 2.) From this time his uncle, C. Julius Caesar, devoted as much of his time as his own busy life allowed him to the practical education of his nephew, and trained him for the duties of the public career he was soon to enter upon. Dion Cassius relates that at this time Caesar also brought about his elevation to the rank of a patrician, but it is a well attested fact that this did not take place till three years later. In a. c. 47, when Caesar went to Africa to put down the Pompeian party in that country, Augustus wished to accompany him but was kept back, because his mother thought that his delicate constitution would be unable to bear the fatigues connected with such an expedition. On his return Caesar distinguished him, nevertheless, with military honors, and in his triumph allowed Augustus to ride on horseback behind his triumphant char. In the year following (B.C. 45), when Caesar went to Spain against the sons of Pompey, Augustus, who had then completed his seventeenth year, was to have accompanied his uncle, but was obliged to remain behind on account of illness, but soon joined him with a few companions. During his whole life-time Augustus, with one exception, was unfortunate at sea, and this his first attempt nearly cost him his life, for the vessel in which he sailed was wrecked on the coast of Spain. Whether he arrived in Caesar's camp in time to take part in the battle of Munda or not is a disputed point, though the former seems to be more probable. (Suet. Aug. 94; Dion Cass. xlix. 4.) Caesar became more and more attached to his nephew, for he seems to have perceived in him the elements of everything that would render him a worthy successor to himself: he constantly kept him about his person, and while he was yet in Spain he is said to have made his will and to have adopted Augustus as his son, though without informing him of it. In the autumn of B.C. 45, Caesar returned to Rome with his nephew; and soon afterwards, in accordance with the wish of his uncle, the senate raised the gens Octavia, to which Augustus belonged, to the rank of a patrician gens. About the same time Augustus was betrothed to Servilia, the daughter of P. Servilius Isauricus, but the engagement appears afterwards to have been broken off.

The extraordinary distinction and favors which had thus been conferred upon Augustus at such an early age, must have excited his pride and ambition, of which one remarkable example is recorded. In the very year of his return from Spain he was presumptuous enough to ask for the office of magister equitum to the dictator, his uncle. Caesar, however, refused to grant it, and gave it to M. Lepidus instead, probably because he thought his nephew not yet fit for such an office. He wished that Augustus should accompany him on the expedition which he contemplated against the Getæ and Parthians; and, in order that the young man might acquire a more thorough practical training in military affairs, he sent him to Apollonia in Illyricum, where some legions were stationed, and whither Caesar himself intended to follow him. It has often been supposed that Caesar sent his nephew to Apollonia for the purpose of finishing his intellectual education; but although this was not neglected during his stay in that city, yet it was not the object for which he was sent thither, for Apollonia offered no advantages for the purpose, as may be inferred from the fact, that Augustus took his instructors—the rhetorician Apollodorus of Pergamus and the mathematician Theagenes, with him from Rome. When Caesar had again to appoint the magistrates in B.C. 44, he remembered the desire of his nephew, and conferred upon him, while he was at Apollonia, the office of magister equitum, on which he was to enter in the autumn of B.C. 43. But things turned out for differently. Augustus had scarcely been at Apollonia six months, when he was surprised by the news of his uncle's murder, in March, B.C. 44. Short as his residence at this place had been, it was yet of great influence upon his future life; his military exercises seem to have strengthened his naturally delicate constitution, and the attentions and flatteries which were paid to the nephew of Caesar by the most distinguished persons connected with the legions in Illyricum, stimulated his ambition and love of dominion, and thus explain as well as excuse many of the acts of which he was afterwards guilty. It was at Apol-lorn, also, that Augustus formed his intimate friendship with Q. Sulpicius Rufus and M. Vinicius Agrippa.

When the news of Caesar’s murder reached the troops in Illyricum, they immediately offered to follow Augustus to Italy and avenge his uncle’s death; but fear and ignorance of the real state of affairs at Rome made him hesitate for a while. At last he resolved to go to Italy as a private person, accompanied only by Agrippa and a few other friends. In the beginning of April he landed at Lupiae, near Brundisium, and here he heard of his adoption into the gens Julia and of his being the heir of Caesar. At Brundisium, whither he next proceeded, he was saluted by the soldiers as Caesar, which name he henceforth assumed, for his legitimate name now was C. Iulius Caesar Octavianus. After having visited his stepfather in the neighbourhood of Naples, he arrived at Rome, apparently about the beginning of May. Here he demanded nothing but the private property which Caesar had left him, but declared that he was resolved to avenge the murder of his benefactor.

The state of parties at Rome was most perplexing; and one cannot but admire the extraordinary tact and prudence which Augustus displayed, and the skill with which a youth of barely twenty contrived to blind the most experienced statesmen in Rome, and eventually to carry all his designs into effect. It was not the faction of the conspirators that placed difficulties in his way, but one of Caesar’s own party, M. Antony, who had in his possession the money and papers of Caesar, and refused to give them up. Augustus declared before the praetor, in the usual manner, that he accepted of the inheritance, and promised to give to the people the portion of his uncle’s property which he had besought them in his will. Antony endeavoured by all means to prevent Augustus from obtaining his objects; but the conduct of Augustus gained the favour of both the senate and the people. [Antonius, p. 215, b.] Augustus had to contend againstDec. Brutus, who was in possession of Cisalpine Gaul, as well as against Antony; but to get rid of one enemy at least, the sword was drawn against the latter, the more dangerous of the two. While Antony was collecting troops for the war against D. Brutus, two of the legions which came from Macedonia, the legio Martia and the fifth, went over to Augustus; and to prevent the remaining troops following the example, Antony hastened with them to the north of Italy. Cicero, who had at first looked upon Augustus with contempt, now began to regard him as the only man capable of delivering the republic from its troubles; and Augustus in return courted Cicero. On the 10th of December, Cicero, in his third Philippic, proposed that Augustus should be entrusted with the command of the army against Antony, and on the first of January, b. c. 43, he repeated the same proposal in his fifth Philippic. The senate now granted more than had been asked: Augustus obtained the command of the army with the title and insignia of a praetor, the right of voting in the senate with the consuls, and of holding the consularship ten years before he attained the legitimate age. He was accordingly sent to Italy, while he left the commands of the provinces to C. Vibius Paternus and A. Hirtius, to command Antony to raise the siege of Mutina. Augustus distinguished himself by his defence of the camp near Mutina, for which the soldiers saluted him as imperator. The fall of the two consuls threw the command of their armies into his hands, but he was humbled and forced to retreat across the Alps. Various reports were spread in the meantime of disputes between D. Brutus and Augustus, and it was even said that the death of the two consuls was the work of the latter. The Roman aristocracy, on whose behalf Augustus had acted, now determined to prevent him from acquiring all further power. They entrusted D. Brutus with the command of the consular armies to prosecute the war against Antony, and made other regulations which were intended to prevent Augustus gaining any further popularity with the soldiers. He remained inactive, and seemed ready to obey the commands of the senate. Antony had in the meantime become reconciled with the governors in Gaul and Spain through the mediation of Lepidus, and was now at the head of a powerful army.

In these circumstances Augustus resolved to seek a power which might assist him in gaining over Antony, or enable him to oppose him more effectually if necessary. This power was the consulsiphip. He was very popular with the soldiers, and they were by promises of various kinds induced to demand the consulihip for him. The senate was terrified, and granted the request, though, soon after, the arrival of troops from Africa emboldened them again to declare against him. But Augustus had won the favour of these troops: he embarked on the campus Martius, and in the month of August the people elected him consul together with Q. Pedius. His adoption into the gens Julia was now sanctioned by the curiae; the arms due to the people, according to the will of Julius Caesar, were paid, the murderers of the dictator outlawed, and Augustus appointed to carry the sentence into effect. He first marched into the north, professedly against Antony, but had scarcely entered Etruria, when the senate, on the proposal of Q. Pedius, repealed the sentence of outlawry against Antony and Lepidus, who were just descending from the Alps with an army of 17 legions. D. Brutus took to flight, and was afterwards murdered at Aquileia at the command of Antony. On their arrival at Bononia, Antony and Lepidus were met by Augustus, who became reconciled with them. It was agreed by the three, that Augustus should lay down his consulsiphip, and that the empire should be divided among them under the title of triumviri rei publicae consularis; and that this agreement should last for the next five years. Lepidus obtained Spain, Antony Gaul, and Augustus Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily. Antony and Augustus were to prosecute the war against the murderers of Caesar. The first objects of the triumvirs were to destroy their enemies and the republican party; they began their prescriptions even before they arrived at Rome; their enemies were murdered and their property confiscated, and Augustus was no less cruel than Antony. Two thousand equites and three hundred senators are said to have been put to death during this prescription: the lands of whole townships were taken from their owners and distributed among the veteran soldiers. Numbers of Roman citizens took to flight, and found a refuge with Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. Augustus first directed his arms against the latter, because Pompeius had it in his power to cut off all provisions from Rome. The army assembled at Rhegrium; but an attempt to cross to Sicily was thwarted by a naval victory which Pompeius gained over Q. Salvinius Rufus in the very sight of Augustus. Soon after this, Augustus sailed across the Ionian sea to Greece, as Brutus and Cassius were leaving Asia for the west. Augustus was obliged to remain at Dyrrhachium on account of illness, but as soon as he had recovered a little, he hastened to Philippi in the autumn of n. c. 42. The battle of Philippi was gained by the two triumvirs: Brutus and Cassius in despair put an end to their lives, and their followers surrendered to the conquerors, with the exception of those who placed their hopes in Sext. Pompeius. After this successful war, in which the victory was mainly owing to Antony, though subsequently Augustus claimed all the merit for himself, the triumvirs made a new division of the provinces. Lepidus obtained Africa, and Augustus returned to Italy to reward his veterans with the lands he had promised them. All Italy was in fear and trembling, as every one anticipated the repetition of the horrors of a proscription. His enemies, especially Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and some other of the friends of the latter, increased these apprehensions by false reports in order to excite the people against him; for Augustus was detained for some time at Brundisium by a fresh attack of illness. But he pacified the minds of the people by a letter which he wrote to the senate. These circumstances not only prevented for the present his undertaking anything fresh against Sext. Pompeius, but occasioned a new and unexpected war. On his arrival at Rome, Augustus found that Fulvia had been spreading these reports, and he sent to Rome, in the stead of one of his clients, her brother-in-law, from the army of Cleopatra, and that L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, was used by her as an instrument to gain her objects. Augustus did all he could to avoid a rupture, but in vain. L. Antonius assembled an army at Praeneste, with which he threw himself into the fortified town of Perusia, where he was blockaded by Augustus with three armies, so that a fearful famine arose in the place. This happened towards the end of n. c. 41. After several attempts to break through the blockading armies, L. Antonius was obliged to surrender. The citizens of Perusia obtained pardon from Augustus, but the senators were put to death, and from three to four hundred noble Perusines were butchered on the 15th of March, n. c. 40, on the altar of Caesar. Fulvia fled to Greece, and Tiberius Nero, with his wife Livia, to Pompeius in Sicily and thence to Antony, who blamed the authors of the war, probably for no other reason but because it had been unsuccessful. Antony, however, sailed with his fleet to Brundisium, and preparations for war were made on both sides, but the news of the death of Fulvia in Greece accelerated a peace, which was concluded at Brundisium, between the two triumvirs. A new division of the provinces was again made: Augustus obtained all the parts of the empire west of the town of Scaura in Illyricum, and Antony the eastern provinces, while Italy was to belong to them in common. Antony also formed an engagement with Cleopatra, married Octavia, the sister of Augustus and widow of C. Marcellus, in order to confirm the new friendship. The marriage was celebrated at Rome. Sext. Pompeius, who had had no share in these transactions, continued to cut off the provisions of Rome, which was suffering greatly from scarcity: scenes of violence and outrage at Rome showed the exasperation of the people. Augustus could not hope to satiate the Romans unless their most urgent wants were satisfied by sufficient supplies of food, and this could not be effected in any other way but by a reconciliation with Pompeius. Augustus had an interview with him on the coast of Misenum, in n. c. 39, at which Pompeius received the proconsulship and the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, together with the province of Achaea. In return for these concessions he was to provide Italy with corn. In order to convince the Romans of the sincerity of his intentions, Augustus be­ trothed M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia and step­ son of Antony, who was present on this occasion, to a daughter of Pompeius. Peace seemed now to be restored everywhere. Antony returned to the East, where his generals had been successful, and Augustus too received favourable news from his lieutenants in Spain and Gaul. Augustus, however, was anxious for an opportunity of a war, by which he might deprive Sext. Pompeius of the provinces which had been ceded to him at Misenum. A pretext was soon found in the fact, that Pompeius allowed piracy to go on in the Mediterranean. Augustus solicited the aid of the two other triumvirs, but they did not support him; and Antony was in reality glad to see Augustus engaged in a struggle in which he was sure to suffer. The fleet of Augustus suffered greatly from storms and the activity of Demochares, the admiral of Pompeius; but the latter did not follow up the advantages he had gained, and Augustus returned to Italy to repair his ships, and send Mace­ enas to Antony to invite him again to take part in the war. Antony hereupon sailed to Tarentum, in the beginning of the year 37, with 300 ships; but, on his arrival there, Augustus had changed his mind, and declined the assistance. This conduct exasperated Antony; but his wife, Octavia, acted as mediator; the two triumvirs met between Tarentum and Metapontum, and the urgent necessity of the times compelled them to lay aside their mutual mistrust. Augustus promised an army to Antony for his Parthian war, while Antony sent 120 ships to increase the fleet of Augustus, and both agreed to prolong their office of triumvirs for five years longer. While Antony hastened to Syria, Octavia remained with her brother. Soon after this, M. Vipsanius Agrippa received the command of the fleet of Augustus, and in July of the year 36, Sicily was attacked on all sides; but storms compelled the fleet of Augustus to return, and Lepidus alone succeeded in landing at Lilybeum. Pompeius remained in his usual inactivity; in a sea-fight off Mylne he lost thirty ships, and Augustus landed at Tauromenium. Agrippa at last, in a decisive naval battle, put an end to the contest, and Pompeius fled to Asia. Lepidus, who had on all occasions been treated with neglect, now wanted to take Sicily for himself; but Augustus easily gained over his troops, and Lepidus himself submitted. He was sent to Rome by Augustus, and resided there for the remainder of his life as pontifex maximus. The forces which Augustus had under his command now amounted, according to Appian, to forty-five legions, independent of the light-armed troops and the cavalry, and to 600 ships. Augustus rewarded his soldiers with garlands and money, and promised still further rewards; but the veterans insisted upon their dismissal, and upon receiving (at once) the lands and all the sums that had been promised them. Augustus quelled the rebellion in its commencement by severity combined with liberality: he dismissed the veterans who had fought at Mutina and Philippi, and ordered them to quit Sicily immediately, that their disposition might not spread further among the soldiers. The latter were satisfied with the promises of Augustus, which he fulfilled at the expense of Sicily, and lands were assigned to the veterans in Campania. Augustus now sent back the ships of Antony, and took possession of Africa. The Roman senate hastened to honour the conqueror in the most extravagant manner; and when he approached the city, which Maccenas had governed during his absence, the senate and people flocked out to meet him. Augustus addressed the senate in a very modest manner, and declined some of the distinctions which were offered him. He celebrated his ovation on the 13th of November, B.C. 36. The abundant supply of provisions which was now brought to Rome satisfied the wants and wishes of the people; and as this happy state of things was the result of his victory, his interests coincided with those of the people, whose burdens were also lessened in various ways.

By the conquest of two of his rivals, Augustus had now acquired strength enough to enter upon the contest with the third. He first endeavoured, however, as much as was in his power, to remedy the confusion and demoralisation in which Italy had been involved in consequence of the civil wars, and he pretended only to wait for the arrival of his colleague in order to withdraw with him into private life, as the peace of the republic was now restored. This pretended self-denial did not remain unrewarded, for the people elected him pontifex maximus, though Lepidus, who held this office, was yet alive; and the senate decreed, that he should inhabit a public building, that his person should be consulted, and that he should sit by the side of the tribunes. Augustus took every opportunity of praising and supporting his absent colleague, Antony, and by this stratagem the Romans gradually became convinced, that if new disputes should break out between them, the fault could not possibly lie with Augustus. But matters did not yet come to this: the most urgent thing was to keep his troops engaged, and to acquire funds for paying them. After suppressing a mutiny among the insolent veterans, he prepared for a campaign against some tribes on the north-eastern coast of the Adriatic, of which the Romans had never become complete masters, and which from time to time refused to pay their tribute. Augustus marched along the coast, without meeting with much resistance, until he came near the country of the Japydes: their capital Metulum was strongly fortified and garrisoned; but the perseverance of Augustus and the courage of his troops compelled the garrison to surrender, and the place was changed into a heap of ashes by the brave Japydes themselves (B.C. 33). As the season of the year was not yet much advanced, Augustus undertook a campaign against the Pannonians in Segestica. After several engagements during their march through the country, the Romans appeared before the town of Segesin, which, after a siege of thirty days, sued for pardon. Augustus, to suit his own purposes, imposed only a fine upon the inhabitants, and leaving his legate Fufius Cestius behind with a garrison of twenty-five cohorts, he returned to Rome. Octavia had in the meantime been repudiated by Antony; and at the request of Augustus the senate declared Octavia and Livia inviolable, and granted them the right of conducting their own affairs without any male assistance—an apparent preparation for the insult offered to Octavia by her husband, but in reality a means of keeping the recollection of it alive. Augustus intended next to make an expedition against Britain, but the news of fresh revolts in the countries from which he had just returned, altered his plan. His generals soon restored peace, but he himself went to Dalmatia, where Agrippa had the command. Several towns were taken, and neither life nor property was spared. Augustus penetrated as far as Scetovia, where he was wounded in his knee. After his recovery, he gave the command to Statilius Taurus, and returned to Rome to undertake the consulship for the year B.C. 33, which he entered upon on the 1st of January together with L. Volcacius Tullus, and laid down on the same day, under the pretext of the Dalmatian war, though his presence there was no longer necessary, since Statilius Taurus had already completed the defeat of the Dalmatians. Out of the spoils made in this war Augustus erected a portico called, after his sister, Octavia. During this year, Agrippa was sedile, and did all he could to gain popularity for his friend Augustus and himself, and Augustus also made several very useful regulations.

Meantime the arbitrary and arrogant proceedings of Antony in the East were sufficient of themselves to point him out to the Romans as an enemy of the republic, but Augustus did not neglect to direct attention secretly to his follies. Letters now passed between the two triumvirs full of mutual criminations; and Antony already purchased from Artavasdes cavalry for the impending war against his colleague. The rupture between the two triumvirs was mainly brought about by the jealousy and ambition of Cleopatra. During the year B.C. 32, while Cleopatra kept Antony in a perpetual state of intoxication, Augustus had time to convince the Romans that the heavy sacrifices he demanded of them were to be made on their own behalf only, as Italy had to fear everything from Antony. War was now declared against Cleopatra, for Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. In B.C. 31, Augustus was consul for the third time with M. Valerius Messalla. Rome was in a state of great excitement and alarm, and all classes had to make extraordinary exertions. An attempt of Augustus to attack his enemy during the winter was frustrated by storms; but, in the spring, his fleet, under the command of the able Actian, spread over the whole of the eastern part of the Adriatic, and Augustus himself with his legions landed in Epeirus. Antony and Cleopatra took their station near the promontory of Actium in Aegaea. Their fleet had no able rowers, and everything depended upon the courage of the soldiers and the size of their ships. Some persons ventured to doubt the safety of entering upon a sea-fight, but Cleopatra's opinion prevailed, and the battle of Actium was fought in September, 31. As soon as the queen observed that victory was not certain on her side, she took to flight, and Antony soon followed her. His fleet fought in vain to the last, and, after a long hesitation, the land forces surrendered.

The danger which had threatened to bring Rome under the dominion of an eastern queen was thus removed, the ambition of Augustus was satisfied, and his generosity met with general admiration. After the battle of Actium, he proceeded westward through Greece and Asia Minor, to the eastern Asia, where he entered on his fourth consulship for the year B.C. 30, and passed the winter at Samos. The confidence of his army in him grew with his success, but the veterans again showed symptoms of discontent, and demanded the fulfilment of the promises made to them. Soon after, they broke out into open rebellion, and Augustus hastened from Samos to remedy the evil in person. It was with great difficulty that he escaped the storms and arrived at Brundusium. Here he was met by the Roman senators, equites, and a great number of the people, which emboldened him to ask for their assistance to pay his soldiers. His requests were readily complied with, and he was enabled to follow his march towards the veterans, and assigned lands to them in various parts of the empire. Without going to Rome, he soon after sailed to Corinth, Rhodes, Syria, and Egypt. Cleopatra negotiated with Augustus to betray Antony; but when she found that Augustus only wanted to spare her that she might adorn his triumph, she put an end to her life. [ANTONIUS, No. 12.]

Egypt was made a Roman province, and the booty which Augustus obtained was so immense, that he could easily satisfy the demands of his army. At Rome the senate and people railed each other in devising new honours and distinctions for Augustus, who was now alone at the head of the Roman world. In Samos he entered upon his fifth consulship for the year B.C. 29. The senate sanctioned all his acts, and conferred upon him many extraordinary rights and privileges. The temple of Janus was closed, as peace was restored throughout the empire. In August of the same year, Augustus returned to Rome, and celebrated his threefold triumph over the Pannomians and Dalmatians, Antony and Egypt; and he obtained the title of imperator for ever.

After these solemnities were over, Augustus undertook the consularship for the year 28 together with his friend Agrippa. He was determined from the first not to lay down the power which his own successes and the circumstances of the times had placed in his hands, although he occasionally pretended that he would resign it. He first directed his attention to the restoration of order in all parts of the government; and, as he was invested with the censorship, he began by clearing the senate of all unworthy members; he ejected two hundred senators, and also raised the senatorial census; but where a worthy senator's property did not come up to the new standard, he very liberally made it up out of his own means. He raised many plebeian families to the rank of patricians; and as he had a predilection for ancient, especially religious, institutions, he restored several temples which had fallen into decay, and also built new ones. The keeping of the seannium was transferred from the quaestors to the praetors and ex-praetors. After having introduced these and many other useful changes, he proposed in the senate to lay down his powers, but allowed himself to be prevailed upon to remain at the head of affairs for ten years longer. This plan was afterwards repeated several times, and he apparently allowed himself to be always persuaded to retain his power either for ten or five years longer. He next made a division of the provinces, leaving the quiet and peaceful ones to the senate, and retaining for himself those which required personal care. The administration of the former was given every year by the senate to proconsuls, while Augustus placed the others under legati Caesaris, sometimes also called propraetors, whom he appointed at any time he pleased. He declined all honours and distinctions which were calculated to remind the Romans of kingly power; he preferred allowing the republican forms to continue, in order that he might imperceptibly concentrate in his own person all the powers which had hitherto been separated. He accepted, however, the name of Augustus, which was offered to him on the proposal of L. Munatius Plancus. In B.C. 29 he entered upon his eleventh consulship, but laid it down immediately after the elections; but afterwards entered upon the principate, which was offered him by the senate, he accepted the imperium proconsulare and the tribunitia potestas for life, by which his inviolability was legally established, while by the imperium proconsulare he became the highest authority in all the Roman provinces. When in B.C. 12 Lepidus, the pontifex maximus, died, Augustus, on whom the title of chief pontiff had been conferred on a former occasion, entered upon the office itself.

Thus he became the high priest of the state, and obtained the highest influence over all the other colleges of priests. Although he had thus united in his own person all the great offices of state, yet he was too prudent to assume exclusively the titles of all of them, or to shew to the Romans that he was the sole master. Other persons were accordingly allowed to hold the consulsip, praetorship, and other public offices; but these offices were in reality mere forms and titles, like the new offices which he created to reward his friends and partisans. Augustus assumed nothing of the outward appearance of a monarch: he retained the simple mode of living of an ordinary citizen, continued his familiar intimacy with his friends, and appeared in public without any pomp or pageantry; a kingly court, in our sense of the word, did not exist at all in the reign of Augustus.

His relation to the senate was at first rather undefined: in B.C. 28 he had been made princeps senatus, but in the beginning of the year 24 he was exempted by the senate from all the laws of the state. During the latter years of his life Augustus seldom attended the meetings of the senate, but formed a sort of privy council, consisting of twenty senators, with whom he discussed the most important political matters. Augustus had no ministers, in our sense of the word; but on state matters, which he did not choose to be discussed in public, he consulted his personal friends, C. Cilnius Maecenas, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, M. Valerius Messallai Corvinus, and Asinius Pollio, all of whom contributed, each in his way, to increase the splendour of the capital and the welfare of the empire. The people retained their republican privileges, though they were mere forms: they still met in their assemblies, and elected consuls and other magistrates; but only such persons were elected as had been proposed or recommended by the emperor. The almost uninterrupted festivities, games, and distributions of corn, and the like, made the people forget the substance of their republican freedom; and they were ready to serve him who fed them most liberally: the population of the city was then little better than a mob.

It was a necessary consequence of the dominion acquired by force of arms, that standing armies (civitas stativa) were kept on the frontiers of the empire, as on the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates, which in many instances became the foundations of flourishing towns. The veterans were distributed into a number of colonies. For the protection of his own person, Augustus established ten praetorian cohorts, consisting of one thousand men each, which were placed under the command of two equites with the title of praefecti praetorio. For the purpose of maintaining order and security in the city, he instituted a sort of police, under the name of colones urbanae, which were under the command of the praefectus urbi. The fleets were stationed at Ravenna, Misenum, and in various ports of the provinces. In the division of the provinces which Augustus had made in n. c. 27, especial regulations were made to secure strict justice in their administration; in consequence of which many, especially those which were not oppressed by armies, enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Egypt was governed in a manner different from that of all other provinces. The division of the provinces was necessarily followed by a change in the administration of the finances, which were in a bad condition, partly in consequence of the civil wars, and partly through all the domain lands in Italy having been assigned to the veterans. The system of taxation was revised, and the taxes increased. The senatorium, out of which the senate defrayed the public expenses, was separated from the fiscus, the funds of the emperor, out of which he paid his armies.

Augustus enacted several laws to improve the moral condition of the Romans, and to secure the public peace and safety. Thus he made several regulations to prevent the recurrence of scarcity and famine, promoted industry, and constructed roads and other works of public utility. The large sums of money which were put into circulation revived commerce and industry, from which the eastern provinces especially and Egypt derived great advantages.

Although Augustus, who must have been startled and frightened by the murder of Caesar, treated the Romans with extreme caution and mildness, and endeavoured to keep out of sight every thing that might show him in the light of a sovereign, yet several conspiracies against his life reminded him that there were still persons of a republican spirit. It will be sufficient here to mention the names of the leaders of these conspiracies,—M. Lepidus, L. Murena, Fannius Caspio, and Cornelius Cimna, who were treated of in separate articles.

After this brief sketch of the internal affairs of the Roman empire during the reign of Augustus, it only remains to give some account of the wars in which he himself took part. Most of them were conducted by his friends and relations, and need not be noticed here. On the whole, we may remark, that the wars of the reign of Augustus were not wars of aggression, but chiefly undertaken to secure the Roman dominion and to protect the frontiers, which were now more exposed than before to the hostile inroads of barbarians. In n. c. 27, Augustus sent M. Crassus to check the incursions of the Dacians, Bastarnians, and Moesians on the Danube; and, in the same year, he himself went to Gaul and Spain, and began the conquest of the warlike Cantabri and Asturii, whose subjugation, however, was not completed till n. c. 19 by Agrippa. During this campaign Augustus founded several towns for his veterans, such as Augusta Emerita and Caesar Augusta. In n. c. 21 Augustus travelled through Sicily and Greece, and spent the winter following at Samos. After this, he went to Syria at the invitation of Tigrdates, who had been expelled from his kingdom of Parthia. The ruling king, Phraates, for fear of the Romans, sent back the standards and prisoners which had been taken from Crassus and Antony. Towards the end of the year 20, Augustus returned to Samos, to spend the approaching winter there. Here ambassadors from India appeared before him, with presents from their king, Pandion, to confirm the friendship which had been sought on a former occasion. In the autumn of n. c. 19, he returned to Rome, where new honours and distinctions were conferred upon him. His vanity was so much gratified at those bloodless victories which he had obtained in Syria and Samos, that he struck medals to commemorate them, and afterwards dedicated the standards which he had received from Phraates in the new temple of Mars Ultor. In n. c. 18, the imperium of Augustus was prolonged for five years, and about the same time he increased the number of senators to 600. The wars in Armenia, in the Alps, and on the Lower Rhine, were conducted by his generals with varying success. In n. c. 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; and Augustus, who thought the danger greater than it really was, went himself to Gaul, and spent two years there, to regulate the government of that province, and to make the necessary preparations for defending it against the Germans. In n. c. 13 he returned to Rome, leaving the protection of the frontier on the Rhine to his step-son, Drusus Nero. In n. c. 9 he again went to Gaul, where he received German ambassadors, who sued for peace; but he treacherously detained them, and distributed them in the towns of Gaul, where they put an end to their lives in despair. Towards the end of this year, he returned to Rome with Tiberius and Drusus. From this time forward, Augustus does not appear to have again taken any active part in the wars that were carried on. Those in Germany were the most formidable, and lasted longer than the reign of Augustus.

In A. D. 13, Augustus, who had then reached his 75th year, again undertook the government of the empire for ten years longer; but he threw some part of the burden upon his adopted son and successor, Tiberius, by making him his colleague. In the year following, A. D. 14, Tiberius was to undertake a campaign in Illyricum, and Augustus, though he was bowed down by old age, by domestic misfortunes and cares of every kind, accompanied him as far as Naples. On his return, he was taken ill at Nola, and died there on the 19th of August, A. D. 14, at the age of 76. When he felt his end approaching, he is said to have asked his friends who were present whether he had not acted his part well. He died very gently in the arms of his wife, Livia, who kept the event secret, until Tibie-

AVIANUS.

Our space does not allow us here to enter into a critical examination of the character of Augustus; what he did is recorded in history, and public opinion in his own time praised him for it as an excellent prince and statesman; the investigation of the hidden motives of his actions is such a delicate subject, that both ancient and modern writers have advanced the most opposite opinions, and both supported by strong arguments. The main difficulty lies in the question, whether his government was the fruit of his honest intentions and wishes, or whether it was merely a means of satisfying his own ambition and love of dominion; in other words, whether he was a straightforward and honest man, or a most consummate hypocrite. Thus much is certain, that his reign was a period of happiness for Italy and the provinces, and that it removed the causes of future civil wars. Previous to the victory of Actium his character is less a matter of doubt, and there we find sufficient proofs of his cruelty, selfishness, and faithlessness towards his friends. He has sometimes been charged with cowardice, but, so far as military courage is concerned, the charge is unfounded.

(The principal ancient sources concerning the life and reign of Augustus are: Sueton. Augustus; Nicolaus Damasc. De Vita Augusti; Dion Cassius, xlv. 41; Tacitus, Annal. i.; Cicero's Epistles and Philippics; Vell. Pat. ii. 59—124; Plut. Antonius. Besides the numerous modern works on the History of Rome, we refer especially to A. Weichert, Imperatoris Caesarii Augusti Scriptorum Helvetarum, Fasc. i.; Grimm, 1841, 4to., which contains an excellent account of the youth of Augustus and his education; Drumm, Geschichte Roaus, vol. iv. pp. 245—302, who treats of his history down to the battle of Actium; Loebell, Uber das Principat des Augustus, in Rauher's Historisches Taschenbuch, Stehr, Jahrgang, 1884; Karl Hoell, Römische Geschichte vom Verfall der Republik bis zur Vollendung der Monarchie unter Constantino, i. pp. 214—421.)

The manuscript text continues with historical and biographical information about Augustus, his reign, and the historical context in which he lived. It mentions various authors and their works, such as Suetonius, Tacitus, Cicero, and Plutarch, who provided accounts of Augustus' life and reign. The text discusses Augustus' character, particularly his reputation for cruelty and faithlessness. It also notes the positive impact of his reign on the stability of Italy and the provinces, although it acknowledges the darker aspects of his rule, particularly during the time of the civil wars.

COIN OF AUGUSTUS.

AVIANUS, M. AEMILIUS, a friend of Cicero, and the patron of Avianus Evander and Avianus Hammonius. (Cie. ad Fam. xiii. 2, 21, 27.)

AVIANUS, FLAVIUS, the author of a collection of forty-two Aesopic fables in Latin elegiac verse, dedicated to a certain Theodotus, who is addressed as a man of great learning and highly cultivated mind. The designation of this writer appears under a number of different shapes in different MSS., such as Avianus, Aelianus, Aelibius, Abienus, and Avenius, from which last form he was by many of the earlier historians of Roman literature, such as Vossius and Funckius, identified with the geographical poet, Rufus Festus Avienus. [AVIENUS.] But, independent of the circumstance that no fact except this resemblance of name can be adduced in support of such an opinion, the argument derived from the style of these compositions must, to every reader of taste and discrimination, appear conclusive. Nothing can be imagined more unlike the vigorous, bold, spirited, and highly embellished rotundity which characterizes the Descriptio Orbis and the Aetna than the feeble, hesitating, dull meagreness of the fabulist. Making all allowances for numerous corruptions in the text, we can scarcely regard these pieces in any other light than as the early effusions of some unpractised youth, who patched very unskilfully expressions borrowed from the purer classics, especially Virgil, upon the loose frame of an unlettered age. Cæmægiærii, in his erudite but most tedious dissertation, has toiled unsuccessfully to prove that Avianus flourished under the Antonines. Wernsdorf, again, places him towards the end of the fourth century, adopting the views of those who believe that the Theodosian of the dedication may be Aurelius Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius, the grammarian, and adding the conjecture, that the Flavianus of the Saturnalia may have been corrupted by transcribers into Fl. Avianus. These are mere guesses, and may be taken for what they are worth. Judging from the language, and we have nothing else whatever to guide us, we should feel inclined to assign him to the end of the first century A.D.

AVIANUS was first printed independently by Jan. de Breda, at Deventer in Holland, in the year 1494, 4to., Gothic characters, under the title "Apologia Aviani civis Romani adolescentis ad mores et Latinum sermonem cepessendos utilissimam," but the editio princeps is appended to the fables of Aesop which appeared about 1490. The earlier editions contain only twenty-seven fables; the whole forty-two were first published by Rigaltius, along with Aesop and other opuscula (16mo. Lugd. 1570). The most complete edition is that of Cannegien, 8vo. Amstel. 1751, which was followed by those of Nodell, 8vo. Amstel. 1787, and of C. H. Taschuck, 12mo. Lips. 1790.

"The fables of Avian translated into English" are to be found at the end of "The Subby Histories and Fables of Oesop, translated out of Frenshye into Englyshe, by William Caxton at Westmonary, in the yere of our lorde MCCC XXXXIII," &c. Engraved by the same the xxxv day of March the yere of our lord MCCC XXXXIII, and the first yere of the regne of kyng Richard the thryde," folio. This book was reprinted by Pynson. We have a translation into Italian by Giov. Gris. Trombéli, 8vo. Venez. 1735; and into German by H. Fr. Kerler, in his Rom. Polecidetic, Stuttgart, 1838. (Vossius, de Poeta Latt. p. 50; Funckius, de Vogata L. L. Senev. cap. iii. § iv.; Barth. Adversar. xix. 24, xxvii. 3, xxxv. 7 and 13, xlv. 4, 7, 16; Wernsdorf, Poett. Latt. Min. vol. v. pars. ii. p. 668, who effectually destroys the leading argument of Cannegiærii that Avianus must be intermediate between Phaedrus and Titianus, upon which idea the hypothesis that he lived under the Antonines rests.) AVIANUS, LAETUS, the name prefixed to an epigram in bad Latin, comprised in three elegiac distichs, on the famous work of Martinius Capella. The subject proves that it cannot be earlier than the end of the fifth century. (Burman, Antholog. Add. i. p. 738, or Ep. n. 553, ed. Meyer; Barth. Adversar. xviii. 21.)

C. AVIUSUS, tribune of the soldiers of the tenth legion, was ignominiously dismissed from the army, on account of misconduct in the African war, B.C. 46. (Hirt, B. Afr. 46.)

AVIUSUS, RUFUS FESTUS. The following poems are ascribed to an author bearing this name:

1. Descriptio Orbis Terrae, or, as it is variously entitled in different editions and MSS., Meteoresi Phlegonii Latinized—Sume de Phlegonia Orbis—in 1385, 4840, 7059 lines, derived directly from the Phlegonius of Dionysius, and containing a succinct account of the most remarkable objects in the physical and political geography of the known world. It adheres too closely in some places, and departs too widely in others, from the text of the Alexandrian, to be called with propriety a translation, or even a paraphrase, and still less does it deserve to be regarded as an independent work, but approaches more nearly to our modern idea of a new edition compiled in certain passages, enlarged in others, and altered throughout. These changes can hardly be considered as improvements, for not unfrequently the anxiety of the writer to expand and embellish his original has made him wander into extravagance and error, while on the other hand the fear of becoming prolix and tedious has led to injurious curtailments, and induced him to omit the names of nations and districts which ought not to have been passed over. Nor does he attempt to correct the mistakes of his predecessor, nor to take advantage of those stores of knowledge which must have been available at the period when he lived; but the blunders and follies of the old Greek poets, who were profoundly ignorant of all the regions to the West and North of their own country, are explicitly followed, and many things set down which every well-informed man under the empire must have known to be absurd. There is, however, a considerable energy and liveliness of style, which animates the inherent dulness of the undertaking and carries the reader through the whole, while much ingenuity is displayed in varying the expression of constantly-recurring ideas.

2. Ora Maritima, a fragment in 703 Iambic trimeters. The plan comprehended a full delineation of the shores of the Mediterranean, together with those of the Euxine and sea of Azov, and a portion of the Atlantic without the pillars of Hercules; but we know not if this design was ever fully carried out, for the portion which has been preserved is confined almost entirely to the coast stretching from Marseilles to Cadiz. The author professed to have commenced the essay in order to satisfy the intelligent inquiries of a youth named Phoebus, to whom it is addressed, with regard to the geography of the Pontus and the Mazetic Gulf; but if intended for the purposes of instruction, it is impossible to imagine any task executed in a less satisfactory manner. There is an absence of all order and arrangement. Instead of advancing steadily in a given direction, we are carried backwards and forwards, transported abruptly from one spot to another at a great distance, and brought again and again to the same point without completing any circuit, besides being distressed with discussions on localities and objects totally foreign to the matter in hand. Moreover, the different nations and districts are distinguished by their ancient and forgotten names, instead of those by which they were actually known at the time when this guide-book was composed, and all the old and exploded fantasies of half mythical geography revived and gravely propounded. We are led almost irresistibly to the conclusion, that Aviusus, possessing no practical or scientific acquaintance with his subject, had read a number of conflicting accounts of the countries in question, written in former times by persons who were as ignominious himself, and had combined and pieced them together in the hope of elaborating a consistent whole,—neglecting with strange perversity the numerous sources of accurate information opened up by the wars so long waged and the dominion so long exercised by his countrymen in those regions.

3. Aratea Phenomena, and Aratea Prognostica, both in Hexameter verse, the first containing 1325, the second 558 lines. They bear exactly the same relation to the well known works of Aratus as the Descriptio Orbis Terrae does to that of Dionysius. The general arrangement of the Greek original is followed throughout, and several of the verses are translated almost literally into the versions of Cicero and Germanicus, but on the other hand many of the mythical legends are expanded, new tales are introduced, and extempts from the works of celebrated astronomers, scraps of Pythagorean philosophy, and fragments of Egyptian superstition, are combined and worked up with the materials of the old fabric. The result is much more successful than in the two efforts previously examined. Here there was more room for the imagination to disport itself unencumbered with dry details and stubborn facts, and accordingly the interest is well sustained and the flowing and spirited style of the poet appears to great advantage.

4. Three short fugitive pieces, the first addressed to a friend, Floreos Myrmeneus, V. C., requesting a gift of some pomegranates from his estates in Africa, in order to remove an attack of bile and indigestion; the second, De Casta Sirenum, or Sirenum Allegoria, on the allusions of the daughters of Aechelous and the device by which Ulysses escaped their wiles; the third, Ad Amicos de Agro, enumerating the various occupations which by turns occupied the time and engaged the attention of the writer each day when living in country retirement.

We must remark, that while we can scarcely entertain a doubt that the two Geographical Essays are from the same pen, especially since in the second (I. 71) we find a direct reference to the first, we have no external evidence connecting them with the others, except the fact, that the same name is prefixed in all MSS. to the whole, with the exception of the 2nd and 3rd epigrams. But, on the other hand, the style, manner, and phraseology of the Aratean poems correspond so exactly with what we observe in the rest, that scholars in general have no hesitated in the arrangement which assigns the whole to one person. They evidently belong to an epoch when Latin literature, although fast verging to old age, was still fresh and hale, and far from being pampered by infirmities;—we still perceive with pleasure a force and freedom of expression in strong contrast with the inflated freeness and unasy stiffness which marked the last period of decay.

Assuming that the astronomical Avienus is the same with the geographical Avienus, we can at once determine approximately the age to which he belongs; for Jerome, in his commentary on the Epistle of St. Paul to Titus, mentions that the quotation by the Apostle, in the xvii. chapter of the Acts, "Tωσιν οὖν τοὺς συνεργάζεσθε," is to be found in the Phaenomena of Aratus, "quem Cicero in Latinum sermonem translatus, et Germanicus Caesar, et nuper Avienus." Now Jerome died in 420; the Latin version of this passage was made in 140 a.d., infinitely super, we may with tolerable certainty place Avienus in the latter half of the fourth century, under Valens, the Valentinians, Gratian, and Theodosius, or even somewhat earlier, under Constantine and Julian. Our next step leads us upon ground much less firm, but we may venture yet a little further. An inscription, discovered originally, we are told, in the church of St. Nicholas, of the Fuscibates, at Rome, and afterwards deposited in the Villa Casaurina, has been published by Fabretti and others, and will be found in Burnmann's Anthologia. (I. 79, or Ep. n. 278, ed. Meyer.) It bears as a title R. Fuscus V. C. Dec. Sen Avianus. The date is surprising, and the author of many poems (carmena multa serenas); the name follows a sort of epitaph in four lines, inscribed by Placidus, apparently the son of the above personage, to the sacred memory of his sire. Vernard and others have at once pronounced without hesitation, that the Festus who here calls himself descendant of Musonius and son of Avienus, for such is undoubtedly the true meaning of the word, must be the same with our Rufus Festus Avienus. The proof adduced, when carefully sifted, amounts to this:—

1. It is probable that the ancestor here referred to may be C. Musonius Rufus, the celebrated Stoic and intimate friend of Apollonius of Tyana. He was exiled by Nero, patronized by Vespasian, and is frequently mentioned by the writers who treat of this period. This idea receives confirmation from the circumstance that Tacitus and Philostratus both represent Musonius as a Tuscan, and Suidas expressly asserts that he was a native of Vulsini. We thus fully establish an identity of name between our Rufus Festus Avienus, and the same Rufus, at any rate his memory, and our Avienus, and can explain satisfactorily how the appellation Rufus came into the family.

2. From two laws in the Codex of Justinian (see Gothofred, Prosopogr. Cod. Theod.), it appears that a certain Festus was proconsul of Africa in the years 366 and 367, which agrees with the age we have assigned to our Avienus from St. Jerome, and an inscription is extant (Boeckh, Inscr. Graec. i. p. 459) commemorating the gratitude of the Athenians towards Poëfios Φιστως, proconsul of Greece. Now the editor of Dionysius and Aratus must have been a Greek scholar, and we gather from some lines in the Descriptio that he had repeatedly visited Delphi in person; thus he may be this very Poëfios Φιστως, and the two proconsular appointments are in this way determined. 3. The words "carmena multa serenas" point out a similarity of taste and occupation. 4. Lastly, in the epitaph by Placidus we detect an expression, "Jupiter nosteram (Pantiti, Festi tibi)," which seems to allude directly to the second line of the Phaenomena, "excellam resem Jupiter netheram," although this may be merely an accidental resemblance. It will be seen that the evidence requires a good deal of hypothetical patching to enable it to hang together at all, and by no means justifies the undoubting confidence of Wernsdorff; but, at the same time, we can scarcely refuse to acknowledge the impressiveness of the argument.

We need scarcely notice the opinion of some early critics, that Avienus was a Spaniard, since it avowedly rests upon the consideration, that the fragment of the Ora Maritimae which has been preserved is devoted chiefly to the coast of Spain, and contains quotations from the works of Himilco and the Carthaginian annalists with regard to that country and the shores of the Atlantic. To refute such arguments would be almost as idle as to invent them. Nor need we treat with greater respect the assertion that he was a Christian. Not a line can be quoted which would appear to any reasonable man favourable to such a notion; but, on the contrary, wherever he speaks of the Pagan gods we find that he expresses in very unequivocal language a marked reverence for their worship. There is little to be said either for or against the idea, that he is the young Avienus introduced by Macrobius in the Saturnalia as talking with Symmachus. So far as dates are concerned there is no anachronism involved, but the name was very common, and we have no doubt to guide us to any conclusion.

Servius, in his commentary on Virgil (x. 388), speaks of an Avienus who had turned the whole of Virgil and Livy into Iambics (qui totum Virgilium et Liviam lambes scripsit), and refers to him again (x. 272) as the person "qui iambic scriptor Virgili fabulas." We cannot doubt that Livy the historian must be indicated here, for he was by so much the most celebrated of all authors bearing that appellation, that a grammarian like Servius would scarcely have failed to add a distinguishing epithet had any other Livy been meant. There is no difficulty in believing the operation to have been performed upon Virgil, for we know that such conversions were common exercises during the decline of literature, and Suidas tells us in particular of a certain Marianus, in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, who turned the doxologies of Theocritus, Apollonius, Callicles, and others, into iambic measures.

Lastly, all scholars now admit that there are no grounds for supposing, that the prose treatises "Breviarium de Victoris ac Provincialis Populi Romani ad Valentinianum Augustum," ascribed to a Sextus Rufus or Rufus Festus, and the topographi cal compendium "Sexti Rufi de Regionibus Urbis Romae," belong to Avienus, as was at one time maintained; while the poem "De Urbibus Hispanicis Mediterraneis," quoted as his work by several Spaniards, is now known to be a forgery, executed in all probability by a certain Hieronymus Romanus, a Jesuit of Toledo, who was notorious for such frauds.

The Edito Princeps of Avienus was printed at Venes in Roman characters, by Antonius de AVITUS.

Strate, under the care of Victor Pisanius, in 4to., and bears the date of 25th October (8Kal. Nov.), 1488. It contains the Descriptio Orbis Terrae, the Ora Maritima, the Aratea, and the epigram addressed to Plautinae Myrmexii; besides which we find in the same volume the translation of Aratus by Cicero and Germanicus, and the verses of Virgil, a Sorcery of Salmurcian on the cure of Diseases.

The most useful edition is to be found in the second part of the fifth volume of the Poetae Latini Minores of Weidrusch, which, however, does not include the Aratea, Weidrusch not having lived to complete his work. But this last piece also, which was carefully edited by Buhi and placed at the end of his Aratus, is given in the French reprint of Weidrusch (1825), which forms a portion of the collection of Latin classics published at Paris by Lemaire. [W. R.]

AVIOLA, the name of a family of the Aclibus gens, which is not mentioned till the very end of the republic.

1. M. AELIUS AVIOLA, consul successus in B.C. 33, from the 1st of July, is probably the same Aviolo who is said to have come to life again on the funeral pile, when it was supposed that he was dead, but to have been nevertheless burnt to death, because the flames could not be extinguished. (Plin. H. N. viii. 52, 53; Val. Max. i. 3. § 12.)

2. AELIUS AVIOLA, legate of Gallia Lugdunensis under Tiberius, put down an outbreak of the Andecavi and Turoni, in A.D. 21. (Tac. Ann. iii. 41.)

3. M. AELIUS AVIOLA, consul in the last year of the reign of Claudius, A.D. 54. (Tac. Ann. xii. 64; Suet. Claud. 45.)

AVITIANUS, son of Julius Asonius and Aemilia Asonia, was a young man of great promise, who was being brought up to follow his father's profession as a physician, but died at an early age, in the fourth century after Christ. He was a younger brother of the poet Ausonius, who in one of his poems (Parent. xiii.) laments his premature death, and gives the above particulars of his life. [W. A. G.]

AVITUS, ALCTIMUS ECDIClius (or ECDIC­DIUS), son of Isiscius, archbishop of Vienne, was born about the middle of the 5th century. From his earliest years he is said to have devoted himself to literature, and to have given promise of that erudition which subsequently gained for him, among his countrymen at least, the reputation of being the most profound and eloquent scholar of his age. After bestowing an ample endowment on the poor, he retired into the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, close to the walls of his native city, and remained in the seclusion of the cloister until the death of his father (in A.D. 499), whom he succeeded in the archiepiscopal dignity. His fame as a pious and charitable priest and a powerful controversyist now rose very high. He took part in the celebrated conference at Lyons between the Arians and the Catholic bishops, held in the presence of the Burgundian king, where, as we are told, he silenced the heretics and brought back many wavering to the bosom of the church. Guin­debal himself is said to have yielded to his arguments, although from political motives he refused to recant his errors openly; and all agree, that after his death his son Sigismund publicly declared his adherence to the true faith. Avitus, at the request of his royal admirers, published treatises in confession of the Nestorians, Eutychians, Sar­bellians, and Pelagians, and was peculiarly success­ful in gaining over a number of Jews who had settled in his diocese. By pope Hormisdas he was appointed vicar apostolic in Gaul, in the year 517 presided at the council of Epomea (consilia Epome­nense), died on the 5th of February, 528, was buried in the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, where he had passed so many years of his early life, and in the fulness of time received the honours of canonization.

The works of Avitus are

1. Sacrorum Poematum libri quinqve, dedicated to his brother, Apollinaris, bishop of Valentia, a renowned worker of miracles. This collection consists of five distinct pieces, all in hexameter verse, extending to upwards of 2500 lines, De Initio Mund. De Pecato Originali, De Sententia Dei, De Di­leneo Mund., De Transitu Mariis Robr. 2. De consolatoris Castellatis Loculi, in 606 hexa­metric verses, addressed to his sister Puscina, a nun. These productions display much imagination and great fluency, the use of the different positions is well conceived and skilfully executed, and both in versification and expression they deserve the moderate praise of being much better than could have been expected, belonging as they do to what Func­tius has quaintly termed the "inera decrepita senectus" of the Latin language. Barthius is of opinion that we are prevented from estimating them fairly, in consequence of the numerous deprivations and interpolations which he believes them to have suffered from the monks in ages still more barbarous. Besides his effusions in verse, Avitus is known to have published nine books of epistles, and a great number of homilies; but of these the following only are extant.

3. Eighty-seven letters to and from various persons of distinction in church and state.

4. A homily "De Posto Rationismus et prima­nos Institutiones,"

5. Eight fragments of homilies.

6. Fragments of opuscula.

These remains show that he was well versed in scripture and in theology, and that he possessed some knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and they contain curious and valuable information on various points of ecclesiastical history, discipline, and doctrine.

The poems were first printed at Strasburg in 1507 from a MS. in the possession of Doroaldus, and are given in the Corpus Poetarum Latinarum of Maittaire and similar compilations.

The whole works of Avitus were published collectively with notes by Père Sirmond, at Paris, 1643, 8vo, in the second volume of his Opuscula of the fathers and other ecclesiastical writers, and also in the works of Sirmond published by Père la Baume, Paris, 1690, fol., and reprinted at Venice, 1729, fol. Since that period, a new homily has been discovered, and is included in the fifth vol. of the Thesaurus Anecd. by Dom. Martene. [W. R.]

AVITUS, A'LPHIUS. The Latin poet quoted under this name is believed to have flourished during the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Many suppose him to be the same person with Alphius Flavus—the precocious pupil of Costius and contemporary with Soscrea, who while yet a boy was so famed for his eloquence, that crowds flocked to listen to his orations (Senec. Controv. 1.1)—and with Flavus Albus, referred to by Pliny (H. N. ix. 8), as an authority for a story about dolphins. Hence
AVITUS.

Vossius conjectures, that his designation at full length and properly arranged, may have been Phlius Alphus Avitus. All this is very ingenuous, and very uncertain. We know from Terentianus Maurus (L. 2448), that Alphius Avitus composed a work upon Illustrious Men, in iberian dimetres, extending to several books; and eight lines are cited by Priscian from the second book, forming a part of the legend of the Faliscan schoolmaster who betrayed his pupils to Camillus; besides which, three lines more from the first book are contained in some MSS. of the same grammarian. (Priscian, vol. i. pp. 410, 553, vol. ii. p. 131, ed. Kreilh, or pp. 823, 947, 1136, ed. Putsch.) These fragments are given in the Anthologia Latina of Burmann, ii. p. 297, and Add. ii. p. 730, or Ep. n. 125, ed. Meyer.

There is also an "Alphius philologus," from whom Priscian adduces five words (vol. i. p. 570, ed. Kr., or p. 792, ed. Putsch), and an Alphilus whose work on the Trojan war is mentioned by Festus, s. v. Maurerini. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Latt. Min. vol. iii. p. xxxi., vol. iv. pass. p. 926.) [W. R.]

AVITUS, GALLONIUS, was legate over the provinces of Thessalonica under Aurelian, and a letter addressed to him by that emperor is quoted by Vopiscus in the life of Bonosus. Some critics have supposed, that he was the author of an "allocutio sponsialis," in five hexameters, preserved among the "fragmenta epitalamiorum veterum," and that the little poem itself was one of the hundred nuptial lays which were composed and recited when Gallienus celebrated the marriages of his nephews. (Pollilus, Cot. 11.) Wernsdorf, however, considers that the lines belong to Alcgna Avitus Alcides. [ALETRIUS.] (Wernsdorf, Poet. Latt. Min. vol. iv. pass. p. 501; Burmann, Anthology. iii. 259, or Ep. n. 259, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

AVITUS, JUlius, the husband of Julia Maeza, brother-in-law of Julia Domna and Septimius Severus, uncle by marriage of Caracalla, father of Julia Soemias and Julia Minnaea, and maternal grandfather of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. He was of consular rank, and, as we gather from the fragments of Dion Cassius, governed in succession Asia, Mesopotamia, and Cyprus. From him Elagabalus inherited the name of Avitus—a name appellation by which ancient historians frequently distinguish that emperor. (Dion Cassius, 90, lxxxix. 16; Herodian, v. 3, § 3; see also the genealogical table under Caracalla.) [W. R.]

AVITUS, M. MACEIUS, emperor of the West, was descended from a noble family in Auvergne, and spent the first thirty years of his life in the pursuits of literature, field-sports, jurisprudence, and arms. The first public office to which he was promoted was the praetorian praefecture of Gaul, and whilst in retirement in his villa near Clermont, he was appointed master of the armies of Gaul. During this period, he twice went as ambassador to the Visigothic court, first in A. D. 450 to Theodoric I., to secure his alliance upon the invasion of Attila; secondly in A. D. 456, to Theodoric II., on the death of Theodoric I., having received the news of the death of Maximus, and of the sack of Rome by the Vandals, he was, by the assistance of the Visigoths, raised to the vacant throne; but, after a year's weak and insolent reign, was deposed by Ricimer, and returned to private life as bishop of Toulon. But the senate having pronounced the sentence of death upon him, he fled to the sanctuary of his patron saint, Julian, at Brives in Auvergne, and there died, or at least was buried. (A. D. 456.)

His private life is chiefly known from the Panegyric of his son-in-law, Sidonius Apollinaris; his public life from Gregory, Tiron. xi. 11, and Istitius, Chronicon. [A. P. S.]

The annexed coin of Avitus has on the obverse the head of Avitus crowned with a diadem of pearls, and the inscription D. M. AVITUS PERR. F. AUG., and on the reverse the emperor wearing the paludamentum, and standing with one foot upon a barbarian; in the right hand he holds the cross, and in the left a small figure of Victory.

AURELIA.

AULANUS EVANDER. [Evander.]

AULUSTES, a Tyrrhenian ally of Aeneas in Italy, is called a son of Thabor and the nymph Manto, and brother of Oeneus. He was slain by Messapus, and was regarded as the founder of Perusia. (Verg. Aen. x. 207, xii. 290.) [L. S.]

AULIA GENIBS, probably plebeian. Persons of this name rarely occur, though one member of the gens, Q. Aulus Cereceanus, obtained the consulship twice in the Senate, in A. D. 323 and 319. The name is derived from the praenomen Aulus, as Sextius from Sextus, Marcus from Marcus, and Quintius from Quintus. The only cognomens belonging to this gens is CERETANUS.

AULUS (Aulus), a daughter of Ogyges and Thebe, from whom the Boeotian town of Aulis was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. ix. 19, § 5.) Other traditions called her a daughter of Broomynus, the son of Cephisus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Aulus.) She was one of the goddesses who watched over oaths under the name of *xpo*ePECIALIA. [ALEACOBERIA.]

M. AULIUS, praefect of the allies, was killed in the battle in which Marcellus was defeated by Hannibal, B. C. 203. (Liv. xxvii. 26, 27.)

AULONIUS (Aulonius), a surname of Asclepius, derived from a temple he had in Aulon, a valley in Messenia. (Paus. iv. 36. § 5.) [L. S.]

AURA (Aure), a daughter of Leitus and Peribon, was one of the swift-footed companions of Artemis. She was beloved by Dionysus, but fled from him, until Aphrodite, at the request of Dionysus, inspired her with love for the god. She accordingly became by him the mother of twins, but at the moment of their birth she was seized with madness, tore one of her children to pieces, and then threw herself into the sea. (Nonnus, Dionys. 360.) Aura also occurs as the name of a race-horse and of one of Actaeon's dogs. (Paus. vi. 13. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 131.) [L. S.]

AURILIVE, the wife of C. Julius Caesar, by whom she became the mother of C. Julius Caesar, the dictator, and of two daughters. It is doubtful who her parents were: Drunn戛 (Geogr. Rom. iii. p. 128) conjectures, that she was the daughter of M. Aurelius Cotta and Rutilia (comp. Cic. ad Att. xii. 20), and that C. M. and L. Cotton, who were consuls in B. C. 75, 74, and 65 respectively, were her brothers. She carefully watched over the education of her children (Dial. de Ord. 26; comp. Dion Cass. xlviii. 38), and always took a lively interest in the success of her son. He appears to have constantly lived with him; and Caesar on his part treated her with great affection and respect. Thus, it is said, that on the day when he was elected Pontifex Maximus, n. c. 63, he told his mother, as she kissed him upon his leaving his house in the morning to proceed to the comitia, that he would not return home except as Pontifex Maximus. (Suet. Caes. 13.) It was Aurelia who detected Claudius in the house of her son during the celebration of the mysteries of the Bona Dea in n. c. 62. (Plut. Caes. 8, 10; Suet. Caes. 74.) She died in n. c. 54, while her son was in Gaul. (Suet. Caes. 26.)

AURELIA FADILLA. [Antoninus, p. 211.]

AURELIA GENS, plebeian, of which the family names, under the republic, are Cotta, Orestes, and Scaurus. On coins we find the cognomina Cotta and Scaurus, and perhaps Rufus (Eckhle, v. p. 147), the last of which is not mentioned by historians. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was C. Aurelius Cotta in n. c. 252, from which time the Aurelii became distinguished in history down to the end of the republic. Under the early emperors, we find an Aurelian family of the name of Pulvinus, from which the Roman emperor Antoninus was descended, whose name originally was T. Aurelius Pulvinus. [See pp. 210, 211.]

AURELIA MESSALINA. [Albinus, p. 56, b.]

AURELIA ORESTILLA, a beautiful but profligate woman, whom Catiline married. As Aurelia at first objected to marrying him, because he had a grown-up son by a former marriage, Catiline is said to have killed his own offspring in order to remove this impediment to their union. (Sall. Cat. 15, 35; Appian, B. C. ii. 2; comp. Cic. ad Fam. ix. 22.) Her daughter was betrothed to the younger Cornificius in n. c. 49. (Caesius, op. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.)

AURELIUS, named twice by Dion Cassius (lxviii. 12, 19), is supposed to be the conspirator against Caracalla, who appears in the text of Spartianus as Rumaus or Rotiusan. The soldiers demanded him from Marinus, who at first resisted their importunities, but at length yielded him up to their fury. [W. R.]

AURELIUS. On coins, this emperor is uniformly styled L. Domitius Aurelianus, but in some fasti and inscriptions he appears as Valerius or Valerianus Aurelianus, the name Valerius being confirmed by a letter addressed to him by his predecessor, Claudius. (Vopisc. c. 17.) He was of such humble origin, that nothing certain is known of his family, nor of the time or place of his nativity. According to the account commonly received, he was born about the year A. D. 212, at Sirmium in Pannonia, or, as others assert, in Dacia, or in Moesia. His father is said to have been a farm servant on the property of Aurelius, a senator, his mother to have officiated as priestess of Sol in the village where she dwelt. It is certain that her son, in after-life, regarded that deity as his tutelary god, and erected for his worship at Rome a magnificent temple, decorated with a profusion of the most costly ornaments. In early youth, Aurelian was remarkable for vivacity of disposition, for bodily strength, and for an enthusiastic love of all military exercises. After entering upon the career of arms, he seems to have served in every grade and in every quarter of the world, and became so renowned for promptness in the use of weapons, and for individual prowess, that his comrades distinguished him as "Hand-on-sword." (Aurelianus manu ad ferrum.) In a war against the Sarmatians, he was believed to have slain forty-eight of the enemy in one day, and nearly a thousand in the course of a single campaign. When tribune of the sixth legion in Gaul, he repelled a predatory incursion of the Franks, who had crossed the Rhine near Mayence, and now for the first time appear in history. His fame as a soldier, an officer, and a general, gradually rose so high, that Valerian compared him to the Corvini and Scipios of the olden time, and, declaring that no reward was adequate to his merits, bestowed on him the titles of Liberator of Illyria and Restorer of Gaul. Having been appointed lieutenant to Ulpius Crinitus, captain-general of Illyria and Thrace, he expelled the Goths from these provinces; and so important was this service deemed, that Valerian, in a solemn assembly held at Byzantium, publicly returned thanks to Aurelian for having averted the dangers by which the state was menaced, and after presenting him with a multitude of military decorations, proclaimed him consul elect. At the same time, he was adopted by Ulpius Crinitus, declared his heir, and probably received his daughter in marriage. He is marked in the Fasti as consul suffectus on the 22nd of May, 257.

We hear nothing of Aurelian during the reign of the indolent and feeble Gallienus; but great successes were achieved by him under Claudius, by whom he was appointed to the command previously held by his adopted father, and was entrusted with the defence of the frontier against the Goths, and nominated commander-in-chief of the cavalry of the empire.

Upon the death of Claudius, which took place at Sirmium in 270, Aurelian was at once hailed as his successor by the legions. Quintillus, the brother of Claudius, at the same time asserted his own claims at Aquileia; but, being abandoned by his soldiers, put himself to death within less than three weeks from the time when he assumed the purple.

The reign of Aurelian, which lasted for about four years and a half, from the end of August, 270, until the middle of March, 275, presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while their ancient lustre to the arms of Rome. As soon as his authority had been formally recognised in the metropolis, he directed his first efforts against a numerous host of Goths and Vandals, who, led by two kings and many powerful chiefs, had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. These, after sustaining a decisive defeat, were forced to submit, and were permitted to retire upon leaving the sons of the two kings, and other noble youths, as hostages, and furnishing a contingent of two thousand auxiliaries.

A great victory was next gained over the Allemanii and other German tribes, which was followed by a serious reverse. For, while the emperor was employing every exertion to cut off their retreat, he failed to watch them in front. The barbarians, taking advantage of this oversight, pressed boldly forwards, outstripped their heavy-armed pursuers, and bursting into Italy wasted all Cisalpine Gaul. When at length overthrown near Placentia, they avoided a battle and sought shelter in a thick forest. Issuing from thence under cloud of night, they attacked and dispersed the Romans with great slaughter, and, advancing into Umbria, threatened the dissolution of the empire. Aurelian, however, having rallied his army, defeated the invaders near Fano, and in two subsequent engagements.

During the panic caused by the first alarm of this inroad, a formidable sedition had arisen in the city. Aurelian, upon his return from the pursuit, giving way to his natural violence of temper, executed bloody vengeance upon the authors of the plot, and upon all to whom the slightest suspicion attached. Numbers suffered death, and many noble senators were sacrificed upon the most frivolous charges. Amniaus distinctly asserts, that the wealthiest were selected as victims, in order that their confiscated fortunes might replenish an exhausted treasury.

Aurelian next turned his arms against the far-famed Zenobia [Zenobia], queen of Palmyra, the wife of Odenathus, who had been permitted by Gallienus to participate in the title of Augustus, and had extended his sway over a large portion of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. The Romans on their march vanquished various barbarous tribes on the Thracian border, who opposed their progress. Passing over the Bostrorus, they continued their triumphant course through Bithynia, which yielded without resistance, stormed Tysa, which had closed its gates at their approach, and at length encountered the forces of Zenobia on the banks of the Orontes, not far from Antioch. The Palmyrenians, being driven from their position, retreated to Emesa, where they were a second time overpowered in a bloody battle and forced to retire upon their capital. Aurelian pursued them across the desert, which he passed in safety, although harassed by the constant attacks of the Bedouins, and proceeded at once to invest Palmyra, which surrendered after a long and obstinate defence, the queen herself having been previously captured in an attempt to effect her escape to Persia. A profound sensation was produced by these events, and embassies poured in from all the most powerful nations beyond the Euphrates, bearing gifts and seeking friendship. The affairs of these regions having been fully arranged, the emperor set out on his return to Italy. At Dyrrachium he was overtaken by the intelligence that the inhabitants of Palmyra had revolted, had murdered the governor and Roman garrison, and proclaimed a relation of Zenobia Augustus. He immediately turned back, marched direct to Palmyra, which he entered unopposed, massacred the whole population, and razed the city to the ground, leaving orders, however, to restore the temple of the Sun, which had been pillaged by the soldiers. While yet in Mesopotamia, it became known that Egypt had risen in rebellion, and acknowledged a certain Firmus as their prince. Aurelian instantly hurried to Alexandria, put to death the usurper, and then returned to Rome.

But Aurelian's labours were not yet over. All the provinces of the East, Greece, Italy, Illyria, and Thrace, now owned his sway; but Gaul, Britain, and Spain were still in the hands of Tetricus [Tetricus], who had been declared emperor a short time before the death of Gallienus, and had been left in undisputed possession by Claudius, who was fully occupied in resisting the Germans and Goths on the Upper and Lower Danube. Tetricus, however, finding that disaffection prevailed among his legions, is said to have privately entered into negotiations with Aurelian. A battle was fought near Chalons, during the heat of which Tetricus surrendered himself, and his soldiers, being then left without a commander, were cut to pieces. Thus the Roman empire, which had been dismembered for a period of more than thirteen years, was now once more restored to its former integrity. In honour of the long series of victories by which this result had been obtained, a magnificent triumph was celebrated at Rome, such as had never been witnessed since the days of Pompey and Julius Caesar. Among the long procession of captives which defiled along the Sacred Way, three might be seen, who engaged the attention of all—Zenobia, Tetricus, and his son—a queen, an Augustus, and a Caesar.

For a brief period, the emperor was enabled to devote his attention to domestic improvements and reforms; but the laws were passed to restrain profusion and luxury. The numerous offices were reduced to a liberal distribution of the necessaries of life; quays were erected along the river, and many works of public utility commenced. The most important of all was the erection of a new line of strongly fortified walls, embracing a much more ample circuit than the old ones, which had long since fallen into ruin; but this vast plan was not completed until the reign of Probus.

About this time, a formidable disturbance arose among the persons entrusted with the management of the mint, who had been detected in extensive frauds, and, to escape the punishment of their crimes, had incited to insurrection a great multitude. So fierce was the outbreak, that seven thousand soldiers are said to have been slain in a fight upon the Ceolian hill; but the riot, which almost deserved the name of a civil war, was at length suppressed.

After a short residence in the city, Aurelian repaired to Gaul, and then visited in succession the provinces on the Danube, checking by his presence the threatened aggressions of the restless tribes who were ever ready to renew their attacks. He at this time carried into effect a measure which, although offensive to the vanity of his countrymen, was dictated by the wisest policy. Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, but for a long series of years had been the seat of constant war, was entirely abandoned, and the garrisons transported to the south bank of the Danube, which was henceforward, as in the time of Augustus, considered the boundary of the empire.

A large force was now collected in Thrace in preparation for an expedition against the Persians. But the career of the warlike prince was drawing to a close. A certain Mnestheus, his freedman and private secretary, had betrayed his trust, and, conscious of guilt, contrived by means of forged documents to organise a conspiracy among some of the chief leaders of the army. While Aurelian was on the march between Heraclea and Dyrrachium, he was suddenly assassinated, and fell by the hand of one officer of high rank, named Macropor. The treachery of Mnestheus was discovered when it was too late. He was seized and condemned to be cast to wild beasts.

It will be seen from the above sketch that Aurelian was a soldier of fortune; that he possessed military talents of the highest order; and that to these alone he was indebted for his elevation. One of his most conspicuous virtues as a commander was the rigid discipline which he enforced among legions long accustomed to unbounded license. His rigour, however, was free from caprice, and tempered by stern and inflexible justice; for we find that his soldiers submitted to his rule without a murmur while he was still in a private station, raised him to the throne, served him with fidelity during the period of his dominion, and after his death displayed the most enthusiastic devotion to his memory. His great faults as a statesman were the harshness of his disposition, and the impetuous violence of his passions, which frequently betrayed him into acts of sanguinary cruelty. Diodetion was wont to say, that Aurelian was better fitted to command an army than to govern a state.

The wife of Aurelian, we learn from coins and inscriptions, was Ulpia Severina, and, as was remarked above, is supposed to have been the daughter of his adopted father, Ulpius Crinitus. He had a daughter whose descendants were living at Rome when Vopiscus wrote. (c. 42.)

It is worthy of observation, that this humble Pannonian peasant was the son of the Roman princes who openly assumed the regal diadem; and now for the first time we read upon medals struck during the lifetime of an emperor the arrogant and impious titles of Lord and God (Deo et Domino nostro Aureliano Aug.).

Our chief authorities for the life of Aurelian are an elaborate biography by Vopiscus, founded, as he himself informs us, upon Greek memoirs, and especially upon certain journals kept by the order of the emperor, and deposited in the Ulpian library. We find also some important information in the other writers of the Augustan history, in the minor historians, and in the works of Dexippus and Zosimus. But the chronology is involved in inextricable confusion. Coins, which are usually our surest guides, here afford no aid. Thus we cannot decide whether the expedition against Zenobia preceded or followed the submission of Tetricus; the invasion of the Goths and Vandals, described above as the first event after his accession, is by Tillemont divided into two distinct intrades, one before and the other after the Alemanic war; and also the evacuation of Dacia is placed by Gibbon among the earliest acts of his reign, and represented as having exercised a material influence upon the treaty concluded with the Goths, while others refer it to the very close of his life. Although these and all the other events may be regarded as certain, the time when they occurred, and consequently their relation to each other, are altogether doubtful. [W. B.]

COIN OF AURELIANUS.

AURELIANUS, CAELIUS or COELIUS, a very celebrated Latin physician, respecting whose age and country there is considerable uncertainty. Some writers place him as early as the first century of the Christian era, while others endeavour to prove that he was at least a century later. This opinion is founded principally upon the circumstance of his not mentioning, or being mentioned by, Galen, indicating that they were contemporaries or rivals. Numidia has been generally assigned as his native country, but perhaps without any direct evidence; it may, however, be concluded, from the imperfection of his style and the incorrectness of some of the terms which he employs, that he was not a native either of Greece or Italy. But whatever doubts may attach to his personal history, and whatever faults of style may exist in his writings, they afford us much valuable information respecting the state of medical science. He was a profound and zealous member of the sect of the Methodici, and it is principally from his work that we are able to obtain a correct view of the principles and practice of this sect. In his descriptions of the phænomena of disease, he displays considerable accuracy of observation and diagnostic sagacity; and he describes some disorders which are not to be met with in any other ancient author. He gives us a very ample and minute detail of the practice which was adopted both by himself and his contemporaries; and it must be acknowledged that on these points his remarks display a competent knowledge of his subject, united to a clear and comprehensive judgment.

He divides diseases into the two great classes of acute and chronic, nearly corresponding to diseases of constriction and of relaxation, and upon these supposed states he founds his primary indications; but with respect to the intimate nature of these states of the system, as well as of all hidden or recondite causes generally, he thinks it unnecessary to inquire, provided we can recognize their existence, and can discover the means of removing them. Hence his writings are less theoretical and more decidedly practical than those of any other author of antiquity; and they consequently contributed more to the advancement of the knowledge and actual treatment of disease than any that had preceded them. They contributed in an especial manner to perfect the knowledge of therapeutics, by ascertaining with precision the proper indications of cure, with the means best adapted for fulfilling them. The great defect of Caelius Aurelianus (a defect which was inherent in the sect to which he belonged), was that of placing too much dependence upon the twofold division of diseases, and not sufficiently attending to the minute shades by which they gradually ran into each other; which is the more remarkable in one who shows so much attention to the phænomena of disease, and who for the most part allows himself to be so little warped by any preconceived notions. This view of the subject leads him not unfrequently to reject active and decide remedies, when he could not reconcile their operation to his supposed indications; so that, although his practice is seldom what could be stilyed bad, it is occasionally defective.

His work consists of three books On Acute Diseases, "Celerum Passionum," (or "De Morbis Acutis") and five books On Chronic Diseases, "Taradurum Passionum" (or "De Morbis Chronicis"). The books On Chronic Diseases were first published in folio, Basil. 1528; those On Acute Diseases in 8vo, Paris, 1555. The first edition of the whole work was that published at Lyons in 8vo, 1566; perhaps the best is that by Amman, Amstel. 1709, 4to., which was several times reprinted. The last

N.B. M. Aurelius and Faustina seem to have had several children in addition to the above. Three daughters were still alive after the death of Commodus (Lamprid. Comm. 18; Herodian, i. 12), and one of these was put to death by Caracalla in 212. We find in an inscription the names of his sons, T. Aurelius Antoninus, and T. Aelius Aurelius, both of whom were, it is probable, older than Commodus, and died young. (See Tillemont.)

The father of young Marcus having died while praetor, the boy was adopted by his grandfather, Annius Verus, and from a very early period enjoyed the favour of Hadrian, who bestowed on him the honours of the equestrian order when only six years old, admitted him as a member of the fraternity of the Syrian priests at the age of eight, and as a tribute to the sincerity and truthfulness of his disposition, was wont in playful affection to address him not as Verus but Pius. At the age of fifteen, he received the main gown, and was betrothed to the daughter of Aelius Caesar, the heir-apparent to the throne. But not long after (138), in consequence of the sudden death of his intended father-in-law, still more brilliant prospects were suddenly opened up to the youth. For, according to the arrangement explained under Antoninus Pius, both he and L. Ceionius Commodus, son of Aelius Caesar, were adopted by Antoninus Pius, immediately after the latter had been himself adopted by Hadrian. He was now styled M. Aelius Aurelius Verus Caesar, and was immediately chosen to fill the office of quaestor for the following year. The proposed union with the daughter of Aelius Caesar was set aside, on account, it was alleged, of disparity in age, and Faustina, the daughter of Pius, who had been previously destined by Hadrian for young Ceionius Commodus, was fixed upon as the future wife of Marcus Aurelius. Their nuptials, however, were not celebrated until after a lapse of seven years. (145.) In 140 he was raised to the consulship, and in 147, after the birth of a daughter by Faustina, was permitted to share the tribunate, and was invested with various other honours and privileges befitting his station. From this time forward he was the constant companion and close orderly of the monarch, and the most perfect confidence subsisted between the son and his adopted father until the death of the latter, which happened on the 7th of March, 161.

The first act of the new ruler was the admission of Cœtiones Commodus to a full participation in the sovereign power, and these emperors henceforward bore respectively the names of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. When the double adoption by Antoninus Pius took place, it was settled that the son of Aelius Caesar should be considered as the younger brother. Thus, on the coins struck before the death of Pius, M. Aurelius alone bears the appellation of Caesar, to him alone Pius committed the empire with his dying breath, and to him alone did the senate formally offer the vacant throne. Hence his conduct towards L. Verus was purely an act of grace. But the alliance promised to prove advantageous both to the parties themselves, and also to the general interests of the state. Marcus was weak in constitution, and took more delight in philosophy and literary pursuits than in politics and war, while Lucius, young, active, and skilled in all manly exercises, was likely to be better fitted for the toils of a military life. His aptitude for such a career was soon put to the proof. The war, which had been long threatening the east, at length burst forth. Verus, after being betrothed to Lucilla, the daughter of his colleague, was despatched in all haste to the Parthian frontier towards the end of 161, while M. Aurelius remained in the city to watch an irruption of the Satti into the Rhenish provinces and a threatened insurrection in Britain.

Vologases III., who had been induced to abandon a meditated attack upon Armenia by the remonstrances of Antoninus Pius, thinking that a fitting season had now arrived for the execution of his long-cherished schemes, had destroyed a whole Roman legion quartered at Elegica, and advancing at the head of a great army, had spread devastation throughout Syria. Lucinus having collected his troops, proceeded to Antioch, where he determined to remain, and entrusted the command of his army to his eldest son and two of his generals. Cassius compelled the Parthians to retreat, invaded Mesopotamia, plundered and burnt Seleucia, razed to the ground the royal palace at Ctesiphon, and penetrated as far as Babylon; while Statius Priscus, who was sent into Armenia, stormed Artaxata, and, rescuing the country from the usurper, reinstated the lawful but dethroned monarch Secucus. Vologases was thus constrained to conclude an ignominious peace, in virtue of which Mesopotamia was ceded to the Romans. These events took place in 162 and the three following years. In 166, Lucinus returned home, and the two emperors celebrated jointly a magnificent triumph, assuming the titles of Armacennus, Particum Maximas, and Medicus. But although this campaign had terminated so gloriously, little praise was due to the commander-in-chief. Twice he was unwillingly prevailed upon to advance us far as the Euphrates, and he made a journey to Ephesus (in 164) to meet his bride on her arrival from Italy; but with these exceptions he passed his winters at Laodicea, and the rest of his time at Daphne or at Antioch, abandoning himself to gambling, drunkenness, and dissolute pleasures of every kind. All the achievements of the war were performed by his legates, and all the general arrangements conducted by M. Aurelius at Rome.

A still heavier danger was now impending, which threatened to crush Italy itself. A combination had been formed among the numerous tribes, dwelling along the whole extent of the northern limits of the empire, from the sources of the Danube to the Illyrian border, including the Marcomanni, the Alani, the Sarmatians, the Quadi, the Servi, and many others. In addition to the danger from without, the city was hard pressed by numerous calamities from within. Inundations had destroyed many buildings and much property, among which were vast granaries with their contents, the poor were starving in consequence of the deficiency thus caused in the supplies of corn, and numbers were perishing by a fearful pestilence, said to have been brought from the east by the troops of Verus. So great was the panic, that it was resolved that both emperors should go forth to encounter the foe. Previous to their departure, in order to restore confidence to the populace, priests were summoned from all quarters, a multitude of expiatory sacrifices were performed, many of them according to strange and foreign rites, and victims were offered to the gods with the most unspiring profusion.

The contest which had now commenced with the northern nations was continued with varying success during the whole life of Lucius Verus, who generally fixed his headquarters in Pannonia; but the details preserved by the historians who treat of this period are so confused and so utterly destitute of all chronological arrangement, that it becomes impossible to draw up anything like a regular and well-connected narrative of the progress of the struggle. Medals are our only sure guide, and the information afforded by these is necessarily meagre and imperfect. It would appear that the barbarians, overawed by the extensive preparations of the Romans and by the presence of the two Augusti, submitted for a time and sued for peace, and that the brothers returned to Rome in the course of 168. They set out again, however, in 169, but before they reached the army, L. Verus was seized with sickness, and expired at Aedineum, in the territory of Venice. Marcus hastened back to Rome, paid the last honours to the memory of his colleague, and returned to Germany towards the close of the year. He now prosecuted the war against the Marcomanni with great vigour, although from the ravages caused by the plague among the troops, he was forced to enrol gladiators, slaves, and exiles, and, from the exhausted state of the public treasury, was compelled to raise money by selling the precious jewels and furniture of the imperial palace. In consequence of the success which attended these extraordinary efforts, the legends Germanicus and Germanica Soluta now appear upon the coins, while Particulic, Armeanicus, and Medicus are dropped, as having more especially appertained to L. Verus. Among the numerous engagements which took place at this epoch, a battle fought on the frozen Danube has been very graphically described by Dion Cassius (lxxii. 7;) but by far the most celebrated and important was the victory gained over the Quadi in 174, which having been attended by certain circumstances believed to be supernatural, gave rise to the famous controversy among the historians of Christianity upon what is commonly termed the Miracle.
of the Thundering Legion. Those who may desire to investigate this question will find the subject duly discussed in the correspondence between King and Moyle. (Moyle's Works, vol. ii. Lond. 1726.)
There is an excellent summary of the whole argument in Landor's "Jewish and Hebraic Testimones" (chap. xv.), and many useful remarks are to be found in Milman's History of Christianity (chap.
vii.), and in the Bishop of Lincoln's "Illustrations, &c. from Tertullian" (p. 105). An attempt has been made recently to restore the credit of the supposed miracle, in the essay by Mr. Newman, prefixed to a portion of Fleury's " Ecclesiastical History," published at Oxford in 1842.
Whatever opinion we may form upon the subject of doubt, we may feel certain of the fact, that the Romans were rescued from a very critical situation by a sudden storm, and gained an important victory over their opponents. That they attributed their preservation to the direct interposition of heaven is proved by the testimonies of the ancient historians, and also by the sculptures of the Antonine column, where a figure supposed to represent Jupiter Fluvius is seen sending down streams of water from his arms and head, which the Roman soldiers below catch in the hollow of their shields.
This success, and the circumstances by which it was accompanied, seem to have struck terror into the surrounding nations, who now tendered submission or claimed protection. But the fruits were in a great measure lost, for the emperor was prevented from following up the advantage gained, in consequence of the alarm caused by unexpected disturbances which had broken out in the East, and had quickly assumed a very formidable aspect.
Faustina had long watched with anxiety the declining health of her husband, and anticipating his speedy death, was filled with alarm lest, from the youth and inexperience of her son Commodus, the empire might pass away into other hands. She had, therefore, opened a correspondence with Avi-dius Cassius, who had gained great fame in the Parthian war commemorated above, who had subsequently suppressed a serious insurrection in Egypt, and had acted as supreme governor of the Eastern provinces after the departure of Lucius Verus. Her object was to persuade him to hold himself in readiness to aid her projects, and she offered him her hand and the throne as his rewards.
While Cassius was meditating upon these proposals, he suddenly received intelligence that Marcus was dead, and forthwith, without waiting for a confirmation of the news, caused himself to be proclaimed his successor. The falseness of the rumour soon became known, but deeming that his offence was beyond forgiveness, he determined to prosecute the enterprise; within a short period he made himself master of all Asia within Mount Taurus,
and resolved to maintain his pretensions by force.
A report of these transactions was forthwith transmitted to Rome by M. Verus, the legate commanding in Cappadocia. Aurelius, who was still in Pannonia, summoned his son to his presence in all haste, and bestowed on him the manly gown, intending to set out instantly for the seat of war. But in the midst of active preparations for a campaign Cassius was assassinated by two of his own officers, after having enjoyed a nominal sovereignty for three months and six days. His son soon after shared the same fate. The conduct of Marcus throughout the whole of this rebellion can scarcely fail to excite the warmest admiration. In the mournful address delivered to his soldiers, he bitterly deploed that he should be forced to engage in a contest so revolting to his feelings as civil strife. His chief dread was that Cassius, from shame or reorse, might put an end to his own life, or fall by the hand of some loyal subject—his fondest wish, that he might have an opportunity of granting a free pardon. Nor did this forgiving temper exhaust itself in words. When the head of the traitor was laid at his feet, he rejected with horror the bloody offering, and refused to admit the murderers to his presence. On repairing to the East, where his presence was thought necessary to restore tranquility and order, he displayed the greatest hostility towards those provinces which had acknowledged the usurper, and towards those senators and persons of distinction who were proved to have favoured his designs. Not one individual suffered death; few were punished in any shape, except such as had been guilty of other crimes; and finally, to establish perfect confidence in all, he ordered the papers of Cassius to be destroyed without suffering them to be read. During this expadition, Faustina, who had accompanied her husband, died in a village among the defiles of Taurus.
According to some, her end was caused by an attack of gout; according to others, it was hastened by her own act, in order to escape the punishment which she feared would inevitably follow the discovery of her negotiations with Cassius. Her guilt in this matter is spoken of by Dion without any expression of doubt; is mentioned by Capitolinus
as a report only, and positively denied by Vulpiani;
but the arguments employed by the latter are of no weight.
After visiting Egypt, the emperor set out for Italy, touched at Athens on his homeward journey, reached Brundusium towards the end of the year 176, and celebrated a triumph along with Commodus, now consil elect, on the 25th of December.
Scarcely was this ceremony concluded, when fresh tumults arose upon the Danube, where the presence of the emperor was once more required. Accord-gingly, after concluding somewhat earlier than he had intended the nuptials of Commodus and Crispina, he quitted Rome along with his son, in the month of August (177), and hastened to Germany. During the two following years his operations were attended with the most prosperous results. The Marcomanni, the Hermunduri, the Sarmatiae, and the Quadi, were repeatedly routed, their confederacy was broken up, and everything seemed to promise that they would at length be effectually crushed. But the shattered constitution of Marcus now sunk beneath the pressure of mental and bodily fatigue. He died in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirmium, on the 17th of March, 180, in the 59th year of his age and the 20th of his reign. A strong suspicion prevailed that his death had been accelerated by the machinations of his son, who was accused of having tampered with the physicians, and persuaded them to administer poison.
The leading feature in the character of M. Aure-lius was his devotion to philosophy and literature.
When only twelve years old he adopted the dress and practised the soteriocracies of the Stoics, whose dogmas were imparted to him by the most celebrated teachers of the day—Diognetus, Apollonius, and Junius Rusticus. He studied the principles of composition and oratory under Andreas Atticus and Cornelius Fronto, and by his close and unremitting application laid the foundation of the bad health by which he was so much oppressed in after life. While yet Caesar he was addressed by Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. init.) as Verissimus "the philosopher," an epithet by which he has been commonly distinguished from that period down to the present day, although no such title was ever publicly or formally conferred. Even after his elevation to the purple, he felt neither reluctance nor shame in resorting to the school of Sextus of Chaeremon, the descendant of Plotinus, and in listening to the extemporaneous declamations of Hermogenes. From his earliest youth he lived upon terms of the most affectionate familiarity with his instructors, as we may gather from his correspondence with Fronto [Fronto]; the most worthy were, through his influence, promoted to the highest dignities; after their death he placed their images in the chapel of his house, and was wont to stroll flowers and offer sacrifices on their graves. Nor was his liberality confined to his own preceptors, for learned men in every quarter of the world enjoyed substantial proofs of his bounty. Philosophy was the great object of his zeal, but the other branches of a polite education were by no means neglected: music, poetry, and painting, were cultivated in turn, and the severer sciences of mathematics and law engaged no small portion of his attention. In jurisprudence especially, he laboured throughout life with great activity, and his Constitutions are believed to have filled many volumes. These are now all lost, but they are constantly quoted with great respect by later writers. (See Westenberg, Dissertations ad Constitutions M. Aurelii Imperatoris, Lug. Bat. 1786.)

With the exception of a few letters contained in the recently discovered remains of Fronto, the only production of Marcus which has been preserved is a volume composed in Greek, and entitled Μελέρω "Αυτονωμων των ανδροκρατων των εις εαυτον μετα τις·" It is a sort of common-place book, in which were registered from time to time the thoughts and feelings of the author upon moral and religious topics, together with striking maxims extracted from the works of those who had been most eminent for wisdom and virtue. There is no attempt at order or arrangement, but the contents are valuable, in so far as they illustrate the system of self-examination enjoined by the discipline of the Stoics, and present a genuine picture of the doubts and difficulties and struggles of a speculative and reflecting mind.

The education and pursuits of M. Aurelius exercised the happiest influence upon a temper and disposition naturally calm and benevolent. He succeeded in acquiring the boasted composure and self-command of the disciples of the Porch, without imbibing the harshness which they were wont to exhibit. He was firm without being obstinate; he steadfastly maintained his own principles without manifesting any overweening contempt for the opinions of those who differed from himself; his justice was tempered with gentleness and mercy; his gravity was devoid of gloom. In public life, he sought to demonstrate practically the truth of the Platonic maxim, even on his lips, that statesmen only could be truly happy which were governed by philosophers, or in which the kings and rulers were guided by the tenets of pure philosophy. In general policy, both at home and abroad, he steadily followed in the path of his predecessor, whose counsels he had shared for more than twenty years. The same praise, therefore, which belongs to the elder may fairly be imparted to the younger Antonine; and this is perhaps the most emphatic panegyric we could pronounce. No monarch was ever more widely or more deeply beloved. The people believed, that he had been sent down by the gods, for a time, to bless mankind, and had now returned to the heaven from which he descended. So universal was this conviction among persons of every age and calling, that his apotheosis was not, as in other cases, viewed in the light of a mere empty form. Every one, whose means permitted, procured a statue of the emperor. More than a century after his decease, these images were to be found in many mansions among the household gods, and persons were wont to declare, that he had appeared to them in dreams and visions, and revealed events which afterwards came to pass.

The great, perhaps the only, indelible stain upon his memory is the severity with which he treated the Christians; and his conduct in this respect was the more remarkable, because it was not only completely at variance with his own general principles, but was also in direct opposition to the wise and liberal policy pursued by Hadrian and Pius. The numerous apologies published during his reign would alone serve to point out that the church was surrounded by difficulties and dangers; but the charge of positive persecution is fully established by the martyrdom of Justin at Rome, of the venerable Polycarp, with many others, at Smyrna (167) in the early part of his reign, and by the horrible atrocities perpetrated at Vienne and Lyons several years afterwards. (177) It would be but a poor defence to allege, that these excesses were committed without the knowledge of a prince who on all other occasions watched with such care over the rights of his subjects in the most remote provinces. But, in so far as the proceedings in Gaul are concerned, we have clear evidence that they received his direct sanction; for when the Roman governor applied for instructions, an answer was returned, that all who confessed themselves to be Christians should suffer death. It is probable that his better feelings were in this instance overpowered by the violence of evil counsellors; for had he followed the dictates of his own nature, he would have been contented to moralise upon and lament over what he viewed as ignorant and obstinate adherence to a vain superstition. (See Med. xi. 5.) But this calm contempt by no means satisfied the active hate of the crowd of real and pretended idolaters who had stained the empire. Many of these were bigots of the worst class, and cherished sentiments of the most malignant animosity towards the professors of the new religion. Accustomed to regard all other sects with self-satisfied disdain, they could ill brook the freedom with which their follies and fallacies were now attacked and exposed; they regarded with jealous rage a code of morals and a spotless purity of life far superior to aught they had ever practised, or taught, or imagined; and least of all could they forgive the complete overthrow of their own exclusive pretensions to mental fortitude and calm endurance of bodily suffering.

Although no other serious charge has been preferred against M. Aurelius, for the rumour that he is probably the same person who is mentioned in Cramer's Anecd. Gr. Paris., vol. 1, p. 394. [W.A.G.] AURELIUS ARCADIU.S CHARISIUS.

AURELIUS. After the defeat and captivity of Valerian, the legions in the different provinces, while they agreed in learning the feebler rule of Gallienus, could by no means unite their sufferages in favour of any one aspirant to the purple; but each army hastened to bestow the title of Augustus on its favourite general. Hence arose within the short space of eight years (A. D. 260—267) no less than thirteen usurpers in the various dependencies of Rome, whose contests threatened speedily to produce the complete dissolution of the empire. The biographies of these adventurers, most of whom were of very humble origin, have been compiled by Trebellius Pollio, who has collected the whole under the fanciful designation of the Thirty Tyrants. But the analogy thus indicated will not bear examination. No parallel can be established between those pretenders who sprang up suddenly in diverse quarters of the world, without concert or sympathy, each struggling to obtain supreme dominion for himself, and that cabal which united under Cæcilius and Thamænes with the common purpose of crushing the liberties of Athens. Nor does even the number correspond, for the Augustan historian is obliged to press in women and children and many doubtful names, in order to complete his tale. Of the whole nineteen, one only, Odenathus the Palmyrene, in gratitude for his successful valour against Sapor, was recognised by Gallienus as a colleague. It has been remarked, that not one lived in peace or died a natural death.

Aurelius, a Daedalian by birth, by occupation originally a shepherd. His merits as a soldier were discovered by Valerian, who gave him high military rank; and he subsequently did good service in the wars waged against Ingenuus, Macriamus, and Postumus. He was at length induced to revolt, was proclaimed emperor by the legions of Illyria in the year 267, and made himself master of Northern Italy. Gallienus, having been recalled by this alarm from a campaign against the Goths, encountered and defeated his rebellious general, and shut him up in Milan; but, while prosecuting the siege with vigour, was assassinated. This catastrophe, however, did not long delay the fate of the usurper, who was the nearest enemy and consequently the first object of attack to his rival, the new emperor Claudius. Their pretensions were decided by a battle fought between Milan and Bergama, in which Aurelius was slain; and the modern town of Pontefract is said to represent under a corrupt form the name of the brook (Pons Aurelii) thrown over the Adda at the spot where the victory was won. The records preserved of this period are full of confusion and contradiction. In what has been said above we have fol-loved the accounts of Aurelius Victor and Zonaras in preference to that of Pollio, who places the usurpation of Aurelius early in 261; but on this supposition the relations which are known to have subsisted afterwards between Gallienus and Aurelius become quite unintelligible. [W.R.]
AURIA. [Aurius, No. 4]
AURIUS, the name of a family at Larinum, frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Clucelius.
1. M. AURIUS, the son of Dinaea, was taken prisoner at Asculum in the Italian war. He fell in the battle of Sulla, and was buried in his ephemeral, where he was murdered by an emissary of Oppianicus, his brother-in-law. (cc.7, 8.)
2. Num. AURIUS, also the son of Dinaea, died before his brother, M. Aurius. (c. 7.)
3. A. AURIUS MELINIUS, a relation of the two preceding, threatened to prosecute Oppianicus, on account of the murder of M. Aurius. Oppianicus thereupon fled to Larinum, but was restored by Sulla, and obtained the procuration and death of
M. Aurius Melinius and his son, Caious. (c. 8.)
Melinius had married Cluentia, the daughter of Sassia; but as his mother-in-law fell in love with him, he divorced Cluentia and married Sassia.
(Cc. 5, 9, 26.)
4. AURIA, the wife of the brother of Oppianicus, was killed by the latter. (c. 11.)
AURO'IA. [Eos] AUURUNCULEIA GENS, plebeian, of which eCotta is the only family-name mentioned: for those who have no cognomen, see AUURUNCULEIA.
None of the members of this gens ever obtained
the consulship: the first who obtained the praetor-ship was C. Aurunculeius, in b. c. 209.
AURURNCLEIUS. 1. C. AUURNCLEIUS, praetor b. c. 209, had the province of Sardinia.
(Liv. xxvii. 6, 7.)
2. C. AUURNCLEIUS, tribune of the soldiers of the third legion in b. c. 207. (Liv. xxvii. 41.)
3. AURURNCLEIUS, praetor urbanus b. c. 190.
He was one of the ten commissioners sent to arrange the affairs of Asia at the conclusion of the war with Antiochus the Great, b. c. 186. (Liv. xxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 55.)
4. C. AUURNCLEIUS, one of the three Roman ambassadors sent into Asia, b. c. 155, to prevent Prasias from making war upon Attalus. (Polyb.
xxxiii. 1.)
AURUURNCUS, POST. COMI'NIUS, consul
b. c. 581, in which year a dictator was first appointed on account of the conspiracy of the Latin states against Rome. (Liv. ii. 18; Dionys. v. 98; Zonar, viii. 13.) According to some accounts, he had to dedicate the temple of Saturn, in 497, in accordance with a decree of the senate. (Dionys.
vi. 1.) AURUURNCUS was consul again, in 493, and entered upon his office during the accession of the plebs, who had occupied the Aventine. He carried on war successfully against the Volsciens, and took several of their towns. It was during this campaign that C. Marcus first distinguished himself at Corioli, whence he obtained the surname of Coriolanus. (Liv. ii. 53; Dionys. vi. 49, 91, 94; Cie. der Rep. ii. 38, pro Balb. 23; Plut. Coriol. 3.) It was probably on account of Coriolanus having saved under him that Auruncus is represented as one of the ambassadors sent to Coriolanus when the latter was marching against Rome. (Dionys. vii. 22.)
AUSONIUS.
AUSONIUS (Ausew), a son of Odysseus either by Calypso or Circe. (Texts. ad Lyogroph, 44, 696; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 555; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171; Suidas, s. v. Ausew.) The country of the Auruncans was believed to have derived from him
the name of Ausonia. Dionysius (i. 72), in enumcerating the sons of Odysseus by Circe, does not mention AUSON. Liripus, from whom the name of the island of Lipara was derived, is called a son of AUSON. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Aoev.)
AUSONIUS, who in the oldest MSS. is entitled DECIMUS MAGNUS AUSONIUS, although the first two names are found neither in his own poems, nor in those of his contemporaries, by Symvamporos.
AUSOINUS, in the works of any ancient author, was born at Bourdeaux in the early part of the fourth century. His father, Julius Ausonius, who followed the profession of medicine, appears to have been a person of high consideration, since he was at one period invested with the honorary title of praefect of Illyricum; but there is no ground for the assertion of Secliger, frequently repeated even in the most recent works, that he acted as physician in ordinary to the emperor Valentinian. If we can trust the picture of the parent drawn by the hand of the son, he must have been a very wonder of genius, wisdom, and virtue. (Polyl. iii. 25; Paris.
Parental. i. 9, &c.) The maternal grandfather of our poet, Caelicius Argicidus Arborius, was being served in judicial astrology, erected a scheme of the natuity of young Ausonius, and the horoscope was found to promise high fame and advancement.
(Parental. iv. 17, &c.) The prediction was, in all probability, in some degree the cause of its own accomplishment. The whole of his kindred took a deep interest in the boy whose career was to prove so brilliant. His infant years were sedu-lously watched by his grandmother, Aemilia Corinthia Muma, wife to Caelicius Arborius, and by his maternal aunts, Aemilia Hilaria and Aemilia Dryadia, the former of whom was a holy woman, devoted to God and chastity. (Parental. vii.
and xxx.) He received the first rudiments of the Greek and Latin languages from the most distinguished masters of his native town, and his education was completed under the superintendence of Aemilius Magnus Arborius, his mother's brother, who taught rhetoric publicly at Toulonous, and who is named as the author of an elegy still extant, Ad Nyphum aminis cultum. (Prophet. vili. 12, &c., x. 16, iii. 1, i.
11; Parental. iii. 12, &c.; Wernsdorf, Poet.
Lat. Minores, vol. iii. p. 217.) Upon his return to Bourdeaux he practised for a while at the bar;
but at the age of thirty began to give instructions
as a grammatician, and not long after was promoted in the professor of rhetoric. The duties of this office were discharged by him for many years, and with such high reputation that he was summoned to court in order that he might act as the tutor of Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian. (Praef. ad Sygn. 15, &c.) Judging from the honours which were now rapidly showered down upon him, he must have acquired himself in his important charge to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He received the title of count (comes) and the post of quaeator from Valentinian, after whose death he was appointed by his pupil praefectus of Latium, of Libyca, and of Gaul, and at length, in the year 378, was elevated to the consularship, thus verifying to the letter, as Bayle has observed, the apothegm of Juvenal:

AUSONIUS.
The letter of Grattian, conferring the dignity, and the grateful reply of Ausonius, are both extant. After the death of Grattian he retired from public life, and ended his days in a country retreat at no great distance from his native city (Epist. xxiv.), without heirs, however, his court favour, for we have direct evidence that he was patronised by Theodosius. (Prefatissimule, i.)

The precise dates of the birth and of the death of Ausonius are alike unknown. That he was born about the beginning of the fourth century, as stated above, is evident from the fact, that he speaks of himself as far advanced in years when invested with the consulship (Grat. Act.), and he was certainly alive in 383, since he refers to the victory of Theodosius over Maximus, and the death of the "Rutulian robber." (Clar. Urb. viii.)

Judging from the fond terms in which Ausonius speaks of his relations, the kindly feeling which appears to have been maintained between himself and several of his pupils, and the warm gratitude expressed by him towards his benefactors, we should be led to conclude that he was gentle, warm-hearted, and affectionate; but it is so very easy to be amiable upon paper, that we have perhaps no right to form any decided opinion upon his character. His religious faith has been the subject of keen controversy, but there seems to be little difficulty in determining the question. From his cradle he was surrounded by Christian relatives, he was selected by a Christian emperor to guide the studies of his Christian son, and he openly professes Christianity in several of his poems. It is on the best authority, and one that friend and quenamian disciple, Pontius Paulinus, the famous bishop of Nola, frequently upholds him on account of his aversion to the pure faith. 2. That several of his pieces are grossly impure. 3. That his works contain frequent allusions to Pagan mythology, without any distinct declaration of disbelief. 4. That he was the intimate friend of Symmachus, who was notorious for his hostility to Christianity. 5. That the compositions in which he professes Christianity are spurious. To which arguments we may briefly reply, that the first fails to the ground, because the assertion, on which it rests, is entirely false; that if we admit the validity of the second and third, we might demonstrate the poet who has lived since the revival of letters to be infidel; that the fourth proves nothing, and that the fifth, the rest being set aside, amounts to a petitio principii, since it is supported by no independent evidence external or internal. His poetical powers have been variously estimated. While some refuse to allow him any merit whatever, others contend that had he lived in the age of Augustus, he would have successfully disputed the palm with the brightest luminaries of that epoch. Without stopping to consider what he might have become under a totally different combination of circumstances, a sort of discussion which can never lead to any satisfactory result, we may pronounce with some confidence, that of all the highest attributes of a poet Ausonius possesses not one. Considerable neatness of expression may be discerned in several of his epigrams, many of which are evidently translations from the Greek; we have a very favourable specimen of his descriptive powers in the Mosella, perhaps the most pleasing of all his pieces; and some of his epistles, especially that to Paulinus (xxiv.) are by no means deficient in grace and dignity. But even in his happiest efforts we discover a total want of taste both in matter and manner, a disposition to introduce on all occasions, withal judgment, the thoughts and language of preceding writers, while no praise except that of misplaced ingenuity can be conceded to the great bulk of his minor effusions, which are for the most part sad trash. His style is frequently harsh, and in latinity and verisimilitude he is far inferior to Claudian.

His extant works are—

1. Epigrammata Ebor., a collection of 150 epigrams. 2. Ephemeris, containing an account of the business and proceedings of a day. 3. Parentalia, a series of short poems addressed to friends and relations on their decease. From these Vinicius has extracted a very complete catalogue of the kindred of Ausonius, and constructed a genealogical tree. 4. Professores, notices of the Professors of Bourdeaux, or of those who being natives of Bourdeaux gave instructions elsewhere. 5. Epitaphe bapt. Harum, epitaphs on the heroes who fell in the Trojan war and a few others. 6. A metrical catalogue of the first twelve Caesars, the period during which each reigned, and the manner of his death. 7. Petruschius, on the Caesars from Julius to Elagabalus. 8. Clarus Urbis, the praises of fourteen illustrious cities. 9. Ludus Septem Spargintius, the doctrines of the seven sages expounded by each in his own person. 10. Idyllia, a collection of twenty poems on different subjects, to several of which dedications in prose are prefixed. The most remarkable are, Epidecmiae in patriae Juliani Antonino; Assegni Vicipa; Fudiis cruce affatus; Mosella; and the two celebrated Cento Nymphia. 11. Eclogarium, short poems connected with the Calendar and with some matters of domestic computation. 12. Epistolae, twenty-five letters, some in verse, some in prose, some partly in verse and partly in prose, addressed to various friends. 13. Gratianarum Acta pro Consulatu, in prose, addressed to the emperor Grattian. 14. Pericliae, short arguments to each book of the Iliad and Odyssey. 15. Tres Prefatissimulan, one of them addressed to the emperor Theodosius.

The Edito Principes of Ausonius appeared at Venice in folio, without a printer's name in a volume bearing the date 1472, and containing Pro bono Consilio, the eclogues of Calpurnius, in addition to which some copies have the Epidsa on the death of Druasus and some opusculum of Publicus Gregorius Tifenus. It is extremely scarce. The first edition, in which Ausonius is found separately, is that edited by J. A. Ferrarius, fol. Mediolan. 1490, printed by Ulricus Schinzeller. The first edition, in which the whole of the extant works are collected in a complete form, is that of Tadeus Urgelotus, printed by his brother Angelus, at Parma, 4to. 1499. The first edition, which exhibits a tolerable text, is that of Phil. Junta, 5vo. Flor. 1517; and the best edition is the Variorum of Volius, 5vo. Amst. 1671. [W. R.]

AUSONIUS, JULIUS, an eminent physician, who, however, is chiefly known by his being the father of the poet of the same name, from whose works almost all the events of his life are to be learned. He was a native of Cassio Vastum (the modern Bassus), but removed to Burdigala (Bourdeaux). He married Aemilia Aenania, with whom he lived thirty-six years, and by whom he had four children, two sons, Decius Magnus Ausonius and Avitianus, and two daughters, Aemilia Melania and Julia Dryadia. He was appointed praefect of Illyricum by the emperor Valentinian. (A.D. 364–375.) He died at the age of eighty-eight (Auson. Parent. i. 4) or ninety (Id. Epodic. v. 61), after having enjoyed perfect health both of body and mind. If he at all resembled the description given of him by his biographer, he must have been a most remarkable man, as almost every intellectual and moral excellence is attributed to him. He wrote some medical works, which are not now extant. (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 96, ed. vet.; Scaliger, Vites Auson.; Ausonius, Parent. i. and Epodic.) [W. A. G.]

AUTARIUS (Αὐτάριος), the leader of the Gallic mercenaries in the Carthaginian army in Africa, took an active part in the rebellion against Carthage at the end of the first Punic war. He at length fell into the power of Hannibal, and was crucified, n. c. 258. (Polyb. l. 77, 79, 80, 83, 86.)

AUTESION (Αὐτέσιος), a son of Tissamenus, grandson of Therander, and great-grandson, by Polyxena, of Therserion and Argeia, by the latter of whom Aristodemus became the father of Euryshanes and Procles. He was a native of Thessaly, where he had succeeded his father as king, but at the command of an oracle he went to Peloponnesus and joined the Doriens. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2; Paus. iii. 15. § 4, 3. § 3, ix. 5. § 8; Herod. iv. 147; vi. 52; Strab. viii. p. 347.) [L. S.]

AUTOLODES (Αὐτολόδης). 1. Son of Tolmaeus, was one of the Athenian commanders in the successful expedition against Cythera, n. c. 424 (Thuc. iv. 53); and, together with his two colleagues, Nicias and Nicostratus, he ratified, on the part of Athens, the truce which in n. c. 425 was concluded for one year with Sparta. (Thuc. iv. 119.)

2. Son of Strombichides, was one of the Athenian envoys empowered to negotiate peace with Sparta in n. c. 371. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. § 2; comp. Diod. xiv. 38.) Xenophon (Hell. vi. 3. § 7, &c.) reports a somewhat injudicious speech of his, which was delivered on this occasion before the congress at Sparta, and by which no means confirms the character, ascribed to him in the same passage, of a skilful orator. It was perhaps this same Autolochus who, in n. c. 363, was appointed to the command in Tisane, and was brought to trial for having caused, by his inactivity there, the triumph of Cotys over the rebel Miltiodynes. (Dem. c. Aris- tocr. p. 655, c. Polyc. p. 1207.) Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 23. § 12) refers to a passage in a speech of Autolochus against Miximides, as illustrating one of his rhetorical τόατο. [E. E.] AUTOCRATES (Αὐτοκράτης), an Athenian, a poet of the old comedy. One of his plays, the Τύπωναυατη, is mentioned by Suidas and Aelian. (V. H. xii. 9.) He also wrote several tragedies. (Suidas, s. v. Αὐτοκράτης.)

The Autocrates whose Αὐτοχάιδης is quoted by Athenaeus (ix. p. 395 and xi. p. 490) seems to have been a different person. [C. P. M.]

AUTOLAUS (Αὐτολαύς), a son of Arcas, who found and brought up the infant Asclepius when exposed in Thebes. (Paus. viii. 4. § 2, 25. § 12; L. D.)

AUTOLEON (Αὐτολέων), an ancient hero of Croton in southern Italy, concerning whom the following story is related:—It was customary with the Opuntian Locrians, whenever they drew up their army in battle array, to leave one place in the lines open for their national hero Ajax. [A. A.] Once in a battle between the Locrians and Crotomians in Italy, Autoleon wanted to penetrate into this vacant place, hoping thus to conquer the Locrians. But the shade of Ajax appeared and inflicted on Autoleon a wound from which he suffered severely. The Locrians thyed him, but Ajax by offering sacrifices to him in the island of Lefce. This was done accordingly, and Autoleon was cured. While in the island of Lefce, Autoleon also saw Helen, who gave him a commission to Stesichorus. This poet had censured Helen in one of his poems, and had become blind in consequence. Helen now sent him the message, that if he would recant, his sight should be restored to him. Stesichorus composed a poem in praise of Helen, and recovered his sight. (Conon, Narra. 16.) Pausanias (iii. 19. § 11) relates precisely the same story of one Leonymus. [L. S.]

AUTOLYCUS (Αὐτόλυκος). 1. Son of Heracleus and Acadimela by Chloe, Phrygian, of Telenge. (Apollod. i. 7. § 16; Hygin. Fab. 201; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 304.) He was the husband of Neera (Paus. viii. 4. § 3), or according to Homer (Od. xix. 394, &c.), of Amphitrite, by whom he became the father of Antiope, the mother of Odysseus and Aeneas. He had his residence on mount Parnassus, and was renowned among men for his cunning and oaths. (Comp. Hygin. l. c.; Ov. Met. xi. 311.) Once when he came to Ithaca as a guest, the nurse placed his newly-born grandson Odysseus on his knees, and he gave the child the name Odysseus. Afterwards, when Odysseus was staying with him, he was wounded by a boar during the chase on Parnassus, and it was by the scar of this wound that Odysseus was subsequently recognized by his aged nurse, when he returned from Troy. (Paus. x. 3. § 4; Ov. Met. xi. 295, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 208.) Polyomed, the mother of Jason, was, according to Apollodorus, a daughter of this Autolykos, and the same writer (ii. 4. § 9) not only describes him as the teacher of Hercules in the art of wrestling, but mentions him among the Argonauts; the latter of which statements arose undoubtedly from a confusion of this Autolykos with the Thessalian of the same name. Autolykos is very famous in ancient story as a successful robber, who had even the power of metamorphosing both the stolen goods and himself. (Hom. R. x. 257; Hygin. Fab. 201; Apollod. ii. 6. § 2; Strab. iv. p. 439; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 409; Serv. ad Aen. li. 70.)

2. A Thessalian, son of Dalmachus, who together with his brothers Deileon and Phaligous joined Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons. But after having gone astray the two brothers dwelt at Sinope, until they joined the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 955, &c.; Valer. Flacc. v. 115.) He was subsequently regarded as the founder of Sinope, where he was worshipped as a god and had an oracle. After the conquest of Sinope by the Romans, his statue was carried from thence by Lucullus to Rome. (Strab. xiii. p. 546.) It must be noticed, that Hyginus (Fab. 14) calls him a son of Phrixus and Chalcides, and a brother of Phronius, Demophon, and Pheres. [L. S.]

AUTOLYCUS (Αὐτόλυκος), a young Athenian of singular beauty, the object of the affection of Callias. It is in honour of a victory gained by him in the pentathlon at the Great Panathenean that Callias gives the banquet described by Xenophon. (Comp. Athen. v. p. 187.) [C. P. M.]

AUTOLOUS (Ἀυτολόος). 1. An Areopagite, who was accused by the orator Lycurgus on account of removing his wife and children from Athens after the battle of Chaeroneia, b. c. 338, and was condemned by the judges. The speech of Lycurgus against Autolous was extant in the time of Horapollo, but has not come down to us. (Lycurg. c. Leon. p. 177, ed. Reiske; Harpocr. s. v. Αὐτολόος, ἡ δίκη; Plut. Vit. Α. Χ. Ort. p. 843, c. d.)

2. The son of Agathocles, and the brother of Lycurgus, was appointed one of the body-guard of King Philip of Macedon, b. c. 321. (Arran, op. Phil. Cod. 92, p. 72, n. 14, ed. Bekker.)

AUTOLOUS (Ἀυτολόου), a mathematician, who is said to have been a native of Pitane in Aeolis, and the first instructor of the philosopher Aresillas. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 29.) From this, it would follow, that he lived about the middle of the fourth century B. C., and was contemporary with Aristotle. We know nothing more of his history. He wrote two astronomical treatises, which are still extant, and are among the most ancient existing specimens of the Greek mathematics. The first is on the Motions of the Sphere (σφαίρης κυλινδρικὴν ἀρχήν). It contains twelve propositions concerning a sphere which with its principal circles is supposed to revolve uniformly about a fixed diameter, whilst a fixed great circle (the horizon) always divides it into two hemispheres (the visible and invisible). Most of them are still explicitly or implicitly included amongst the elements of astronomy, and they are such as would naturally result from the first systematic application of geometrical reasoning to the apparent motion of the heavens. This treatise may be considered as introductory to the second, which is on the risings and settings of the fixed stars, περὶ ἑξαυτῶν καὶ ἄλλων, in two books. Autolous first defines the true risings and settings, and then the apparent. The former happen when the sun and a star are actually in the horizon together; and their positions are observed, because the sun’s light makes the star invisible. The latter happen when the star is in the horizon, and the sun just so far below it that the star is visible, and there are in general four such phenomena in the year in the case of any particular star; namely, its first visible rising in the morning, its last visible rising in the evening, its first visible setting in the morning, and last visible setting in the evening.

In a favourable climate, the precise day of each of these occurrences might be observed, and such observations must have constituted the chief business of practical astronomy in its infancy; they were, moreover, of some real use, because these phenomena afforded a means of defining the seasons of the year. A star when rising or setting is visible according to its brilliancy, if the sun be from 10 to 18 degrees below the horizon. Autolous supposes 15 degrees, but reckons them along the ecliptic instead of a vertical circle; and he proceeds to establish certain general propositions concerning the intervals between these apparent risings and settings, taking account of the star’s position with respect to the ecliptic and equator. It was impossible, without trigonometry, to determine beforehand the absolute time at which any one of them would happen; but one having been observed, the rest might be roughly predicted, for the same star, by the help of these propositions. The demonstrations, and even the enunciations, are in some cases not easily understood without a globe; but the figures used by Autolous are simple. There is nothing in either treatise to show that he had the least conception of spherical trigonometry.

There seems to be no complete edition of the Greek text of Autolous. There are three Greek manuscripts of each treatise in the Bodleian and Savilian libraries at Oxford. The propositions without the demonstrations were printed in Greek and Latin by Dauphodius in his “Sphæricæ Doctrinæ Propositiones,” Argent. 1672. Both the works were translated into Latin from a Greek MS. by J. a. Auris, Rom. 1587 and 1588; and a translation of the first by Maurolycus, from an Arabic version, is given, without the name of Autolous, at p. 245 of the “Universae Geometiae, etc. Synopsis” of Merremius, Paris, 1649.

A full account of the works of Autolous may be found in Delambre’s Hist. de l’Astronomie Ancienne. Brucker quotes an essay by Carposavus, de Autolusi Pitaneo Dietrib, Lips. 1744. See also Schaubach, Geschichte der Griechischen Astronomie, p. 338; Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. ii. p. 89. [W. F. D.]

AUTOMATE (Ἀυτοματή), one of the Danads, who, according to Apollodorus (ii. 1, § 5) and others, killed Busiris, who was betrothed to her; whereas, according to Pausanias (vii. 1, § 3), she was married to Archites, the son of Achaos, who emigrated from Phthiotis in Thessaly to Argos with Areschand. [L. S.]

AUTOMATIA (Ἀυτοματία) a surname of Tycche or Fortuna, which seems to characterize her as the goddess who manages things according to her own will, without any regard to the merit of man. Under this name Timoleon built to the goddess a sanctuary in his house. (Plut. De Rei Laude, p. 542, e; Nepos, Timol. 4.) [L. S.]

AUTOMEDON (Ἀυτομέδων), a son of Diomedes, was, according to Homer, the charioteer and companion of Achilles, whose portraiture (I. v. 97) makes him sail by himself with ten ships against Troy. According to Virgil (Aen. ii. 476), he fought bravely by the side of Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. (Hom. ii. ii. 209, xiv. 148, 219, xv. 429, &c, xiii. 392, xxiv. 474.) [L. S.]

AUTOMEDON (Ἀυτομέδων), of Cysicus, a Greek epigrammatic poet, twelfth of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. (v. 129, x. 23, xi. 29, 46, 50, 519, 324—326, 340, 361, xii. 34.) He must have lived in the first century of the Christian era, as one of his poems is addressed to Nicias, a distinguished orator in the reign of Nerva. One of the epigrams usually attributed to Theocritus (Anth. Graece, vii. 534; No. 9, in Kieslings’s edition of Theocritus, p. 779) has in the manuscript the inscription Ἀυτομέδων Αἰγαλύτης: if this is correct there must have been an Aetolian poet of the name of Automedon.

AUTOMÉDUSA. [ALCATHOUS.]

AUTO'NE (Ἀτονή), a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, was the wife of Aristaeus, by whom she became the mother of Polydorus. (Hesiod. Theog. 977; Paus. x. 17, § 3.) According to Apollodorus (iii. 4, § 2, &c.), Polydorus was a brother of Autonoe, and Actaeon was her son. (Comp. Didot. iv. 81.) Autonoe together with her sister Agave tore Pentheus to pieces in their Bacchic fury. (Hygin. Fab. 184.) At last grief and sadness at the lamentable fate of the house of her father induced her to quit Thebes, and she went to Elis, in the territory of Mogara, where her tomb was shown as late as the time of Pausanias. (i. 44. § 6.) There are five other mythical personages of this name. (Hesiod. Theog. 258; Apollod. i. 3. § 7, ii. 1. §§ 5, 7, §§ 9; Paus. viii. 9. § 2; Hom. Od. xvii. 182.)

AUTOPHABATES (Ἀυτοφάβατος), a Persian who distinguished himself as a general in the reign of Artaxerxes III. and Dareius Codomannus. In the reign of the former he made Autobazus, the revolted satrap of Lydia and Ionia, his prisoner, but afterwards set him free. (Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 671.) [ARTABAZUS, No. 4.] After the death of the Persian admiral, Memnon, in B.C. 535, Autophradates and Pharnabazus undertook the command of the fleet, and reduced Mytilene, the siege of which had been begun by Memnon. Pharnabazus now sailed with his prisoners to Lydia, and Autophradates attacked the other islands of the Aegean, which espoused the cause of Alexander the Great. But Pharnabazus soon after joined the Autophradates again, and both sailed against Tenedos, which was induced by force to surrender to the Persians. (Arrian, Anab. ii. 1.) During these expeditions Autophradates also laid siege to the town of Athens in Myus, but without success. (Aristot. Politi. ii. 4. §§ 10.) Among the Persian satraps who appeared before Alexander at Zadaracata, Arrian (Anab. iii. 25) mentions an Autophradates, satrap of the Tapuri, whom Alexander left in possession of the satrapy. But this satrap is undoubtedly a different person from the Autophradates who commanded the Persian fleet in the Aegean. [L. S.]

AUTRONIA GENS, of which the only family-name mentioned is PARIUS. Persons of this gens first came into notice in the last century of the republic: the first member of it who obtained the consulship was P. Autronius Paccius, in B.C. 65.

AUXESIA (Ἄυξεσία), the goddess who grants growth and prosperity to the fields, a surname of Persephone. According to a Troczenian legend, there came once during an insurrection at Troezen two Cretan maidens, Auxesia and Damia, who was probably Demeter, and who, in our editions of Pausanias, is called Lamia (perhaps only an incorrect reading for Damia). During the tumult, the two maidens were stoned to death, whereupon the Troczenians paid divine honours to them, and instituted the festival of the Lithobolia. (Paus. ii. 32. § 3.) According to an Epidaurian and Aeginaean tradition, the country of Epidaurus was visited by a season of scarcity, and the Delphic oracle advised the Epidaurians to erect statues of Auxesia and Damia, which were to be made of olive-wood. The Epidaurians therefore asked permission of the Athenians to cut down an Attic olive-tree. The request was granted, on condition that the Epidaurians should every year offer up sacrifices to Athena Agraulos and Erechtheus. When the condition was complied with, the country of Epidaurus again bore fruit as before. Now when about B.C. 540 Aegina separated itself from Epidaurus, which had till then been regarded as its metropolis, the Epidaurians, who had had their sacra in common with the Epidaurians, took away the two statues of Auxesia and Damia, and erected them in a part of their own island called Oea, where they offered sacrifices and celebrated mysteries. When the Epidaurians, in consequence of this, ceased to perform the sacrifices at Aegina, and the Athenians heard of the statues being carried to Aegina, they demanded their surrender of the Aeginaeans. The islanders refused, and the Athenians threw ropes round the sacred statues, to drag them away by force. But thunder and earthquakes ensued, and the Athenians engaged in the work were seized with madness, in which they killed one another. Only one of them escaped to carry back to Athens the sad tidings. The Aeginaeans added to this legend, that the statues, when the Athenians were dragging them down, fell upon their knees, and that they remained in this attitude ever after. (Herod. v. 82-86; Paus. iii. 30. § 5; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 122; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 10. § 4, note f, iv. 6. § 11, Aeginae, p. 171.) [L. S.]

AUROX (Ἀυρόξ), 1. [HORÆ].

2. An ancient Attic divinity, who was worshipped, according to Pausanias (ix. 35. § 1), together with Hecate, under the name of Charites. [CHARITÆS.]

AXILLA GENS, plebeian, of which very little is known, as there are only two or three persons of this name mentioned by ancient writers. There is a coin of this gens bearing on the obverse the cognomen Nauso, and on the reverse the inscription L. AXXIIUS L. F. (Ekhol. p. 149); AXXIIUS being instead of AXXIUS, in the same way as we find MUSIUSE for MISIUSE and Alexandrea for Alexanndrea. We do not know who this L. AXXIIUS Nauso was; as the AXXII mentioned by ancient writers have no cognomina. [AXIUS.]

AXYROS (Ἀχύρος), a daughter of Cadmus, and one of the three Samothracian Cabiri. According to the Paris Scholia on Appollonius (i. 915-921), she was the same as Demeter. The two other Cabiri were Arionessa (Persephone), and Arionessa (Hades). [CAHRI.]

AXILLA, the name of a family of the Servilia gens, which is merely another form of AXXIIA. Axilla is a diminutive of Alia. (Comp. Cic. Oreat. 45.) We have only one person of this name mentioned, namely, C. SERVILIUS Q. F. C. N. (STUCUSS) AXILLA, consul tribune in B.C. 419 and again in 418, in the latter of which he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas. This is the account of the Fasti Capitolini; but Livy calls the consul tribune in B.C. 418 only C. Servilius, and says that he was the son of the dictator Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas. He also tells us that some annals related, that the magister equitum was the son of the dictator, while others called him Servilius Ahala (Axilla). (Liv. iv. 45, 46.)

AXION (Ἀξίων). 1. A son of Phegius of Psophis, and brother of Temenus and Araios or Alphesiboeus. (Paus. viii. 24. § 4.) Appollodorus (iii. 7. § 5) calls the two sons of Phegius, Agenor and Pronos. [AGENOR, No. 5, ALGARON, AGARANN.] 2. A son of Piam, who was slain by Euryppus, the son of Eumeneum. (Hygin. Fab. 90; Paus. x. 27.) [L. S.]

AXYONICUS (Ἀξιωνίκους), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy. Some important fragments of the following plays have been preserved by Athenaeus: the Τούντακος or Τούντυρκος (iv. p. 166, vi. p. 244); Φιλευρίνη (iv. p. 175, viii. p. 166).
AZE'SIA. 342); Ἀλία (x. p. 442); Χαλεπιδίς (vi. p. 230, ii. p. 95). [C. P. M.]

ΧΙΟΠΙΣΤΟΣ (Ἀχιόπιστος), a Locrian or Gall, was the son of a poet entitled Ἀρμινίαν, which was commonly ascribed to Epicarnus. (Athen. xiv. p. 648, d. c.)

ἈΧΙΟΠΟΘΟΣ (Ἀχιώποθος), the avenger, a surname of Athenia. Under this name Heracles built a temple to the goddess at Spera, after he had chastised Hippocon and his sons for the murder of Oousis. (Paus. iii. 15, § 4.) [L. S.]

ΑΧΙΟΘΕΛΟΣ (Ἀχιόθελος). (A. R. iii. 7.)

ΑΧΙΟΤΗΘΟΣ (Ἀχιότηθος), the first wife of Nicocles, king of Paphius. When Nicocles, by the command of Ptolemy Lagi, killed himself, Achiotea slew her daughters with her own hand, to prevent their falling into the hands of their enemies, and then, together with her sisters-in-law, killed herself. (Diod.
xx. 21; Polyena. Strateg. viii. 48.)

2. A native of Philius, who came to Athens, and putting on male attire, was for some time a hearer of Plato, and afterwards of Socrates. (Diog.
Laërt. iii. 46, iv. 2; Clem. Alex. Stromat. iv. p. 523; Themistius. Orat. iv.) [C. P. M.]

ἈΧΙΟΥΣ (Ἀχιόυς), a Peonian river-god, who begot by Periboea a son, Pelemon, the father of Asteropoeus. (Hom. I. xxii. 141, with the note of Estath. Asylymop.) [L. S.]

ΑΧΙΟΥΣ, I. L. ΑΧΙΟΥΣ, a Roman knight, mentioned by Varro. (R. R. iii. 7.)

2. Q. Axius, an intimate friend of Cicero and Varro, the latter of whom has introduced him as one of the speakers in the third book of his De Risica. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. iii. 15, iv. 15.)
Suetonius quotes (Coes. 9) from one of Cicero's letters to Axius, and Gellius speaks (vii. 3) of a letter which Tiro, the freedman of Cicero, wrote to Axius, the friend of his patron. Axius was a man of wealth, and was accustomed to lend money, if at least the Axius to whom Cicero talked of applying in b. c.
61 (ad Att. i. 12), is the same as the above. In
b. c. 49, however, we find that Axius was in
Cicero's debt. (ad Att. xi. 11, 13, 15.)

AXUR. [A. X. Y.]

AZAN (Ἀζάν), a son of Arcas and the nymph Erato, was the brother of Apheidas and Eustas, and father of Cleitor. The part of Arendis in which he received from his father was called, after him, Azania. After his death, funeral games, which were believed to have been the first in Greece, were celebrated in his honour. (Paus. viii. 4. § § 2, 3, v. 1. § 6; Steph. Brys. s. v. Άζάνα.) [L. S.]

AZANITIDES (Ἀζανίτιδες), a physician whose medical formulae appear to have enjoyed some celebrity, as they are quoted with approbation by
p. 784), Orbitas (Sympos. iii. p. 45), Aétius (Tet-
ii. 21. p. 772), Paulus Aegineta (iv. 55. p. 530, vii. 19. p. 680), and others. As Galen is the earliest writer by whom he is mentioned, he must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

AZELLICUS (Ἀζελλικοῦς), king of Tyre, was serving in the Persian fleet under Autophatades
at the time when Alexander arrived at Tyre, b. c.
332. He was in the city when it was taken, but his life was spared by Alexander. (Arrian, ii. 15, 24.)

ἈΖΕΣΙΔΑ (Ἀζεσίδα), a surname of Demeter and Persephone, which is derived either from ἀζεσίδερα tōs ἀζεσίδερα, to dry fruits, or from ἀζεσίδον, to seek.
( Zend. iv. 20; Suid. s. v.; Hesych. s. v.; Sphaheim, ad Callim. p. 740.) [L. S.]

AZEUΣ (Ἀζεύς), a son of Clymenus of Orcho-menus, was a brother of Erginus, Stratus, Arrhon, and Pylus, father of Actor and grandfather of Astoche. (Hom. Η. ii. 513; Paus. ix. 37, § 2.)
He went with his brothers, under the command of Erginus, the eldest, against Thebes, to take vengeance for the murder of his father, who had been slain by the Thebans at a festival of the Oroches-tian Poseidon. [Erginus, Clymenus.] [L. S.]

AZEUΣ (Ἀζεύς), according to Hesychius (s. v.), the husband of the ship Argo, who is said to have built the Pelagonian town of Azoros.
(Steph. Brys. s. v.) [L. S.]

B.

ΒΑΒΙΛΟΣ, an astrologer at Rome, in the reign of Nero (Suet. Nero. c. 36), is perhaps the same as Barbillus. [BARBILUS.]

ΒΑΒΙΟΝΟΣ (Βαβίονος), or ΒΑΒΡΙΑΣ (Βαβρίας), sometimes also called ΒΑΒΙΛΙΑΣ (Βαβίλιας), who is not a different person from Babrion, as Bentley supposed, a Greek poet, who after the example of Socrates turned the Aesopian fables into verse.
The emperor Julian (Ep. 90) is the first writer who mentions Babrion; but as some of Babrion's verses are quoted by Apollonius in his Homeric Lexicon (s. v. Άβιλια), though without mentioning his name, he lived in all probability before the time of Augustus. [APOLLONIUS, No. 5.] This is in accordance with the account of Avianus, who speaks (Prog.) of Babrion before Phaedrus.

The work of Babrion, which was in Chollianic verses [see p. 47, b.], was called Μέθοι και Μυθίστος, and was comprised in ten books according to Suidas (s. v. Βαβίλος), or two volumes (voluminia) according to Avianus. His version, which is one of no ordinary merit, seems to have been the basis of all the Aesopian fables which have come down to us in various forms. Later writers of Aesopian fables, such as Maximus Planudes, probably turned the poems of Babrion into prose, but they did it in so clumsy a manner, that many choliastic verses may still be traced in their fables, as Bentley has shown in his dissertation on Aesop's fables.
[AESOPUS, p. 48, a.]

Bentley was the first writer who called the attention of the learned to this fact, which was proved still more clearly by Tyrwhitt
in his dissertation "De Babro, Fabularum Aesop-ianum Scriptorem," Lond. 1776, reprinted at Erangen, 1785, ed. Harles. To this treatise Tyrwhitt added the fragments of Babrion, which were but few in number and chiefly taken from Suidas; but several of his complete poems have been discovered in a Florentine and Vatican MS., and were first published by de Furia under the title of "Fabulae Aesopicae, quales ante Plutodem forebant," Flor. 1809. They have also been edited by J. Gl.
Schneider, "Aesopi Fabulae, cum Fabulis Babrii," Vratisl. 1812; by Berger, BabroÁαμενούς έλθαν και βιλιανών βελτίων τρία, &c., Monach. 1816; and by Knoch, "Babrion Fabulæ et Fabularum Fragmenta, Halis Sax. 1835.

ΒΑΒΡΙΛΙΟΣ. [BARCILLUS.]

ΒΑΒΡΙΟΣ (Βαβρίος). I. The same according to Hellanicius (op. Athen. xv. p. 680, a.) as the Egyptian Typhon. [TYPHON.]
2. The author of Pherecydes. (Strab. x. p. 487; Diog. Laërt. i. 116.) [PHERECDYES.]

BACCHIDEAS (bacchigdus), of Sicyon, a dancer and teacher of music, in honour of whom there is an ancient epitaph of four lines preserved by Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 629 a.)

BACCHIEUS or BACCHITIUS, of Mileta, the author of a work on agriculture (Var. R. R. i. 1), who is referred to by Piny as one of the sources of his Natural History. (Blechus. lib. viii. x. xiv. xv. xvii. xviii.)

BACCHIEUS (bacchigdus), surnamed Senior (Διάφωρος), the author of a short musical treatise in the form of a catechism, called εἰς τοὺς γενικῶς τέχνης μουρσίνας. We know nothing of his history. Fabrius (Bibl. Grec. ii. p. 260, etc.) gives a list of persons of the same name, and conjectures that he may have been the Bacchieus mentioned by M. Aurelius Antoninus (de Rebus suis, i. 6) as his first instructor. The treatise consists of brief and clear explanations of the principal subjects belonging to Harmonics and Rhythm. Bacchiesis reckons seven modes (pp. 12, 18), corresponding to the seven species of octave anciently called by the same names. Hence Meliboumis (praef. in Arist. Quaet.) supposed that he lived after Ptolemy, who adopts the same system, and before Manuel Bryennius, in whose time an eighth (the Hypermixolydian) had been added. But the former supposition does not seem to rest on satisfactory grounds.

The Greek text of Bacchius was first edited by Marinus Marsenus, in his Commentary on the first six chapters of Genesis. (Paris, 1623, fol., p. 1887.) It was also printed in a separate form, with a Latin version, by Frederic Morelli, Paris, 1623, 8vo, and lastly by Meliboumis, in the Anti-Quae Musicae Anctorum Septem, Amst. 1652. An anonymous Greek epigram, in which Bacchus is mentioned, is printed by Meliboumis in his preface, from the same manuscript which contained the text; also by Fabrius. (c. c.) [W. F. D.]

BACCHIEUS (bacchigdus), one of the earliest commentators on the writings of Hippocrates, was a native of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Erol. Gloss. Hippo. p. 8.) He was a follower of Helobrias (Gal. Com. in Hippocr. "Aphor." vii. 70, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 127, and a contemporary of Phyllias, and must therefore have lived in the third century n.c. Of his writings (which were both valuable and interesting) nothing remains but a few fragments preserved by Eroistratus and Galen, by whom he is frequently mentioned. (Erol. Gloss. Hippocr. pp. 3, 39, 38, etc.; Gal. Com. in Hippocr. "Epyd. VI." i. proem. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 794; Comment. in Hippocr. "de Med. Offic." i. proem. vol. xviii. p. ii. p. 631.) [W. A. G.]

BACCHIADAE (bacchigdus), a Heracleid clan, derived their name from Bacchis, who was king of Corinth from 926 to 891 B.C., and retained the supreme rule in that state, first under a monarchial form of government, and then as a dynasty, till their deposition by Cypselus, about B.C. 657. Diodorus (Frugia, 6), in his list of the Heracleid kings, seems to imply that Bacchis was a lineal descendant from Aletes, who in B.C. 1074 disposed the Sisyphides and made himself master of Corinth (Wess. ad Diod. l.c.; Pind. Olymp. xiii. 17; Schol. ad Pind. Nom. vii. 155; Paus. ii. 4; Müll. Dor. i. 5 § 9); while from Pausanias (l.c.) it would rather appear that Bacchis was the founder of the new, though still a Heracleid, dynasty. In his line the throne continued till, in B.C. 748, Teleses was murdered by Argeius and Porantas, who were themselves Bacchides, and were perhaps the members of a general conspiracy of the clan to gain for their body a larger share of power than they enjoyed under the regal constitution. (Diod. and Paus. l. c.) From Diodorus, it would seem that a year, during which Automenes was king, elapsed before the actual establishment of oligarchy. According to the same author, this form of government, with annual tyrannies elected from and by the Bacchides, lasted for ninety years (747-657); nor does it appear on what grounds a period of 200 years is assigned to it by Strabo. (Strab. viii. p. 378; Müll. Dor. Append. ix. note x.) It was indeed too narrow and exclusive a kind to be of any very long duration; the members of the ruling clan intermarried only with one another (Herod. v. 92); and their downfall was moreover hastened by their excessive luxury (Ael. V. H. i. 19), as well as by their insolence and oppression, of which the atrocious outrage that drove Archias from Corinth, and led to the founding of Syracuse and Carystya, is probably no very unfair specimen. (Diod.Ec. de Virl. et. Vitr. v. 228; Plat. Apol. p. 772, c.; Schol. ad Apol. Rhoii. ib. 1212.) On their deposition by Cypselus, with the help of the lower orders (Herod. v. 92; Aristot. Politt. v. 10, 12, ed. Bekk.), they were for the most part driven into banishment, and were said to have taken refuge in different parts of Greece, and even Italy. (Plut. Lygand. c. 1; Liv. i. 34; comp. Niebuhr. Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 366, etc.) Some of them, however, appear to have still remained at Corinth, if we may consider as a Bacchidas the Heracleid Phallos, who led the colony to Epidamus in n. c. 627. (Thuc. i. 24.) As men of the greatest distinction among the Bacchides, may be mentioned Philloclus, the legislator of Thebes, about n. c. 728 (Aristot. Politt. ii. 12, ed. Bekk.), and Eumelus, the eulogist of poets (Paus. i. 3, v. 33; Athen. i. p. 22, c.; Schol. ad Pind. Olymp. xiii. 30; Müll. Hist. of Greek Lit. c. x. § 5.) Strabo tells us also (vii. p. 626) that the Eumelid dynasty claimed descent from the Bacchides. [E. E.]

BACCHIDES (bacchigdus), an eunuch of Mithridates. After the defeat of the latter by Lucullus, Mithridates in despair sent Bacchides to put his wives and sisters to death, n. c. 71. (Plut. Luclull. 18, &c.) Appian (Mith. 82) calls the eunuch Bacchus. The Bacchides, who was the governor of Sinope, at the time when this town was besieged by Lucullus, is probably the same as the above. (Strab. xii. p. 346.)

BACCHUS, [DIONYSUS]

BACCHYLIDES (bacchigdus). 1. One of the great lyric poets of Greece, was a native of Iulis in the island of Cees, and the nephew as well as fellow-townsmen of Simonides. (Strab. x. p. 426; Stephens, Byz. s. v. TOXAS.) His father is usually called Melampus (Suidas, s. s. BacaXpGdus), Melian (Epigr. in novum Lyr. ap. Theod. Schol. Pind. p. 8), or Meidylus (Erym. M. p. 562, 20); his paternal grandfather was the athlete Bacchylides. We know nothing of his life, except that he lived at the court of Hiero in Syracuse, together with Simonides and Pindar. (Aelian, V. H. iv. 15.) Eusebius makes him flourish in n. c. 450; but as Hiero died n. c. 457, and Bacchylides obtained great fame at his court, his poetical reputation must have been established as early as n. c. 470. The Scholast on Pindar frequently states (ad Or. ii. 154, 155, ad Pyth. ii. 131, 161, 165, 167, 171) that Bacchylides and Pindar were jealous of and opposed to one another; but whether this was the fact, or the story is to be attributed to the love of scandal which distinguishes the later Greek grammarians, it is impossible to determine.

The poems of Bacchylides were numerous and of various kinds. They consisted of Opisci (songs, like his pieces in honour of the victors in the public games), Hymin, Paeans, Dithyrambs, Prosodia, Hypercorneta, Erotica, and Paroemia or Drinking-songs; but all of these disappeared with the exception of a few fragments. It is, therefore, difficult to form an independent opinion of his poetical value; but as far as we can judge from what has come down to us, Bacchylides was distinguished, like Simonides, for the elegance and finish of his compositions. He was inferior to Pindar in strength and energy, as Longinus remarks (c. 33); and in his lamentations over the inexorable character of fate, and the necessity of submitting to death, he reminds us of the more elegiac. Like his predecessors in Lyric poetry, he wrote in the Doric dialect, but frequently introduces Attic forms, so that the dialect of his poems very much resembles that of the choancers in the Attic tragedies.

Besides his lyric poems there are two epigrams in the Greek Anthology attributed to Bacchylides, one in the Dorian and the other in the Ionic dialect, and there seems no reason to doubt their genuineness. The fragments of Bacchylides have been published by Neue, "Bacchylidés Cel Fragmenta," Berol. 1823, and by Bergk, "Poëtæ Lyrici Graeci," p. 620, &c.

2. Of Opus, a poet, whom Plato, the comic poet (about n. c. 400), attacked in his play entitled the Sophists. (Studia, a. e. Zopfia.)

BACCHYLUS (written Bacchylæus, by Eusebius, but given with only one t by Jerome, Rufinus, Sephranius, and Nicephorus), bishop of Corinth, flourished in the latter half of the second century, under Commodus and Severus. He is recorded by Eusebius and Jerome as having written on the question, so early and so long disputed, as to the proper time of keeping Easter. From the language of Eusebius, Valesius is disposed to infer that this was not a Synodical letter, but one which the author wrote in his own individual capacity. But Jerome says expressly, that Bacchylus wrote "de Pascha ex omnium qui in Achæia erant episcoporum persona." And in the ancient Greek Synodicon, published by Paprus at Strasburg in 1691, and inserted in both editions of Fabricius's Bibliotheca Graece, not only is this council registered as having been held at Corinth by Bacchylides, archbishop of that place, and eighteen bishops with him, but the celebration of Easter is mentioned as the subject of their deliberations. (Fabric. Bibl. Graece. xii. p. 364.) Notwithstanding the slight change of the name, and the designation of Bacchylides as archbishop of Corinth, there can be no reasonable doubt that he is the same with the bishop mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. v. 22, 23; Jerome, de Viris Illust. c. 44, and the note of E. S. Cyriac.)

BACHYLIUS, a Latin ecclesiastical writer, respecting whom we possess little authentic information. The following account of him is given by Gennadius, de Viris Illustris, c. 24: "Bachilius, vir Christianæ philosophiae, mundus et expeditus vacare Deo dispornens, etiam perergiomenton propser conservandum vitae integritate elegit. Edidisse diutius grata opuscula; sed ego ex illis unum tantum de fide libidinum legi, in quo satisfacti Pontifici urbi, adversus querulos et infamatores perergionum unum, et indicat, se non timore hominum, sed Dei, perergionem succipere, et extensio de eis scribit Abrahamum patriarcha."

To this brief account some additions of doubtful authority have been made by later writers. Bishop Bale calls him Bacchilios Maeceneus, says that he was a native of Great Britain, and a disciple of St. Patrick, and assigns the cruel oppressions under which his country was then groaning as the cause of his voluntary expatriation. Joannes Pitoeus (John Pits), the Roman Catholic chronicler, follows the account of Bale. Aubertus Miræus (Aubert Lembire) says that Bacchilius was an Irishman, a disciple of St. Patrick, and contemporary with St. Augustine. These statements rest on no evidence whatever, and are merely conjectures. "Bachilius," says M. Le Quien, "est un inexact, un incohérent, un injuste, un mauvais auteur.*

Schöenemann denies that there is any proof, that Bacchilius was a native either of Great Britain or Ireland; and, from the contents of the treatise de Fide, infers, that the author's country was Spain, and the heresy which he was solicits to disavow that of the Pescanistas. This notion agrees very well with the contents of the work de Fide; but as it is not supported, so far as we are aware, by any positive evidence, we are rather surprised to see it so boldly assumed by Neander (Gesch. der Christ. Religion, &c. ii. 8, p. 1485) as indubitably true.

The only surviving works of Bacchilius are the treatise "de Fide," mentioned above, and a letter to a certain Januaris, respecting the re-admission of a monk into the church, who had been excommunicated for seducing a nun. The "Officiatio in Evang.," inaccurately ascribed to Jerome, and the "Libri Duo de Deitate et Incarnatione Verbi ad Januarium," improperly clasped among the works of Augustin, are regarded by Florus as the productions of Bacchilius. This, though not intrinsically improbable, wants the confirmation of direct external proof. Pusepin, Bale, and Pits attribute other works to Bacchilius, but upon no sufficient grounds.

The "Epistola ad Januarium de recipienda Lapsis," or "De Reparatione Lapsi," was first published in the Monumenta S. Palmar Orthod. of John James Grynaeus, Basle, 1569. It was included in the Paris editions of de la

BACIS.

Bacis's Bibliotheca Patrum, 1575, vol. i. 1589, vol. iii. 1654, vol. iii.; in the Cologne edition, 1618, vol. v.; and in the Lyon's edition, 1677, vol. vi. The treatise "de Fide" was first published in the second volume of Muratori's Anecdota, Milan, 1697, where the text is given from a manuscript of great antiquity, and is accompanied by valuable prolegomena and notes. In 1748, both works were ably edited at Rome by Franchise Florius, who, besides other illustrative matter, added two learned dissertations, the first "de Harcresi Prisifallian," the second "de Scripitis et Decetris Bachiarii." This edition is reprinted in the ninth volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum. The works of Bacchus are also included in the fifteenth volume of Le Espagne Segreata of Henry Florio, a voluminous collection in thirty-four volumes quarto, Madrid, 1747-54.

From the scanty remains of this author it is hardly possible to form a very exact judgment of his character, learning, and abilities. So far as may be collected from the above-named treatises, he appears to have possessed an understanding somewhat above mediocrity, and well exercised in the current theological erudition of the Latin church during the fifth century. His spirit and tenor seem to have been singularly amiable. [H. J. M. M.]

L. BACILLUS, praetor n. c. 45, to whom Caesar would not assign a province, but gave a sum of money instead. Bacillus felt the indignity so much, that he put an end to his life by voluntary starvation. (Dion Cass. xiii. 47.) It is conjectured that Babullius, whose death Cicero mentions in this year (ad Att. xiii. 48), may be the same as the above.

BACIS (Bac[es]), seems to have been originally only a common noun derived from Baceus, to speak, and to have signified any prophet or speaker. In later times, however, Bacis was regarded as a proper noun, and the ancients distinguish several senses of the name.

1. The Boeotian, the most celebrated of them, was beloved to have lived and given his oracles at Helicon in Boeotia, being inspired by the nymphs of the Corycian cave. His oracles were held in high esteem, and, from the specimens we still possess in Herodotus and Pausanias, we see that, like the Delphic oracles, they were composed in hexameter verse. (Paus. iv. 27. § 2, ix. 17. § 4, x. 12. § 6, 14. § 3, 82. § 6; Herod. viii. 26, 77, 44; Aristoph. Pax. 1009 with the Schol., Esch. 123. Av. 907.) From these passages it seems evident, that in Boeotia Bacis was regarded as an ancient prophet, of whose oracles there existed a collection made either by himself or by others, similar to the Sibylline books at Rome; and, in fact, Cicero (de Divin. i. 19), Aelian (V. H. xii. 25), Tzetzes (ad Iogoph. 1278), and other writers, mention this Bacis always as being of the same class with the Sibyls.

2. The Arcadian, is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria as the only one besides the Boeotian. (Stron. i. p. 333.) According to Suidas, he belonged to the town of Caphya, and was also called Cydas and Alcles. (Comp. Tzetzes, ad Iogoph. Io.)

3. The Athenian, is mentioned along with the two others by Aelian, Suidus, Tzetzes, and the Scholiast on Aristophanes. (Pax. 1009; comp. Perizon. ad Aelian, V. H. xii. 25.) [L. S.]

BACIS or PACIS, is only another name for the Egyptian Onuphis, the sacred bull, who was worshiped at Hermouthis in Upper Egypt, just as Apis was at Memphis. In size Bacis was required to excite all other bulls, his hair to be briskly, and his colour to change every day. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 21; Aelian, Hist. An. xii. 11.) [L. S.]

BADIUS, a Campanian, challenged his hostes, T. Quinctius Crispinus, to single combat when the Romans were besieging Capua, n. c. 212. Crispinus at first refused, on account of the friendship subsisting between him and Badius, but was at length induced by his fellow soldiers to accept the challenge. In the combat which ensued, he wounded Badius, who fled to his own party. (Liv. xxv. 18; Val. Max. v. 1. § 3.)

BADRES (Badepus), or BARES (Bareus), a Persian, of the tribe of the Pasargades, was appointed to the command of the naval portion of the force which Aryanus, governor of Egypt, sent against the Burenaeans on the pretext of avenging the murder of Arceolus III. (Batt. i. 24.) After the capture of Barca (about 512 b. c.), the Persians were allowed to pass through Cyrene, and Badius was anxious to take the city; but through the refusal of Amasis, who commanded the land force, the opportunity was lost. (Herod. iv. 167, 205.) This is perhaps the same Bades whom Herodotus mentions as commanding a portion of the Persian army in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. (Herod. vii. 77.) [E. K.]

BAEBIA GENUS, plebeian, of whom the cognomina are Dives, Herennius (? see Liv. xxxii. 34), Sulca, Tampillus: the last is the only surname which appears on coins, where it is written Tampilus. (Eckhel. v. 149.) The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was Cn. Baebius Tampilus, in n. c. 182. For those whose cognomina is not mentioned, see BAEBIUS.

BAEBIUS. 1. L. BAEBIUS, one of the ambassadors sent by Scipio to Carthage, n. c. 202. He was afterwards left by Scipio in command of the camp. (Liv. xxx. 25; Polyb. iv. 1, 4.)

2. Q. BAEBIUS, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 200, endeavoured to persuade the people not to engage in the war against Philip of Macedon. (Liv. xxxi. 6.)

3. M. BAEBIUS, one of the three commissioners sent into Macedonia, n. c. 186, to investigate the charges brought by the Maronites and others against Philip of Macedon. (Polyb. xxxii. 6.)

4. L. BAEBIUS, one of the three commissioners sent into Macedonia, n. c. 188, to inspect the state of affairs there, before Aemilius Paulus invaded the country. (Liv. xlviii. 18.)

5. A. BAEBIUS, caused the members of the Aetolian senate to be killed in n. c. 167, and was in consequence afterwards condemned at Rome. Livy calls him praesidus, a term which is applied in later times by the jurists to a governor of a province. Whether, however, Baebius had the government of Aetolia, or only of the town in which the murder was perpetrated, is uncertain. (Liv. xlviii. 31.)

6. C. BAEBIUS, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 111, was bribed by Jugurtha when the latter came to Rome. When Mummius commanded Jugurtha to give answers to certain questions, Baebius made him be silent, and thus quashed the investigation. (Sall. Jug. 33, 34.)

7. C. BAEBIUS was appointed by L. Caesar (called Sext. Caesar by Appian), n. c. 89, as his successor in the command in the social war. (Appian, B. C. i. 46.)
8. M. BARBIUS was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome in B.C. 87. Instead of being killed by any weapon, Baebius was literally torn to pieces by the hands of his enemies. (Appian, B. C. i. 72; Florus, iii. 21; Lucan, ii. 119.)

9. M. BARBIUS, a brave man, slain by order of L. Piso in Macedonia, B.C. 57. (Cic. in Pisc. 36.)

10. A. BARBIUS, a Roman equus of Asia in Spain, deserted the Pompeian party in the Spanish war, and went over to Caesar, B.C. 45. (Bell. Hisp. 56.)

11. BARBIUS, a Roman senator, served under Vatinius in Illyria. On the murder of Caesar, B.C. 44, the Illyrians rose against Vatinius, and cut off Baebius and five cohorts which he commanded. (Appian, M. App. 13.)

BAEBIUS MACRINIUS. [MACRINIUS.]

BAEBIUS MARCELLINUS. [MARCELLINUS.]

BAETON (Bartron), was employed by Alexander the Great in measuring distances in his marches, wherein he is called ὁ Ἀλέξανδρος Βατασίτης. He wrote a work upon the subject entitled στοιχεῖον τῆς Ἀλέξανδρου περιήγησις. (Ath. x. p. 422, b.; Plin. H. N. vii. 17, 21, 19, s. 22, vii. 2, Solin. 55.)

BAETYLMUS (Baetivos), is in reality the name of a peculiar kind of conical shaped stones, which were erected as symbols of gods in remarkable places, and were from time to time anointed with oil, wine, or blood. The custom of setting up such stones originated, in all probability, in mysteries being erected in the places where they had fallen down. (Phot. Cod. 242.) Euæbius (Praep. Evang. i. 10) says, that Baetyli were believed to be stones endowed with souls and created by Uranus. Hence Baetulus, when personified, is called a son of Uranus and Ge, and a brother of Ianus and Cronos. Traces of the veneration paid to such stones are found among the Hebrews and Phoenicians, no less than among the Greeks. Photius (L. c.) says, that Asclepiades ascended mount Libanon, in the neighbourhood of Heliopolis in Syria, and saw many Baetyli there, concerning which he related the most wonderful tales. (Comp. Lucian, Alex. 30; Theophrast. Charact. 16; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. p. 718.) In Greek mythology, the stone which was given to Uranus, to swallow instead of the infant Zeus, was called Baetulus (Hexech. s. v.); and a little above the temple of Delphi, on the left, there was a stone which was anointed with oil every day, and on solemn occasions covered with raw wool; tradition said, that this stone was the same which Uranus had swallowed. (Paus. ix. 24. § 5; comp. vii. 22, § 3; Tac. Hist. ii. 3.) [L. S.]

BAEUS (Baús), the helmsman of Odysseyus, who is said to have died during the stay of the latter in Sicily. Mount Baesa in the island of Cephalonia, and several islands and towns, especially Baene in Campania, in the bay of which he was believed to have been buried, are supposed to have derived their names from him. (Lycochr. 694, with Tzetzes; note; Steph. Byz. s. v. Baia; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1967.) [L. S.]

BAGAEUS (Bagaeus). 1. A Persian nobleman, to whom was allotted the dangerous office of convoying the order of Dareius Hyasippos for the execution of Oroetes, the powerful and rebellious satrap of Lydia, about 520 B.C. On his arrival at Sardis, Bagaeus first ascertained the disposition of the satrap's guards by the delivery to them of several minor fransms from the king; and, when he saw that they received these with much reverence, he gave the order for the death of Oroetes, which was unhesitatingly obeyed. (Herod. iii. 128.)

2. Or Bagaeus (Bagaxtis), a half-brother of the satrap Phenobazus, is mentioned by Xenophon as one of the commanders of a body of Persian cavalry, which, in a skirmish near Dascyllum, defeated the cavalry of Agesilaus, in the first year of his invasion of Asia, B.C. 396. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 12; Plut. Alex. 9.) [E. E.]

BAGISTANES (Bagistanes), a distinguished Babylonian, united Rezas and the conspirators, when Alexander was in pursuit of them and Dareius, B.C. 330, and informed Alexander of the danger of the Persian king. (Arrian, iii. 21; Curt. v. 13.)

BAGOAS (Bagos). 1. An eunuch, highly trusted and favoured by Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), is said to have been by birth an Egyptian, and seems to have fully merited the character assigned him by Diodorus, of a bold, bad man (τόσον καὶ παρομοίως διαφέρων). In the successful expedition of Ochus against Egypt, B.C. 350, Bagoas was associated by the king with Mentor, the Rhodian, in the command of a third part of the Greek mercenaries. (Diod. xvi. 47.) Being sent to take possession of Pelusium, which had surrendered to the Theban Lacedaemonians, he incurred the censure of Ochus by permitting his soldiers to plunder the Greek garrison of the town, in defiance of the terms of capitulation. (Diod. xvi. 49.) In the same war, the Egyptian part of the garrison at Bubastus having made terms with Bagoes for themselves, and admitted him within the gates, the Greek garrison, privately instigated by his colleague Mentor, attacked and slaughtered his men and took him prisoner. Mentor accordingly had the credit of releasing him and receiving the submission of Bubastus; and henceforth an alliance was formed between them for their mutual interest, which was ever strictly preserved, and conducing to the power of both. Mentor enjoying the satrapy of the western provinces, while Bagoes directed affairs at his pleasure in the centre of the empire,—and the king was reduced to a cipher. (Diod. xvi. 50.) The cruelties of Ochus having excited general detestation, Bagos at length removed him by poison, B.C. 338, fearing perhaps lest the effects of the odium in which he was held might extend to himself, and certainly not from the motive abusively assigned by Aelian, viz. the desire of averting the insult offered by Ochus, so many years before, to the religion of Egypt. To the murder of the king he joined that of all his sons except Arsæ, the youngest, whom he placed upon the throne; but, seeing reason to apprehend danger from him, he put him also to death in the third year of his reign, B.C. 336. He next conferred the crown on Codomannus (a great-grandson of Dareius II.), who having discovered, soon after his accession, a plot of Bagoes to poison him, obliged the traitor to drink the poison himself. (Diod. xvii. 5; Ael. V. H. vi. 8; Strab. xv. p. 736; Arc. Alex. ii. p. 41, e.; Curt. vi. 3. § 12.) [E. E.]

2. A favourite eunuch of Alexander the Great who first belonged to Dareius and afterwards fell into the hands of Alexander. He was a youth of remarkable beauty. Alexander was passionately fond of him, and is said to have kissed him publicly in the theatre on one occasion. (Curt. vi. 5, x. 1; Plut. Alex. 67; Athen. xiii. p. 603 b.)

3. A general of Tigranes or Mithridates, who together with Mithridates expelled Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia in b. c. 92. (Appian, Mithr. 10; comp. Justin, xxxvii. 3.)

The name Bagas frequently occurs in Persian history. According to Pliny (H. N. xiii. 9), it was the Persian word for an eunuch; and it is sometimes used by Latin writers as synonymous with an eunuch. (Comp. Quintil. v. 12; Ov. Am. ii. 2. 1.)

mela, b. c. 331. (Curt. v. 1.)

BALACRUS (Βάλακρος). 1. The son of Nicaran, one of Alexander's body-guard, was appointed satrap of Cilicia after the battle of Issus, b. c. 333. (Arrian, ii. 12.) He fell in battle against the Pisidians in the life-time of Alexander. (Diod. xviii. 22.) It was probably this Balacerus who married Phila, the daughter of Antipater, and subsequently the wife of Craterus. (Phot. p. 111. b. 3, ed. Bekker.)

2. The son of Amyntas, obtained the command of the allies in Alexander's army, when Antigonus was appointed satrap of Phrygia, b. c. 334. After the occupation of Egypt, b. c. 333, he was one of the generals left behind in that country with a part of the army. (Arrian, i. 30, iii. 5; Curt. viii. 11.)

3. The commander of the javelin-throwers (δεισοavΤα) in the army of Alexander the Great. (Arrian, iii. 12, iv. 4, 24.)

BALAGRUS (Βάλαγρος), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work on Macedonia (Μακε-dονεία) in two books at least. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Αμπος, Ωλθονς, Δηφθαρός.)

BALANUS, a Gaulish prince beyond the Alps, who sent ambassadors offering to assist the Romans in their Macedonian war, b. c. 169. (Liv. xiv. 14.)

BALAS. [ALEXANDER BALAS, p. 114.]

BALDILLUS, who was in Spain, b. c. 44 (Cic. Att. xev. 19), in the intrigue of L. Munatius to be only a divinatory of Cornelius Balbus, the younger, a friend of Cicero's, but this is very improbable.

C. BALRILLUS, governor of Egypt in the reign of Nero, a. d. 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 22), and a man of great learning, wrote a work respecting Aegypt and his journeys in that country. (Senec. Quest. Nat. iv. 2; Plin. H. N. xix. proem.)

BALBILUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in b. c. 43, but restored with Sex. Pompeius in b. c. 39, and subsequently advanced to the consulship. (Appian, iv. 50.) No other author but Appian, and none of the Fasti, mention a consul of this name; but as we learn from Appian that Bal-bilus was consul in the year in which the conscription of the younger Aemilius Lepidus was detected by Maceanus, that is b. c. 30, it is conjectured that Balbirus may be the cognomen of L. Scaurus, who was consul sufficient in that year.

BALBILUS. When intelligence reached Rome that the elder Gordian and his son had both perished in Africa, and that the savage Maximin, thirsting for vengeance, was advancing towards Italy at the head of a powerful army, the senate resolved upon electing two rulers with equal power, one of whom should remain in the city to direct the civil administration, while the other should march against Maximin. The choice fell upon Decimus Claudius Balbilla and Marcus Claudius Pupienus Maximus, both consuls and well-striken in years, the one a sagacious statesman, the other a bold soldier and an able general. Balbilla, who was of noble birth, and traced his descent from Cornelius Balbus of Cadiz, the friend of Pompey, Cicero, and Caeser, had governed in succession the most important among the peaceful provinces of the empire. He was celebrated as one of the best orators and poets of the age, and had gained the esteem and love of all ranks. Maximin, on the other hand, was of lowly origin, the son, according to some, of a goldsmith, according to others, of a commoner. He had acquired great renown as an imperial legate by his victories over the Sarmatians in Illyric and the Germans on the Rhine, had been eventually appointed prefect of the city, and had discharged the duties of that office with a remarkable fairness and strictness.

The populace, still clinging with affection to the family of Gordian, and dreading the severity of Maximin, refused for a while to ratify the decision of the senate, and a serious tumult arose, which was not quelled until the grandson of Gordian, a boy of fourteen, was presented to the crowd and proclaimed Caesar. While Pupienus was hastening to encounter Maximin, now under the walls of Aquileia, a formidable strife broke out at Rome between the citizens and the praetorians. The camp of the praetorians was closely invested, and they were reduced to great distress in consequence of the supply of water being cut off, but in retaliation they made desperate sallies, in which whole regions of the town were burned or reduced to ruins. These disorders were repressed for a time by the glad tidings of the destruction of Maximin, and all parties joined in welcoming with the most lively demonstrations of joy the united armies and their triumphant chief. But the calm was of short duration. The hatred existing between the praeto-rians and the populace had been only smothered for a while, not extinguished; the soldiers of all ranks secretly determined that they had lost a prince chosen by themselves, and were obliged to submit to those nominated by the civil power. A conspi-unity was soon organized by the guards. On a day when public attention was engrossed by the exhib-tion of the Capitoline games, a strong band of soldiers forced their way into the palace, seized the two emperors, stripped them of their royal robes, dragged them through the streets, and finally put them to death.

The chronology of this brief reign is involved in much difficulty, and different historians have contracted or extended it to periods varying from twenty-two days to two years. The statements of ancient writers are so irreconcilable, that we have no sure resource except medals; but, by studying carefully the evidence which these afford, we may repose with considerable confidence on the conclusion of Eckel, that the accession of Balbilla and Maximin took place about the end of April, a. d. 238, and their death before the beginning of August in the same year.

We ought to notice here a remarkable innovation which was introduced in consequence of the circumstances attending the election of these princes.
Up to this period, although several individuals had enjoyed at the same time the appellation of Augustus, it had been held as an inviolable maxim of the constitution, that the office of chief pontiff did not admit of division, and could be vacated by death only. But the senate, in this case, anxious to preserve perfect equality between the two emperors, deprived from a rule scrupulously observed from the earliest ages, and invested both with the office and appellation of Pontifex Maximus. The precedent thus established was afterwards generally followed; colleagues in the empire became generally, as a matter of course, colleagues in the chief priesthood; and when pretenders to the purple arose at the same time in different parts of the world, they all assumed the title among their other designations.

Money by plundering the temple of Diana in Ephesus, which was prevented from doing only by the arrival of Caesar. (Caes. B. C. iii. 106.) Balbus was one of those who was banished by Caesar; but he afterwards obtained his pardon through the intercession of his friend Cicero (comp. Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 70), who wrote him a letter on the occasion, B. C. 46. (Ad Fam. vi. 12.)

Balbus appears to have written some work on the history of his times; for Suetonius (Caes. 77) quotes some remarks of Caesar's from a work of T. Ampius. Balbus was also mentioned in the fourth book of Varro "De Vita Populi Romani." (Varr. Fragment. p. 249, ed. Bip.)

III. Q. Antonius Balbus, plebeian, is supposed to be the same as Q. Antonius who was praetor in Sicily in B. C. 82 and was killed by L. Philippus, the legate of Sulla. (Liv. Epit. 86.) The annexed coin was struck either by, or in honour of, this Balbus. The obverse represents the head of Jupiter; the reverse is Q. A(n)l. Ro. Ba(1)Pr. with Victory in a quadriga.

IV. M. Atius Balbus, plebeian, of Aricia, married Julia, the sister of Julius Caesar, who bore him a daughter, Atia, the mother of Augustus Caesar. (Atia.) He was praetor in B. C. 62, and obtained the government of Sardinia, as we learn from the annexed coin (copied from the Theaesc. Morell.), of which the reverse is Atius Balbus Pa., with the head of Balbus; and the obverse, Sard, Paesa, with the head of Sardus, the father or mythical ancestor of the island. In B. C. 59, Balbus was appointed one of the vigintiviri under the Julian law for the division of the land in Campania; and, as Pompey was a member of the same body, Balbus, who was not a person of any importance, was called by Cicero in joke Pompey's colleague. (Suet. Oct. 4, Phil. iii. 6, ad Att. ii. 4.)

V. Cornelius Balbi, plebeians. The cornelia Balbi were, properly speaking, no part of the cornelia gens. The first of this name was not a Roman; he was a native of Gades; and his original name probably bore some resemblance in sound to the Latin Balbus. The reason why he assumed the name of Cornelius is mentioned below. [No. 1.]

I. L. Cornelius Balbus, sometimes called Major to distinguish him from his nephew [No. 3], was a native of Gades, and descended from an illustrious family in that town. Gades, being one of the federate cities, supported the Romans in their war against Sertorius in Spain, and Balbus thus had an opportunity of distinguishing himself. He served under the Roman generals, Q. Metellus Pius, C. Pompeius, and Sertorius, and was present at the battles of Turia and Sueca. He distinguished himself so much throughout the war, that Pompey conferred the Roman citizenship upon him, his brother, and his brother's sons; and this act of Pompey's was ratified by the law of the consuls, Ch. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Gellius, n. c. 72. (Cic. pro Balb. 8.) It was probably in honour of these consuls that Balbus took the gentile name of the one and the praenomen of the other; though some modern writers suppose that he derived his name from L. Cornelius, consul in n. c. 199, who was the husband of the inhabitants of Gades. (Pro Balb. 13.)

At the conclusion of the war with Sertorius, n. c. 72, Balbus removed to Rome. He obtained admission into the Cuscinianum tribe by acceding a member of this tribe of bribery, and thus gaining the place which the guilty party forfeited on conviction. Balbus had doubtless brought with him considerable wealth from Gades, and supported by the powerful interest of Pompey, whose friendship he assiduously cultivated, he soon became a man of great influence and importance. One of Pompey's intimate friends, the Greek Theophras of Mytilene, adopted him; and Pompey himself shewed him marks of favour, which not a little offended the Roman nobles, who were indignant that a man of Gades should be preferred to them. Among other presents which Pompey made him, we read of a grant of land for the purpose of pleasure-gounds. But Balbus was too prudent to confine himself to only one patron; he early paid court to Caesar, and seems to have entirely ingratiated himself into his favour during Pompey's absence in Asia in prosecution of the Mithridatic war. From this time, he became one of Caesar's most intimate friends, and accompanied him to Spain in n. c. 61, in the capacity of praefectus fabrum, when Caesar went into that province after his praetorship. Soon after his return to Rome, the first triumvirate was formed, n. c. 69; and though he was ostensibly the friend both of Pompey and Caesar, he seems to have attached himself more closely to the interests of the latter than of the former. On Caesar's departure to Gaul in n. c. 58, Balbus again received the appointment of praefectus fabrum, and from this time to the breaking out of the civil war, he passed his time alternately in Gaul and at Rome, but principally at the latter. He was the manager and steward of Caesar's private property in the city, and a great part of the Gallic booty passed through his hands. But his increasing wealth and influence raised him many enemies among the nobles, who were still more anxious to ruin him, as he was the favourite of the triumvirs. They accordingly induced an inhabitant of Gades to accuse him of having illegally assumed the rights and privileges of a Roman citizen. The cause came on for trial probably in n. c. 55; and as there was yet no breach between Pompey and Caesar, Balbus was defended by Pompey and Caesar, and also by Cicero, who undertook the defence at Pompey's request, and whose speech on the occasion has come down to us. Balbus was acquitted, and justly, as is shown in the article Foderae Cistae in the Dict. of Ant.

In the civil war, in n. c. 49, Balbus remained at Rome, and endeavoured to some extent to keep up the semblance of neutrality. Thus he looked after the pecuniary affairs of his friend, the consul Cornelius Lentulus, who was one of Pompey's partisans; but his neutrality was scarcely disguised. It is true that he did not appear against Pompey in the field, but all his exertions were employed to promote Caesar's interests. He was especially anxious to gain over Cicero, with whom he had corresponded before the breaking out of the civil war. Knowing the weak side of Cicero, he had first requested him to act the mediator between Caesar and Pompey, and afterwards pressed him to come to Rome, which would have been tantamount to a declaration in Caesar's favour. Cicero, after a good deal of hesitation, eventually left Italy, but returned after the battle of Pharsalia (n. c. 48), when he re-opened his correspondence with Balbus, and requested him to use his good offices to obtain Caesar's pardon for him. During all this time, Balbus, in conjunction with Oppius, had the entire management of Caesar's affairs at Rome; and we see, from Cicero's letters, that Balbus was now regarded as one of the chief men in the state. He seems, however, to have used his good fortune with moderation, and never to have been deserted by the prudence which had always been one of his chief characteristics. We are therefore disposed to reject the tale, which is related only by Suetonius (Caes. 78) and Plutarch (Caes. 60), that Balbus prevented Caesar from rising to receive the senate on his return from the Spanish war, in n. c. 45.

On the murder of Caesar in March, 44, Balbus was placed in a somewhat critical position. He retired from the city, and spent two months in the country, and was one of the first who hastened to meet young Octavius at Neapolis. During this time, he frequently saw Cicero, who believed that his professions to Octavius were hollow, and that he was in reality the friend of Antony. In this, however, Cicero was mistaken; Balbus, whose good fortune it always was to attach himself to the winning party, accompanied Octavius to Rome, and was subsequently advanced by him to the highest offices in the state. It is uncertain in what year he was praetor; but his praetorship is commemorated in the annexed coin of Octavius (copied from the Tiasaur. Morell.), which contains on the obverse C. Cassar. III vir. R. P. C. with the head of Octavius, and on the reverse BALBUS PRO PR. He obtained the consulship in n. c. 49, the first instance, according to Pliny (H. N. vii. 43. s. 44), in which this honour had been conferred upon one who was not born a Roman citizen. The year of his death is unknown. In his will he left every Roman citizen twopence denarius apiece (Dion Cass. xlvi. 32), which would seem to show that he had no children, and that consequently the emperor Balbinus could not be, as he pretended, a lineal descendant from him.

Balbus was the author of a diary (Epistolarum) which has not come down to us of the most remarkable occurrences in his own and Caesar’s life. (Sidon. Apoll. Ep. ix. 14; Suet. Cass. 81; Capit. Balb. 2.) He took care that Caesar’s Commentaries be continued, and we accordingly find the eighth book dedicated to him. There does not, however, appear to be sufficient grounds for the conjecture of some modern writers, that Balbus was the author of the History of the Spanish war. In the collection of Cicero’s letters we find four from Balbus. (Ad Att. viii. 15, ix. 6, 13.)

2. P. Cornelius Balbus, brother of the preceding, received the Roman franchise at the same time as his brother; but appears to have died soon afterwards, either in Gades or Rome.

3. L. Cornelius Balbus, P. r., son of the preceding [No. 2,] and frequently called Minor, to distinguish him from his uncle [No. 1], was born at Gades, and received the Roman franchise along with his father and uncle. On the breaking out of the civil war (a. c. 49) he served under Caesar, and was sent by him to the consul L. Cornelius Lentulus, who was an old friend of his uncle’s, to persuade him to return to Rome. Balbus undertook the same dangerous commission in the following year, and paid Lentulus a visit in the Pompeian camp at Dyrachchum, but he was not successful either. Balbus served under Caesar in the Alexandrian and Spanish wars, during which time he kept up a correspondence with Cicero, with whom he had become acquainted through his uncle. In return for his services in these wars, Caesar made him pontifex, and it is therefore probably this Cornelius Balbus who wrote a work on the Roman sacra, of which the eighth book is quoted by Macrobius. (Sat. iii. 6.)

In a. c. 44 and 43, Balbus was quaestor of the proprietor Asinias Pollio in Further Spain; and while there, he added to his native town Gades a suburb, which was called the new city, and built a dock-yard; and the place received in consequence the name of Didyma or double-city. (Strab. iii. p. 163.) But his general conduct in Spain was of a most arbitrary and tyrannical kind; and at length, after plundering the provincials and amassing large treasures, he left Spain in a. c. 43, without even paying the soldiers, and crossed over to Bogrud in Africa.

From that time, we hear nothing of Balbus for upwards of twenty years. We then find him governor of Africa, with the title of proconsul, although he had been neither praetor nor consul. While in Africa, he obtained a victory over the Garamantes, and enjoyed a triumph in consequence in March, a. c. 19, the first instance of this honour having been conferred upon one who was not born a Roman citizen. (Plin. H. N. v. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 51; Strab. iii. p. 169.) Balbus, like his uncle, had amassed a large fortune; and, as Augustus was anxious to adorn Rome with public buildings, Balbus erected at his own expense a theatre in the city, which was remarkable on account of its containing four pillars of onyx. It was dedicated in a. c. 19, with festive games, on the return of Augustus to Rome; and as a compliment to Balbus for having built it, his opinion was asked first in the senate by Tiberius, who was consul in that year. (Dion Cass. liv. 25; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7. 12.) After this we hear nothing further of Balbus. He may have been the Cornelius Balbus whom L. Valerius made his hair, although he had involved Valerius in many law-suits, and had at last brought a capital charge against him. (Val. Max. vii. 8, 7.)

VI. Domitius Balbus, a wealthy man of praetorian rank, whose will was forged in a. d. 61. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40.)

VII. Lucullus Balbi.

1. D. Labilius D. P. D. N. Balbus, one of the quindecemviri who superintended the celebration of the saecular games in b. c. 17 (Fast. Capitol.), and consul in b. c. 6. (Dion Cass. iv. 9.)

2. Labilius Balbus, accused Acutia, formerly the wife of P. Vitellius, of treason (magni judicis), but was unable to obtain the usual reward after her condemnation, in consequence of the intercession of the tribune Junius Otho. He was condemned in a. d. 37 as one of the murderers of Albueulla, deprived of his senatorial rank, and banished to an island: his condemnation gave general satisfaction, as he had been ever ready to secue the innocent. (Tac. Ann. vi. 47, 48.)

VIII. Lucullus Balbi.

1. L. Lucilius Balbus, the jurist. See below.

2. Q. Lucilius Balbus, probably the brother of the preceding, a Stoic philosopher, and a pupil of Pannethus, had made such progress in the Stoic philosophy, that he appeared to Cicero comparable to the best Greek philosophers. (De Nat. Deor. i. 6.) He is introduced by Cicero in his dialogue "On the Nature of the Gods:" as the expositor of the opinions of the Stoics on that subject, and his arguments are represented as of considerable weight. (De Nat. Deor. iii. 40, de Divin. i. 5.) He was also the exponent of the Stoic opinions in Cicero’s "Hortensius." (Fragm. p. 484, ed. Orelli.)

IX. L. Naevius Balbus, plebeian, one of the quinqueviri appointed in b. c. 171 to settle the dispute between the Pianii and Luminenses respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Liv. xlv. 18.) The annexed coin of the Naevius gens belongs to this family. The obverse represents a head of Venus, the reverse is C. Naev. Ba(ara) with Victory in a chariot.

X. Nonius Balbus, plebeian, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 52, put his veto upon the decree which the senate would have passed against Octavius at the instigation of the consul C. So- sius, a partizan of Antony. (Dion Cass. l. 2.)

XI. Octavius Balbus. See below.

XII. Thorius Balbus, plebeians.

1. C. Thorius Balbus of Locurnum, is said by Cicero to have lived in such a manner, that there was not a single pleasure, however refined and rare, which he did not enjoy. (De Fin. ii. 20.) He must not be confounded, as he has been by Pighius, with L. Turius who is mentioned in Cicero’s Brutus (a. d. 67). The annexed coin of L. Thorius Balbus contains on the obverse the head of Juno Sospita, whose worship was of great anti-
BALBUS.

2. SP. THORIUS BALBUS, tribune of the plebs about n. c. 111, was a popular speaker, and introduced in his tribunalty an agrarian law, of which considerable fragments have been discovered on bronze tablets, and of which an account is given in the Dict. of Ant. s. v. Thoria Lex. (Cic. Brut. 36, de Oraet. i. 70; Appian, B. C. i. 27.)

BALBUS, JUNIUS, a consular, husband of Metia Faustina, the daughter of the elder Gordian. (Capitolin. c. 4.) According to some historians, the third Gordian, who succeeded Balbus and Pupilianus Maximus, was the issue of this marriage, while others maintain that he was the son of Gordian the second. [GORDIANUS.] [W. R.]

BALBUS, L. LUCILIUS, a Roman jurist, one of the pupils of Q. Mucius Scaevola, and one of the legal instructors of the eminent lawyer and distinguished friend of Cicero, Servius Sulpicius Rufus. He was probably the father of Lucilius, the companion of Appius Pulcher in Cilicia (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4), and the brother of Q. Lucilius Balbus, the Stoic philosopher. [BALBUS, NO. VIII.] Cicero (de Oraet. iii. 21) speaks of the duo Balbi a Stoicis. By Heineccius (Hist. R. Rom. § 149) and others the jurist Lucius has been confounded with Quintus the Stoic philosopher. The jurist was occasionally quoted in the works of Sulpicius; and, in the time of Pomponius, his writings did not exist in a separate form, or, at least, were in the hands of few. (Dig. i. tit. 2, s. 42.) He was a man of much learning. In giving advice and pleading causes his manner was slow and deliberate. (Cic. Brut. 42, pro Quint. 16, 17.)

[J. T. G.]

BALBUS, L. (q.v. P.) OCTAVIUS, a Roman, contemporary with Cicero. He was remarkable for his skill in law, and for his attention to the duties of justice, morality, and religion. (Cic. pro Cluent. 36.) For these reasons he bore a high character as a judex in public as well as private trials. There is a passage in Cicero (in Ver. ii. 12) in relation to L. Octavius Balbus, which has been misrepresented and corrupted by commentators and critics ignorant of the Roman forms of pleading. Cicero accuses Verres of having directed an issue of fact in such an improper form, that even L. Octavius, if he had been appointed to try it, would have been obliged to adjudge the defendant in the cause either to give up an estate of his own to the plaintiff, or to pay pecuniary damages. The perfect acquittance with Roman law, and the knowledge of his duty which Balbus possessed, would have compelled him to pass an unjust sentence. To understand the compliment, it is necessary to remark, that in the time of Cicero a judex in a private cause was appointed for the occasion merely, and that his functions rather resembled those of a modern English juryman than those of a judge. It was his duty to try a given question, and according to his finding examine the parties as to the sentence of condemnation or acquittal contained in the formula directed to him by the praetor. It was not his duty but the praetor's to determine whether the question was material, and whether the sentence was made to depend upon it in a manner consistent with justice. In the ordinary form of Roman action for the recovery of a thing, as in the English action of detinue, the judgment for the plaintiff was not directly that the thing should be restored, but the defendant was condemned, unless it were restored; to pay damages. The remainder of the chapter has been equally misinterpreted and corrupted. It accuses Verres of so shaping the formula of trial, that the judex was obliged to treat a Roman as a Sicilian, or a Sicilian as a Roman.

The death of Octavius Balbus is related by Valerius Maximus (v. 7. § 8) as a memorable example of paternal affection. Prescribed by the trimmings Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus, n. c. 42, he had already made his escape from his house, when a false report reached his ears that the soldiers were massacring his son. Thereupon he returned to his house, and was consolated, by witnessing his son's safety, for the violent death to which he thus offered himself.

The pomenen of Balbus is doubtful. In Cic. pro Cluent. 38 most of the MSS. have P.; in Cic. in Verr. ii. 12 the common reading is L. [J. T. G.]

BALDUNUS I. (Balduinio), BALDWIN, the first basin emperor of Constantinople, was the son of Baldwin, count of Hainaut, and Marguerite, countess of Flanders. He was born at Valenciennes in 1171, and after the death of his parents inherited both the counties of Hainaut and Flanders. He was one of the most powerful among those warlike barons who took the cross in 1200, and arrived at Venice in 1202, whence they intended to sail to the Holy Land. They changed their plan at the supplantation of prince Alexis Angelus, the son of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus, who was gone to Venice for the purpose of persuading the crusaders to attack Constantinople and release Isaac, who had been deposed, blinded, and imprisoned by his brother Alexis Angelus, who reigned as Alexis III. from the year 1195. The crusaders listened to the promises of young Alexis, who was chiefly supported by Baldwin of Flanders, as he is generally called; and they left Venice with a powerful fleet, commanded by the doge of Venice, Dandolo, who was also commander-in-chief of the whole expedition. The various incidents and the final result of this bold undertaking are given under ALEXIS III., IV., and V. The usurper Alexis III. was driven out by the crusaders; prince Alexis and his father Isaac succeeded him on the throne; both perished by the usurper Alexis V. Ducas Murzuphils; and Murzuphils in his turn was driven out and put to death by the crusaders in 1204. During this remarkable Balduinid dynasty, Baldwin distinguished himself by his military skill as well as by his personal character, and the crusaders having resolved to choose one of their own body emperor of the East, their choice fell upon Baldwin.

Baldwin was accordingly crowned emperor at Constantinople, on the 9th of May, 1204. But he received only a very small part of the empire, namely Constantinople and the greater part of Thrace; the Venetians obtained a much greater part, consisting chiefly of the islands and some parts of Epirus; Boniface, marquis of Monteferrato, received Thessalonica, that is Macedonia, as a kingdom; and the rest of the empire, in Asia as well as in Europe, was divided among the French, Fleming, and Venetian chiefs of the expedition. The speedy ruin of the new Latin empire in the East was not doubtful under such divisions; it was hastened by the successful enterprises of Alexis Comnenus at Trebizond, of Theodore Lascaris at Nicomedia, and by the partial results of the Greek subjects of the conquerors. Calo-Ioannes, king of Bulgaria, supported the revolters, who succeeded in making themselves masters of Adrianoile. Baldwin laid siege to this town; but he was attacked by Calo-Ioannes, entirely defeated on the 14th of April, 1205, and taken prisoner. He died in captivity about a year afterwards. Many fables have been invented with regard to the nature of his death: Nicetas (Urbs Capta, 16) says, that Calo-Ioannes ordered the limbs of his imperial prisoner to be cut off, and the mutilated body to be thrown into a field, where it remained three days before life left it. But from the accounts of the Latin writers, whose statements have been carefully examined by Gibbon and other eminent modern historians, we must conclude, that although Baldwin died in captivity, he was neither tortured nor put to death by his victor. The successor of Baldwin I. was his brother Henry I. (Nicetas, Alexius Isaccides Angulas Fr. iii. 9, Alexius Doukas Manurolaphus, i. 1, Urbs Capta, 1—17; Acropolita, 8, 12; Nicephorus Gregorius. ii. 3, &c.; Villehardouin, De la Conqueste de Constantinoble, ed. Paulin Paris, Paris, 1838). [W. P.]

BALDUNIUS II. (Balduinus), the last Latin emperor of the east, was descended from the noble family of Courtenay, and was the son of Peter I. of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, and the empress Yolanda, countess of Flanders. He was born in 1217, and succeeded his brother, Robert, in 1228, but, on account of his youth, was put under the guardianship of John of Brienne, count de la Marche and king of Jerusalem. The empire was in a dangerous position, being attacked in the south by Vatatzes, the Greek emperor of Nicomedia, and in the north by Asam, king of Bulgaria, who in 1234 concluded an alliance with Vatatzes and laid siege to Constantinople by sea and land. Until then the regent had done very little for his ward and the realm, but when the enemy appeared under the walls of the capital the danger roused him to energy, and he compelled the besiegers to withdraw after having sustained severe losses. John of Brienne died soon afterwards. In 1237 Vatatzes and Asam once more laid siege to Constantinople, which was defended by Geodory de Villehardouin, prince of Achaia, while the emperor made a mendiant visit to Europe. Begging for assistance, he appeared successively at the courts of France, England, and Italy, and was exposed to humiliations of every description; he left his son Philip at Venice as a security for a debt. At last he succeeded in gaining the friendship of Louis IX., king of France, of the emperor Frederic II., and of Pope Gregory IX., among whom Louis IX. was the most useful to him. The French king gave the unhappy emperor a large sum of money and other assistance, in return for which Baldwin permitted the king to keep several most holy relics. With the assistance of the Latins, Baldwin obtained some advantages over Vatatzes, and in 1243 concluded an alliance with the Turks Seljukis; but notwithstanding this, he was again compelled to seek assistance among the western princes. He was present at the council of Lyon in 1245, and returned to Greece after obtaining some feeble assistance, which was of no avail against the forces of Michael Palaeologus, who had made himself master of the Nicæan empire. On the night of the 15th of July, 1248, Constantinople was taken by surprise by Alexis Caesar Syrmialopoulos, one of the generals of Michael Palaeologus. Baldwin fled to Italy. In 1270 he nearly persuaded Charles, king of Naples, to fit out a new expedition against Michael Palaeologus, and Louis IX. of France promised to second him in the undertaking; but the death of Louis in Tunis deterred the Latin princes from any new expedition against the East. Baldwin II. died in 1275, leaving a son, Philip of Courtenay, by his wife Maria, the daughter of John of Brienne. The Latin empire in the East had lasted fifty-seven years. (Acropolita, 14, 27, 37, 78, 85, &c.; Phychymeres, Michael Palæologus, iii. 31, &c., iv. 29; Nicephorus Gregorius. ii. 4, &c., vi. 2, &c.). [W. P.]

BALEARIQUIS, an agnomen of Q. Caecilius Metellus, consul r. c. 125. [METELLUS.]

BALISTA, one of the thirty tyrants of Trebellius Pollus. [AUREOLUS.] He was prefect of the praetorian under Valerian, whom he accompanied to the East. After the defeat and capture of that emperor, when the Persians had penetrated into Cilicia, a body of Roman troops rallied and placed themselves under the command of Balista. Led by him, they raised the siege of Pompeipolis, cut off numbers of the enemy who were straggling in disorderly confidence over the face of the country, and retook a vast quantity of plunder. His career after the destruction of Macrianus, whom he had urged to rebel against Gallienus, is very obscure. According to one account, he retired to an estate near Daphne; according to another, he assumed the purple, and maintained a precarious dominion over a portion of Syria and the adjacent provinces for three years. This assertion is however based on no good foundation, resting as it does on the authority of certain medals now universally recognised as spurious, and on the hesitating testimony of Trebellus Pollus, who acknowledges that, even at the time when he wrote, the statements regarding this matter were doubtful and contradictory. Neither the time nor manner of Balista's death can be ascertained with certainty, but it is believed to have happened about 264, and to have been contrived by Odenathus. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyran. xvii., Gallien. 2, &c.; see MACRANUS, ODENATHUS, QUIRITUS.) [W. B.]

BALLONYMUS. [AIDONOMUS.]

BALSAMO, THEODO/RUS, a celebrated Greek canonist, born at Constantinople, where, under Manuel Comnenus, he filled the offices of Magnæ Ecclesiæ (S. Sophiae) Diaconus, Nomophylæus, and Chartophylæus. Under Isaac Angelus he was elevated to the dignity of patriarch of Antioch, about 1185; but, on account of the invasion of the Latins, he was never able to ascend the patriarchal throne, and all the business of the patri-archeate was conducted at Constantinople. He died about 1204. Of the works of this author there is no complete edition; they are scattered among various collections. Under the auspices of the emperor Manuel Comnenus and of Michael Archelaus, the patriarch of Constantinople, he composed commentaries or scholia upon the Syntagma and the Nomocanon of Photius. These scholia seem, from external evidence, (though there is some difference of opinion among critics as to the exact date of their composition,) to have been begun as early as 1163, and not to have been completed before 1192. They are of much use in illustrating the bearing of the imperial law of Rome upon the canon law of the Church, and the historical accuracy of Balsamo has been questioned. In the preface of his commentary upon Photius, he refers the last revision of the Basilica to Constantinos Porphyrogenitus; whereas Attalista, Baptistae, Harmonopolus, and other authorities, concur in ascribing that honour to Leo the Wise. The Syntagma of Photius (which is a collection of canons at large,) and the Nomocanon (which is a systematic abstract), are parts of a single plan; but, with the scholia of Balsamo, they have been usually edited separately. The scholia on the Nomocanon are given in Justell et Voell Bibliotheca Juris Canonici. (Paris, 1661), vol. ii. p. 799, &c. The Syntagma, without the Nomocanon, is printed with the scholia of Balsamo and Zonaras subjuncted to the text in the Syntagma of Bishop Beveridge. In this edition much use is made of an ancient Bodleian MS, which supplies the lacunae of the former printed edition of Paris, 1620. A further collation of Beveridge’s text with this MSS. is given in Wolffi Anmodia Graeca Sacra et Prophissa, vol. iv. p. 113. The scholia of Balsamo, unlike those of Zonaras, treat not so much of the sense of words as of practical questions, and the mode of reconciling apparent contradictions. The text of Justinian’s collections is carefully compared by Balsamo with the Basilica, and the portions of the former which are not incorporated in the latter are regarded by him as having no validity in ecclesiastical matters.

Other genuine works of Balsamo are extant. His book Μακρον καὶ ἄνεμορπος, and his answers to the questions of Marcus, patriarch of Alexandria, are given by Leunclavius. (Jas. Gr. Rom. vol. i.) The former work is also to be found in Cotelerius, Exod. Gr. Monum.

Several works have been erroneously attributed to Balsamo. Of these the most important is a Greek collection of Ecclesiastical Constitutions, in three books, compiled chiefly from the Digest, Code, and Novelli of Justinian. It is inserted, with the Latin translation of Leunclavius, in Justell et Voell Biblioth. Jur. Can. vol. ii. F. A. Biener, however, in his history of the Authenticae ( Diss. i. p. 10), proved that this collection was older than Balsamo; and in his history of the Novelli (p. 179), he referred it to the time of the emperor Heraclius. (A. d. 610—641.) Heinbach (Anmodia, vol. i. pp. xlv.—xlvii) maintains, in opposition to Biener, that the collection was made soon after the time of Justin II. (565—8), and that four Novelli of Hemalis, appended to the work, are the addition of a later compiler. There is extant an arrangement of Justinian’s Novelli according to their contents, which was composed, as Biener has shewn, by Athanasius Scholasticus, though a small portion of it had been previously printed under the name of Balsamo. (Hugo, Röm. R. R. 14.)

The Glossa ordinaria of the Basilica, which was formed in the 12th century from more ancient scholia, is, without sufficient reason, attributed to Balsamo by Assemani. (Bibl. Jur. Oriental, ii. p. 386.)

Tigerström, in his Accersorii Geschichte des Röm. Rechts (Berlin, 1841, p. 531), speaks of a Πρόξενος, or legal manual, of Anwocius Balsamo, as extant in MS.; but he does not say where, nor does he cite any authority for the fact. As Tigerström is often inaccurate, we suspect that Anwocius is put by mistake for Theodorus, and that the Prochronos of the former has been confused with that of the latter, of which an account is given by C. E. Zacharias, Historiae Juris Graeco-Romanici, § 48. The commencement of this Prochronos was published, by way of specimen, by Zacharias in the Prolegomena to his edition of the Prochronos of the emperor Basilius, (Heidelberg, 1637.) The Prochronos Anwocius is supposed by Biener (in Savigny’s Journal, vol. viii. p. 276) to have been rather later than Balsamo, from whose works it borrows, as also from the works of Leonis Citoius, who outlived Balsamo. (Beveridge, Preface to the Synodicon, §§ 14—21; Bach, Hist. Jur. Rom. ed. Stockmann, p. 684; Heinbach, de Butil. Orig. pp. 120, 192; Biener, Gesch. der Novell. pp. 210—212; Witt, in Rhein. Mus. für Jurispr. ii. p. 27, n. 2; Walter, Kirchenvetz, Bonn, 1842, § 77.) [J. T. G.]

T. BALVENTIUS, a centurion of the first century (primo pili), who was severely wounded in the attack made by Ambiorix upon Q. Titurius Sabinus, b. c. 54. (Caes. B. G. v. 55.)

M. BAMBATIUS, a man of no account, the father-in-law of M. Antonius, the triumvir, who received the nickname of Bambalius on account of a hesitancy in his speech. His full name was M. Fulvius Bambatio, and his daughter was Fulvia: he must not be confounded with Q. Fulvius, whose daughter Fulvia was Antony’s first wife. (Cic. Phil. ii. 36, iii. 8.)

L. BA’NTIUS, of Nola, served in the Roman army at the battle of Cannae, b. c. 216, in which he was dangerously wounded and fell into the hands of Hannibal. Having been kindly treated by Hannibal, and sent home laden with gifts, he was anxious to surrender Nola to the Carthaginians, but was gained over to the Romans by the prudent conduct of Marcellus, who had the command of Nola. (Liv. xxiii. 15; Plut. Marcell. 10, &c.)

BA-PHIUS, a Greek commentator on the Basilica (cited Basilica, vol. vii. p. 787, ed. Fabrot). His date and history are uncertain, but he probably lived in the 9th or 10th century. Suarez (Notitia Basilicorum, § 39) thinks that Baphius is not strictly a proper name, but an appellative epithet given to an annotator on the Rubricae of the Basilica. This opinion is rejected by Bach. (Hist. Jur. Rom. 676, n. 1.) Tigerström (Annales Rom. Reichsgesch. p. 339) erroneously calls him Salvanon Baphius. The names should be separated by a comma, for Salomon is a distinct scholiast (cited Basilica, vol. iii. p. 361.) [J. T. G.]

BARBA, CA’SSIUS, a friend of J. Caesar, who gave Cicero guards for his villa, when Caesar paid him a visit in b. c. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 52; comp. Phil. xiii. 2.)

BARRATA, the bearded, a surname of Venus (Aphrodite) among the Romans. (Serv. ad Sen.
BARBATIUS. 461

ii. 632.) Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8) also mentions a statue of Venus in Cyprus, representing the goddess with a beard, in female attire, but resembling in her whole figure that of a man. (Comp. Strabo, s. v. *Ἀφροδίτης; Hesych., s. v. *Ἀφροδίτες.) The idea of Venus thus being a mixture of the male and female nature, seems to belong to a very late period of antiquity. (Voss, Mythol. Briefe, ii. p. 282, &c.) [L. S.]

BARBATIO, commander of the household troops under the Caesar Gallus, arrested his master, by command of Constantius, at Potamium in Noricum, and then, after stripping him of the ensigns of his dignity, conducted him to Pula in Istria, A. D. 354. In return for his services, he was promoted, upon the death of Silvanus, to the rank of general of the infantry (pontifex magnus), and was sent with an army of 25,000 or 30,000 men to cooperate with Julian in the campaign against the Alamanni in 356; but he treacherously deserted him, either through envy of Julian, or in accordance with the secret instructions of the emperor. In 358, he defeated the Juthungi, who had invaded Rhaetia; and, in the following year, he was beleaguered by command of Constantius, in consequence of an impudent letter which his wife had written him, and which the emperor thought indicated treasonable designs on his part. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, xvi. 11, xvii. 6, xviii. 3; Liban. Orat. x. p. 272.)

M. BARBATIUS, a friend of J. Caesar, and afterwards quaeator of Antony in B. C. 40. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 2; Appian, B. C. v. 81.) His name occurs on a coin of Antony: the obverse of which is M. ANCI. IMP. AVG. IIIVIR. R. P. C., M. BARBATIUS Q. P., where there can be little doubt that M. Barbatus signifies M. Barbatus, and not Barbatus, as Ursinus and others have conjectured, who make it a surname of the Valeria gens. The letters Q. P. probably signify Quaeator Praepositor. (Comp. Echel. v. p. 334.)

This M. Barbatus appears to be the same as the Barbatus Philippius mentioned by Ulpian (Dig. 1. tit. 14. s. 3), where Barbatus is only a false reading for Barbusius, and also the same as the Barbus Philippius, spoken of by Suidas. (s. v.) We learn from Ulpian and Suidas that M. Barbatus was a runaway slave, who ingrated himself into the favour of Antony, and through his influence obtained the post of quaestor under the triumvirs. While discharging the duties of his office in the forum he was recognized, as we are told, by his old master, but privately purchased his freedom by a large sum of money. (Comp. Garlton. ad Cic. Phil. xiii. 2.)

BARBATIUS, the name of a family of the Horatia gens. Barbatus was also a surname of P. Cornelius Scipio, consul in B. C. 328 [Scipio], of the Quintii Capitolini [Capitolinus], and of M. Valerius Messalla, consul in B. C. 12. [Messalla.] 1. M. HORATIUS M. F. M. N. BARBATUS, was one of the most violent opponents of the second decemvirs, when they resolved to continue their power beyond their year of office. In the tumult which followed the death of Virginius, Valerius Poblicola and Horatius Barbatus put themselves at the head of the popular movement; and when the plebeians seceded to the Sacred Hill, Valerius and Horatius were sent to them by the senate, as the only acceptable deputies, to negotiate the terms of peace. The right of appeal and the tribunes were restored to the plebs, and a full indemnity granted to all engaged in the secession. The decemvirs was also abolished, and the two friends of the plebs, Valerius and Horatius, were elected consuls, B. C. 449. The liberties of the plebs were still further confirmed in their consularship by the passing of the celebrated Valeri us Horatius Leges. [Poplicola.] Horatius gained a great victory over the Sabines, which inspired them with such dread of Rome, that they did not take up arms again for the next hundred and fifty years. The senate out of spite refused Horatius a triumph, but he celebrated one without their consent, by command of the populace. (Liv. iii. 39, &c. 49, 50, 53, 54, 61—63; Dionys. xi. 5, 22, 26, 43, 46; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31; Dion. xii. 26; Zonar. viii. 18.)

2. L. HORATIUS BARBATIUS, consul tribune, B. C. 425. (Liv. iv. 35.)

BARBILLIUS (Babilius), an astrologer at Rome in the reign of Vespasian. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 9.) He was retained and consulted by the emperor, though all of his profession were forbidden the city. He obtained the establishment of the games at Ephesus, which received their name from him, and are mentioned in the Arundelian Marbles, p. 71, and discussed in a note in Reimar's edition of Dion Cass. vol. ii. p. 1084. [A. O.]

BARBUCALLIUS, JOANNES (Iovanni Bap- goulacou), the author of eleven epigrams in the Greek Anthology. From internal evidence his date is fixed by Jacobs about a. D. 551. The Scholion derives his name from Barbucene, a city of Spain within the Ebro mentioned by Polybius and Stephanius. The name of the city as actually given by Polybius (iii. 14), Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v.), and Livy (xxi. 5), is Arbenea (Apbouna) or Arborea, probably the modern Albocella. [P. S.]

BARBULA, the name of a family of the patrician Aemilia gens.

1. Q. AEMILIUS Q. F. L. N. BARBULA, consul in B. C. 317, in which year a treaty was made with the Apulian peoples, Nerulum taken by Barbula, and Apulia entirely subdued. (Liv. ix. 20, 21; Dioii. x. 17.) Barbula was consul again in 311, and the conduct of the war against the Etruscans, with whom he fought an indecisive battle according to Livy. (ix. 50—52; Dion. xx. 8.) The year 313, however, assigns him a triumph in the war against the Etruscans, but this is improbable (Rom. Hist. iii. p. 279) thanks to have been an invention of the family, more especially as the next campaign against the Etruscans was not opened as if the Romans had been previously conquerors.

2. L. AEMILIUS Q. F. Q. N. BARBULA, son of No. 1, was consul in B. C. 281. The Tarentines had rejected with the vilest insult the terms of peace which had been offered by Postumius, the Roman ambassador; but as the republic had both the Etruscans and Samities to contend with, it was unwilling to come to a rupture with the Tarentines, and accordingly sent the consul Barbula towards Tarentum with instructions to offer the same terms of peace as Postumius had, but if they were again rejected to make war against the city. The Tarentines, however, adhered to their former resolution; but as they were unable to defend themselves against the Romans, they invited Pyrrhus to their assistance. As soon as Barbula became acquainted with their determination, he prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour, beat the Tarentines in the open field, and took several of their towns. Alarmed at his progress, and trusting to his dexterity, as he had treated the prisoners kindly and dismissed some without ransom, the Tarentines appointed Agis, a friend of the Romans, general with unlimited powers. But the arrival of Cicero, the chief minister of Pyrrhus, almost immediately afterwards, caused this appointment to be annulled; and as soon as Milo landed with part of the king's forces, he marched against Barbula and attacked the army as it was passing along a narrow road by the sea-coast. By the side of the road were precipitous mountains, and the Tarentine fleet lay at anchor ready to discharge missiles at the Roman army as it marched by. The army would probably have been destroyed, had not Barbula covered his troops by placing the Tarentine prisoners in such a manner that they would have become the first object of the enemy's artillery. Barbula thus led his army by in safety, as the Tarentines would not injure their own countrymen.

Barbula continued in southern Italy after the expiration of his consulship as proconsul. He gained victories over the Samnites and Sallentines, as we learn from the Fasti, which record his triumph over these people, as well as over the Brusaeans, in Quintilis of 260. (Zonar. viii. 2; Oros. iv. 1; Appian, Samn. p. 56, &c., ed. Schr.; Dionys. Eloc. p. 2342, &c., ed. Reiske; Frontin. Strat. i. 4, § 1, where Aemilius Paulus is a mistake.)

3. M. Aemilius L. F. Q. N. Barbula, son of No. 2, was consul in n. c. 230, and had in conjunction with his colleague the conduct of the war against the Ligurians. (Zonar. viii. 19.) Zonaras says (i.e.), that when the Carthaginians heard of the Ligurian war, they resolved to march against Rome, but that they relinquished their design when the consuls came into their country, and received the Romans as friends. This is evidently a blunder, and must in all probability be regarded as the Gauls, who, as we learn from Polybius (ii. 21), were in a state of great ferment about this time owing to the lex Flaminia, which had been passed about two years previously, n. c. 235, for the division of the Flaminian land.

4. Barbula, the patrician Marcus, the legate of Brutus, who had been proscribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, and who pretended that he was a slave in order to escape death. Barbula took Marcus with him to Rome, where he was recognized at the city-gates by one of Barbula's friends. Barbula, by means of Agrrippa, obtained the pardon of Marcus from Octavianus. Marcus afterwards became one of the friends of Octavianus, and commanded part of his forces at the battle of Actium, n. c. 31. Here he had an opportunity of returning the kindness of his former master. Barbula had served under Antony, and after the defeat of the latter fell into the hands of the conquerors. He, too, pretended to be a slave, and was purchased by Marcus, who procured his pardon from Augustus, and both of them subsequently obtained the consulship at the same time. Such is the statement of Appian (B. C. iv. 49), who does not give us either the gentle or family name of Marcus, nor does he tell us whether Barbula belonged to the Aemilia gens. The Fasti do not contain any consul of the name of Barbula, but he and his friends may have been consuls suffecti, the names of all of whom are not preserved.

Barca, the surname of the great Hannibal, the father of Hanibal [Hamilcar]. It is probably the same as the Hebrew Barak, which signifies lightning. Niebuhr (Rom. Hist. iii. p. 609) says, that Barca must not be regarded as the name of a house, but merely as a surname of Hamilcar: but, however this may be, we find that the family to which he belonged was distinguished subsequently as the "Barcine family," and the war and democratic party as the "Barcine party." (Liv. xxxi. 2, 9, xxiii. 13, xxxvii. 12, xxx. 7, 42.)

Bardeanes, a Syrian writer, whose history is involved in partial obscurity, owing to the perplexed and somewhat contradictory notices of him that are furnished by ancient authorities. He was born at Edessa in Mesopotamia, and flourished in the latter half of the second century, and perhaps in the beginning of the third. The Edessene Chronicle (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i. 389) fixes the year of his birth to B.C. 154; and Epiphanius (Hær. 58) mentions, that he lived in favour with Abgar Bar Manu, who reigned at Edessa from B.C. 152 to a. d. 187. It is difficult to decide whether he was originally educated in the principles of the famous Gnostic teacher Valentinus (as Eusebius seems to intimate), or whether (as Epiphanius implies) he was brought up in the Christian faith and afterwards embraced the Valentinian heresy. It is clear, however, that he eventually abandoned the doctrines of Valentinus and founded a school of his own. For an account of the leading principles of his theology see Mosheim, de Idibus Christiani, ante Constantinum M. pp. 395—397, or C. W. F. Walch's Ketzerhistorie, vol. i. pp. 415—422.

Bardeanes wrote much against various sects of heretics, especially against the school of Marcion. His talents are reported to have been of an elevated order, and Jerome, referring to those of his works which had been translated out of Syriac into Greek, observes, "Si autem tanta vis est fulgor in interpretatione, quantum putamus in sermone proprio." He elsewhere mentions that the writings of Bardeanes were held in high repute among the philosophers. Eusebius, in his Praeparatio Evangelica (vi. 10), has preserved a fragment of the apologia of Eusebius, written by the writer, and it undoubtedly displays abilities of no ordinary stamp. This fragment is published by Grabe, in his Spicilegium SS. Patrum, vol. i. pp. 289—299; and by Orelli, in the collection entitled Alexandri Ammonii, Plotini, Bardesianis, &c., de Fato, quasi superverit, Turici, 1824. Grabe there shews that the writer of the Recognitio, falsely ascribed to Clemens Romanus, has committed plagiarism by wholesale upon Bardeanes. It appears from this fragment that the charge of fatulism, preferred against Bardeanes by Augustin, is entirely groundless. It is acutely conjectured by Colberg (de Orig. et Progress. Haeres. p. 140), that Augustin knew this work of Bardeanes only by its title, and hastily concluded that it contained a defence of fatulism. Eusebius says that this defence was written to the Christians. Jerome declares that this was the emperor Marcus Aurelius; but it was most probably Antoninus Verus, who, in his expedition against the Parthians, was at Edessa in the year 165.

Eusebius mentions that Bardeanes wrote several works concerning the persecution of the Christians. The majority of the learned suppose that this was BARDYLIS.

We learn from Ephrem the Syrian that Bardanes composed, in his native tongue, no fewer than one hundred and fifty Psalms elegantly varified. On this subject see Hahn, Bardanes Gnosticus Sycorum primum Hymnologicus, Lips., 1819. Bardanes had a son, called Hammonios (incorrectly called Hammonius by Juniper), whom Sozomen styles a man of learning, and specially skilled in music. (Hist. Eccles. iii. 16; comp. Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv. 29.) He was devoted to his father's opinions, and, by adapting popular melodies to the words in which they were conveyed, he did harm to the cause of orthodoxy. To counteract this mischief, Ephrem set new and evangelical words to the tunes of Harmo-nion, which, in this improved adaptation, long continued in vogue.

In the writings of Porphyry (de Abstinentiis, iv. 17, and also in his fragment de Stige), a Bardesanes Babylonius is mentioned, whom Vossius (de Hist. Graec. iv. 17), Struzy (Hist. Barnum, iv. 35) identifies the Babylonian Bardanes with the Syrian Gnostic, and maintains that he shone, not under Marcus Antoninus, but Eligabalus; and in this last position Grabe concurs.
(Spicil. i. 317.) Lardner conceives that the historical and chronological difficulties may be satisfactorily adjusted by the hypothesis that the same person who had acquired an early reputation in the reign of Marcus Aurelius was still living, the individual in full blaze of his celebrity, under Eligabalus. His reasoning on the question is very sound; yet an attentive consideration of the ancient authorities disposes us to agree with Vossius and Heeren.
The Bardaneses mentioned by Porphyry wrote concerning the Indian Gynnosophists. (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 30; Jerome, de Viris Illust. c. 33; Sozomen, Theodoret, and the Eusebian Chronicle.

BARDYLIS or BARDYLLIS (Βαρδυλής, Βαρδύλλις), the Illyrian chieftain, is said to have been originally a collier,—next, the leader of a band of freebooters, in which capacity he was famous for his equity in the distribution of plunder,—and ultimately to have raised himself to the supreme power in Illyria. (Wesseling, ad Diod. xvi. 4, and the authorities there referred to. He supported Argeas against Amynatas II. in his struggle for the throne of Macedonia (see p. 154, b.); and from Diodorus (xvi. 2) it appears that Amynatas, after his restoration to his kingdom, was obliged to purchase peace of Bardylis by tribute, and to deliver up as a hostage his younger son, Bardylis, who was only 16 years old. *(which (it seems fair from the truth), was committed by the Illyrians to the custody of the Thebans. *(Diod. xvi. 2; comp. Wesseling, ad loc.; Diod. xv. 67; Plut. Pelop. 26; Just. vii. 5.) The incursions of Bardylis into Macedonia we find continued in the reign of Perdiccas III., who fell in a battle against him in a. c. 300. (Diod. xvi. 2.) When Philip, in the ensuing year, was preparing to invade Illyria, Bardylis, who was now 90 years old, having proposed terms of peace which Philip rejected, led forth his troops to meet the enemy, and was defeated and probably slain in the battle which ensued. Plutarch mentions a daughter of his, called Bircena, who was married to Pyrrhus of Epirus. *(Diod. xvi. 4; Just. vii. 6; Lucian, Macrob. 10; Plut. Pyrrh. 9.) (E. E.)

BARREA SORANUS, must not be confounded with Q. Marcus Barea, who was consul successively in a. d. 26. The gentle name of Barea Soranus seems to have been Servillius, as Servilia was the name of his daughter. Soranus was consul successively in a. d. 52 under Claudius, and afterwards pro-consul of Asia. By his justice and zeal in the administration of the province he incurred the hatred of Nero, and was accordingly accused by Ostorius Sabinius, a Roman knight, in a. d. 66. The charges brought against him were his intimacy with Rubellius Plautus (Plautus), and the design of gaining over the province of Asia for the purpose of a revolution. His daughter Servilia was also accused for having given money to the Magi, whom she had consulted respecting her father's danger: she was under twenty years of age, and was the wife of Annius Pollio, who had been banished by Nero. Both Soranus and his daughter were condemned to death, and were allowed to choose the mode of their execution. The chief witness against father and daughter was P. Egnatius Celer, a Stoic philosopher, formerly a client and also the teacher of Soranus; to whose act of villany Juvenal alludes (iii. 116).

"Stoici occidit Bareaem, delator amicum, Discipline que subest." (T. Aqu. xii. 53, xvi. 21, 23, 30—33; Hist. iv. 10, 40; Dion Cass. lxx. 26; Schol. ad Just. i. 33, vi. 531.)

BARICES. (Barbes)

BAR RAGASUS (Βαρραγασας), a son of Hercules and Barge, from whom the town of Bargassac in Caria derived its name. He had been expelled by Lannus, the son of Omphale. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βαρραγας.) (L. S.)

BARGYLLUS (Βαργγυλος), a friend of Bellerophon, who was killed by Pegasus, and in commemoration of whom Bellerosoph gave to a town in Caria the name of Bargylia. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βαργγυλος.) (L. S.)

BARNA BAS (Βαρναβάς), one of the early inspired teachers of Christianity, was originally named Joseph, and received the appellation Barnabas from the apostles. To the few details in his life supplied by the New Testament various additions have been made; none of which are certainly true, while many of them are evidently false. Clemens Ax-andrinus, Eusebius, and others, affirm, that Barna-as was one of the seventy disciples sent forth by our Lord himself to preach the gospel. Barnabas and Joseph, who maintained, that Barnabas not only preached the gospel in Italy, but founded the church in Milan, of which they say he was the first bishop. That this opinion rests on no sufi-BARNABAS.

ient evidence is ably shown by the candid Tillement. (Mémoires, &c. vol. i. p. 657, &c.) Some other fabulous stories concerning Barnabas are related by Alexander, a monk of Cyprus, whose age is doubtful; by Theodorus Lector; and in the Clementina, the Recognitions of Clemens, and the spurious Passio Barnabae in Cypro, forged in the name of Mark.

Tertullian, in his treatise "de Pudicitia," accuses the Epistle to the Hebrews to Barnabas; but this opinion, though probably shared by some of his contemporaries, is destitute of all probability.

A gospel ascribed to Barnabas is held in great reverence among Turks, and has been transcribed in genuine, Spanish and English. It seems to be the production of a Gnostic, disfigured by the interpo-lations of some Mohammedan writer. (Fabric. Codex Apostolus Novi Testamenti, Para Tertia, pp.
373-394; White's Baptism Lectures.)

Respecting the epistle attributed to Barnabas great diversity of opinion has prevailed from the date of its publication by Hugh Menard, in 1645, down to the present day. The external evidence is decidedly in favour of its genuineness; for the epistle is ascribed to Barnabas, the conductor of Paul, no fewer than seven times by Clemens Alexandrinus, and twice by Origen. Eusebius and Jerome, however, though they held the epistle to be a genuine production of Barnabas, yet did not admit it into the canon. When we come to examine the contents of the epistle, we are at a loss to conceive how any serious believer in divine revelation could ever think of ascertaining a work full of such gross absurdities and blunders to a teacher endowed with the gifts of the Spirit. It is not improbable that the author's name was Barnabas, and that the Alexandrian fathers, finding its contents so accord-ant with their system of allegorical interpretation, came very gladly to the precipitate conclusion that it was composed by the associate of Paul.

This epistle is found in several Greek manuscripts appended to Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians. An old Latin translation of the epistle of Barnabas was found in the abbey of Corby; and, on comparing it with the Greek manuscripts, it was discovered that they all of them want the first four chapters and part of the fifth. The Latin translation, on the other hand, is destitute of the last four chapters contained in the Greek codices. An edition of this epistle was prepared by Usher, and printed at Oxford; but it perished, with the exception of a few pages, in the great fire at Oxford in 1644. The following are the principal editions:
in 1645, 4to. at Paris; this edition was prepared by Menard, and brought out after his death by Lake d'Acherry; in 1646, by Isaac Vossius, append to his edition of the epistles of Ignatius;
in 1685, 4to. at Helmstadt, edited by Mader; and in 1767, with valuable notes by the editor, in Cotelerius's edition of the Apostolic Fathers; it is included in both of Le Clerc's republications of this work;
in 1690, Isaac Vossius's edition was republished;
in 1695, 12mo. at Oxford, an edition superintended by Bishop Fell, and containing the few surviving fragments of Usher's notes; in the same year, in the Varia Sacra of Stephen Le Moyn; the first volume containing long prolegomena, and the second pro-lix but very learned annotations to this epistle;
in 1746, 8vo. in Russel's edition of the Apostolic Fathers; in 1788, in the first volume of Gallandi's Bibliotheca Patrum; in 1839, 8vo. by Hefele, in his first, and, in 1842, in his second edition of the Patres Apostolici. In English we have one translation of this epistle by Archbiskop Wake, originally published in 1695 and often reprinted. Among the German translations of it, the best are by Rössler, in the first volume of his Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, and by Hefele, in his Das Sondervorlagen des Apostols Barnabas aufs Neue unterzucht, übersetzt, und erklärt, Tübingen, 1840. [J. M. M.]

BARRUS, T. BEFUCIUS, of Ascalon, a town in Pileum, is described by Cicero (Buct.
49), as the most eloquent of all orators out of Rome. In Cicero's time several of his orations were delivered at Ascalon, and he was engaged in arguments against Caepio, which was spoken at Rome.
This Caepio was Q. Servilius Caepio, who perished in the social war, b. c. 90. [Caepio.]

BARSANUPHIUS (Barsoanofos), a monk of Gaza, about 540 A.D., was the author of some works on asceticism, which are preserved in MS.
in the imperial library at Vienna and the royal library at Paris. (Cave, Hist. Lit. sub. ann.) [P. S.]

BARSINE (Barsoin), 1. Daughter of Artabazus, the satrap of Bithynia, and wife of Memnon the Rhodian. In b. c. 334, the year of Alexander's invasion of Asia, she and her children were sent by Memnon to Dareius III., as hostages for his filiality; and in the ensuing year, when Memnon was betrayed to the Macedonians, she fell into the hands of Alexander, by whom she became the mother of a son named Hercules. On Alexander's death, b. c. 323, a claim to the throne on this boy's behalf was unsuccessfully urged by Neanthes.
From a comparison of the accounts of Diodorus and Justin, it appears that he was brought up at Pergamum under his mother's care, and that she shared his fate when (b. c. 309) Ptolemy was induced by Cassander to murder him. (Plut.
Alec. 21, Eum. 1; Dio. v. 23, xx. 29, 28; Curt.
iii. 13. § 14, x. 6. § 10; Just. xi. 10, xili. 2, 2; Paus. ix. 7.) Phutarch (Krem. L. c.) mentions a sister* of hers, of the same name, whom Alexander gave in marriage to Eumenes at the grand neplitals at Susa in b. c. 324; but see Arrian, Anc.
vi. p. 148, s.

2. Known also by the name of Stateim, was the elder daughter of Dareius III., and became the bride of Alexander at Susa, b. c. 324. Within a year after Alexander's death she was treacherously murdered by Roxana, acting in concert with the regent Perdiccas, through fear of Barsine's giving birth to a son whose claims might interfere with those of her own. (Plut. Alex. 70, 77; Arr. Anc.
vii. p. 148, t.; Dio. v. 107.) Justin (xii. 10) seems to confound this Barsine with the one mentioned above.

BARSUMAS or BARSAUMAS, bishop of Nisibis (455-483 A. D.), was one of the most eminent leaders of the Nestorians. His efforts gained for Nestorianism in Persia numerous adherents, and the patronage of the king, Phraoes, who, at the instigation of Barsumas, expelled from his kingdom the opponents of the Nestorians, and allowed the latter to erect Seleucia and Ctesiphon into a patriarchal see. He was the author of some polemical works, which are lost. He must not be confounded with Barsamus, an abbot, who was condemned for Eutychianism by the council of

BARTHOLOMAEUS (Βαρθολομαίος), one of the twelve apostles of our Lord. Eusebius (H. E. v. 10) informs us, that when Panteenus visited the Indians, he found in their possession a Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, which their fathers had received from Bartholomew. The story is confirmed by Jerome, who relates that this Hebrew Gospel was brought to Alexandria by Panteenus. It is not very easy to determine who these Indians were; but Mosheim and Neander, who identify them with the inhabitants of Arabia Felix, are probably in the right. The time, place, and manner of the death of Bartholomew are altogether uncertain. There was an apocryphal gospel falsely attributed to him, which is condemned by Pope Gelasius in his decree de Libris Aporopxylos. (Tillmont, Mémoires, vol. i. pp. 387—389, 642—645. Ed. sec.; Mosheim, de Ritus Christianorum, p. 205, &c.; Neander, Allgemeine Geschichte, g. i. p. 113.)

BARSANTES (Βαρσάντης), or BARSAENTUS (Βαρσάέντης), satrap of the Arachot and Drangae, was present at the battle of Gugamela, n. c. 351, and after the defeat of the Persian army conspired with Bessus against Dareius. He was one of those who mortally wounded the Persian king, when Alexander was in pursuit of him; and after this he fled to India, where, however, he was seized by the inhabitants and delivered up to Alexander, who put him to death. (Arrinn, Anab. iii. 8, 21, 25 ; Diod. xvii. 74; Curt. vi. 6, viii. 13.)

BARYAXES (Βαραϊξης), a Mede, who assumed the sovereignty during Alexander's absence in India, but was seized by Atropates, the satrap of Media, and put to death by Alexander, n. c. 325. (Arrinn, Anab. vi. 29.)

BARZANES (Βαρζάνης). 1. Of the early kings of Armenia according to Diodorus (ii. 1), who makes him a tributary of the Assyrian Ninos. 2. Appointed satrap of the Parthiak by Bessus, n. c. 330, afterwards fell into the power of Alexaner. (Arrinn, Anab. iv. 7.)

BAS (Βασ), king of Bithynia, reigned fifty years, from n. c. 370 to 326, and died at the age of 71. He succeeded his father Botonis, and was himself succeeded by his own son Zipotes. He defeated Calantus, the general of Alexander, and maintained the independence of Bithynia. (Mennon, c. 20, ed. Orelli.)

BASILIDIES (Βασιλιδεῖς). 1. A Greek grammarian, who wrote a work on the Dialect of Homer (περί λέξεως Ομηρίκης), of which an epitome was made by Quintus. Both works are lost. (Erythmol. Mag. s. v. Πέρι λέξεως Ομηρίκης.)

2. Of Scythopolis, a Stoic philosopher mentioned by Eusebius (Chron. Arm. p. 364, ed. Zohrab and Mai) and Syncellus (p. 551, b.) as flourishing under Antoninus Pius, and as the teacher of Verus Lucianus.

3. An Epicurean philosopher, the successor of Dionysus. (Diog. Laërt. x. 25.)

4. Of Alexandria, was one of the earliest and most eminent leaders of the Gnostics. The time when he lived is not ascertained with certainty, but it was probably about 120 a. D. He professed to have received from Glaucias, a disciple of St. Peter, the esoteric doctrine of that apostle. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. p. 763, ed. Potter.) No other Christian writer makes an allusion of Glaucias. Basilides was the disciple of Menander and the fellow-disciple of Saturninus. He is said to have spent some time at Antioch with Saturninus, when the latter was commencing his heretical teaching, and then to have proceeded to Persia, where he sowed the seeds of Gnosticism, which ripened under Manes. Thence he returned to Egypt, and publicly taught his heretical doctrines at Alexandria. He appears to have lived till after the accession of Antoninus Pius in 138 a. D. He made additions to the doctrines of Menander and Saturninus. A complete account of his system of theology and cosmogony is given by Mosheim (Eccles. Hist. bk. i. pt. ii. c. 5. §§ 11-13, and de Rel. Chríst. ante Constant. pp. 842-861), Lardner (History of Heretics, bk. ii. c. 2), and Wallach. (Hist. d. Ketzer. i. 391-309.)

Basilides was the author of Commentaries on the Gospel, in twenty-four books, fragments of which are preserved in Grabe, Spicilegio, ii. p. 89. Origen, Ambrose, and Jerome mention a "gospel of Basilides," which may perhaps mean nothing more than his Commentaries.

5. Bishop of the Libyan Pentapolis, was a contemporary and friend of Dionysius of Alexandria, to whom he wrote letters "on the time of our Lord's resurrection, and at what hour of that day the antepascal fast should cease." The letters of Basilides are lost, but the answers of Dionysius remain. Cave says, that Basilides seems to have been an Egyptian by birth, and he places him at the year 258 a. D. (Hist. litt. sub. ann.) (P.S.)

BASILIA'NUS, prefect of Egypt at the assassination of Caracalla and the elevation of Macrinus, by whom he was nominated to the command of the praetorians. Before setting out to assume his office, he put to death certain messengers despatched by Elagabalus to publish his claims and proclaim his accession; but soon after, upon hearing of the success of the pretender and the overthrow of his patron, he fled to Italy, where he was betrayed by a friend, seized, and sent off to the new emperor, at that time wintering in Nicomedea. Upon his arrival, he was slain by the orders of the prince, a. D. 213. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 55.) [W.R.]

BASILICAS. [BASILICÁCRIS.]

BASILICAS. [BASILICÁCRIS.]

BASILICUS (Βασιλίκος), a rhetorician and sophist of Nicomedea. As we know that he was one of the teachers of Apines of Gadara, he must have lived about A. D. 200. He was the author of several rhetorical works, among which are specified one περί τῶν δια τῶν λέξων σχολωμάτων, a second περί βιοτομίων παρατηθείσης, a third περί διήνευσης, and a fourth περί μετατοπισθείσης. (Suidas, s. v. Βασιλικούς και Αφίσων; Eudoc. p. 93.) [L. S.]

BASILIDES. 1. A priest, who predicted success to Vespasian as he was sacrificing on mount Carmel. (Tac. Hist. ii. 75.)

2. An Egyptian of high rank, who is related to have appeared miraculously to Vespasian in the temple of Neptunus at Alexandria. (Tac. Hist. iv. 82; Sueton. Vesp. 7.) Suetonius calls him a freedman; but the reading is probably corrupt.

BASILIDES, a jurist, contemporary with Justinian, and one of a commission of ten employed by the emperor to compile the first code, which was afterwards suppressed, and gave place to the 2 u BASILISCUS.

During the negotiations, Genseric assembled his ships, and suddenly attacked the Roman fleet, which was unprepared for a general engagement. Basiliscus, in his rush, fell off the battle; his lieutenant, Joanna, one of the most distinguished warriors of his time, when overpowered by the Vandals, refused the pardon that was promised him, and with his heavy armour leaped overboard, and drowned himself in the sea. One half of the Roman ships was burnt, sunk, or taken, the other half followed the fugitive Basiliscus. The whole expedition had failed. After his arrival at Constantinople, Basiliscus hid himself in the church of St. Sophia, in order to escape the wrath of the people and the revenge of the emperor, but he obtained his pardon by the mediation of Verina, and he was punished merely with banishment to Hercules in Thrace.

Basiliscus is generally represented as a good general, though easily deceived by stratagems; and it may therefore be possible that he had suffered himself to be surprised by Genseric. The historians generally speak ambiguously, saying that he was either a dupe or a traitor; and there is much ground to believe that he had concerted a plan with Aspar to ruin Leo by causing the failure of the expedition. This opinion gains further strength by the fact, that Basiliscus aspired to the imperial dignity, which, however, he was unable to obtain during the vigorous government of Leo. No sooner had Leo died (474), than Basiliscus and Verina, Leo's widow, conspired against his feeble successor, Zeno, who was driven out and deprived in the following year. It seems that Verina intended to put her lover, Priscus, on the throne; but Basiliscus feared too much authority in the army, and succeeded in being proclaimed emperor, (October or November, 475.) His reign was short. He conferred the title of Augustus upon his wife, Zenomida; he created his son, Marcus, Cæsar, and afterwards Augustus; and he patronised the Eutychians in spite of the decisions of the council of Chalcedon. During his reign a dreadful configuration destroyed a considerable part of Constantinople, and amongst other buildings the great library with 120,000 volumes. His rapacity and the want of union among his adherents caused his ruin, which was accelerated by the activity of Zeno, his wife, the empress Ariadne, and generally all their adherents. Illus, the general dispatched by Basiliscus against Zeno, who had assemled some forces in Glion and Isauria, had no sooner heard that the Greeks were dissatisfied with the usurper, than he and his army joined the party of Zeno; and his successor, Armatius or Harmatus, the nephew of Basiliscus, either followed the example of Illus, or at least allowed Zeno to march unmolested upon Constantinople. Basiliscus was surprised in his palace, and Zeno sent him and his family to Cappadocia, where they were imprisoned in a stronghold, the name of which was perhaps Cæsusus. Food having been refused them, Basiliscus, his wife, and children perished by hunger and cold in the winter of 477-478, several months after his fall, which took place in June or July, 477. (Zonaras, c. iv. 15; Procop. De Bell. Varn. i. 6, 7; Theophanes, pp. 97-107, ed. Paris; Cedrenus, pp. 349-50, ed. Paris. Jornandes, de Regn. Suec. pp. 58, 59, ed. Lidenberg, says, that Carthage was in an untenable position, and that Basiliscus was bribed by Genseric.) BASILIIUS (Barcelos and Basilus), commonly called BASIL. 1. Bishop of ANGYRA (A.D. 336-360), originally a physician, was one of the chief leaders of the Semi-Arian party, and the founder of a sect of Arians which was named after him. He was held in high esteem by the emperor Constantius, and is praised for his piety and learning by Socrates and Sozomen. He was engaged in perpetual controversies both with the orthodox and with the ultra-Arians. His chief opponent was Aecius, through whose influence Basil was deposed by the synod of Constantinople (A.D. 360), and banished to the monastery of Ammarina. He wrote against his predecessor Marcellus, and a work on Virginity. His works are lost. (Hieron. de Vic. Hist. 39; Epiphani. Haeres. Ixxli. 1; Socrates, H. E. ii. 30, 42; Sozomen, H. E. ii. 43.)

2. Bishop of CASAREA in Cappadocia, commonly called Basil the Great, was born A.D. 329, of a noble Christian family which had long been settled at Caesarea, and some members of which had suffered in the Maximinian persecution. His father, also named Basil, was an eminent advocate and teacher of rhetoric at Caesarea: his mother's name was Emmeila. He was brought up in the principles of the Christian faith partly by his parents, but chiefly by his grandfather, Macrina, who resided at Neocaesarea in Pontus, and had been a bearer of Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of that city. His education was continued at Caesarea in Cappadocia, and then at Constantinople. Here, according to some accounts, or, according to others, at Antioch, he studied under Libanius. The statements of ancient writers on this matter are confused; but we learn from a correspondence between Libanius and Basil, that they were acquainted when Basil was a young man. The genuineness of these letters has been doubted by Garnier, but on insufficient grounds. From Constantine he proceeded to Athens, where he studied for four years (351-355 A.D.), chiefly under the sophists Himerius and Procraterus. Among his fellow-students were the emperor Julian and Gregory Nazianzen. The latter, who was also a native of Cappadocia, and had been Basil's school-fellow, now became, and remained throughout life, his most intimate friend. It is said, that he persuaded Basil to remain at Athens when the latter was about to leave the place in disgust, and that the attachment and piety of the two friends became the talk of all the city. Basil's success in study was so great, that even before he reached Athens his fame had preceded him; and in the schools of that city he was surprised by no one, if we may believe his friend Gregory, in rhetoric, philosophy, and science. At the end of 355, he returned to Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he began to plead causes with great success. He soon, however, abandoned his profession, in order to devote himself to a religious life, having been urged to this course by the persuasions and example of his sister Macrina. The more he studied the Bible the more did he become convinced of the excellence of a life of poverty and seclusion from the world. About the year 357, he made a journey through Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, in order to become acquainted with the monastic life as practised in those countries. On his return from this journey (358), he retired to a mountain on the banks of the river Iris, near Neocaesarea, and there lived as a recluse for thirteen years. On the opposite bank of the river was a small estate belonging to his family, where his mother and sister, with some chosen companions, lived in religious seclusion from the world. Basil assembled round him a company of monks, and was soon joined by his friend Gregory. Their time was spent in manual labour, in the religious exercises of singing, prayer, and watching, and more especially in the study of the Scriptures, with the comments of Christian writers. Their favourite writer appears to have been Origen, from whose works they collected a body of extracts under the title of Philothea (Philosophia). He composed a series of regulations for the monastic life. He wrote many letters of advice and consolation, and made journeys through Pontus for the purpose of extending monasticism, which owed its establishment in central Asia mainly to his exertions.

In the year 359, Basil was associated with his namesake of Angyra and Eustathius of Sebaste in an embassy to Constantinople, in order to gain the emperor's confirmation of the decrees of the synod of Seleucia, by which the Homoeans had condemned the Anomolians; but he took only a silent part in the embassy. He had before this time, but how long we do not know, been appointed reader in the church at Caesarea by the bishop Dianius, and he had also received deacon's orders from Melitus, bishop of Antioch. In the following year (360) Basil withdrew from Caesarea and returned to his monastery, because Dianius had subscribed the Arian confession of the synod of Ariminum. Here (361) he received a letter from the emperor Julian, containing an invitation to court, which Basil refused on account of the emperor's apostasy. Other letters followed; and it is probable that Basil would have suffered martyrdom had it not been for Julian's sudden death. In the following year (362), Dianius, on his death bed, recalled Basil to Caesarea, and his successor Eusebius ordained him as a presbyter; but shortly afterwards (364), Eusebius deposed him, for some unknown reason. Basil retired once more to the wilderness, accompanied by Gregory Nazianzen. Encouraged by this division, the Arians, who had acquired new strength from the accession of Valens, commenced an attack on the church at Caesarea. Basil had been their chief opponent there, having written a work against Eunomius; and now his loss was so severely felt, that Eusebius, availing himself of the mediation of Gregory Nazianzen, recalled Basil to Caesarea, and, being himself but little of a theologian, entrusted to him almost the entire management of ecclesiastical affairs. (365.) Basil's learning and eloquence, his zeal for the Catholic faith, and, above all, his conduct in a famine which happened in Cappadocia (397; 398), where he directed his whole fortune to relieve the sufferers, gained him such general popularity, that upon the death of Eusebius, in the year 376, he was chosen in his place bishop of Caesarea. In virtue of this office, he became also metropolitan of Caesarea and archbishop of Pontus. He still retained his monastic habit and his ascetic mode of life. The chief features of his administration were his care for the poor, for whom he built houses at Caesarea and the other cities in his province; his restoration of church discipline; his strictness in examining candidates for orders; his efforts for church union both in the East and West; his defence of his authority against Anthimus of Tyana, whose see was raised to a second metropolis of Cappadocia by Valens; and his defence of orthodoxy against the powerful Arian and Semi-Arian bishops in his neighbourhood, and against Modestus, the prefect of Cappadocia, and the emperor Valens himself. He died on the 1st of January, 379 A.D., worn out by his ascetic life, and was buried at Caesarea. His epitaph by Gregory of Nazianzus is preserved, and his chief works: 1. Εἰς τὸν ἔθρημον, Nine Homilies on the Six Days' Work. 2. XVII. Homilies on the Psalms. 3. XXXI. Homilies on various subjects. 4. Two Books on Baptism. 5. On true Virginity. 6. Commentary (ἐρωτευμα or ἐρυθέσει) on the first XVI. chapters of Isaiah. 7. Αἰτιλογίου τοῦ ἀσαλογίου τοῦ δυστεθέντος Εὐσημνοῦ, An Answer to the Apology of the Arian Eunomius. 8. Ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ προσευνήμα, A Treatise on the Holy Spirit, addressed to Eunomius: its genuineness is doubted by Garnier. 9. Ἀποτυχία, ascetic writings. Under this title are included his work on Christian Morals (θῶμα), his monastic rules, and several other treatises and sermons. 10. Letters. 11. A Burial. His minor works, and those falsely ascribed to him are enumerated by Fabrius and Cave. The first complete edition of Basil's works was published at Basel in 1551; the most complete is that by Garnier, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1721—1730. (Gregor. Nazianz. Ort. in Laud. Basilli M.; Gregor. Nyss. Vit. S. Maxmiana; Garnier, Vita S. Basili; Socrates, H. E. iv. 26; Sozomen, H. E. vi. 17; Rufinus, H. E. xi. 9; Suidas, s. v. Basilii.)

3. Of CILICIA (διά Κίλια), was the author of a history of the Church, of which Photius gives a short account (Cod. 432), a work against John of Scythopolis (Phot. Cod. 107), and one against Archelaius, bishop of Colonlia in Armenia. (Suidas, s. v.) He lived under the emperor Anastasius, was presbyter at Antioch about 407 A.D., and afterwards bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia.

4. Bishop of SELCUCHIA in Isauria from 448 till after 458, distinguished himself by taking alternately both sides in the Eutychian controversy. His works are published with those of Gregory Thaumaturgus, in the Paris edition of 1622. He must not be confounded with Basil, the friend of Chrysostom, as is done by Photius. (Cod. 168, p. 116, ed. Bekker.)

BASILIUS I. MACEDO (BASILEIOS Í-MACEDO), emperor of the East, one of the most extraordinary characters recorded in history, ascended the throne after a series of almost incredible adventures. He was probably born in 320, and is said to have been the descendant of a prince of the house of the Areopagite, who died to Greece, and was invested with large estates in Thrace by the emperor Leo I. Thrax. (451—474.) There were probably two Areopagites who settled in Thrace, Chiones and Arzabamis. The father of Basil, however, was a small landowner, the family having gradually lost their riches; but his mother is said to have been a descendant of Constantine the Great. At an early age, Basil was made prisoner by a party of Bulgarians, and carried into their country, where he was educated as a slave. He was ransomed several years afterwards, arrived at Constantinople a destitute lad, and was found safe on the same day in St. Diomede. His intellectual beauty attracted the attention of a monk, on whose recommendation he was presented to Theophilus, surnamed the Little, a cousin of the emperor Theo-philus (829—842), who, a diminutive man himself, liked to be surrounded by tall and handsome foot- men. Such was Basil, who, having accompanied his master to Greece, was adopted by a rich widow at Patras. Her wealth enabled him to purchase large estates in Macedonia, whence he derived his surname Macedo, unless it be true that this was merely an account of his pretended descent, on his mother's side, either from Alexander the Great or his father, Philip of Macedonia, which however seems to be little better than a fable. He continued to attend the little Theophilus, and after the accession of Michael I. in 842, attracted the attention of this emperor by vanquishing in single combat a giant Bulgarian, who was reputed to be the first pugilist of his time. In 854 Michael appointed him his chief chamberlain; and the ambition of Basil became so conspicuous, that the courtiers used to say that he was the lion who would devour them all. Basil was married to one Maria, by whom he had a son, Constantine; but, in order to make his fortune, he repudiated his wife, and married Hypoxia Ingerina, the eminence of the emperor, who took in exchange Thecla, the sister of Basil. The marriage was celebrated in December, 865; and in September, 866, Ingerina became the mother of Leo, afterwards emperor. The influence of Basil increased daily, and he was daring enough to form a conspiracy against the emperor's uncle, Bardus, upon whom the dignity of Caesar had been conferred, and who was assassinated in the presence of Michael.

A short time afterwards, Basil was created Augustus, and the administration of the empire devolved upon him, Michael being unable to conduct it on account of his drunkenness and other vices. The emperor became nevertheless jealous of his associate, and resolved upon his ruin; but he was prevented from carrying his plan into execution by the bold energy of Basil, whose contrivance Michael was murdered after a debauch on the 24th of September, 867.

Basil, who succeeded him on the throne, was no general, but a bold, active man, whose intelligence was of a superior kind, though his character was stained with many a vice, which he had learned during the time of his slavery among the barbarians and of his courtiership at Constantinople. The famous patriarch Photius having caused those religious troubles for which his name is so conspicuous in ecclesiastical and political history, Basil instantly removed him from the see of Constantinople, and put Ignatius in his place. He likewise ordered a campaign to be undertaken against the warlike sect of the Paulicians, whom his generals brought to obedience. A still greater danger arose from the Arabs, who, during the reign of the incompetent Michael III., had made great progress in Asia and Europe. Basil, who knew how to choose good generals, forced the Arabs to renounce the siege of Ragusa. In 872, he accompanied his Asiatic army, which crossed the Euphrates and defeated the Arabs in many engagements, especially in Cilicia in 875. In 877 the patriarch Ignatius died, and Photius succeeded in resuming his former dignity, under circumstances the narrative of which belongs to the Life of Photius. The emperor, however, quickly obtained against the Arabs, encouraged Basil to form the project of driving them out of Italy, the southern part of which, as well as Sicily and Sardinia, they had gradually conquered during the ninth century. They had also laid siege to Chaldeis; but there they were defeated with great loss, and the Greeks burnt the greater part of their fleet off Creta. After these successes, Basil sent an army to Italy, which was commanded by Procopius and his lieutenant Leo. Procopius defeated the Arabs wherever he met them; but his glory excited the jealousy of Leo, who abandoned Procopius in the heat of a general action. Procopius was killed while endeavouring to rouse the spirit of his soldiers, who hesitated when they beheld the defection of Leo. Notwithstanding these unfavourable occurrences, the Greeks carried the day. Basil immediately recalled Leo, who was maligned and sent into exile. The new commander-in-chief of the Greek army in Italy was Stephano Maccensius, an incompetent general, who was soon superseded in his command by Nicephorus Phocas, the grandfather of Nicephorus Phocas who became emperor in 963. This happened in 885; and in one campaign Nicephorus Phocas expelled the Arabs from the continent of Italy, and forced them to content themselves with Sicily.

About 879, Basil lost his eldest son, Constantine. His second son, Leo, who succeeded Basil as Leo VI. Philosopher, was for some time the favourite of his father, till one Santabaren succeeded in kindling jealousy between the emperor and his son. Leo was in danger of being put to death for crimes which he had never committed, when Basil discovered that he had been abused by a traitor. Santabaren was punished (893), and the good understanding between Basil and Leo was no more troubled. In the month of February, 896, Basil was wounded by a stag while hunting, and died in consequence of his wounds on the 1st of March of the same year.

Basil was one of the greatest emperors of the East; he was admired and respected by his subjects and the nations of Europe. The weak government of Michael III. had been universally despised, and the empire under him was on the brink of ruin, through external enemies and internal troubles. Basil left it to his son in a flourishing state, with a well organised administration, and increased the size of the empire. As a legislator, Basil is known for having begun a new collection of the laws of the Eastern empire, the Basilei̓i̓ōn diastrá̑keis, "Constitutiones Basili̓icas," or simply "Basili̓icas," which were finished by his son Leo, and afterwards augmented by Constantine Porphyrogeneta. The bibliographical history of this code belongs to the history of Leo VI. Philosopher.

(See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Basili̓icas.) The reign of Basil is likewise distinguished by the propagation of the Christian religion in Bulgaria, a most important event for the future history of the East.

Basil is the author of a small work, entitled Κερελαία παραμένουσα, which was translated into Greek by Eustathius of Kayseri (Excerptiorum codici LXVI. ad Leonem filium), and dedicated to and addressed to his son Leo. It contains sixty-six short chapters, each treating of a moral, religious, social, or political principle, especially such as concern the duties of a sovereign. Each chapter has a superscription, such as, Περὶ ταδείουν, which is the first; Περὶ τιμῆς Ἱερόν; Περὶ τιματῶν; Περὶ αὐχής; Περὶ λόγου τελείου, &c. and Περὶ ανοίγοντος γραφῆς, which is the last. The first edition of this work was published, with a Latin translation, by F. Morelli, at Paris, 1584, 4to; a second edition was published by Damke, with the translation of Morelli. Basil, 1633, 8vo.; the edition of Dransfeld, Göttlingen, 1740, 8vo., is valued for the editor's excellent Latin translation; and another edition, with the translation of Morelli corrected by the editor, is contained in the first volume (pp. 143-156) of Bandurcius, "Imperium Orientale," Paris, 1729.

BASILIIUS II. (Basil the Emperor of the East, was the elder son of Romanus II., of the Macedonian dynasty, and was born in A. D. 958; he had a younger brother, Constantine, and two sisters, Anna and Theophano or Theophania. Romanus ordered that, after his death, which took place in 963, his infant sons should reign together, under the guardianship of their mother, Theophano or Theophania; but she married Nicephorus Phocas, the conqueror of Creta, and raised him to the throne, which he occupied till 969, when he was murdered by Jeannes Zimisces, who succeeded to his place. Towards the end of 975, Zimisces received poison in Cilliæ, and died in Constantinople in the month of January, 976. After his death, Basil and Constantine ascended the throne; but Constantine, with the exception of some military expeditions, in which he distinguished himself, led a luxurious life in his palace in Constantinople, and the care of the government devolved upon Basil, who, after having spent his youth in luxuries and extravagances of every description, showed himself worthy of his ancestor, Basil I., and was one of the greatest emperors that ruled over the Roman empire in the East.

The reign of Basil II. was an almost uninterrupted series of civil troubles and wars, in which, however, the imperial arms obtained extraordinary success. The emperor generally commanded his armies in person, and became renowned as one of the greatest generals of his time. No sooner was he seated on the throne, than his authority was shaken by a revolt of Sclerus, who, after bringing the East of Greece in revolt to the bast of Athens, was at last defeated by the imperial general, Phocas, and obliged to take refuge among the Arabs. Otho II., emperor of Germany, who had married Theophania, the sister of Basil, claimed Calabria and Apulia, which belonged to the Greeks, but had been promised as a dowry with Theophania. Basil, unable to send sufficient forces to Italy, excited the Arabs of Sicily against Otho, who, after obtaining great successes, lost an engagement with the Arabs, and on his flight was taken prisoner by a Greek galley, but nevertheless escaped, and was making preparations for a new expedition, when he was poisoned (982). In consequence of his death, Basil was enabled to consolidate his authority in Southern Italy. In 986, he laid siege with Al-mash, the khalif of Bagdad, and the Arabs of Sicily, who were in the service of the sea-towns of Southern Italy, the Greeks made some valuable conquests, although they were no adequate reward either for the expenses incurred or sacrifices made in these expeditions. Basil's greatest glory was the destruction of the kingdom of Bulgaris, which, as Gibbon says, was the most important triumph of the Roman arms since the time of Belisarius. Basil opened the war, which lasted, with a few interruptions, till 1018, with a successful campaign in 987; and, during the following years, he made conquest after conquest in the south-western part of that kingdom, to which Epirus and a considerable part of Macedonia belonged. In 996, however, Samuel, the king of the Bulgarians, overran all Macedonia, laid siege to Thessalonica, took it, burned it, and penetrated into the Peloponnesus. Having marched back into Thessaly, in order to meet with the Greeks, who advanced in his rear, he was routed on the banks of the Sperchius, and hardly escaped death or captivity; his army was destroyed.

In 999, the lieutenant of Basil, Nicephorus Xiphias, took the towns of Plistova and Parasthiva in Bulgaria Proper. But as early as 1002, Samuel again invaded Thrace and took Adrianople. He was, however, driven back; and during the twelve following years the war seems to have been carried on with but little energy by either party. It broke out again in 1014, and was signalized by an extraordinary success of the Greeks, who were commanded by their emperor and Nicephorus Xipphias. The Bulgarians were routed at Zetagum. Being incumbered on his march by a band of 15,000 prisoners, Basil gave the cruel order to put their eyes out, sparing one in a hundred, who was to lead one hundred of his blind companions to their native country. When Samuel beheld his unhappy warriors, thus mutilated and filling his camp with their cries, he fell senseless on the ground, and died two days afterwards. Bulgaria was not entirely subdued till 1017 and 1018, when it was degraded into a Greek thema, and governed by dukes. This conquest continued a province of the Eastern empire till the reign of Isaac Angelus. (1185–1193.)

Among the other events by which the reign of Basil was signalized, the most remarkable were, a new revolt of Scylas in 987, who was made prisoner by Phocas, but persuaded his victor to make common cause with him against the emperor, which Phocas did, whereupon they were both attacked by Basil, who killed Phocas in a battle, and granted a full pardon to the cunning Scylas; thecession of Southern Thessalian to the Greeks by its king David in 991; a glorious expedition against the Arabs in Syria and Phoenicia; a successful campaign of Basil in 1022 against the king of Northern Thessalia, who was supported by the Arabs; and a dangerous mutiny of Scylas and Phocas, the son of Nicopho-rous Phocas mentioned above, who rebelled during the absence of Basil in Iberia, but who were speedily brought to fortune. Notwithstanding his advanced age, Basil meditated the conquest of Sicily from the Arabs, and had almost terminated his preparations, when he died in the month of December, 1025, without leaving issue. His successor was his brother and co-regent, Constantine IX., who died in 1028. It is said, and it cannot be doubted, that Basil, in order to expiate the sins of his youth, promised to become a monk, that he bore the frown of a monk under his imperial dress, and that he took a vow of abstinence. He was of course much praised by the clergy; but he impoverished his subjects by his continual wars, which could not be carried on without heavy taxes; he was besides very rapacious in accumulating treasures for himself; and it is said that he left the enormous sum of 200,000 pounds of gold, or nearly

BAΣILΙUS, the name of a family of the Minneda gens. Persons of this name occur only in the first century B. C. It is frequently written Basilus, but the best MSS. have Basilus, which is also shown to be the correct form by the line of Lucan (iv. 416),

"Et Basilum videre ducem," &c.

1. (MINUCIUS) BASILUS, a tribune of the soldiers, served under Sulla in Greece in his campaign against Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, b. c. 86. (Appian, Mithr. 50.)

2. M. MINUCIUS BASILUS. (Cic. pro Caes. 38.)

3. MINUCIUS BASILUS, of whom we know nothing, except that his tomb was on the Appian way, and was a spot infamous for robberies. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 9; Ascon. in Milon, p. 50, ed. Orelli.)

4. L. MINUCIUS BASILUS, the uncle of M. Satrius, the son of his sister, whom he adopted in his will. (Cic. de Off. iii. 18.)

5. L. MINUCIUS BASILUS, whose original name was M. Satrius, took the name of his uncle, by whom he was adopted. [No. 4.] He served under Caesar in Gaul, and is mentioned in the war against Ambiorix, b. c. 54, and again in 52, at the end of which campaign he was stationed among the Remi for the winter with the command of two legions. (Caes. B. G. vi. 29, 30, vii. 92.) He probably continued in Gaul till the breaking out of the civil war in 43, in which he commanded part of Caesar's fleet. (Flor. iv. 2. § 32; Lucan, iv. 416.) He was one of Caesar's assassins in b. c. 44, although, like Brutus and others, he was a personal friend of the dictator. In the following year he was himself murdered by his own slaves, because he had punished some of them in a barbarous manner. (Appian, B. C. ii. 113, iii. 98; Oros. vi. 18.) There is a letter of Cicero's to Basilus, congratulating him on the murder of Ceasar. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18.)

6. (MINUCIUS) BASILUS, is attacked by Cicero in the second Philippic (c. 41) as a friend of Antony. He would therefore seem to be a different person from No. 5.

BASSAREUS (Bασσαρεύς), a surname of Dio-yneus (Hor. Carm. i. 18. 11; Macrob. Sat. i. 18), which, according to the explanations of the Greeks, is derived from Basardpa or Basareps, the long robe which the god himself and the Maenads used to wear in Thrace, and whence the Maenads themselves are often called basarors ou basarides. The name of this garment again seems to be connected with, or rather the same as, Bασσαρις, a fox (Hesych. s. v. Βασσαρις), probably because it was ori-namally made of fox-skins. Others derive the name Bassareus from a Hebrew word, according to which its meaning would be the same as the Greek προπαργνυς, that is, the precursor of the vintage. On some of the vases discovered in southern Italy Dionysus is represented in a long garment which is commonly considered to be the Thymbra bat-

BASSUS.

BASSUS'NUS. 1. A Roman of distinction selected by Constantine the Great as the husband of his sister Anastasia, and destined for the rank of Caesar and the government of Italy, although probably never actually invested with these dignities. For, while negotiations were pending with Licinius respecting the ratification of this arrangement, it was discovered that the last-named prince had been secretly tampering with Bassianus, and had persuaded him to form a treasonable plot against his brother-in-law and benefactor. Constantine promptly executed vengeance on the traitor, and the discovery of the perfidy so nastifed by his colleagues led to a war, the result of which is recounted elsewhere. [Constantianus.] The whole history of this intrigue, so interesting and important on account of the momentous consequences to which it eventually led, is extremely obscure, and depends almost exclusively upon the anonymous fragment appended by Valesius to his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus. 2. A Phoenician of humble extraction, who nevertheless numbered among his lineal descendants, in the three generations which followed immediately after him, four emperors and four Augustae. — Caracalla, Geta, Elagabalus, Alexander Severus, Julia Domna, Julia Macra, Julia Soemias, and Julia Mamaea, besides having an emperor (Sept. Severus) for his son-in-law. From him Caracalla, Elagabalus, and Alexander Severus all bore the name of Bassianus; and we find his grand-daughter Julia Soemias entitled Bassiana in a remarkable bilingual inscription discovered at Velitrae and published with a dissertation at Rome in 1765. (Aurelius Victor, Epit. c. 21), has preserved his name; and from an expression used by Dion Cassius, lxxviii. 24, with regard to Julia Domna, we infer his station in life. See also the genealogical table prefixed to the article Caracalla. [W. R.]

BASSUS. We find consuls of this name under Vespasian for the years a. p. 250 and 252. One of these is probably the Pompennus Bassus who under Claudius came forward as a national sacrifice, because the Sibylline books had declared that the Goths could not be venerated unless the chief senator of Rome should devote his life for his country; but the emperor would not allow him to execute this design, generously insisting, that the person pointed out by the Fates must be himself. The whole story, however, is very problematical. (Aurel. Vict. Epit. c. 34; comp. Julian, Cesar, p. 11, and Tillemonmt on Claudius II.) [W. R.]

BASSUS. 1. Is named by Ovid as having formed one of the select circle of his poetical associates, and as celebrated for his iambic lays, 'Pontius heroic Bassus quoque clarus iambico,' but is not noticed by Quintilian nor by any other Roman writer, unless he be the Bassus familiarly addressed by Propertius. (Eleg. i. 4.) Hence is probable that friendship may have exaggerated his fame and merits. Osann argues from a passage in Apuleius the grammatician (De Orthograph. § 49), that Battus, and not Bassus, is the true reading in the above line from the Tristia, but his reasons have been successfully combated by Weihert. (De L. Vario Poeta, Excurs. ii. De Bassus quisbus- dam, &c.) 2. A dramatic poet, contemporary with Martian, and the subject of a witty epigram, in which he is recommended to abandon such themes as Medea, Th etestes, Niobe, and the fate of Troy, and to devote his compositions to Phaeton or Doudouni, i. a. to fire or water. (Martini, v. 58.) The name occurs frequently in other epigrams by the same author, but the persons spoken of are utterly unknown. [W. R.]

BASSUS, occurs several times in the ancient authors as the name of a medical writer, sometimes without any praenomen, sometimes called Julius and sometimes Tullius. It is not possible to say exactly whether all these passages refer to more than two individuals, as it is conjectured that Julius and Tullius are the same person; it is, however, certain that the Julius Bassus said by Pliny (Ind. to H. N. xx) to have written a Greek work, must have lived before the person to whom Galen dedicates his work De Libris Propriis, and whom he calls Κεκτοστος Βασεως. (Vol. xix. p. 8.) Bassus Tullius is said by Caesius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. iii. 16. p. 233) to have been the friend of Niger, who may perhaps have been the Sextius Niger mentioned by Pliny. (Ind. to H. N. xx). He is mentioned by Dioscorides (De Med. Mol. i. praecl.) and St. Ephraimus (Adv. Advers. i. § 3) among the writers on botany; and several of his medical formulae are preserved by Aetius, Marcellus, Joannes Aeternus, and others (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 101, ed. vet.; C. G. Kühn, Addit. ad Elench. Med. a Farl. &c. Encl. fasc. iv. p. 1, &c.) [W. A. G.]

BASSUS, A'NNIUS, commander of a legion under Antonius Primus, a. d. 70. (Tac. Hist. iii. 50.)

BASSUS, A'FFIDUS, an orator and historian, who lived under Augustus and Tiberius. He drew up an account of the Roman wars in Germany, and also wrote a work upon Roman history of a more general character, which was continued, in thirty-one books, by the elder Pliny. No fragment of his compositions has been preserved. (Dialog. de Orat. 23; Quintil. x. 1, 102, &c.; Senec. Susor. s. Ep. xxx, which perhaps refers to a son of this individual; Plin. H. N. Præf., Ep. iii. 5, ed. Tite.) It will be clearly perceived, upon comparing the two passages last referred to, that Pliny wrote a continuation of the general history of Bassus, and not of his history of the German wars, as Bilh and others have asserted. His praenomen is uncertain. Orelli (ed. Dialog. de Orat. c. 23) rejects Titus, and shews from Priscian (lib. viii. p. 371, ed. Krech), that Pollius is more likely to be correct. [W. R.]

BASSUS, BEITILEI'NUS, occurs on a coin, from which we learn that he was a triumvir mone- tellis in the reign of Augustus. (Echel. v. 150.) Seneca speaks (de Ira, iii. 18) of a Beitilenus Bassus who was put to death in the reign of Caligula; and it is supposed that he may be the same as the Beitilinus Cassius, who, Dion Cassius says (lix. 25), was executed by command of Caligula, a. d. 40.

BASSUS, Q. CAECILIUS, a Roman knight, and probably quaestor in h. c. 59 (Cic. ad Att. ii. 9), espoused Pompey's party in the civil war, and after the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48) fled to Tyre. Here he remained concealed for some time; but being joined by several of his party, he endeavoured to gain over some of the soldiery of Sex. Julius Caesar, who was at that time governor of Syria. In this attempt he was successful; but his designs were discovered by Sextus, who, however, forgave him on his alleging that he wanted to collect troops in order to assist Mithridates of Pergamus. Soon afterwards, however, Bassus spread a report that Caesar had been defeated and killed in Africa, and that he himself had been appointed governor of Syria. He forthwith seized upon Tyre, and marched against Sextus; but being defeated by the latter, he corrupted the soldiers of his opponent, who was accordingly put to death by his own troops.

On the death of Sextus, his whole army went over to Bassus, with the exception of some troops which were wintering in Amaometown and which fled to Cilicia. Bassus followed them, but was unable to take them, whom he brought into the city. On the return he took the title of praetor, a. c. 46, and settled down in the strongly fortified town of Ama埇nea, where he maintained himself for three years. He was first besieged by C. Antonius Vetus, who, however, compelled to retire with loss, as the Arabian Alchaundonius and the Parthians came to the assistance of Bassus. It was one of the charges brought against Cicero's client, Deitoraus, that he had intended to send forces to Bassus. After the retreat of Antonius, Statius Mureaus was sent against Bassus with three legions, but he too received a repulse, and was obliged to call on his assistance Marcus Crispus, the governor of Bithynia, who, with the aid of this legions, seized the city. With these six legions Mureaus and Crispus kept Bassus besieged in Ama埇nea till the arrival of Caesar in Syria in the year after Caesar's death, a. d. 43. The troops of Bassus, as well as those of Mureaus and Crispus, immediately went over to Cassius, and Bassus, who was unwilling to join Cassius, was dismissed uninsured. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 26—28; Appian, B. C. iii. 77, 78, iv. 58, 59; Cic. pro Dei Is, 9, 9, ad Att. iv. 9, xly. 13, ad Fam. xi. 8, Philop. xi. 13, ad Fam. xii. 11, 12; Liv. Epit. xlv. 114, 121; Vell. Pat. ii. 69; Strab. xvi. p. 752; Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11, B. J. i. 10, § 10.)

Appian gives (l. c.) a different account of the origin of the revolt in Syria under Bassus. According to Appian's statement, Bassus was appointed by Caesar commander of the legion under the governor Sec. Julius. But as Sextus gave himself up to pleasure and carried the legion about with him everywhere, Bassus represented to him the impropriety of his conduct, but his reproves were received with contempt; and shortly afterwards Sextus ordered him to be dragged into his presence, because he did not immediately come when he was ordered. Hereupon the soldiers rose against Sextus, who was killed in the tumult. Fearing the anger of Caesar, the soldiers resolved to rebel, and compelled Bassus to join them.

BASSUS, CAESSUS. 1. A Roman lyric poet, who flourished about the middle of the first century. Quintilian (x. 1. § 95) observes, "At Lyricorum idem Horatius fero solus legi dignus. . . . Si quemdam adjejiciere velis, eis exit Cassius Bassus, quem muper vidimus: sed cum longe praeecedent ingenia viventium." Two lines only of his compositions have been preserved, one of these, a dactylic hexameter from the second book of his Lyric, is to be found in Priscian (x. p. 897, ed. Putsch); the other is quoted by Dionysius (iii. p. 513, ed. Putsch.) as an example of Mosaic verse. The sixth satire of Persius is evidently addressed to this Bassus; and the old scholiast informs us, that he was destroyed along with his villa in a. n. 79 by the usurpation of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii. He must not be confounded with

2. Caessus Bassus, a Roman Grammarian of uncertain date, the author of a short tract entitled "Ars Caessii Bassi deMetro," which is given in the "Grammaticae Latinae Acetae Antiqui" of Puteschis (Hanov. 1605), pp. 2663-2671. [W. R.]

BASSUS, CASSIUS NUS, summoned Scholasticus, was in all probability the compiler of the Geoponica (Γεωπονικα), or work on Agriculture, which is usually ascribed to the emperor Constantine Porphyrogeneta. (a. d. 911—959.) Cassius Bassus appears to have compiled it by the command of this emperor, who has thus obtained the honour of the work. Of Bassus we know nothing, save that he lived at Constantinople, and was born at Marmannym, probably a place in Bithynia. (Geop. v. 6, comp. v. 36.) The work itself, which is still extant, consists of twenty books, and is compiled from various authors, whose names are always given, and of whom the following is an alphabetical list:—SEX. JULIUS APIC-ARUS; ANATOLICUS OF Beryus [p. 161, b.], APPULEIUS: ARATUS OF SOLI; ARISTOTELES, the philosopher; DAMOGERON; DAMOCITIUS; DI- YMUS of Alexandria; CASSIUS DIONYSIUS OF Utica; DIOPHANES OF Nicara; FLORENITIUS; FRONTE; Hierocles, governor of Bithynia under Diocletian; Hippocrates, of Cos, a veterinary surgeon, at the time of Constantine the Great; LEONTINUS OR LEONTIUS; NESTOR, a poet in the time of Alexander Severus; PAMPHILUS OF Alex- ANDRIA; PARAMUS; PHILOGONIUS; PTOLEMAIUS OF Alexandria; the brothers Quintilius (Gordianus and Maximus) TARQENTINUS; THEOMNATIUS; VARRO; ZORASTER. Cassius Bassus has contributed only two short extracts of his own, namely, cc. 5 and 36 of the fifth book.

The various subjects treated of in the Geoponica will best appear from the contents of the different books, which are as follow: 1. Of the atmosphere and the rising and setting of the stars. 2. Of general matters appertaining to agriculture, and of the different kinds of corn. 3. Of the various agricultural duties suitable to each month. 4 and 5. Of the cultivation of the vine. 6—8. Of the making of wine. 9. Of the cultivation of the olive and the making of oil. 10—12. Of horticulture. 13. Of the animals and insects injurious to plants. 14. Of pigeons and other birds. 15. Of natural sympathies and antipathies, and of the management of bees. 16. Of horses, asses, and camels. 17. Of the breeding of cattle. 18. Of the breeding of sheep. 19. Of dogs, hares, deer, pigs, and of salting meat. 20. Of fishes.

The Geoponica was first published at Venice in 1538, 8vo, in a Latin translation made by Janus Cornarius. The Greek text appeared in the following year, 1539, 8vo, at Basle, edited by J. Alex. Bassicamnqu, from a manuscript in the imperial library in Vienna. The next edition was published at Cambridge, 1704, 8vo, edited by Needham, and the last at Leipzig, 1781, 4 vols, 8vo, edited by Nichas.

BASSUS, CSEELLUSIUS, a Roman knight, and a Carthagian by birth, on the faith of a dream promised to discover for Nero immense treasures, which had been hidden by Dido when she fled to Africa. Nero gave full credit to this tale, and dispatched vessels to carry the treasures to Rome; but Bassus, after digging about in every BASSUS.

The Bassus who was governor of Myos under Caracalla may have been the father or the son of the above. (Dion Cass. Ixxxviii. 21, Ixxix. 5; Herodian, v. 6, 5.)

BASSUS, SAELEIUS, a Roman epic poet, contemporary with Statius. Quintilian thus characterizes his genius: "vehemens et poetaeum fuit nec ipsum semecet euchraturum. The last word is obscure, but probably signifies that he died young, before his powers were ripened by years. He is the "tennis Saleius" of Juvenal, one of the numerous band of literary men whose poverty and sufferings the satirist so feelingly deplores; but at a later period his wants were relieved by the liberality of Vespasian, as we learn from the dialogue on the decline of eloquence, where warm praise is lavished on his abilities and moral worth.

We have not even a fragment acknowledged as the production of this Bassus. A papyry, indeed, in 261 heroic hexameters, on a certain Callumus Piso, has been preserved, the object and the author of which are equally uncertain; and hence we find it attributed to Virgil, Ovid, to Statius, and very frequently to Lucan, whose name is said to be prefixed in some MSS, while Wernsdorf, rejecting all these suppositions, labours hard to prove that it ought to be ascribed to Saleius Bassus, and that the Piso who is the hero of the piece must be the well-known leader of the great conspiracy against Nero. The strong points in the position are the allusions (l. 180) to the game of draughts in which this Piso is known to have been an adept (Vet. Schol. ad Juv. v. 109), and the references by the writer to his own humble origin and narrow means, a description altogether inapplicable to the well-born and wealthy band of Corduba. Granting, however, that Wernsdorf is right so far as Piso and Lucan are concerned, it by no means follows, from the simple fact that the author in question was poor and neglected, that we are entitled, in the absence of all other evidence direct or circumstantial, to identify him with Saleius Bassus, for it is certain that the same conditions would hold good of Statius, Serranus, and a long list of versifiers belonging to the same period. (Quint. x. 1, 90; Dialog. de Orat. cc. 5, 9; Juv. vii. 89; Wernsdorf, Poetl. Latt. Mann. vol. iv. i. pp. 36, 72, 75, 236.)

BASSUS, SEPULLIUS, a Roman orator, frequently mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Contr. iii. 16, 17, 20-22.)

BASSUS, SILIUS, a Roman orator, mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Contr. i. 6, 7.)

BATAULUS (Bataulus), according to some, the author of laudious drinking-songs, and according to others, an effeminate flute-player, who must have lived shortly before the time of Demosthenes, for the latter is said to have been nick-named Bataulus on account of his weekly and delicate constitution. (Plut. Dem. 4, Vit. X. Orat. p. 847, c.) According to Libanius (Vit. Dem. p. 2, ed. Reiske), Bataulus, the flute-player, was a native of Ephesus, and the first man that ever appeared on the stage in women's shoes, for which reason he was ridiculed in a comedy of Aniphiles. Whether the poet and the flute-player were the same, or two different persons, is uncertain. (Comp. Meineke, Hist. Crit. Comp. Gramm. p. 535, &c.)

BATEBA (Bateba), a daughter of Teucer of Tros (Steph. Byz. s. n. Achelone), the wife of Dav-BATHYLUS. 1. Of Alexandria, the freeman and favourite of the Musaeans, together with Pylades of Cleis and Horo, was the pupil of the latter, brought up by reflection during the reign of Augustus the initiatory dance or ballet called Pontomimus, which excited boundless enthusiasm among all classes at Rome, and formed one of the most admired public amusements until the downfall of the empire. Bathylus excelled in comic, while Pylades was preeminent in tragic personifications.

each had a numerous train of disciples, each was the founder of a school which transmitted his fame to succeeding generations, and each was considered the head of a party among the citizens, resembling in its character the factions of the Circus, and the rivalry thus introduced stirred up angry passions and violent contests, which sometimes ended in open riot and bloodshed. The nature and peculiarities of these exhibitions are explained in the Did. of Ant. s. v. Pantomimus. (Tat. Ann. i. 54; Senec. Quaest. Natur. vii. 32, Controv. v. praef.; Juv. vi. 63; Suet. Octav. Dion Cass. liv. 17; Plut. Symp. v. 8; Macrobi. ii. 7; Athen. i. p. 70; Zosimus, i. 6; Suid. s. v. Ορφέας and Ἀφραίασσα.)

2. Is named in the life of Virgil, ascribed to Tib. Cl. Donatus, as "poeta quidam meritorius," the hero of the Sue ves ves non vos est story. (Vit. Virg. xviii. § 70.)

BATHYLLUS (Βάθυλλος), a Pythagorean philosopher, to whom, together with Brontinus and Leon of Metapontum, Alcmeon of Crotona (Alcmaron) addressed his treatise on Natural Philosophy. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 83.)

BATSIS (Βάτσης), the sister of Epicurus, who married Idomeneus. (Diog. Laërt. x. 23.)

BATON or BATO. 1. The son of Longarus, a Dalmatian chief, who joined the Romans in their war with Philip of Macedon, b.c. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 28.)

2. The name of two leaders of one of the most formidable insurrections in the reign of Augustus. One was the chief of the Dyssidian tribe of the Dalmatians, and the other to the Breuciens, a Pannonian people. The insurrection broke out in Dalmatia, in a. d. 6, when Tiberius was engaged in his second German expedition, in which he was accompanied by Valerius Messallinus, the governor of Dalmatia and Pannonia, with a great part of the army stationed in those countries. The example of the Dalmatians was soon followed by the Breuciens, who, under the command of their countryman Bato, marched against Sirmium, but were defeated by Cae西亚 Severus, the governor of Moesia, who had advanced against them. Meantime the Dalmatian Bato had marched against Salonae, but was unable to accomplish anything in person in consequence of the want of soldiers, and was wound from a sudden battle; he dispatched others, however, in command of the troops, who laid waste all the sea-coast as far as Apollonia, and defeated the Romans in battle.

The news of this formidable outbreak recalled Tiberius from Germany, and he sent Messallinus ahead with part of the troops. The Dalmatian Bato had not yet recovered from his wound, but he nevertheless advanced against Messallinus, and gained a victory over him; but being shortly after defeated in his turn, he fled to his Breuci name-sake. The two Batos now united their forces, and took possession of the mountain Alma, near Sirium, where they remained on the defensive, and maintained themselves against the attacks of Cae- cina Severus. But after the latter had been recalled to Moesia by the ravages of the tribes bordering upon his province, the Batos, who had no enemy to oppose them, since Tiberius and Messallinus were remaining at Siscia, left their position and induced many of the neighbouring tribes to join them. They undertook predatory incursions on every side, and carefully avoided an engagement with the Romans, and the commencement of war they marched into Macedonia, but here they were defeated by the Thracian Rhymetales and his brother Raseyporhis, allies of the Romans.

The continuance of the war alarmed Augustus, who thought that it was purposely prolonged by Tiberius. Germanicus was accordingly sent into the disturbed districts in the following year (A. D. 7) with a fresh army, but Tiberius, it appears, was not recalled, as he did not return to Rome till two years later. In the campaign of this year the Ro- mans accomplished very little; the chief advantage which they gained was the conquest by Ger- manicus of the Mazaei, a Pannonian people. Next year (A. D. 8), the Pannonians and Malians were afflicted by famine and pestilence, in conse- quence of which, and of having suffered some re- verses, they concluded a peace with the Romans. When the Dalmatian Bato appeared before Tiberius to treat respecting the peace, and was asked why he had rebelled, he replied, \"You are the cause. Instead of sending dogs and shepherds to take care of your flocks, you send wolves.\"

This peace was of short duration. The Breucian Bato had betrayed to the Romans Pinnus or Pin- notes, one of the principal Pannonian chiefs, and had obtained in consequence the sovereignty of the Breucians. The Dalmatian Bato, suspecting the designs of the Breucian, made war upon the latter, took him prisoner, and put him to death. This led to a fresh war with the Romans. Many of the Pannonians joined the Batists, but Silvanus Plau- tius subdued the Breucians and several other tribes; and Bato, seeing no hope of success in Pannonia, laid waste the country and retired into Dalmatia.

At the beginning of the following year (A. D. 9), after the winter, Tiberius returned to Rome, while Germanicus remained in Dalmatia. But as the war was still protracted, Augustus resolved to make a vigorous effort to bring it to a conclusion. Tibe- rius was sent back to the army, which was now divided into three parts, one under the command of Silvanus, the second under M. Legidius, and the third under Tiberius and Germanicus, all of whom prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour in different directions. Tiberius and Germanicus marched against Bato, who at length took refuge in a very strong fort, called Anderion or Andetor- rion, near Salona. Before this place the Romans remained for some time, unable to obtain possession of it. Bato, however, mistrusting the issue, endeavoured to persuade his men to enter into negotia- tions with Tiberius; but, as they refused, he abandoned them and went into concealment. The Romans eventually took the fort and subdued the great part of Dalmatia; whereasupon Bato offered to surrender himself to Tiberius upon pro- mise of pardon. This was promised, and Bato accompanied Tiberius to Rome, where he was the chief object of attraction in the triumph. Tiberius, however, kept his word. He sent Bato to Ravenna laden with presents, which were given him, ac- cording to Suetonius, because he had on one occasion allowed Tiberius to escape, when he was shut up with his army in disadvantageous ground. (Dion Cass. iv. 29—31, iv. 1, 10—16; Vell. Pat. ii. 110—114; Suet. Tiber. 9, 16, 20; Ov. ex pont. ii. 1, 45.)

BATO (Βάτω), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, flourished about 260 B.C. We have fragments of the following comedies by him: Αρώνας, Αρχαιος, Αρτέμις, Ασβοθοδωρις, Σμυρνα hitter. His plays appear to have been chiefly designed to ridicule the philosophers of the day. His name is incorrectly written in some passages of the ancient authors, Βατός, Βάτων, Βάθων. (Plut. de Am. et Adul. p. 55; Suidas, s. v.; Eudoc. p. 93; Phot. Cod. 167; Stobaeus, Florivm, xviii. 18; Athen. xiv. p. 662, c.; iv. p. 163, b., vii. p. 279, c.; xv. p. 678, f.) [P. S.]

BATRACHIUS (Βάτραχος), a Lacedaemonian sculptor and architect of the time of Augustus. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. 14) relates, that Batrachus and Saurus (Food and Lizard), who were both very rich, built at their own expense two temples in Rome, one to Jupiter and the other to Juno, hoping they would be allowed to put their names in the inscription of the temples (inscriptiones superstes). But being denied this, they made the figures of a frog and a lizard in the convolutions of the Ionic capitals (in columnarum spirum, comp. Thiersch, Epoch. Ann. p. 96.) That this tale is a mere fable founded on nothing but the appear- ance of the two figures on the columns, scarcely needs to be remarked. [W. I.]

BATTARUS, a name which repeatedly occurs in the ancient poem "Dirae," or inscriptions, ascribed to Virgil or the grammarian Varullus Cato, and respecting the meaning of which the commen- tators on this poem have entertained the most op- posite opinions. Some have thought it to be the name of some boudancy, a tree, a river, a grove, or a hill, and the like; while others, and apparently with more reason, have considered it to be the name of a person. But those who entertain this latter opinion are again divided in regard to the person that may be meant. Some believe Battarus to be the name of the person who had taken pos- session by force of the estates, the loss of which the author of the "Dirae" laments, and against whom, therefore, the imprecations are directed. Wernsdorff believes that it is only a fictitious name, and is meant to designate some satiric poet, perhaps Callimachus; others imagine that Battarus
Justin (xiii. 7) is a strange mixture of the two stories in Herodotus with the fable of Apollo’s love for the nymph Cyrene. (Comp. Thirige, § 17.) Amidst these statements, the one thing certain is, that Battus led forth his colonists in obedience to the Delphic oracle, and under a belief in the protection of Apollo Ἀρχέττες. (Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 65, &c., 55, &c.; Spanheim, ad loc.; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 3. §§ 1, 17; Thirige, §§ 11, 16, 76.) Of the several opinions as to the period at which the colonists first sailed from Thera, the most probable is that which placed it about 670 B.C. (Müller, Orc. p. 344), and from this point apparently we must begin to reckon the 40 years assigned by Herodotus (iv. 159) to the reign of Battus I. It was not, however, till after a settlement of two years in the island Platea, and between six and seven at Aziris on the mainland, that Cyrene was actually founded, about 631 &c. (Herod. iv. 157, 158; Thirige, §§ 22—24), whence Ovid (Met. 541) calls Battus “conditor tardae Cyrrhiae.”

Little further is known of the life of Battus I. He appears to have been vigorous and successful in surmounting the difficulties which beset his infant colony, in making the most of the great natural advantages of the country, and in subjugating the native tribes, with the assistance, it is said, of the Lucadenmonian Archiokos. (Pind. Pyth. v. 72, &c.; Aristot. op. Schol. ad Aristoph. Philol. 925; Paus. iii. 14.) Dioscurus tells us (Diss. de Virt. et Vit. p. 232), that he governed with the mildness and moderation befitting a constitutional king; and Pindar (Pyth. v. 120, &c.) celebrates his pious works, and especially the road (σχοινοτος ὄρος, comp. Buchh. Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. ii. c. 10) which he caused to be made for the sacred procession to Apollo’s temple, also built by him. (Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 77.) Where this road joined the Agora, the tomb of Battus was placed, apart from that of the other kings. (Pind. Pyth. v. 125, &c.; Catull. vii. 6.) His subjects worshipped him as a hero, and we learn from Pausanias (x. 15), that they dedicated a statue of him at Delphi, representing him in a chariot driven by the nymph Cyrene, with Libya in the act of crowning him. (See Thirige, §§ 29, 28.)

2. ARKELLAUS I. (Ἀρκέλλαος) was a son of the above (Herod. iv. 159); but nothing is recorded of him except that he reigned, and apparently in quiet, for 16 years, n. c. 599—583.

3. BATTUS II., summed “the Happy,” principally from his victory over Apesia (Βάττος δ’ Ἐπέσιαος), was the son of No. 2, and the third king of the dynasty; for the opinion of those who consider that Herodotus has omitted two kings between Arkelaus I. and the present Battus, is founded on an erroneous punctuation of iv. 159, and is otherwise encompassed with considerable chronological difficulties. (Thirige, §§ 29, 42, 43; comp. Plut. Cor. 11.) In this reign, Cyrene received a great accession of strength by the influx of a large number of colonists from various parts of Greece, principally perhaps from Peloponnesus and from Crete and the other islands, whom the state invited over under the promise of a new division of lands (probably to enable herself to make head against the neighbouring Libyans), and who were further urged to the migration by the Delphic oracle. (Herod. iv. 139, comp. c. 161.) This influx apparently giving rise to further encrenations on the Libyan tribes, the latter, under Adurar, their king, surrendered themselves to Apries, king of Egypt, and claimed his protection.
A battle ensued in the region of Imaa, n. c. 670,
in which the Egyptians were defeated,—this being the first time, according to Herodotus (iv. 159), that they had ever come into hostile collision with Greeks. (Comp. Herod. ii. 161; Diod. i. 68.) This battle seems to have finished the war with Egypt;
for we read in Herodotus (ii. 181), that Amasis formed a marriage with Ladyce, a Cyrenaean woman, daughter perhaps of Battus II. (Wesseling, ad Herod. i. c.). and, in other ways as well, cultivated friendly relations with the Cyrenaeans.
By the same victory too the sovereignty of Cyrene over the Libyans was confirmed. (Comp. Herod.
iv. 160, where their revolt from Arcebalus II. is spoken of.) It was in this reign also, according to a probable conjecture of Thrige's (§ 30), that Cyrene began to occupy the neighbouring region with her colonies, which seem to have been numerous.
(Pind. Pyth. iv. 20, 34, v. 20.) The period of the death of Battus II. it is impossible to settle with exactness. We know only that his reign lasted beyond the year 570 B. c.; and it is pure conjeture which would assign the end of it, with Thrige, to 560, or, with Bouhier and Larcher, to 554.
(Thrige, § 29; Larcher, ad Herod. iv. 163.)
4. ARCEBALUS II., son of Battus II., was surnamed "the oppressive" (χαλκος), from his attempts probably to substitute a tyranny for the Cyrenaean constitution, which had hitherto been similar to that of Sparta. It was perhaps from this cause that the Libyans arose between himself and his brothers, in consequence of which the latter withdrew from Cyrene, and founded Barca,
at the same time exciting the Libyan tribes to revolt from Arcebalus, who, in his attempt to quell this rebellion, suffered a signal defeat at Lecon or Leucote, a place in the region of Marmaria.
He met his end at last by treachery, being strangled
by his brother or friend, Larcher. His wife, Eryxo, however, soon after avenged his death by the murder of his assassin. His reign lasted, according to some, from 560 to 550 b. c.; according to others, from 554 to 544. (Herod. iv. 160; Diod. Econ. de Virt. et Vit. p. 292; Plut. de Virt. Mul. pp. 260, 261; Thrige, §§ 35, 87.)
5. BATUSS III., or "the lame" (χωλας), son of Arcebalus II., reigned from n. c. 550 to 530, or, as some state it, from 544 to 529. In his time, the Cyrenaeans, weakened by internal seditions, approaching of assailants from Libya and Egypt,
and distracted too perhaps by the consciousness of the king's inefficiency, invited Demoxas, a Mantinean, by the advice of the Delphic oracle, to settle the constitution of the city. The conflicting claims of the original colonists with those of the later setters, and the due distribution of power between the sovereign and the commonalty, were the main difficulties with which he had to deal. With respect to the former point, he substituted for the old division of tribes an entirely new one, in which he made a number of districts, and reserved to each to the Haploace, were reserved to those of Theracian descent; while the royal power he reduced within very narrow limits, leaving to the king only certain selected lands, and the enjoyment of some priestly functions (τυβόμενος καὶ καρπωρίας), with the privilege probably (see Herod. iv. 165) of presidency in the council. We hear nothing more recorded of Battus III. The diminution of the kingly power in his reign is not to be wondered at,
when we remember that the two main causes assigned by Aristotle (Politi. v. 10, ad fin. ed. Bock.)
for the overthrow of monarchy had been, as we have seen, in full operation at Cyrene,—viz. quarrels in the royal family, and the attempt to estaablish a tyrannical government. (Herod. iv. 161; Diod. l. c. Plut. l. c.; Thirge, §§ 58; Müller, Dor.
iii. 4, § 5, iii. 9, § 13.)
6. ARCEBALUS III., son of Battus III. by Pherestine, reigned, according to Thrige (§ 59), from 530 to about 514 B. c. In the early part of his reign he was driven from Cyrene in an attempt to recover the ancient royal privileges, and, taking refuge in Samos, returned with a number of auxiliaries, whom he had attached to his cause by the promise of a new division of lands. With their aid he regained the throne; on which, besides taking the most cruel vengeance on his enemies, he endeavoured further to strengthen himself
by making submission to Comynbys, and stipulating to pay him tribute, n. c. 525. (Herod. iv. 162-165, comp. iii. 13, 91, ii. 181.) Terrified, however, according to Herodotus (iv. 164), at the discovery that he had subjected himself to the woe denounced against him, under certain conditions, by an obscure oracle (comp. iv. 163), or, more probably, being driven out by his subjects, who were exasperated at his submission to the Persians (see
iv. 163, ad fin.), he fled to Alaeir, king of Barea, whose daughter he had married, and was there slain, together with his father-in-law, by the Barecaeans and some Cyrenaean exiles. (Herod. iv.
164, 167; see Thrige, §§ 39-41.)
7. BATUSS IV. is called "the Handsome" (ο καλος) by Hermelides Ponticus. (See Thrige, § 38, iii. 3, § 42.) It has been doubted by some whether there were any kings of the family after Arcebalus III., but this point seems to be settled by Her-'odotus (iv. 163) and by Pindar. (Pyl. iv. 115.)
The opinion of those, who suppose the names of the two kings to have been omitted by Herodotus between Arcebalus I. and Battus "the lame," has been noticed above. Of Battus IV. we know nothing. It is not improbable, however, that he was the son of Arcebalus III., and was in possession of the throne at the peace of Bera and the Persians about 512 B. c. (Herod. iv. 203.) At least the peaceful admission of the latter into Cyrene (Herod.
1. c.) may seem to point to the prevalence there of a Modifying policy, such as we might expect from a son or near relative of Arcebalus III. The chronology of this reign is involved in as much obscurity as the events of it, and it is impossible therefore to assign any exact date either to its beginning or its end. (See Thrige, §§ 42-44.)
8. ARCEBALUS IV., son probably of Battus IV., is the prince whose victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games, n. c. 466, is celebrated by Pindar in his 4th and 5th Pythian odes; and these, in fact, together with the Scholia upon them, are supposed to refer to the last and reign of this last of the Battidae. From them, even in the midst of all the praises of him which they contain,
- appears, that he endeavoured to make himself
despotic, and had recourse, among other means,
to the expedient (a favourite one with tyrants, see: Aristot. Politi. iii. 13, v. 10, ed. Bekk.) of ridding himself of the nobles of the state. Indeed one main object of Pindar in the 4th Pythian ode seems to have been to induce Arescleus to adopt a more prudent and moderate course; and in particular to recall Demophilus, a banished Aresclean noble, now living at Thebes. (See especially Pth. iv. 463, &c., ci γαρ τον δυναμένον, &c., &c. &c.; Boeck and Dissen, ad loc.) It is further probable (Thur., § 45), that the city "Hesperides" in the Cynocean Pentapolis (afterwards called "Berenice") from the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes was founded by Arescleus IV., with the view of securing a retreat for himself in the event of the successful rebellion of his subjects. It is not known whether he died by violence or not; but after his death royalty was abolished, and his son Battu, who had fled to Hesperides, was there murdered, and his head was thrown into the sea. Various dates have been assigned for the conclusion of the dynasty of the Bastetdae; but nothing is certain, except that it could not have ended before a.e. 460, in which year Arescleus IV. won the chariot-race at Olympia,—nor after 401, when we hear of violent seditions between the Cynocean nobles and populace. (Diod. xiv. 34; Aristot. Polit. vi. 4, ed. Bekker.) Thirige is disposed to place the commencement of popular government about 450. (Res Cynocean., §§ 24, 45, 46, 48; comp. Müller, Dor. iii. 9, § 13.) The father of Callimachus was a Cynocean of the name of Battu (Sidn., s.v. Καλλίακης); and the poet, who is often called "Batiades," seems to have claimed descent from the royal blood. (Callim. Hymn in Apoll. 65, &c., Βάτιαδ. 37; Ovid. Trist. ii. 397; Catull. 66.)

BAUCLUS (Bauclus or Bauclé), a mythical woman of Eleusis, whom Hesychius calls the nurse of Demeter; but the common story runs thus,—on her wanderings in search of her daughter, Demeter came to Baucis, who received her hospitably, and offered her something to drink; but when the goddess, being too much under the influence of grief, refused to drink, Baucis made such a strange gesture, that the goddess smiled and accepted the draught. (Clem. Alex. Cohort. p. 17.) In the fragment of the Orphic hymn, which Clemens Alex. adds to this account, it is further related, that a boy of the name of Iacchus made an indescribable gesture at the grief of Demeter. Arnoebedes (Aere. Gesta. v. p. 175) repeats the story of Baucis from Clemens, but without mentioning the boy Iacchus, who is otherwise unknown, and, if meant for Dionysus, is out of place here. The different stories concerning the reception of Demeter at Eleusis seem all to be inventions of later times, coined for the purpose of giving a mythical origin to the jokes in which the women used to indulge at the festival of this goddess. [ASCALABUS and ASCALAPUS, No. 2.]

[BAUCIS, a Phrygian woman, in whose humble dwelling Jupiter and Mercury were hospitably received, after having been refused admission by every one else in the country. Baucis and her husband Philemon were therefore saved by the gods when they visited the country with an inundation; and Jupiter made Baucis and Philemon priests in his temple and when he two people expressed a wish to die together, Jupiter granted their request by changing them simultaneously into trees. (Or. Met. viii. 629-724.)

BAUCIS (Bauclés), a Greek poetess, who is called a disciple of Sappho. She was a native of Tenos, and a friend of Erinna. She died at a youthful age, just before her marriage, and Erinna is said to have written the epitaph upon her which is still extant, and which, together with another fragment of Erinna, contains all we know about Baucis. (Anthol. Gr. vii. 710, 712; Buxtorf, Pos. Lyce. Gr. p. 633.)

BAVIIUS and MAVE'VIUS, whose names have become a by-word of scorn for all jealous and meekvolent poctasters, owe their unenviable immortality solely to the eminence which they displayed towards the rising genius of the most distinguished of their contemporaries, and would probably never have been heard of but for the well-known line of Virgil (Ec. iii. 90): "Qui Bauvium non edat amst tuae carmina, Maevi;" the Epodes of Home, where evil fortune is heartily anticipated to the ship whose bone "Maevis" as its freight, and a missive epigram by Domitius Maurus, in which one and probably both are wittily assailed. Upon the first of these passages we have the remark of Servius, "Maevis et Bauvis pessimi fuerunt poetae, inimici tam Horatii quam Virgili;" and upon the "scire hordea campis;" in Georg. i. 210, the same commentator observes, "sane reprehensibus Virgilius dictor a Bauvio et Maevio hoc versu"

Hordea qui dixit, superest ut tritice dicit," from which it would appear, that their attack was in the form of a poetical satire, and was moreover a joint undertaking. Philargyris, in his exposition of the third Eclogue, after giving the same account of these personages as Servius, adds, that M. Bavins was a "curator," a designation so indefinite, that it determines nothing except the fact that he enjoyed some public appointment. Finally, St. Jerome, in the Eusebian chronicle, records that M. Bavins, the poet, stigmatized by Virgil in his Bucolics, died in Cappadocha, in the third year of the hundred and eighty-sixth Olympiad, that is, a.e. 355. Porphyryon (ed Hor. Soc. i. 3. 239) tells us, that Maevis was a son of Bacchos upon the son of Aescopus the tragedian, and his luxury; the old Schlosten published by Longinus (Epo. x.) observes, "Maevis poeta fuit inimicus Horatii, obtrector certe omni vice virorum doctorum, ipse sectator voce antiquarum," and an early annotator upon the Ibis (i. 525) asserts, that Maevis is the person there spoken of who lanmpooned the Athenians, was thrown into prison in consequence, and starved to death; but this story has not found credit among scholars, although many disputes have arisen as to the individual actually referred to. To one or other of these worthies has been attributed the practical joke played off upon Virgil, who, when re released the first book of his Georgics, having chanced to make a pause after the words

Nudus am, sore nudus—

some one of the audience completed the verse by exclaiming

—habebis frigore febrebem.

And to them also have been assigned the Anti-bucolica, two pastoral verses expressly as a parody of the Bucoline upon their publication. (Donat. Phil. Virg. vii. §§ 28, xvi. § 61; Weichert, Poet. Lat. Reliqu., &c., p. 308, &c.)

BEBIUS MASSA. [Massa.]

BEBRYCE (Bebryke), one of the Danaids, whom Apolloorus (ii. l. § 5) calls Bryce, and BELISARUS.

from whom the Bebryces in Bithynia were believed to have derived their name. (Kuina. ad Div. Per. 905.) Others however derived the Bebryces from a hero, Bebryx. (Steph. Byz. s. e. Bebryx.) (L. S.)

BEDAS, a sculptor, the son and pupil of Lyssippus, sculptured a praying youth (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), probably the original of which the fine bronze statue in Berlin is a copy. [W. I.]

BE戈D, an Etruscan nymph, who was believed to have written the Ars Iudiciorum, probably the art of purifying places which had been struck by lightning. This religious book was kept at Rome in the temple of Apollo together with the Sibylline books and the Carmina of the Marchi. (Serv. ad Aen. vi. 72.) [L. S.]

BELIEUS. [ABELIUS.]

BELESIS or BELESYS (Bélaes, Bélaesus), the noblest of the Chaldaean priests; Babylon, who, according to the account of Ctesias, is said, in conjunction with Araxes, the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. [ARAXES.] Belesis afterwards received the satrapy of Babylon from Araxes. (Diod. ii. 24, &c. 28.)

BELGIUS or BOGLIUS (Bágyoros), the leader of that division of the Gaulish army which invaded Macedonia and Illyria in x. c. 280. He defeated the Macedonians in a great battle, in which Ptolemy Ceanusus, who had then the supreme power in Macedonia, was killed; but the Gauls did not follow up their victory, and the rest of Greece was spared for a time. (Paus. x. 19, § 4; Justin. xxiv. 5.)

BELISARUS (the name is Belisar, Selavonian for "White Prince"), remarkable as being the greatest, if not the only great general, in whom the Byzantine empire ever produced. He was born about A. D. 505 (comp. Procop. Goth. i. 5, Pers. i. 12) at Germania, a town of Illyria. (Procop. Vandal. i. 11, de Aedific. iv. 1.) He public life is so much mixed up with the history of the times, that it need not here be given except in outline, and his private life is known to us only through the narrative of the licentiousness and intrigues of his unworthy wife Antonina in the Secret History ofProcopius. He first appears as a young man in the service of Justinian under the emperor Justin I. A. D. 520—527 (Procop. Pers. i. 12), and on the accession of the former, was made general of the Eastern armies, to check the inroads of the Persians. A. D. 528—532 (Procop. Pers. i. 15—21); shortly after which he married Antonina, a woman of wealth and rank, but of low birth and morals, and following the profession of an actress. (Procop. Hist. Arcam. 4, 5.)

The two great scenes of his history were the wars against the Vandals in Africa, and against the Ostrogoths in Italy.

1. The African expedition (A. D. 533, 534) was speedily ended by the taking of Carthage, the capture of the Vandal king, Gelimer, and the final overthrow of the Vandal kingdom established in Africa. (Procop. Vandal. i. 11, ii. 8.) His triumph in 534 was remarkable as being the first ever seen at Constantinople, and the first ever enjoyed by a subject over the head of the emperor. As captives was the noble Gelimer, and the spoils of the Vandal kingdom contained the vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, that had been carried from Rome to Carthage by Genericus. He also (alone of Roman citizens besides Bonifacius) had medals struck in his honour, with his head on the reverse (Cedrenus, i. 370), and on Jan. 1, A. D. 535, was inaugurated with great splendour as consul, and with the imperial title of triumph, conducted however not according to the new imperial, but the old republican forms. (Procop. Vandal. ii. 8.)

2. The Gothic war consists of two acts, the first (A. D. 535—540), the second (A. D. 544—548). The first began in the claims laid by Justinian to Sicily, and in his demand for the abdication of the feeble Gothic king, Theodatus. It was marked by Belisarius's conquest of Sicily (533) and Naples (537), by his successful defence of Rome against the newly elected and energetic king of the Goths, Vitiges (March, 537—March, 538), and by the capture of Ravenna with Vitiges himself, Dec. 539. (Procop. Goth. i. 5, ii. 30.) He was then recalled by the jealousy of Justinian and the intrigues of rival generals, without even the honours of a triumph. (Procop. Goth. iii. 1.)

The interval between the two Gothic wars was occupied by his defence of the eastern frontier against the inroads of the Persians under Nushirvan or Chosroes (541—543) (Procop. Pers. i. 23), from which he was again recalled by the intrigues of the empress Theodora, and of his wife Antonina, and escaped the sentence of death only by a heavy fine, and by his complete submission to his wife. (Procop. Hist. Arcam. 3, 4.)

The second act of the Gothic war, which Belisarius undertook in the office of count of the stables, arose from the revolt of the Goths and reconquest of Italy under their new king, Totila, A. D. 541—544. (Procop. Goth. iii. 2—9.) Belisarius, on arriving in Italy, made a vigorous but vain endeavour to raise the siege of Rome (May, 546—Feb. 547), and then kept in check the hostility of the conquerors, and when they left the city, recovered and successfully defended it against them. (Procop. Goth. iii. 13—24.) His career was again cut short by the intrigues of the Byzantine court, and after a brief campaign in Lucania, he returned from Italy, Sept. A. D. 548 (Procop. Goth. iii. 29—33), and left his victories to be completed by his rival Naraces in the complete overthrow of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna. (Procop. Goth. iv. 21—35.) (A. D. 549—554.)

The last victory of Belisarius was gained in repelling an inroad of the Bulgarians, A. D. 559. (Agath. Hist. v. 15—20; Theophanes, pp. 198, 199.) In A. D. 565 he was accused of a conspiracy against the life of Justinian, and his fortune was sequestered. All that is certain after this is, that he died on the 16th of March, A. D. 565. (Theophanes pp. 160, 162.)

It is remarkable that whilst his life is preserved to us with more than usual accuracy—by the fact of the historian Procopius having been his secretary (Procop. Pers. i. 12), and having published both a public and private history of the times—the circumstances of his disgrace and death are involved in great uncertainty, and historical truth has in popular fame been almost eclipsed by romance. This arises from the termination of the contemporaneous history of Procopius and Agathias before the event in question; and in the void thus left, Gibbon (after Alemann) follows the story of John Malalas (p. 242), and of Theophanes (pp. 159—162), that he was merely imprisoned for a year in his own palace (A. D. 565, 564) and restored to his honours eight months before his death; whilst Lord Mahon in his recent life of Belisarius, on the authority of an anonymous writer of the eleventh century, and of Tzetzes in the twelfth century, has endeavoured to revive the story which he conceives to have been handed down by tradition in Constantinople,—which was then transferred in the fifteenth century to Italy,—and which has become so famous through the French romance of Marmontel, that his eyes were put out, and that he passed the remainder of his life sitting in the streets of Constantinople and begging in the words preserved in the metrical narrative of Tzetzes.

The statue in the Villa Borghese, in a sitting posture with a long horn, formerly supposed to be Belisarius, has since the time of Winkelman been generally conjectured to represent Augustus in the act of propitiating Nemesis.

In person, Belisarius was tall and handsome. (Procop. Goth. iii. 1.) As a general, he was distinguished as well by his personal prowess and his unconquerable presence of mind, as by the rapidity and comprehensiveness of his movements, and also as never having sustained defeat without good reason, and as having effected the greatest conquests with the smallest resources. His campaigns form an era in military history, as being the first conducted by a really great soldier under the influence of Christianity (for that he confirmed to Christianity, even if he was not himself a Christian, is evident from his mention in connexion with the baptism of Theodosius, Procop. Hist. Arcam. 1); and it is remarkable to trace the union of his rigorous discipline over his army (Procop. Goth. i. 23, Vand. i. 12, 16) with his considerate humanity towards the conquered, and (especially in contrast with the earlier spirit of Roman generals) his forbearance towards his enemies. (Procop. Vand. i. 16, 17, Goth. i. 10.)

In a private capacity, he was temperate, chaste, and brave; but his characteristic virtue, which appeared to Gibbon "either below or above the character of a man," was the patience with which he endured his rivals' insults, and the loyalty to Justinian—in itself remarkable as one of the earliest instances in European history of loyalty to the person of the sovereign—which caused him at the height of his success and power to return, at the emperor's order, from Africa, Persia, and Italy. Sir W. Temple (Works, vol. ii. p. 280) places him among the seven generals in the history of the world who have deserved a crown without wearing it.

In his two vices—the avrice of his later life (Procop. Hist. Arcan. 5), and his uxoriousness—he has been well compared to Marlborough, except so far as the great Sarah was superior to the infamous Antonina. To her influence over him are to be ascribed the only great blots of his life—the execution of his officer, Constantine (Procop. Hist. 1), A. d. 535, the persecution of his step-son, Phocas (Hist. 1–3), A. d. 540, and the deposition of the pope Sylvester and the corrupt election of Vigilius, A. d. 557. (Goth. i. 25.) He had by Antonina an only daughter, Joanna. (Procop. Hist. Arcan. i. 5, Goth. iii. 30.)

The effects of his career are—1. The preservation of the Byzantine empire, and, with it, of the mass of ancient literature afterwards bequeathed by it to the West; both of which, but for his appearance, must, humanly speaking, have perished in the inroad of the barbarians. 2. The timely support given to the cause of the orthodox faith in the Western empire at the crisis of its greatest oppression by the Arian kingdoms of the Goths and Vandals in all the western provinces. 3. The temporary infusion of Byzantine art and of the Greek language into Italy by the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna on the ruins of the Ostrogothic kingdom. 4. The substitution of the Byzantine for the Vandal dominion in Africa and Sicily, and the consequent preparation for their future submission to the Mohammedan conquerors, and their permanent desolation, from the fact of his having made them the provinces of a distant and declining empire, instead of leaving them to become the homes of a warlike and vigorous nation.

The authorities for the life of Belisarius are the works of Procopius; for the Bulgarian war, Agathias (v. 15, 20) and Theophanes (pp. 198, 199); and for his death, those mentioned above. In modern times, the chief authority is Gibbon (cc. 41 and 43); Lord Mahon's Life of Belisarius, in which several inaccuracies in Gibbon's account are pointed out; and a review of this last-mentioned work in the Wiener Jahrbücher, by von Hammer. [A. P. S.]

BELLOPHON or BELLORPHONTONES (Βελλοφόροντες or Βελλορφόροντες), properly called Hippion, was a son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and Eurymede, and a grandson of Siaphus. (Apollod. i. 9, § 3; Hom. II. vi. 155.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 157; comp. Pind. Ol. xiii. 69), he was a son of Poseidon and Euryheme. He is said to have received the name Bellerophon or Bellerophontes from having slain the noble Corinthian, Bellerus. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 17; Eustath. Hom. p. 632.) Others related, that he had slain his own brother, Delaides, Peiren, or Aleimenes. (Apollod. ii. 3, § 1, &c.) In order to be purified from the murder, wherewith it may have been, he fled to Proctus, whose wife Antea fell in love with the young hero; but her offers being rejected by him, she accused him to her husband of having made improper proposals to her, and insisted upon his being put to death. Proctus, unwilling to have his friend thus sent to his father-in-law, Iobates, king in Lycia, with a sealed letter in which the latter was requested to put the young man to death. Iobates accordingly sent him to kill the monster Chimæron, thinking that he was sure to perish in the contest. Bellerophon mounted the winged horse, Pegasus, and rising up with him into the air, killed the Chimæron from on high with his arrows. Iobates, being thus disappointed, sent Bellerophon out again, first against the Solyms and next against the Amazon. In these contests too he was victorious; and when, on his return to Lycia, he was attacked by the bravest Lydians, whom Iobates had placed in ambush for the purpose, Bellerophon slew them all. Iobates, now seeing that it was hopeless to attempt to kill the hero, showed him the letter he had received from Proctus, gave him his daughter (Philoноe, Autelidea, or Cassandra) for his wife, and made him his successor on the throne. Bellerophon became the father of Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodameia. Here Apollodorus breaks off the story; and Homer, whose account (vi. 155–202) differs in some points from that of Apollodorus, describes the later period of Bellerphous's life only by saying, that he drew upon himself the hatred of the gods, and, consumed by grief, wandered lonely through the Alcean field, avoiding the paths of men. We must here remark with Bustaithius, that Homer knows nothing of Bellerophon killing the Chimæra with the help of Pegasus, which must therefore be regarded in all probability as a later embellishment of the story. The manner in which he destroyed the Chimæra is thus described by Tzetzes (I. c.); he fixed his lead to the point of his lances, and thrust it into the fire-breathing mouth of the Chimæra, who was accordingly killed by the molten lead. According to others, Bellerophon was assisted by Athena Chalchitria or Hippia. (Paus. ii. 1. 40; P. L. c.; Val. Max. viii. 202. Some traditions stated, that he attempted to rise with Pegasus into heaven, but that Zeus sent a gad-fly, which stung Pegasus so, that he threw off the rider upon the earth, who became lame or blind in consequence. (Pind. Isth. vii. 44; Schol. ad Pind. Od. xiii. 130; Horat. Carm. iv. 11. 26.)

A peculiar story about Bellerophon is related by Plutarch. (De Virt. Moll. p. 247, &c.) Bellerophon was worshipped as a hero at Corinth, and had a sanctuary near the town in the cypress grove, Creacion. (Paus. ii. 2. § 4.) Scenes of the story of Bellerophon were frequently represented in ancient works of art. His conflict with the Chimæra was seen on the throne of Amycalus (ii. 18. § 7), and in the vestibule of the Delphic temple. (Eurip. Ion. 203.) On coins, gems, and vases he is often seen fighting against the Chimæra, taking leave of Proetus, taming Pegasus or giving him to drink, or falling from him. But, until the recent discoveries in Lydia by Mr. Fellowes, no representation of Bellerophon in any important work of art was known; in Lydian sculptures, however, he is seen riding on Pegasus and conquering the Chimæra. [Comp. Chimæra and Pegasus.] [L. S.]

BELLUS. [Bellerophon.] BELLUS. [Bellerophon.] BELLUS. [Bellerophon.] BELLUS. [Bellerophon.] BELLUS. [Bellerophon.]

BELLUS, the name of a family of the Anna gens. The word is sometimes written Bilius. 1. L. (Annius) BELLUS, praetor in B.C. 107, served under Marius in the war against Jugurtha and Bocchus. (Sull. Jug. 104.) 2. C. ANNIUS BELLUSl ONE of the legates of M. Fonteius in Gallia Narbonensis, in B.C. 75. (Cic. pro Font. 4.) 3. L. (Annius) BELLUS, the uncle of Catiline, killed, by command of Sulla, Lucius Ocella, who attempted to obtain the consulship contrary to Sulla's wish. Bellenus was condemned in B.C. 64. (Ascon. in Tog. Cud. p. 92, ed. Orelli; comp. Appian, B. C. i. 101.)

4. L. (Annius) BELLUS, perhaps a son of the preceding, whose house was burnt down after the murder of Caesar in B.C. 44. (Cic. Phil. ii. 30.) 5. BELLUS, originally a slave, born in the family of one Demetrius, was stationed at Intlemunh with a garrison in B.C. 49, where he put to death, in consequence of a sum of money which he had received from the opposite party, Domitius, a man of noble rank in the town, and a friend of Caesar's. Thereupon the Intemelians took up arms, and Caelius had to march to the town with some cohorts, to put down the insurrection. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 15; comp. xvi. 22.)

C. BELLUS, a distinguished Roman orator and jurist, who was prevented by the disorders which occurred in the time of Marius from attaining the consulship. (Cic. Brut. 47.) He is supposed by Tietmann (Comm. P. i. p. 90) to be the same person with C. Annus Bellenus mentioned above [No. 3], but Ernesti (Claw. Cis.) repudiates this conjecture, as not easily reconcileable with dates. [J. T. G.]

BELLUS, a Roman praetor, who was taken prisoner by the pirates, about B.C. 68 (Plut. Pomp. 24; comp. Appian, Mil. iii. 32.) may perhaps be a false reading for Bellenus.

BELLONA, the goddess of war among the Romans. It is very probable that originally Bellona was a Sabine divinity whose worship was carried to Rome by the Sabine settlers. She is frequently mentioned by Tacitus and Sallust, and is even as his sister or his wife. Virgil describes her as armed with a bloody scourge. (Virg. Aen. vi. 763; Lucan, Phars. vii. 569; Horat. Sat. ii. 3. 223.) The main object for which Bellona was worshipped and invoked, was to grant a warlike spirit and enthusiasm which no enemy could resist; and it was for this reason, for she had been worshipped at Rome from early times (Liv. viii. 9), that in B.C. 295, during the war against the Samnites, Appius Claudius the Blind vowed the first temple of Bellona, which was accordingly erected in the Campus Martius close by the Circus Flaminius. (Liv. xx. 19; Ov. Fast. vi. 201, &c.) This temple subsequently became of great political importance, for in it the senate assembled to give audience to foreign ambassadors, whom it was not thought proper to admit into the city, to generals who returned from a campaign for which they claimed the honour of a triumph, and on other occasions. (Liv. xxviii. 9, xxx. 21; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Legati.) In front of the entrance to the temple there stood a pillar, which served for making the symbolic declarations of war; for the area of the temple was regarded as a symbolic representation of the enemies' country, and the pillar as that of the frontier, and the declaration of war was made by burning a spear over the pillar. This ceremony, so long as the Roman dominion took its small extent, had been performed on the actual frontier of the enemy's country. (Ov. Fast. vi. 205, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 53; Liv. i. 32; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Pictatus.) The priests of Bellona were called Bellonarii, and when they offered sacrifices to her, they had to wound their own arms or legs, and either to offer up the blood or drink it themselves, in order to become inspired with a warlike enthusiasm. This sacrifice, which was afterwards softened down into a mere symbolic act, took place on the 24th of March, which day was called dies saeculares for this reason. (Lucan, i. 565; Martini, xii. 57; Tertull. Apol. 9; Lactant. i. 21; comp. Heidberer, ad Hor. Sat. i. 15; Hartung, Die Relig. der Römer, ii. 270, &c.; C. Tiesler, De Bellonae Cultu et Sacris, Berlin, 1843. 5th.)

BELLOVEUS. [Ambiguus.]

BELUS (Bæna). 1. A son of Poseidon by Libya or Eurynome. He was a twin-brother of Agenor, and father of Aegeus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several eastern nations, from whence the legends about him were transplanted to Greece and became mixed up with Greek myths. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Diod. i. 28; Serv. ad Aen. i. 738.)

2. The father of Didus, who conquered Cyprus and then gave it to Teucer. (Virg. Aen. i. 621; Serv. ad Aen. i. 628, 646.)

[LS.]
BELLIJTA. C. SICIN'NIUS, was the leader of the plebs in their accessions to the Sacred Mountain, n. e. 494, and was afterwards one of the first tribunes of the plebs elected in that year. (Liv. ii. 32, 33; Dionys. vi. 45, 70, 72, 89, 89.) He was plebeian noble in 499 (Dionys. vii. 14), and tribune again in 491, when he distinguished himself by his attacks upon Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in that year. (Dionys. vii. 33-39, 61.) Asconius calls him (in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli) L. Sicinius L. f. Bellutus.

It is most probable that his descendants, one of whom was certainly elected tribune in B. C. 449 (Liv. iii. 54), also bore the cognomen Bellutus; but as they are not mentioned by this name in ancient writers, they are given under Scinius.

BEMA'ARCHUS (Bouadraxos), a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who lived in or shortly after the time of the emperor Constantine, whose history he wrote in a work consisting of ten books. He also wrote declamations and various orations; but none of his works have come down to us. (Suidas, s. v. Bouadraxos; Libn. Orat. p. 24, &c. ed. Reiske.) [L. S.]

BEDNIS (Bédōs), a Thracian divinity in whom the moon was worshipped. Hesychius (s. v. Δηλογχός) says, that the poet Callinus called this goddess Δηλογχός, either because she had to discharge two duties, one towards heaven and the other towards the earth, or because she bore two lances, or lastly, because she had two lights, the one her own and the other derived from the sun. In Greece she was sometimes identified with Persophone, but more commonly with Artemis. (Proclus, Theog. p. 353.) From an expression of Aristophanes, who in his comedy "The Lemnian Women" called her the μεγάλη Σέκα (Phot. Lex. and Hesych. s. v.), it may be inferred, that she was worshipped in Lemnos; and it was either from this island or from Thucu that her worship was introduced into Attica; for we know, that as early as the time of Plato the Bendidians were celebrated in Petacæus every year on the twentieth of Thargelion. (Hesych. s. v. Bédos; Plat. Rep. i. 1; Proclus, ad Tim. p. 9; Xen. Hell. ii. 4. § 11; Strab. x. p. 471; Liv. xii. 41.) [L. S.]

BERE'CYNTHIA (Berēcyνθia), a surname of Cybele, which she derived either from Beren- cynthia, or from a fortified place of that name in Phrygia, where she was particularly worshipped. Mount Berenecynthia again derived its name from Berecynthia, a priest of Cybele. (Callim. Hymn. in Diem. 246; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 82, vi. 783; Strab. x. p. 472; Plut. de Flam. 10.) [L. S.]

BERENICE. (Berēcynθi), a Macedonian form of Pherecynthia (Pherecynθi).

I. Egyptian Berenices.

1. A daughter of Lagos by Antigone, niece of Antipater, was married first to Philip, an obscure Macedonian, and afterwards to Ptolemy Soter (the reputed son of Lagos by Arsinoe), who fell in love with her when she came to Egypt in attendance on his bride Eurydice, Antipater's daughter. (Schol. ad Thuc. Idyl. xvii. 61; Paus. i. 6, 7.) She had such influence over her husband that she procured the succession to the throne for her son Ptolemy Philadelphus, to the exclusion of Eurydice's children—and this, too, in spite of the remonstrances of Demetrius of Phalerus with the king. (Just. xvi. 2; Diog. Laerb. v. 78; comp. Ael. V. H. iii. 17.) Plutarch speaks of her as the first in virtue and wisdom of the wives of Ptolemy, and relates that Pyrrhus of Epeirus, when he was placed with Ptolemy as a hostage for Demetrius, courted her favour especially, and received in marriage Antigone, her daughter by her first husband Philip. Pyrrhus is also said to have given the name of "Berenice," in honour of her, to a city which he built in Epeirus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4, 6.) After her death her son Philadelphus instituted divine honours to her, and Theocritus (Idyl. xlii. 34, &c., 123) celebrates her beauty, virtue, and deification. See also Athen. v. pp. 202, d., 203, a.; Theoc. Idyll. xv. 106; and the pretty Epigram (55) of Callimachus. It seems doubtful whether the Berenice, whose humane interference with her husband on behalf of criminals is referred to by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 43), is the subject of the present article, or the wife of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes.) See Perizom. ad Ael. i. c.

2. Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, became the wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, according to the terms of the treaty between him and Ptolemy, n. c. 249, which required him to divorce Laodice and marry the Egyptian princess, establishing also the issue of the latter as his successors. On the death, however, of Ptolemy, n. c. 247, Antiochus put Berenice away and recalled Laodice, who notwithstanding, having no faith in his constancy, caused him to be poisoned. Berenice fled in alarm to Daphne with her son, where being besieged they fell into the hands of Laodice's partizans, and were murdered with all their Egyptian attendants, the forces of the Asiatic cities and of Ptolemy Euergetes (brother of Berenice) arriving only in time to avenge them. These events are prophetically referred to by Daniel in the clearest manner. (Polyb. Hist. 54, v. 58, ad fin.; Athen. ii. p. 45, c.; Just. xxvii. 1; Polyaen. viii. 50; Appian, Syr. 65, p. 130; Dan. xi. 6, and Hier. ad loc.)

3. Grand-daughter of Berenice, No. 1, and daughter of Magnus, who was first governor and then king of Cyrene. Aetheneaus (xv. p. 689, a.) calls her, if we follow the common reading, "Berenice the Great," but perhaps ἡ Μάγνα should be substituted for ἡ μεγαλὴ. (Schweigh. ad Athen. i. c.) She was betrothed by her father to Ptolemy Euergetes, as one of the terms of the peace between himself and his half-brother Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), the father of Euergetes.
BERENICE.

Magnus died, however, before the treaty was executed, and his wife Arsinoe*[Just. xxvi. 2], to prevent the marriage of Berenice with Ptolemy, offered her, together with the kingdom, to Demetrius, brother of Antigonus Gonatas. On his arrival, however, at Cyrene, Arsinoe fell in love with him herself, and Berenice accordingly, whom he had slighted, caused him to be murdered in the very arms of her mother; she then went to Egypt, and became the wife of Ptolemy. When her son, Ptolemy IV. (Philopator), came to the throne, b.c. 221, he put her and his brother Magas to death, at the instigation of his prime minister Sosibius, and against the remonstrance of Cleomenes III. of Sparta. The same fate befell Demetrius, whom she dedicated for her husband's safe return from his Syrian expedition [see No. 2] in the temple of Arsinoe at Zephyrium (Ἀφροδίτη Ζεφύριος), and which was said by the counsellors of Sosibius to have become a constellation, was celebrated by Callimachus in a poem, which, with the exception of a few lines, is lost. There is, however, a translation of it by Catullus, which has been re-translated into indifferent Greek verse by Salvinii the Florentine. (Polyb. v. 36, xxv. 23; Just. xxvi. 3, xxx. 1; Plut. Demetr. ad fin., Cleom. 33; Catull. lvii. 36; Moret. ad loc.; Hygin. Poet. Astron. ii. 24; Thir. Res Cyren. §§ 35—61.) Hyginus (I. c.) speaks of Berenice as the daughter of Ptolemy II. and Arsinoe [No. 2, p. 366, b. 1]; but the account above given rests on far better authority. And though Catullus, translating Callimachus, calls her the sister of her husband Euergetes, yet this may merely mean that she was his cousin, or may also be explained from the custom of the queens of the Ptolemies being called their sisters as a title of honour; and thus in either way we reconcile Callimachus with Polybios and Justin. (See Thir. Res Cyren. § 61; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexanders, Tabb. xiv. xix.)

4. Otherwise called Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy IX. (Lathyrum), succeeded her father on the throne, b.c. 21, and married her first cousin, Alexander II., son of Alexander I., and grandson of Ptolemy VIII. (Phyeon), whom Sosibius, then dictator, had sent to Egypt to take possession of the kingdom. Nineteen days after her marriage she was murdered by her husband, and Appian tells us, that he was himself put to death by his subjects about the same time; but this is doubtful. (Paus. i. 9; Appian, Bell. Civ. i. p. 414; but see Cie. de Leg. Agr. ii. 16; Appian, Mithr. p. 251.)

5. Daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and eldest sister of the famous Cleopatra (Strab. xii. p. 558), was placed on the throne by the Alexandrines when they drove out her father, b.c. 58. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 13, &c.; Liv. Epit. 104; Plut. Cat. Min. 35; Strab. xvii. p. 186.) She married first Seleucus Cylleonastes, brother of Antiochus XIII. (Asiaticus) of Syria, who had some claim to the throne of Egypt through his mother Seleene, the sister of Lathyrum. Berenice, however, was soon disgusted with the sordid character of Seleucus, and caused him to be put to death. (Strab. i. c.; Dion Cass. xxxix. 57; comp. Sueton., Vespas. 19.) She next married Archelaus, whom Pompoly had

* PauSanius (1. 7) mentions Apana as the name of the wife of Magnus; but she may have had both names, or Arsinoe may have been her second wife. See p. 367, n.; and Thir. Res Cyreniænus, § 60.

II. Jewish Berenices.

1. Daughter of Costobarus and Salome, sister of Herod the Great, was married to Aristobulus, her first cousin. [ARISTOBULUS, No. 4.] This prince, proud of his descent from Mariamne from the house of the Maccabees, is said by Josephus to have taunted Berenice with her inferiority of birth, and her consequent complaints to Salome served to increase that hostility of the latter to Aristobulus which mainly caused his death. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, 94, xvi. 1, § 2, 4, § 1, 7, § 8; Bell. Jud. i. 23, § 1, 24, § 3.) After his execution, b.c. 6, Berenice became the wife of Thaddeus, maternal uncle to Antipater the eldest son of Herod the Great,—Antipater having brought about the marriage with the view of conciliating Salome and disarming her suspicions of himself. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 23, § 1.) Josephus does not mention the death of Thaddeus, but it is probable that he suffered for his share in Antipater's plot against the life of Herod. [See p. 203, a.] (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 4, § 9; Bell. Jud. i. 30, § 5.)

Berenice certainly appears to have been again a widow when she accompanied her mother to Rome with Archelaus, who went thither at the commencement of his reign to obtain from Augustus the ratification of his father's will. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9, § 3; Bell. Jud. ii. 2, § 1.) At Rome she seems to have continued for the rest of her life, enjoying the favour of Augustus and the friendship of Antonia, wife of the elder Drusus. [ANTONIA, No. 6.] Antonia's affection, indeed, for Berenice exhibited itself even after the death of the latter, and during the reign of Tibérius, in offices of substantial kindness to her son Agrippa I., whom she furnished with the means of discharging his debt to the treasury of the emperor. (Strab. xvi. p. 765; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, §§ 1—6.)

2. The eldest daughter of Agrippa I., by his wife Cypros, was espoused at a very early age to Marcus, son of Alexander the Alabarch; but he died before the consummation of the marriage, and she then became the wife of her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcid, by whom she had two sons. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4, xix. 5, § 1, 9, § 1, xx. 5, § 2, 7, §§ 3; Bell. Jud. ii. 2, § 6.) After the death of Herod, a.d. 46, Berenice, then 20 years old, lived for a considerable time with her brother, and not without suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him, to avoid the scandal of declaring him a eunuch, falsely charged with having seduced the queen. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 15, § 1.) Together with her brother, she endeavoured to divert her countrymen from their purpose of rebellion (Bibl. Jud. ii. 16. § 5); and haveing joined the Romans with him on the outbreak of the war, she gained the favour of Vespasian by her manifold presents, and the love of Titus by her grace. She remained with the latter continued at Rome, whither she went after the capure of Jerusalem, and it is said that he wished to make her his wife; but the fear of offending the Romans by such a step compelled him to dismiss her, and, though she afterwards returned to Rome,
he still avoided a renewal of their intimacy. (Tac.
Hist. ii. 2, 81; Suet. Tit. 7; Dion Cass. lxxvi.
15. 18.) Quintilian (Inst. Orat. iv. 1) speaks of having pleaded her cause on some occasion, not further added to, on which she herself sat as judge. [T. F.]

BERISADES (Beirazds), a ruler in Thrace, who, inheriting, in conjunction with Amadocus and Cersobileus, the dominions of Cotys on the death of the latter in B.C. 536. Berisades was probably a son of Cotys and a brother of the other two princes. His reign was short, as he was already dead in B.C. 525; and on his death Cersobileus appeared against his children. (Dem. in Aris-toc. pp. 623, 624.) The Birisades (Birazd Sheriff)
mentioned by Deinarchus (c. Dem. p. 95) is probable the same as Berisades, the king of Bosporus, who must not be confounded with the Berisades
mentioned above. The Birisades, king of Pontus, where Stratoniceus, the player on the lyre, visited ( Athen. viii. p. 949, d.), must also be regarded as the same as Berisades. [PARAPHRASES.]

BEROB (Beor), a Trojan woman, married to Dorucrus, one of the companions of Aeneas. Iris assumed the appearance of Berob when she persuaded the woman to set fire to the ships of Aeneas on the coast of Sicily. (Virg. Aen. v. 620, &c.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name, concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Hygin. Fab. 167; Virg. Georg. iv. 341; Nonnus, Dionys. xii. 155.) [L. S.]

BEROB, the wife of Glancias, an Ilyrian king, took charge of Pyrrhus when his father, Aeacides, was expelled from Epirus in B.C. 316. (Justin.
 xvii. 3.)

BERONICIANUS (Beronicus), of Sardis,
a philosopher of considerable reputation, mentioned only by Eunapius. (Phil. Soph. sub linn.)

BERO'SUS (Beroas or Beorodas), a priest of Belus at Babylon, and an historian. His name is usually considered to be the same as Bar or Bar Ocean, that is, son of Ocean. (Scalig. Antiq. orb.
Ad Euseb. p. 243.) He was born in the reign of Alexander the Great, and lived till that of Antiochus IL surnamed Theos (B. C. 261-246), in whose reign he is said to have written his history of Babylonia.
(Tatian, adv. Gent. 55; Euseb. Prorp. Evang. x.
p. 289.) Respecting the personal history of Beroas scarcely anything is known; but he must have been a man of education and extensive learning, and was well acquainted with the Greek language,
which the conquests of Alexander had diffused over a great part of Asia. Some writers have thought that they can discover in the extract fragments of his work traces of the author’s ignorance of the Chaldean language, and thus have sought to criticize his work. Her connection with the history of Babylonia was in the work of a Greek, who assumed the name of a celebrated Babylonian. But this opinion is without any foundation at all. The fact that a Babylonian wrote the history of his own country in thesis, for Justin may have confounded the well-known historian with some earlier Babylonian of the name of Berosus; or, what is more probable, the Sibyl whom he mentions is a recent one, and may really have been the daughter of the historian. [Faus.s. c] [Sibylla.] Other writers again have been inclined to assume, that Berosus the historian was a different person from the astrologer; but this opinion too is not supported by satisfactory evidence.

The work entitled Berosi Antiqutatum libri quinque cum Commentariis Joannis Ammii, which appeared at Rome in 1498, fol., and was afterwards often reprinted and even translated into Italian, is one of the many fabrications of Giovanni Nanni, a Dominican monk of Viterbo, better known under the name of Ammianus of Viterbo, who died in 1502. [Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 162, &c.; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 120, &c., ed. Weustermann; and Richter's Introduction to his edition of the Fragments.] [L. S.]

BERRYSS. (Beryllis), bishop of Bostra in Arabia, a. d. 296, maintained that the Son of God had no distinct personal existence before the birth of Christ, and that Christ was only divine as having the divinity of the Father residing in him, communicated to him at his birth as a ray or emanation from the Father. At a council held at Bostra (a. d. 244) he was convinced by Origen of the error of his doctrine, and returned to the Catholic faith. He wrote Hymns, Poems, and Letters, several of the latter to Origen, thanking him for having reclaimed him. A work was extant in the time of Eusebius and of Jerome, in which was an account of the questions discussed between Beryllus and Origen. None of his works are extant. [Euseb. H. E. vi. 26, 33; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 69; Socrates, H. E. iii. 7.] [P. S.]

BEBYLIUS, a surname given to several writers from their being natives of Berytus. See ANATOLUS, HARMIPUS, LUCERCUS, TAURUS.

BESANTUS (Besançau). The Vatican MS. of the Greek Anthology attributes to an author of this name two epigrams, of which one is also ascribed to Pallas (Anth. ii. p. 455, No. 134; Jacobs, iii. p. 142), and the other (Jacobs, Patrol. ex Cod. Pat. 42, xii. p. 651) is included among the epigrams of Theognis. (Vv. 557, 558, Bolett.) This latter epigram is quoted by Stobæus as of "Theognis or Besantius," (Tit. cxxi. 11.) The "Egg" of Simmias (Anth. i. p. 207, Jacobs, i. p. 140) bears the following title in the Vatican MS.: Βεσαντίου Β' πρόφυλτο σω κα τη Σώμην, διαφώρων γερ τ' έπος. Hence we may infer that Besantius was a Rhodian.

The author of this name is repeatedly quoted in the Etymologicum Magnus (pp. 608, L 57, 665, L 56, Syll.), where Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x. 772) rightly identifies with the Heliandus Besantius of Photius. [Hellenus.] The name is also spelt Besanitium. (Bibarncius, Etym. Mag. p. 212, 49; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 467.) [P. S.]

BESESS (Besos), was sestry of Bactria in the time of Dareius III. (Codomanus), who saw reason to suspect him of treachery soon after the battle of Issus, and summoned him accordingly from his sestry to Babylon, where he was collecting forces for the continuance of the war. (Curt. iv. 6, § 1.) At the battle of Arbela, a. c. 331, Bessus commanded the left wing of the Persian army, and was thus directly opposed to Alexander himself. (Curt. iv. 12, § 6; Arr. Anab. iii. p. 59, e.) After this battle, when the fortunes of Dareius seemed hopelessly ruined, Bessus formed a plot with Nabarzanes and others to seize the king, and either to put him to death and make themselves masters of the empire, or to deliver him up to Alexander, according to circumstances. Soon after the flight of Dareius from Ecbatana (where, after the battle of Arbela, he had taken refuge), the conspirators, who had the Bactrian troops at their command, succeeded in possessing themselves of the king's person, and placed him in chains. But, being closely pressed in pursuit by Alexander, and having in vain urged Dareius to mount a horse and continue his flight with them, they filled up by his murder the measure of their treason, a. c. 330. (Curt. v. 9—13; Arr. Anab. iii. pp. 68, 69; Diod. xvii. 78; Plut. Alex. 42.) After this deed Bessus fled into Bactria, where he collected a considerable force, and assumed the name and insignia of royalty, with the title of Artaxerxes. (Curt. vi. 6, § 13; Arr. Anab. iii. p. 71, d.) On the approach of Alexander, he fled from him beyond the Oxus, but was at length betrayed by two of his followers, and fell into the hands of Ptolemy, whom Alexander had sent forward to receive him. (Curt. vii. 5; Arr. Anab. iii. p. 75; comp. Strab. xi. p. 513.) He was brought naked before the conqueror, and, having been scourged, was sent to Zariaasp, the capital of Bactria (Strab. xi. p. 514); here, a council being afterwards held upon him, he was sentenced to suffer mutilation of his nose and ears, and was delivered for execution to Oxathres, the brother of Dareius, who put him to a cruel death. The mode of it is variously related, and Plutarch even makes Alexander himself the author of the shocking barbarity which he describes. (Curt. vii. 5, 10; Arr. Anab. iv. p. 82, d.; Ptolem. and Aristobol. op. Anab. iii. ed. fin.; Diod. xvii. 83; Plut. Alex. 43; Just. xii. 5.)

BESTRES (Berrys), perhaps Vestes, surnamed Conostomus, a Greek interpreter of the Novella, filled the office of judex vel, and probably lived soon after the age of Justinian. He is cited by Harnomenus (Promptuarium, p. 426, ed. 1567), and mentioned by Nic. COMMENAS Papadopoli. (Proc. Acad. Mystag. p. 372.) [J. T. G.]

BESTIA, the name of a family of the plebeian Calpurina gens.

I. L. CALPHURNIUS BESTIA, tribune of the plebs, a. c. 121, obtained in his tribunship the recall of P. Popillius Lænas, who had been banished through the efforts of C. Gracchus in 123. (Cic. Brut. 94; comp. Vell. Pat. ii. 7; Plut. C. Gracch. 2.) He made the tribunes popular with the aristocratical party, who then had the chief power in the state; and it was through their influence doubtful that he obtained the consulship in 111.

The war against Jugurtha was assigned to him. He prosecuted it at first with the greatest vigour; but when Jugurtha offered him and his legate, M. Seirus, large sums of money, he concluded a peace with the Numidian without consulting the senate, and returned to Rome to hold the comitia. His conduct excited the greatest indignation at Rome, and the aristocracy was obliged to yield to the wishes of the people, and allow an investigation into the whole matter. A bill was introduced for the purpose by C. Manilius Limetanus, and three commissioners or judges (questores) appointed, one of whom Scourus contrived to be chosen. Many men of high rank were condemned, and Bestia among the rest, n. c. 110. The nature of Bestia's punishment is not mentioned; but he was living at Rome in n. c. 90, in which year he went voluntarily into exile, after the passing of the Varia lex, by which all were to be brought to trial who had been engaged in exciting the Italians to revolt.

Bestia possessed many good qualities; he was prudent, active, and capable of enduring fatigue, not ignorant of warfare, and undismayed by danger; but his quickness of gun spoilt all. (Cic. l. c.; Sall. Jug. 27—29, 46, 65; Appian, B. C. i. 37; Val. Max. viii. 6, § 4.)

2. L. CALPURNIUS BESTIA, probably a grandson of the preceding, was one of the Catilinarian conspirators, and is mentioned by Sullust as tribune of the plebs in the year in which the conspiracy was detected, n. c. 63. It appears, however, that he was then only tribune designatus; and that he held the office in the following year, n. c. 62, though he entered upon it, as usual, on the 10th of December, 63. It was agreed among the conspirators, that Bestia should make an attack upon Cicero in the popular assembly, and that this should be the signal for their rising in the following night. The vigilance of Cicero, however, as is well known, prevented this. (Sall. Cat. 17, 43; Appian, B. C. ii. 3; Plut. Cic. 33; Schol. Dob. pro Sest. p. 294, pro Sall. p. 366, ed Orelli.)

Bestia was sedile in n. c. 59, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the praetorship in 57, notwithstanding his bravery, for which he was brought to trial in the following year and condemned. He was defended by his former enemy, Cicero, who had now become reconciled to him, and speaks of him as his intimate friend in his oration for Cæcilius. (c. 11.) After Caesar's death, Bestia attached himself to Antony, whom he accompanied to Mutina in n. c. 43, in hopes of obtaining the consulship in the place of M. Brutus, although he had not been praetor. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 12, ad Qu. Fr. ii. 3, Phil. xl. 5, xili. 8, xili. 2.)

BETIHNUS OR BETILHNUS. [Bassus, Betythus.]

BETUCIUS BARRUS. [Barrus.]

BIA (Bia), the personification of mighty force, is described as the daughter of the Titan Pallus and Styx, and as a sister of Zelos, Cratos, and Nice. (Hesiod. Thyg. 3643; Aschyl. Prom. 12.) [L.S.]

BIA'DICE (Bia'dice), or, as some MSS. call her, Demodice, the wife of Creteus, who on account of her love for Phrixus meeting with no return, accused him before Athamas. Athamas therefore wanted to kill his son, but he was saved by Nephele. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 20; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 328; comp. Athamas.) [L.S.]

BIA'NOR, an ancient hero of the town of Mantua, was a son of Tiberis and Manto, and was also called Omus or Anusus. He is said to have built the town of Mantua, and to have called it after his mother. According to others, Omus was a son of Atys, the Greek name of Amasis, founder of Perusia, and emigrated to Gaul, where he built Cesena. (Serv. ad Virg. Æd. ix. 60, Aen. x. 198.) [L.S.]

BIA'NOR (Bianor), a Bithynian, the author of twenty-one epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under the emperors Augustus and Tiberius. His epigrams were included by Philip of Thessalonica in his collection. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 368; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 467.) [P.S.]

BIBACULUS.

BIBAS (Bia's), son of Amythaon, and brother of the seer Melampus. He married Pero, daughter of Naeus, whom her father had refused to give to any one unless he brought him the omen of Iphicles. These Melampus obtained by his courage and skill, and so won the princess for his brother. (Schol. ad Theod. Ig. ii. 48; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 118; Paus. iv. 36; comp. Hom. Odys. xii. 286, &c., xx. 231.) Through his brother also Bias is said to have gained a third of the kingdom of Argos, Melampus having insisted upon it in his behalf, as part of the condition on which alone he would cure the daughters of Proetus and the other Argive women of their madness. According to Pausanias, the Bantiades continued to rule in Argos for four generations. Apollonius Rhodius mentions three sons of Bias among the Argonauts, —Talas, Arcius, and Leodocus. (Herod. iii. 84; Pind. Nem. ix. 30; Schol. ad loc.; Diod. iv. 68; Paus. ii. 6, 18; Apoll. Rhod. i. 118.) According to the received reading in Diod. iv. 68, "Bias" was also the name of a son of Melampus by Iphianeia, daughter of Megapenthes; but it has been proposed to read "Abas," in accordance with Paus. i. 48; Apoll. Rhod. i. 142; Apoll. i. 9. [E. E.]

BIAS (Bia's), of Priene in Ionia, is always reckoned among the Seven Sages, and is mentioned by Dienechus (ap. Diog. Laërt. i. 41) as one of the Four to whom alone title was universally given,—the remaining three being Thales, Pittacus, and Solon. We do not know the exact period at which Bias lived, but it appears from the reference made to him by the poet Hippomachus, who flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century n. c., that he had by that time become distinguished for his skill as an advocate, and for his use of it in defence of the right. (Diog. Laërt. i. 84, 88; Strab. xiv. p. 636.) Diogenes Laërtius informs us, that he died at a very advanced age, immediately after pleading successfully the cause of a friend: by the time the votes of the judges had been taken, he was found to have expired. Like the rest of the Seven Sages, with the exception of Thales, the fame of Bias was derived, not from philosophy, as the word is usually understood, but from a certain practical wisdom, moral and political, by means of eloquence. Many of his sayings and doings are recorded by Diogenes Laërtius, in his rambling uncritical way, and by others. In particular, he suffers in character as the reputed author of the selfish maxim quâ mali à due perfessâ: and there is a certain ungentle dilemma on the subject of marriage, which we find fathered upon him in Aulus Gellius. (Herod. i. 27, 170; Aristot. Rhêt. ii. 13, § 4; Cic. de Amicis. 16; Parad. i.; Diod. Sec. p. 552; ed. Weis; Gell. v. 11; Diog. Laërt. i. 82—88; comp. Herod. i. 29—22; Plut. Saf. 4.) [E. B.]

BIBACULUM, the name of a family of the Furici gens.

1. L. Furicius BIBACULUS, quaestor, fell in the battle of Cannae, b. c. 216. (Livy. xxxi. 49.)

2. L. Furicius BIBACULUS, a pious and religious man, who, when he was praetor, carried, at the command of his father, the magister of the college of the Selli, the aneulia with his six lictors preceding him, although he was exempted from this duty by virtue of his praetorship. (Val. Max. i. 1, § 9; Lactant. i. 21.)

3. M. Furicius BIBACULUS. See below.
BIBACULUS.

BIBACULUS, M. FURIIUS, who is classed by Quintilian (x. 1. § 96) along with Catullus and Horace as one of the most distinguished of the Roman satiric lamp-bearers, and who in like manner ranked by Dionysius, in his chapter on the mimics (p. 482, ed. Putsch.), with Archibulus and Hippoxen, among the Greeks, and with Lucilius, Catullus, and Horace, among the Romans, was born according to St. Jerome in the Eusebian Chronicle, at Cremona in the year b.c. 103. From the scanty and unimportant specimens of his works transmitted to modern times, we are scarcely in a condition to form any estimate of his powers.

A single senarius is quoted by Suetonius (de Iul. Gr. c. 9), containing an allusion to the loss of memory sustained in old age by the famous Orbilius Pupillus; and the same author (c. 11) has preserved two short epigrams in hendecasyllabic measure, not remarkable for good taste or good feeling, in which Bibaculus alludes to the poverty to which his friend, Varusius Catu [VARLERIUS CATO], had been reduced at the close of life, as contrasted with the splendour of the villa which that unfortunate poet and grammarian had at one period possessed at Tusculum, but which had been seized by his importunate creditors.

In addition to these fragments, a ductile hexameter is to be found in the Scholiast on Juvenal (viii. 16), and a scap consisting of three words in Charisius (p. 102, ed. Putsch.). We have good reason, however, to believe that Bibaculus did not confine his efforts to pieces of a light or satiric tone, but attempted themes of more lofty pretensions. It seems certain that he published a poem on the Gaulish war, entitled Pragmatia Belfi Galliti, and it is probable that he was the author of another upon some of the legends connected with the Athelpian allies of king F знн. The former is known to us only from an unlucky metaphor cleverly parodied by Horace, who takes occasion at the same time to ridicule the loose roundness of person which distinguished the composer.

(Hor. Serm. ii. 5. 41, and the notes of the Scholiast; comp. Quintil. viii. 6. § 17.) The existence of the latter depends upon our acknowledging that the "turgidus Alpinus" represented in the epistle to Julius Florus (l. 103) as a "murdering" Memnon, and polluting by his turbid descriptions the fair fountains of the Rhine, is no other than Bibaculus. The evidence for this rests entirely upon a medonation introduced by Bentley into the text of the old commentators on the above passage, but the correction is so simple, and tallies so well with the rest of the annotation, and with the circumstances of the case, that it may be pronounced almost certain. The whole question is fully and satisfactorily discussed in the dissertation of Welcher in his Poet. Lat. Religi. p. 331, &c. Should we think it worth our while to inquire into the cause of the enmity thus manifested by Horace towards a brother poet whose age might have commanded forbearance if not respect, it may perhaps be plausibly ascribed to some indisposition which had been testified on the part of the elder bard to recognise the merits of his youthful competitor, and possibly to some expression of indignation at the presumptuous freedom with which Lucilius, the idol and model of the old school, had been censured in the earlier productions of the latter. An additional motive may be found in the fact, which we learn from the well-known octonary of Cremaulus Cordus as reported by Tacitus (Ann. iv. 34), that the writings of Bibaculus were studded with insults against the first two Caesars—a consideration which will serve to explain also the hostility displayed by the favourite of the Augustan court towards Catullus, whose talents and taste were as fully and deservedly appreciated by his countrymen and contemporaries as they were by the poet of the Roman Forum. We are therefore little likely to sound pleasing in the ears of the adopted son and heir of the dictator Julius.

Lastly, by comparing some expressions of the elder Pliny (Pers. H. N.) with hints dropped by Suetonius (de Iul. Gr. c. 4) and Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 1), there is room for a conjecture, that Bibaculus made a collection of celebrated jests and wit-turnes, and gave the composition to the world under the title of Lucubrations.

We must carefully avoid confounding Furius Bibaculus with the Furius who was imitated in several passages of the Aenid, and from whose Annals, extending to eleven books at least, we find some extracts in the Saturnalia. (Macrobi. Sat. ii. 1; Compare Macrobius, Saturn. ii. 30.) The latter was named in full Aulus Furius Antius, and to him L. Lutatius Cæcilius, colleague of M. Marius in the consulship of b.c. 102, addressed an account of the campaign against the Histrians. (Cic. Brut. c. 35.) To this Furius Antius are ascribed certain lines found in Aulus Gallius (viii. 11), and brought under review on account of the affected neoterisms with which they abound. Had we any fair pretext for calling in question the authenticity of the summaries prefixed to the chapters of the Noces Atticae, we should feel strongly disposed to follow G. J. Voss, Lambinus, and Heidorf, in assigning these folies to the ambitious Bibaculus rather than to the exultant and simple Antius, whom even Virgil did not disdain to copy. (Welcher, Poet. Lat. Religi.) [W. R.]

BIBULUS, a cognomen of the plebeian Calpurnia gens.

1. L. CALPURNIUS BIBULUS, obtained each of the public magistracies in the same year as C. Julius Caesar. He was curule aedile in b.c. 65, praetor in 52, and consul in 50. Caesar was anxious to obtain L. Lucceius for his colleague in the consulship; but as Lucceius was a thorough partisan of Caesar’s, while Bibulus was opposed to him, the aristocratical party used every effort to secure the election of the latter, and contributed large sums of money for this purpose. (Suet. Cæs. 19.) Bibulus, accordingly, gained his election, but was able to do but very little for his party. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Caesar’s agrarian law, he withdrew from the popular assemblies altogether, and shut himself up in his own house for the remainder of the year; whence it was said in jest, that it was the consulship of Julius and Caesar. He confined his opposition to publishing edicts against Caesar’s measures: these were widely circulated among his party, and greatly ex-tolled as pieces of composition. (Suet. Cæs. 9. 49; Cic. ad Att. ii. 19, 30; Philon, Pomp. 48; comp. Cic. Brut. 77.) To vitiate Caesar’s measures, he also pretended, that he was observing the skies, while his colleague was engaged in the comitia (Cic. pro Dom. 15); but such kind of opposition was not likely to please Caesar. On the expiration of his consulship, Bibulus remained at Rome, as no province had been assigned him. Here he continued to oppose the measures of Caesar and Pompey, and prevented the latter in 56 from restoring in person Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt. When, however, a coolness began to arise between Caesar and Pompey, Bibulus supported the latter, and it was upon his proposal, that Pompey was elected sole consul in 52, when the republic was almost in a state of anarchy through the tumults following the death of Clodius. In the following year, 51, Bibulus obtained a province in consequence of a law of Pompey's, which provided that no future consul or praetor should have a province till five years after the expiration of his magistracy. As the magistrates for the time being were to be elected by the people at large, to provide that all men of consular or proconsular rank who had not held provinces, should now draw lots for the vacant ones. In consequence of this measure Bibulus went to Syria as proconsul about the same time as Cicero went to Cilicia. The eastern provinces of the Roman empire were then in the greatest alarm, as the Parthians had crossed the Euphrates, but they were driven back shortly before the arrival of Bibulus by C. Cassius, the proconsul. Cicero was very jealous of this victory which had been gained in a neighbouring province, and took good care to let his friends know that Bibulus had no share in it. When Bibulus obtained a thanks-giving of twenty days in consecration of the victory, Cicero complained bitterly to his friends, that Bibulus had made false representations to the senate. Although great fears were entertained, that the invasion would be repeated, the Parthians did not appear for the next year. Bibulus left the province with the reputation of having administered its internal affairs with integrity and zeal.

On his return to the west in 49, Bibulus was appointed by Pompey commander of his fleet in the Ionian sea to prevent Caesar from crossing over into Greece. Caesar, however, contrived to elude his vigilance; and Bibulus fell in with only thirty ships returning to Italy after landing some troops. Enraged at his disappointment, he burnt these ships with their crews. This was in the winter; and his own men suffered much from cold and want of fuel and water, as Caesar was now in possession of the eastern coast and prevented his crews from landing. Sickness broke out among his men; Bibulus himself fell ill, and died in the beginning of the year 48, near Coreya, before the battle of Dyrrhachium. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5–18; Dion Cass. xli. 48; Plut. Brut. 13; Oros. vi. 15; Cic. Brut. 77.)

Bibulus was not a man of much ability, and is chiefly indebted for his celebrity to the fact of his being one of Caesar's principal, though not most formidable, opponents. He married Porcia, the daughter of M. Porcius Cato Uticensis, by whom he had three sons mentioned below. (Orelli, Ov. Fast. l. 119, &c.; Drummius' Gesch. Roms, ii. p. 87, &c.)

2. CALPURNIUS BIBULLI, two sons of the preceding, whose praenomina are unknown, were murdered in Egypt, b. c. 50, by the soldiers of Gabinius. Their father bore his loss with fortitude though he deeply felt it; and when the murderers of his children were subsequently delivered up to him by Cleopatra, he sent them back, saying that their punishment was not his duty but that of the senate. Bibulus had probably sent his sons into Egypt to solicit aid against the Parthians; and they may have been murdered by the soldiers of Gabinius, because it was known that their father had been opposed to the expedition of Gabinius, which had been undertaken at the instigation of Pompey. (Caes. B. C. iii. 110; Val. Max. iv. 1. § 15; comp. Cic. ad Att. vi. 5, ad Fam. ii. 17.)

4. L. CALPURNIUS BIBULUS, the youngest son of No. 1, was quite a youth at his father's death (Plut. Brut. 13), after which he lived at Rome with M. Brutus, who married his mother Porcia. He went to Athens in b. c. 45 to prosecute his studies (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32), and appears to have joined his step-father Brutus after the death of Caesar in 44, in consequence of which he was proscribed by the triumvirs. He was present at the battle of Philippi in 42, and shortly after surrendered himself to Antony, who pardoned him and promoted him to the command of his fleet, whence we find on some of the coins of Antony the inscription L. BIBULUS PRAEPT. CLAS. (Eckhel, v. p. 161, vi. p. 57.) He was frequently employed by Antony in the negotiations between himself and Augustus, and was finally promoted by the former to the government of Syria, where he died shortly before the battle of Actium. (Appian, B. C. iv. 58, 104, 130, v. 192.) Bibulus wrote the Memorabilia of his step-father, a small work which Plutarch made use of in writing the life of Brutus. (Plut. Brut. 19, 23.)

C. BIBULUS, an able minister to Tacitus (Ann. iii. 59) in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 22, appears to be the same as the L. Publicius Bibulus, a plebeian noble, to whom the senate granted a burial-place both for himself and his posterity. (Orelli, Inscr. n. 4698.)

BILICENTUS. [Bellincensus.]

BION (Blaw). 1. Of Proconnesus, a contemporary of Phercydes of Syros, who consequently lived about b. c. 550. He is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) as the author of two works which he does not specify; but we must infer from Clemens of Alexandria (Stron. vi. p. 207.), that one of these was an abridgment of the work of the ancient historian, Cadmus of Milicia.

2. A mathematician of Athens, and a pupil of Demonax. He wrote both in the Ionic and Attic dialects, and was the first who said that there were some parts of the earth in which it was night for six months, while the remaining six months were one uninterrupted day. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 58.) He is probably the same as the one whom Strabo (i. 29) calls an astrologer.

3. Of Soli, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) as the author of a work on Achelops (AIUOAE), of which a few fragments are preserved in Pliny (vi. 35), Athenaeus (xiii. p. 560), and in Crantor's Anecdota (iii. p. 415). Whether he is the same as the one from whom Plutarch (Theb. 26) quotes a tradition respecting the Amazons, and from whom Agathias (i. 25; comp. Synullecas, p. 676, ed. Dindorf) quotes a statement respecting the history of Assyria, is uncertain. Varro (De Re Rust. i. 1) mentions Bion of Soli among the writers on agriculture; and Pliny refers to the same or similar works, in the Bibliotheca to several books. (Lib. 8, 10, 14, 15, 17, 18.) Some think that Bion of Soli is the same as Cæcilius Bion. [Bion, Carillus.]

4. Of Smyrna, or rather of the small place of Philossa on the river Meles, near Smyrna. (Suid. s. v. Biosapros.) All that we know about him is the little that can be inferred from the third Idyl of Moschus, who laments his untimely death. The time at which he lived can be pretty accurately determined by the fact, that he was older than Moschus, who calls himself the pupil of Bion. (Mosh. ii. 96, &c.) His flourishing period must therefore have very nearly coincided with that of Theocritus, and must be fixed at about B.C. 200. Moschus states, that Bion left his native country and spent the last years of his life in Sicily, cultivating boccale poetry, the natural growth of that island. Whether he also visited Macedonia and Thrace, as Moschus (iii. 17, &c.) intimates, is uncertain, since it may be that Moschus mentions those countries only because he calls Bion the Doric Orpheus. He died of poison, which had been administered to him by several persons, who afterwards received their well-deserved punishment for the crime. With respect to the relation of master and pupil between Bion and Moschus, we cannot say anything with certainty, except that the resemblance between the productions of the two poets obliges us to suppose, at least, that Moschus imitated Bion; and this may, in fact, be all that is meant when Moschus calls himself a disciple of the latter. The subjects of Bion's poetry, viz. shepherdesses and love-songs are beautifully described by Moschus (iii. 82, &c.); but we can now form only a partial judgment on the spirit and style of his poetry, on account of the fragmentary condition in which his works have come down to us. Some of his idyls, as his poems are usually called, are extant entire, but of others we have only fragments. Their style is very refined, the sentiments soft and sentimental, and his versification (he uses the hexameter exclusively) is very fluent and elegant. In the invention and management of his subjects he is superior to Moschus, but in strength and depth of feeling, and in the truthfulness of his sentiments, he is much inferior to Theocritus. This is particularly visible in the greatest of his extant poems, "Exarchoi Aithôdæa." He is usually reckoned among the boccal poets; but it must be remembered that this name is not confined to the subjects it really indicates; for in the time of Bion boccal poetry also embraced that class of poems in which the legends about gods and heroes were treated from an erotic point of view. The language of such poems is usually the Doric dialect mixed with Attic and Ionic forms. Rare Doric forms, however, occur much less frequently in the poems of Bion than in those of Theocritus. In the first editions of Theocritus the poems of Bion are mixed with those of the former; and the first who separated them was Adolphus Metker, in his edition of Bion and Moschus. (Bruges, 1835, &c.) In modern works the separation is more pronounced. The remains of Bion and Moschus are printed at the end, as in those of Winterton, Valckenaer, Brunck, Gaisford, and Schaefer. The text of the editions previous to those of Brunck and Valckenaer is that of Henry Stephens, and important corrections were first made by the former two scholars. The best among the subsequent editions are those of F. Jacobs (Gotha, 1795, 8vo.), Gilb. Wakefield (London, 1795), and J. F. Manso (Gotha, 1784, second edition, Leipzig, 1807, 8vo.), which contains an elaborate dissertation on the life and poetry of Bion, a commentary, and a German translation.

3. A tragic poet, whom Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) describes as παρηγορός τηγάματα τῶν Τεργεστίων ἀρχαῖων. Casaubon (De Sac. Fac. i. 3) remarks, that Diogenes by these words meant to describe a poet whose works bore the character of extemporaneous poetry, of which the inhabitants of Tarsus were particularly fond (Strab. xiv. p. 674), and that Bion lived shortly before or at the time of Strabo. Suidas (s.n. Aithôdæa) mentions a son of Asclepius of the name of Bion who was likewise a tragic poet; but nothing further is known about him. 6. A melic poet, about whom no particulars are known. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 59; Enod. p. 94.) 7. A Greek sophist, who is said to have conspired for not giving a true account of the events he describes. (Aen. ad Horat. Epist. ii. 2.) He is perhaps the same as one of the two rhetoricians of this name.

8. The name of two Greek rhetoricians: the one, a native of Syracuse, was the author of theoretical works on rhetoric (τέχνες ποιήματι γεγραμμένες); the other, whose native country is unknown, was said to have written a work in nine books, which bore the names of the nine Muses. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 58.) [L. S.]

BION (Bios), a Scythian philosopher, summed Bionn notionen, from the town of Okeania, Olbia, or Douris, near the mouth of the Danube, lived about B.C. 250, but the exact date of his birth and death are uncertain. Strabo (i. 13) mentions him as a contemporary of Eratothenes, who was born B.C. 275. Leäritius (iv. 46, &c.) has preserved an account which Bion himself gave of his parentage to Antiguous Genatus, king of Macedonia. His father was a freedman, and his mother, Olympia, a Leucadian maidservant, and the whole family were sold as slaves, on account of some offence committed by the father. In consequence of this, Bion fell into the hands of a rhetorician, who made him his heir. Having burnt his patron's library, he went to Athens, and applied himself to philosophy, in the course of which study he embraced the tenets of almost every sect in succession. First he was an Academic and a disciple of Centes, then a Cyneic, afterwards attached to Theodorus (Theodorus), the philosopher who carried out the Cyrenaic doctrines into the atheistic results which were their natural fruit (Aristippus), and finally he became a pupil of Theophrastus, the Peripatetic. He seems to have been a man of considerable intellectual acuteness, but utterly profane, and a notorious unbeliever in the existence of God. His habits of life were indeed avowedly infamous, so much so, that he spoke with contempt of Socrates for abstaining from crime. Many of Bion's dogmas and sharp sayings are preserved by Leäritius: they are generally ripe pieces of morality put in a somewhat pointed shape, though hardly strong enough to justify Homer in holding him up as the type of keen satirist, as he does when he speaks of persons delighting Bionis sermocrates et salo nigro. (Epist. ii. 2. 60.) Examples of this wit are his sayings, that "the miser did not possess wealth, but was possessed by it," that "impety was the companion of credulity," "worse the μετρήτοις of vice," "that good slaves are really free, and bad freemen really slaves," with many others of the same kind. One is preserved by Cicero (Tusc. iii. 26), viz. "that it is useless to tear our hair when we are in grief, since sorrow is not cured by baldness." He died at Chalcis in Euboea. We learn his mother's name and country from Athenaeus (xii. p. 530, f. 562, a.) [G. E. L. C.]

BION, CAECIPILIUS, a writer whose country is unknown, but who is mentioned by Pliny (Ind. to H. N. xxviii.) among the "Auctores Externi." Of his date it can only be said, that he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. He wrote a work Περὶ Δαυδασίαν, "On the Properties of Plants and other Medicines," which is not now extant, but which was used by Pliny and other writers. [W. A. G.]

BIPPUS (Βηππός), an Argive, who was sent by the Achaean league as ambassador to Rome in a. c. 181. (Polyb. xvi. 2, 3.)

BIRCENNA, the daughter of the Illyrian Bardylis, was one of the wives of Pyrrhus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 9.)

BUSANTINUS. [BUSANTINUS.]

BITALAS (Βητάλας), was the daughter of Dano, and grand-daughter of Pythagoras. (Iamb. Vit. Pyth. c. 28, p. 153.) [A. G.]

BISTHANES (Βισθάνης), the son of Aratus Oecus, met Alexander near Ecbatana, in a. c. 330, and informed him of the flight of Dareius from that city. (Arrian, Anab. i. 19.)

BITHYS (Βίθυς), the commander of a considerable body of Numidian cavalry, deserted Gula- nes, the son of Mauiniss and the ally of the Romans in the third Punic war, a. c. 148, and went over to the Carthaginians, to whom he did good service in the war. At the capture of Carthage in 146, Bithys fell into the hands of Scipio, by whom he was taken to Rome. He doubtless adored the triumph of the conqueror, but instead of being put to death afterwards, according to the usual custom, he was allowed to reside under guard in one of the cities of Italy. (Appian, Pun. 111, 114, 120; Zonar. i. 39; Sozomen. s. v. Bithys.)

BITHYNICUS, a cognomen of the Pompeii. We do not know which of the Pompeii first bore this cognomen; but, whatever was its origin, it was handed down in the family.

1. Q. POMPHUS BITHYNICUS, the son of Albus, was about two years older than Cicero, with whom he was very intimate. He prosecuted his studies together with Cicero, who describes him as a man of great learning and industry, and no mean orator, but his speeches were not well delivered. (Cic. Brut. 68, 90, comp. ad Fam. vi. 17.) On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, Bithynicus espoused the party of his great namesake, and, after the battle of Pharsalia, accompanied him in his flight to Egypt, where he was killed together with the other attendants of Pompeius Magnus. (Oros. vi. 15.)

2. A. POMPHUS BITHYNICUS, son of the preceding, was praetor of Sicily at the time of Caesar's death, b. c. 44, and seems apparently to have been in fear of the reigning party at Rome, as he wrote a letter to Cicero soliciting his protection, which Cicero promised in his reply. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 16, 17, comp. xvi. 28.) Bithynicus repulsed Sextus Pompeius in his attempt to gain possession of Messana, but he afterwards allowed Sextus to obtain it, on the condition that he and Sextus should have the government of the island between them. Bithynicus, however, was, after a little while, put to death by Sextus. ( Dion Cass. xlviii. 17, 19; Liv. Epit. 123; Appian, B. C. iv. 64, v. 70.)

Bithynicus also occurs as the cognomen of a Clodius Bithynius put to death by Octavianus, on the taking of Pons Asis, a. c. 40. (Appian, B. C. v. 49.)

BITIS or BITIYS (Βίτης), the son of Cotys, king of Thrace, who was sent by his father as a hostage to Persia, king of Macedonia. On the conquest of the latter by Aemilius Paulus in a. c. 168, Bithis fell into the hands of the Romans, and was taken to Rome, where he adored the triumph of Paulus in 167. After the triumph, he was sent to Caroleii, but was shortly afterwards restored to his father, who sent an embassy to Rome to solicit the release of his son. (Zonar. i. 24; Liv. xiv. 45; Polyb. xxx. 12.)

BITON (Βίτων), the author of a work called κατασκευασμαύρων και κατασκευικών. His history and place of birth are unknown. He is mentioned by Hesychius (s. v. Σχισσόμενος), by Heron junior (De Mach. Bell. proem), and perhaps by Aelian (Tact. c. 1), under the name of Βιτων. The treatise consists of descriptions—1. Οἱ πεπράξοντες, or machine for throwing stones, made at Rhodes by Charon the Magnesius. 2. Of another at Thessalonica, by Isidorus the Abdicene. 3. Of a ξύλον (an apparatus used in besieging cities, see Vitruv. x. 22, and Diet. of Ant. s. v.), made by Poseidonius of Macedon for Alexander the Great. 4. Of a Συστάσσον (a Dick of fortification), made by Demetrius of Colophon. 5. Of a γεωστροφής (an engine somewhat resembling a crossbow, and so named from the way in which it was held in order to stretch the string, see Hero Alexandrinus, Belpo, op. Vet. Math. p. 125), made by Zopyrus of Taruntum at Miletus, and another by the same at Cuma in Italy. Biton addresses this work to king Attalus, if at least the reading of Ατταλε is to be adopted instead of Ατταλι (near the beginning), and the emendation is said to be supported by a manuscript (Gale, de Script. Mythol. p. 45) but whether Attalus, the 1st of Pergamus, who reigned b. c. 241—197, or one of the two later kings of the same name be meant, is uncertain.

BITON (Βίτων) and CLEOBIS (Κλεόβις) were the sons of Cydippe, a priestess of Hera at Argos. Herodotus, who has recorded their beautiful story, makes Solon relate it to Crousus, as a proof that it is better for mortals to die than to live. On one occasion, says Herodotus (i. 31), during the festival of Hera, when the priestess had to ride to the temple of the goddess in a chariot, and when the oxen which were to draw it did not arrive from the country in time, Cleobis and Biton dragged the chariot with their mother, a distance of 45 stadia, to the temple. The priestess, moved by the filial love of her sons, prayed to the goddess to grant them what was best for mortals. After the solemnities of the festival were over, the two brothers went to sleep in the temple and never rose again. The goddess thus showed, says Herodotus, that she could bestow upon them no greater boon than death. The Argives made statues of the two brothers and sent them to Delphi. Pausanias (ii. 29, § 2) saw a relief in stone at Argos, representing Cleobis and Biton drawing the chariot with their mother. (Comp. Cic. Tuscul. i. 47; Val. Max. v. 4, extam. 4; Stephainus, Sacromen. 169; Securius and Philostrat. de Virg. Georg. iii. 532.) [L. S.]

BITUITUS, or as the name is found in in-BLAUSUS, a king of the Arverni in Gaul. When the consul Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus undertook the war in B.C. 121 against the Allobroges, who were joined by the Arverni under Bituitus, these Gallic tribes were defeated near the town of Vindualium. After this first disaster the Allobroges and Arverni made immense preparations to renew the contest with the Romans, and Bituitus again took the field with a very numerous army. At the point where the Issara empties itself into the Rhodanus, the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, the grandson of Paullus, met the Gauls in the autumn of B.C. 121. Although the Romans were far inferior in numbers, yet they gained such a complete victory, that, according to the lowest estimate, 120,000 men of the army of Bituitus fell in the battle. After this irreparable loss, Bituitus, who had been taken prisoner in an insidious manner by Cn. Domitius, was sent to Rome. The senate, though disapproving of the conduct of Domitius, exiled Bituitus to Alba. His son, Congentianus, was likewise made prisoner and sent to Rome. Florus adds, that the triumph of Q. Fabius was adorn by Bituitus riding in a silver war-chariot and with his magnificent armour, just as he had appeared on the field of battle. (Liv. Epit. 61; Florus, ii. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 10; Suet. Nero, 2; Appian, Gall. 12, where Bituitus is erroneously called king of the Allobroges; Eutrop. iv. 93, where the year and the consuls are given incorrectly; Oros. v. 14; Val. Max. ix. 6 § 3; comp. Strab. iv. p. 191; Plin. H. N. vii. 51.) [T. S.]

BITYS (ΒΙΤΥΣ), an Egyptian seer, who is said by Iamblichus (de myst. viii. 5) to have interpreted to Ammon, king of Egypt, the books of Hermes written in hieroglyphics.

BLAUSUS (Βλαύσος), an ancient Italian poet, born at Capreae, who wrote serio-comic plays (στοιχυγλώσσια) in Greek. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Καπρία.) Two of these plays, the Μεσσερίκας and Σαυτώρος, are quoted by Athenaeus (iii. p. 111, c., xi. p. 487, c.), and Hesychius refers to Blaesus (s. v. Μεσσερίκας, Μαλάγης, Φαλακτός), but without mentioning the names of his plays. Caesarius supposed that Blaesus lived under the Roman empire; but he must have lived as early as the 3rd century B.C., as Valeskius (ad Theocr. p. 280, a.) has shown, that Atheneus took his quotations of Blaesus from the Τάξισια of Pamphilus of Alexandria, who was a disciple of Aristarchus; and also that Pamphilus borrowed a part of his work explaining the words in Blaesus and similar poets from the Τάξισια του Χριστού of Diodorus, who was a pupil of Aristophanes of Alexandria. (Comp. Schweigh. ad Athen. iii. p. 111, c.)

BLAUSUS, "a stammerer," was the name of a plebeian family of the Sempronia gens under the republic. It also occurs as a cognomen of the Junii and of one Pedius under the empire.

1. C. SEMPRONIUS T. F. T. N. BLAUSUS, consul in B.C. 253 in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, Cn. Servilius Caepio, with a fleet of 300 ships, which was the last of the great waste in frequent descents, and from which they obtained great booty. They did not, however, accomplish anything of note; and in the lesser Syria, through the ignorance of the pilots, their ships ran aground, and only got off, upon the return of the tide, by throwing everything overboard. This disaster induced them to return to Sicily, and in their voyage from thence to Italy they were overtaken off Cape Palinurus by a tremendous storm, in which 150 ships perished. Notwithstanding these misfortunes, each of them obtained a triumph for their successes in Africa, as we learn from the Fasti. (Polyb. i. 39; Eutrop. ii. 23; Oros. iv. 9; Zonar. viii. 14.) Blaesus was consul a second time, in 244 (Fasti Capit., in which year a colony was founded at Brundusium. (Vell. Pat. i. 14.)

2. SEMPRONIUS BLAUSUS, questor in B.C. 217 to the consul Cn. Servilius Geminus, was killed, together with a thousand men, in a descent upon the coast of Africa in this year. (Liv. xxii. 31.)

3. C. SEMPRONIUS BLAUSUS, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 211, brought Cn. Fulvius to trial on account of his losing his army in Apulia. (Liv. xxvi. 2; comp. Val. Max. ii. 8 § 3.)

4. Cn. SEMPRONIUS BLAUSUS, legate in B.C. 210 to the dictator Q. Fulvius Flaccus, by whom he was sent into Etruria to command the army which had been under the praetor C. Culpurnius. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) It is not improbable that this Cn. Blaesus may be the same as No. 3, as Cn. is very likely a false reading for C., since we find none of the Sempronii at this period with the former praenomen, while the latter is the most common one.

5. P. SEMPRONIUS BLAUSUS, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 151, opposed the triumph of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, but withdrew his opposition through the remonstrances of the consul. (Liv. xxxvi. 39, 40.)

6. C. SEMPRONIUS BLAUSUS, plebeian aedile in B.C. 187, and praetor in Sicily in 184. In 170, he was sent with Sex. Julius Caesar as ambassador to Abdera. (Liv. xxxix. 7, 32, 38, xiii. 6.)

BLAUSUS, a Roman jurist, not earlier than Trebatius Testa, the friend of Cicero: for Blaesus is cited by Labeo in the Digest (33. tit. ii. 2, s. 31) as reporting the opinion of Trebatius. Various conjectures have been made without much plausibility for the purpose of identifying the jurist with other persons of the same name. Junius Blaesus, proconsul of Africa in A.D. 22, was probably somewhat later than the jurist. (Majanius, vol. ii. p. 163; G. Grotil, Vita Isorunm, e. 5. § 18.) [J. T. G.]

BLAUSUS, JUNIUS. 1. The governor of Panamus at the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, when the formidable insurrection of the legions broke out in that province, which was with difficulty quelled by Drusus himself. The conduct of Blaeus in allowing the soldiers relaxation from their ordinary duties was the immediate cause of the insurrection, but the real causes lay deeper. Through the influence of Sejanus, who was his uncle, Blaesus obtained the government of Africa in 21, where he gained a victory over Taefarinas in 22, in consequence of which Tiberius granted him the insignia of a triumph, and allowed him the title of Imperator—the last instance of this honour being conferred upon a private person. We learn from Velleius Paterculus, who says that it was difficult to discover who was most useful at the camp or distinguished in the forum, that he also commanded in Spain. (Dion Cass. liv. 4; Tac. Ann. i. 16, &c., iii. 35, 58, 72-74; Vell. Pat. ii. 125.) It appears from the Fasti, from which we learn that his praenomen was Quintus, that Blaesus was consul suffectus in 26, but he shared in the fall of Sejanus in 31, and was deprived, as was also his son, of the priestly offices which he held. His life, however, was spared for the time; but when Tiberius, in 36, conferred these offices upon other persons, Blaesus and his son perceived that their fate was sealed, and accordingly put an end to their own lives. (Tac. Ann. v. 7, vi. 40.)

2. The son of the preceding, was with his father in Pannonia when the legions mutinied in a. d. 14, and was compelled by the soldiers to go to Tiberius with a statement of their grievances. He was sent a second time to Tiberius after the arrival of Drusus in the camp. He also served under his father in 22 in the war against Tachferius in Africa; and he put an end to his own life, as mentioned above, in 36. (Tac. Ann. i. 19, 29, iii. 74, vi. 40.)

3. Probably the son of No. 2, was the governor of Gallia Lugdunensis in a. d. 70, and espoused the party of the emperor Vitellius, whom he supplied when in Gaul with everything necessary to support his rank and state. This liberality on the part of Blaesus excited the jealousy of the emperor, who shortly after had him poisoned on the most trumped accusation, brought against him by L. Vitellius. Blaesus was a man of large property and high integrity, and had steadily refused the solicitations of Caesar and others to desert the cause of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. i. 59, ii. 59, iii. 36, 39.)

BLAESVS, PEDIVIUS, was expelled the senate in a. d. 60, on the complaint of the Cyrenians, for robbing the temple of Aesculapius, and for corruption in the military levies; but he was re-admitted in 70. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 18, Hist. i. 77.)

BLANDUS, a Roman knight, who taught eloquence in Rome in the time of Augustus, and was the instructor of the philosopher and rhetorician, Fabianus. (Senec. Controv. ii. proem. p. 136, ed. Bipp.) He is frequently introduced as a speaker in the Scaenicius (2, 5) and Controversiae (i. 1, 2, 4, &c.) of the elder Seneca. He was probably the father or grandfather of the Rubellius Blandus mentioned below.

BLANDUS, RUBELLIUS, whose grandfather was a Roman knight of Tibur, married in a. d. 33 Julia, the daughter of Drusus, the son of the emperor Tiberius, whence Blandus is called the progenitor of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 27, 45) Rubellius Plautus, who was put to death by Nero, was the oilspiser of this marriage. [PLAUTUS]

There was in the senate in a. d. 21 a Rubellius Blandus, a man of consular rank (Tac. Ann. iii. 23, 51), who is probably the same as the husband of Julia, though Lipsius supposes him to be the father of the latter. We do not, however, find in the Fasti any consil of this name.

There is a coin, struck under Augustus, bearing the inscription C. RUBELLIUS BLANDVS HVRV C A. A. A. E. F., that is, Auro Argento Aere Flundo Periodo, which is probably to be referred to the father of the above-mentioned Blandus. (Echhel, v. p. 239.)

BLASIO, a surname of the Cornells and Holgia gens.

I. Cornelli Blasiones.

1. CN. CORNELIUS L. F. CN. N. BLASIO, who is mentioned nowhere but in the Fasti, was consul in a. d. 270, censor in 285, and consul a second time in 287. He gained a triumph in 270, but we do not know over what people.

2. CN. CORNELIUS BLASIO, was praetor in Sicily in a. d. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 42, 43.)

3. P. CORNELIUS BLASIO, was sent as an am-bassador with two others to the Carni, Istri, and Iapyges, in a. d. 170. In 168 he was one of the five commissioners appointed to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lunenses respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Livy. xlii. 7, xlv. 13.)

There are several coins belonging to this family. The obverse of the one annexed has the inscription BLASIO CN. F. with what appears to be the head of Mars: the reverse represents Dionysus, with Pallas on his left hand in the act of crowning him and another female figure on his right. (Echhel, v. p. 190.)

II. Helvii Blasiones.

1. M. HELVIUS BLASIO, plebeian secedile in a. d. 186 and praetor in 197. He obtained the province of further Spain, which he found in a very disturbed state upon his arrival. After handing over the province to his successor, he was detained in the country a year longer by a severe and tedious illness. On his return home through nearer Spain with a guard of 6000 soldiers, whom the praetor Ap. Claudius had given him, he was attacked by an army of 20,000 Celtiberi, near the town of Illiturgi. These he entirely defeated, slew 12,000 of the enemy, and took Illiturgi. This at least was the statement of Valerius Antius. For this victory he obtained an ovation (n. c. 195), but not a triumph, because he had fought under the auspices and in the province of another. In the following year (194) he was one of the three commissioners for founding a Roman colony at Sipontum in Apulia. (Liv. xxxii. 27, 28, xxxii. 21, xxxiv. 10, 45.)

2. HELVIUS BLASIO, put an end to his own life to encourage his friend D. Brutus to meet his death firmly, when the latter fell into the hands of his enemies, in a. d. 43. (Dion Cass. xlv. 53.)

BLASIIUS, BLATTIUS, or BLATTIUS, one of the chief men at Salapia in Apulia, betrayed the town to the Romans in a. d. 210, together with a strong Carthaginian garrison that was stationed there. The way in which he outwitted his rival Datus, who supported the Carthaginians, is related somewhat differently by the ancient writers. (Appian, Annab. 45—47; Liv. xxxvi. 38; Val. Max. iii. 8, extern. 1.)

BLASTARES, MATTHAEUS, a hieromnemachus, or monk in holy orders, eminent as a Greek canonist, who composed, about the year 1385 (as Bishop Beveridge satisfactorily makes out from the author's own enigmatic statement) an alphabetical compendium of the contents of the genuine canons. It was intended to supply a more convenient repertory for ordinary use than was furnished by the collections of Photius and his commentators. The letters refer to the leading word in the rubrics of the titles, and under each letter the chapters begin anew in numerical order. In each chapter there is commonly an abstract, first of the ecclesiastical, then of the secular laws which relate to the subject; but the sources whence the secular laws are cited are not ordinarily referred to, and cannot always be determined. The ecclesiastical constitutions are derived from the common canonical collections. This compilation, as the numerous extant manuscripts prove, became very popular among ecclesiastics. The preface to the Syntagma Alphabetico of Blasites contains some historical particulars, mingled with the other collections of the civil law. As an example of the errors, it may be stated that the formation of Justinian’s Digest and Code is attributed to Hadrian. In most MSS., a small collection of minor works, probably due to Blasites, is appended to the Syntagma. As to unpublished works of Blasites in MS., see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 205. A portion of the Syntagma (part of B and G), which was probably found copied in a detached form, is printed in Leucclav. Jurr. Graec. Rom. vol. i. lib. viii.; but the only complete edition of the work is that which is given by Beveridge in his Synodicon, vol. ii. part. 2. The “matrimonial questions” of Blasites, printed in Leucclav. Jurr. Graec. Rom., were often incorporated as a distinct work from the Syntagma, but in reality they come under the head Πασιω. At the end of the Père Gérard’s edition of Codinus is a treatise, written in popular verses (τοιχήμα τε χιλια), concerning the offices of the Palace of Constantinople, by Matthaeus, monk, Sōrlis, and physician. The author may possibly be no other than Blasites. (Bieri, Gesch. der Nov. pp. 218—222; Walter, Kirchenrecht, § 79.) [J. T. G.]

BLEMMIDAS. [Nécrhorous Blemmidas.]

BLEPAEUS (Bépareios), a rich banker at Athens in the time of Demosthenes, who was also mentioned in one of the comedies of Alexis. (Dem. c. Meid. p. 583. 17. c. Doct. de Doct. p. 1023. 19; Athen. vi. p. 241. b.)

BLESAUS, a Galatian, a friend and minister of Delotarus, by whom he was sent as ambassador to Rome, where he was when Cicero defended his master, n. c. 45. (Cic. pro Deiot. 12, 14, 15.) Blesas was also in Rome in the following year, 44. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 3.)

BLITOR (Báitrop), estrag of Mosapotamia, was deprived of his satrapy by Antigonus in B. c. 316, because he had allowed Seleucus to escape from Babylon to Egypt in that year. (Appian, Syr. 53.)

BLOSIUS or BLOSSIUS, the name of a noble family in Campania.

1. F. MARIIUS BLOSUS, was Campanian praetor when Capua revolted from the Romans and joined Hannibal in B. c. 216. (Liv. xxvii. 7.)

2. Blosus, two brothers, were the tingleaders in an attempted revolt of Capua from the Romans in B. c. 216; but the design was discovered, and the Blosii and their associates put to death. (Liv. xxvii. 8.)

3. C. BLOSSUS, of Cumae, a kouros of Scamulon's family, was an intimate friend of Ti. Gracchus, whom he is said to have urged on to bring forward his agrarian law. After the death of Ti. Gracchus he was accused before the consuls in B. c. 132, on account of his participation in the schemes of Gracchus, and fearing the issue he fled to Aristonius, king of Pergamus, who was then at war with the Romans. When Aristonius was conquered shortly afterwards, Blosus put an end to his own life for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans. Blosus had paid considerable attention to the study of philosophy, and was a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus. (Cic. de Amic. 11, de Leg. Agr. ii. 34; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 1; Plut. Ti. Gracch. 6, 17, 20.)

BOADICEA (some MSS. of Tacitus have Boudicca, Boudiccia or Boudicce, and Dion Cassius calls her Bovdiccebus), was the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, who in the testament of the latter declared himself sole heir of the kingdom of Britain. Her husband, who died about A. D. 60 or 61, made his two daughters and the emperor Nero the heirs of his private property, hoping thereby to protect his kingdom and his family from the oppression and the rapacity of the Romans stationed in Britain. But these expectations were not realized; for Boadicea, who succeeded him, saw her kingdom and her house robbed and plundered by the Roman soldiers, as if they had been in a country conquered by force of arms. The queen herself was maltreated even with blows, and Romans ravished her two daughters. The most distinguished among the Iceni were deprived of their property, and the relatives of the late king executed as slaves. These outrages were committed by Roman soldiers and veterans under the complicity of their officers, who not only took no measures to stop their proceedings, but Catus Decianus was the most notorious of all by his extortion and avarice. At last, in A. D. 62, Boadicea, a woman of manly spirit and undaunted courage, was roused to revenge. She induced the Iceni to take up arms against their oppressors, and also prevailed upon the Trinobantes and other neighbouring tribes to join them. While the legate Paulinus Suetonius was absent on an expedition to the island of Mona, Camulodunum, a recently established colony of veterans, was attacked by the Britons. The colony solicited the aid of Catus Decianus, who however was unable to send them more than 200 men, and these had not even regular arms. Camulodunum was taken and destroyed by fire, and the soldiers, who took refuge in a temple which formed the ara of the place, were besieged for two days, and then made prisoners. Pettilius Cerealis, the legate of the ninth legio, who was advancing to relieve Camulodunum, was met by the Britons, and, after the loss of his infantry, escaped with the cavalry to his fortified camp. Catus Decianus, who in reality bore all the guilt, made his escape to Gaul; but Suetonius Paulinus, who had been informed of what was going on, had returned by this time, and forced his way through the midst of the enemies as far as the colony of Londinium. As soon as he had left it, it was taken by the Britons; and the municipality of Verulamium soon after experienced the same fate: in these places nearly 70,000 Romans and Roman allies were slain with cruel tortures. Suetonius saw that a battle could no longer be deferred. His forces consisted of only about 10,000 men, while those of the Britons under Boadicea are said to have amounted to 250,000. On the day of the battle, the queen rode in a chariot with her two daughters before her, and commanded her army in person. She harangued her soldiers, reminded them of the wrong inflicted upon Britain by the Romans, and roused their courage against the common enemy. But the Britons were conquered by the greater military skill and the favourable position of their camp. After the battle, it is said to have fallen on that day, and the Romans to have lost no more than 400. Boadicea would not suffer this irreparable loss, and put an end to her life by poison. Her body was interred with great solemnity by the Britons, who then dispersed. This victory, which Tacitus describes as the greatest of Trajan's time, finally established the Roman dominion in Britain. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 31-37, Agr. i. 15, 16; Dion Cass. xii. 1-12.) [L.S.]

BOCCCHAR. 1. A king of the Mani in the time of Masinissa, b. c. 204. (Liv. xxix. 30.)

2. A general of Syphax, who sent him against Masinissa, b. c. 204. (Liv. xxix. 32.) [P. E.]

BOCCORIS (Bocchoris), an Egyptian king and legislator, who was distinguished for his wisdom, aversion, and bodily weakness. His laws related chiefly to the prerogatives of the king and to pecuniary obligations. (Diod. i. 94.) From his not being mentioned by Herodotus, it has been conjectured that he was identical with Aseychis. (Herod. ii. 136.) Bocchoris places him alone in the twenty-fourth dynasty, calls him a Sute, and says that, after reigning forty-four years, he was taken prisoner and burnt by Subaco. (Chron. Arm. pp. 304, 318, Mai and Zoehner; compare Synesius, pp. 74, b., 184, c.) According to Wilkinson, he began to reign b. c. 812; he was the son and successor of Turphachthus; and his name on the monuments is Pehor, Balbok, or Amun-see-Pehor. (Ancient Egyptians, i. pp. 130, 136.) In the Armenian copy of Eusebius his name is spelt Boccharis, in Synesius Bocchoris. (See also Aelian, Hist. An. xii. 3; Tac. Hist. v. 3; Athen. x. p. 418, f., where his father is called Neoebis.) [F. S.]

BOCCUS (Bocrus), 1. A king of Mauretania, who acted a prominent part in the war of the Romans against Jugurtha. He was a barbarian without any principles, assuming voluntarily the appellation of a friend of Jugurtha and of the Romans, as his momentary inclination or aversion dictated; but he ended his prevarication by betraying Jugurtha to the Romans. In b. c. 108, Jugurtha, who was then hard pressed by the proconsul Q. Metellus, applied for assistance to Bocchus, whose daughter was his wife. Bocchus complied the more readily with this request, since at the beginning of the war he had made offers of alliance and friendship to the Romans, which had been rejected. But when Q. Metellus also sent an embassy to him at the same time, Bocchus entered into negotiations with him likewise; and in consequence of this the war against Jugurtha was almost suspended so long as Q. Metellus had the command. When in b. c. 107, C. Marius came to Africa as the successor of Metellus, Bocchus sent several embassies to him, expressing his desire to enter into friendly relations with Rome; but when at the same time Jugurtha promised Bocchus the third part of Numidia, and C. Marius ravaged the portion of Bocchus's dominion which he had formerly taken from Jugurtha, Bocchus accepted the proposal of Jugurtha, and joined him with a large force. The two kings thus united made an attack upon the Romans, but were defeated in two successive engagements. Hereupon, Bocchus again sent an embassy to Marius, requesting him to despatch two of his most trustworthy officers to him, that he might negotiate with them. Marius accordingly sent his quaestor, Sulla, and A. Manlius, who succeeded in effecting a decided change in the king's mind. Soon after, Bocchus despatched ambassadors to Rome, but they fell into the hands of the Gæstuli, and having made their escape into the camp of Sulla, who received them very hospitably, they proceeded to Rome, where hopes of an alliance and the friendship of the Roman people were held out to them. When Bocchus was informed of this, he requested an interview with Sulla. This being granted, Sulla tried to persuade Bocchus to deliver up Jugurtha into the hands of the Romans. At the same time, however, Jugurtha also endeavoured to induce him to betray Sulla, and these clashing proposals made Bocchus hesitate for a while; but he at last determined to comply with the wish of Sulla. Jugurtha was accordingly invited to negotiate for peace, and when he arrived, was treacherously taken prisoner, and delivered up to Sulla, b. c. 106. According to some accounts, Jugurtha had come as a fugitive to Bocchus, and was then handed over to the Romans. Bocchus was rewarded for his treachery by an alliance with Rome, and he was even allowed to dedicate in the Capitoline statues of Victory and golden images of Jugurtha representing him in the act of being delivered up to Sulla. (Sall. Juv. 19, 80-120; Appian, Num. 3, 4; Liv. Epit. 66; Dion Cass. Fragm. Reimau. n. 168, 169; Entrop. iv. 27; Florus, iii. 1; Oros. v. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Plut. Mar. 10, 52, Sull. 3.)

2. Probably a son of the preceding, and a brother of Bogud, who is expressly called a son of Bocchus I. (Oros. v. 21.) These two brothers for a time possessed the kingdom of Mauretania in common, and, being hostile to the Punic party, J. Caesar confirmed them, in b. c. 49, as kings of Mauretania, which some writers describe as if Caesar had then raised them to this dignity. In Caesar's African war, Bocchus was of great service, by taking Girita, the capital of Juba, king of Numidia, and thus compelling him to abandon the cause of Scipio. Caesar rewarded him with a portion of the dominions of Masinissa, the ally of Juba, which however was taken from him, after the death of Caesar, by Ambion, the son of Masinissa. There is a statement in Dion Cassius (xliii. 36), that, in b. c. 45, Bocchus sent his sons to Spain to join Cn. Pompey. If this is true, it can only be accounted for by the supposition, that Bocchus was induced by jealousy of his brother Bogud to desert the cause of Caesar and join the enemy; for all we know of the two brothers shews that the good understanding between them had ceased. During the civil war between Antony and Octavius, Bocchus sided with the latter, while Bogud was in alliance with Antony. When Bogud was in Spain, b. c. 38, Bocchus usurped the sole government of Mauretania, in which he was afterwards confirmed by Octavius. He died about b. c. 33, whereupon his kingdom became a Roman province. (Dion Cass. xii. 42, xliii. 3, 36, xlviii. 45, xlix. 43; Appian, b. c. ii. 96, iv. 54, v. 26; Hirt. R. Afr. 25; Strab. xvii. p. 829.) [L.S.]

BODOOGENATUS, a leader of the Nervii in their war against Caesar, b. c. 57. (Caes. B. C. ii. 52.)

BOEBUS (Boebus), a son of Glaucinus, from whom the Thessalian town of Boebus derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Boeb.) [L.S.]

BOEDROMIUS (Boedromius), the helper in distress, a surname of Apollo at Athens, the origin of which is explained in different ways. According to some, the god was thus called because he had assisted the Athenians in the war with the Amazons, who were defeated on the seventh of Boeotidion, the day on which the Boeotidion was afterwards celebrated. (Plut. Thes. 27.) According to others, the name arose from the circumstance, that in the war of Euréfuckus and Iou against Eúropous, Apollo had advised the Athenians in a war-shout (Boe), if they would conquer. (Harpoer., Suid., Etym. M. s.v. Βοιότας; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 69.) (L.S.)

BOEO (Βοέος), an ancient poetae of Delphi, composed a hymn of which Pausanius (x. 5. § 4) has preserved four lines. Athenaeus (ix. 539. c.) cites a work, apparently a poem, entitled Ὀρφευςβία, which seems to have contained an account of the myths of men who had been turned into birds, but he was doubtful whether it was written by a poetess Boe or a poet Boeis (Βοείς): Antonius Liberalis, however, quotes it (ce. 3, 7, and 11, &c.) as the work of Boeis. The name of Boeis occurs in a list of seers given by Clement of Alexandria. (Strom. i. p. 335, ed. Phil. 169.)

BOBOTUS (Βοβότος), a son of Poseidon and Iotus and Arne (Antigp or Molanipe), and brother of Acolus. (Acolus, No. 3.) He was the ancestral hero of the Boeotians, who derived their name from him. (Paus. ix. 1. § 1.) (L.S.)

BOETHIUS, whose full name was ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOETHIUS (to which from a few MSS. of his works add the name of Torquatus), and commentators prefix by conjecture the pseudonym Pictius from his father's consulship in a. d. 487), a Roman statesman and author, and remarkable as standing at the close of the classical and the commencement of scholastic philosophy. He was born between a. d. 470 and 475 (as is inferred from Consol. Phil. i. 1). The Anician family had for the two preceding centuries been the most illustrious in Rome (see Gibbon, c. 31), and several of its members have been reckoned amongst the direct ancestors of Boethius. But the only conjecture worth notice is that which makes his grandfather to have been the Flavian Boethius murdered by Valentinian III. a. d. 455. His father was probably the consul of a. d. 457, and died in the childhood of his son, who was then brought up by some of the chief men at Rome, amongst whom were probably Festus and Symmachus. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3.) He was famous for his general learning (Encom. Ep. viii. 1) and his laborious translations of Greek philosophy (Cassiod. Ep. i. 45) as well as for his extensive charities to the poor at Rome, both natives and strangers. (Procop. Goth. i. 1.) In his domestic life, he was singularly happy, as the husband of Rustician, daughter of Symmachus (Consol. Phil. ii. 3, 4; Procop. Goth. iii. 20), and the father of two sons, Aurelius Anicius Symmachus, and Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius, who were consuls. A. d. 522. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3, 4.) He naturally rose into public notice, became patrician before the usual age (Consol. Phil. ii. 3), consul in a. d. 510, as appears from the diplomy of his consulship still preserved in Brescia (See Fabriii, Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), and princesse senatus. (Procop. Goth. i. 1.) He also attracted the attention of Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, was appointed (Procop. Wars, p. 30) master of ceremonies in his court, and was applied to by him for a mathematicall regulation of the coinage to prevent forgery (Cassiod. Ep. i. 10), for a sun-dial and water-clock for Gundahel, king of the Burgundians (ib. i. 45), and for the recommendation of a good musician to Clovis, king of the Franks. (Bl. ii. 40.) And he reached the height of his prosperity when, on the inauguration of his two sons in the consulate, a. d. 532, after pronouncing a panegyric on Theodoric, he distributed a largess to the Roman populace in the games of the circus. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3.)

This happiness was suddenly overcast. He had resolved, on his entrance into public life, to carry out the saying of Plato, "that the world would only be happy when kings became philosophers, or philosophers became kings." He protected and relieved the provincials from the public and private rapine to which they were exposed, defended the Campanians against the praetor of the praetorium, saved Paulinus from "the dogs of the palace," and restrained the oppressions of the barbarian officers, Trigullia and Conigastus. (Consol. Phil. i. 4.) This interference in the internal affairs of the court of Theodoric; and the boldness with which he pleaded the cause of Albinus, when accused of treason by the informer Cyprianus, seems to have been the plea on which Gaudentius, Opilio, and Basilis charged him and Symmachus with the intention of delivering Rome from the barbarian yoke,—to which was added the charge of sacrilege or magic. A sentence of confiscation and death was passed against him unheard (Consol. Phil. i. 4), and he was imprisoned at Ticinum in the baptismary of the church, which was to be seen at Pavia till 1864 (Tiraboschi, vol. iii. lib. i. c. 4), during which time he wrote his book De Consolatione Philosophiae." He was executed at Calvenzano (in ago Calventiano) (Anonymous, Vales. p. 36), or according to the general belief, at Ticinum, by beheading (Ann. Ant. Vit. Pontif. in Joanne I.; Alminon. Hist. Franc. ii. 1), or (according to Anonymous, Vales. p. 36) by the torture of a cord drawn round his head till the eyes were forced from their sockets, and then by beating with clubs till he expired. Symmachus was also beheaded, and Rusticius reduced to poverty, till Amalasontha, widow of Theodoric and regent during her son's minority, restored his house and restored to her his confiscated property. (Procop. Gath. i. 2, Acces. 10; Jornand. Reb. Get. 89.) Rusticius was however, on the sack of Rome, in a. d. 541, chiefly by her liberality to the besieged, again reduced to beggary, and was only saved by the kindness of Totila from the fury which this liberty, as well as her destruction of Theodoric's statues in revenge for the death of her husband and father, had excited in the Gothic army. (Procop. Gath. iii. 20.) In a. d. 722, a tomb was erected to Boethius's memory by Luitprand, king of the Lombards, in the church of S. Pietro Gielo d'Oro, and in a. d. 990, a more magnificent one by Otho III., with an epitaph by pope Sylvester II. (Tiraboschi, vol. iii. lib. i. c. 4.)

With the facts stated above have been mixed up various stories, more or less disputed, which seem to have grown with the growth of his posthumous reputation.

1. The story of his eighteen years' stay at Athens, and attendance on the lectures of Proclus, which rests upon the authority of the spurious treatise "De Disciplina Scholastica," passed by Tommaso to have been written by Thomas Brabantes, or Cantipratines. The sentence of Cassiodorus (i. 45) inaccurately quoted by Gibbon ("Athenienaeum scholae [not Athnesa] longe posita [not posita] intosisti") as a proof of his visit to Athens, is really a statement of the reverse, being a rhetorical assertion of the fact, that though living at Rome, he was well acquainted with the philosophy of Greece. Compare the similar expressions in the same letter: "Plato... Aristoteles... Quiritii text to a different question.

2. The three consulsahps sometimes ascribed to him are made up from that of his father in 487, and that of his sons in 522.

3. Besides his wife, Rusticiam, later and especially Sicilian writers have supposed, that he was previously the husband of a Sicilian lady, Elpis, authoress of two hymns used in the Baeviri ("Decom lux," and "Bato Pastor," or according to others, "Aurea luce," and "Felix per omnes"), and by her to have had two sons, Patricius and Hypatius, Greek consuls in A. p. 500. But this has no ground in history: the expression "sacer-ocum, in Consol. Phil. ii. 3, refers not to two fathers-in-law, but to the parents of Rusticiam; and the epithet of Elpis, which is the only authentic record of her life, contradicts the story altogether, by implying that she followed her husband (who is not named) into exile, which would of course leave no time for his second marriage and children. (See Tiraboschi, vol. iii. lib. i. c. 4.)

4. Paulus Diaconus (book vii.), Anastasius (Vit. Pontif. in Joanne i.), and later writers, have connected his death with the embassy of pope John i. to Constantinople for the protection of the Catholics, in which he is alleged to have been inplicated. But this story, not being attested to in the earlier accounts, appears to have arisen, like the last-mentioned one, from the desire to connect his name more distinctly with Christianity, which leads to the least and most signal variation in his history.

5. He was long considered as a Catholic saint and martyr, and in later times stories were current of his having been a friend of St. Benedict, and having supposed at Monte Cassino (Trithemius, op. Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), and again of miracles at his death, as carrying his head in his hand (Life of him by Martinus, op. Baron. Aesn. a. d. 526, No. 17, 18), which last indeed probably arose from the fact of this being the symbolic representation of martyrdom by decapitation; as the particular day of his death (Oct. 23) was probably fixed by its being the day of two other saints of the same name of Severina.

Whatever may be thought of these details, the question of his Christianity itself is best with difficulty; and therefore it may be determined.

On the one hand, if the works on dogmatical theo-yacter ascribed to him be really his, the question is settled in the affirmative. But, in that case, the total omission of all mention of Christianity in the "Consolatio Philosophiae," in passages and under circumstances where its mention seemed to be imperatively demanded, becomes so great a perplexity that various expedients have been adopted to solve it. Bertius conjectured, that there was to have been a sixth book, which was interrupted by his death. Glaerenus, though partly on other grounds, with the independent judgment for which he is commended by Niebuhr, rejected the work itself as spurious. Finally, Professor Hand, in Ernsh and Gruber's "Benevolis," has with much ingenuity maintained the opposite hypothesis, viz. that Boethius was not a Christian at all, and that the theological works ascribed to him were written by another Boethius, who was afterwards confounded with him; and hence the origin or confirmation of the mistake. In favour of this theory may be mentioned, over and above the general argument arising from the "Consolatio Philosophiae," (1.) The number of persons of the name of Boethius in or about that time. See Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15. (2.) The tendency of that age to confound persons of inferior note with their more famous namesakes, as well as to publish anonymous works under celebrated names; as, for example, the ascription to St. Athanasius of the hymn "Quicumque vult," or to St. Dionysius the Areopagite, of the works which go under his name. (3.) The evidently fabulous character of all the events in his life alleged to prove his Christianity. (4.) The tendency which appears increasingly onwards through the middle ages to Christianize eminent heathens; as, for example, the embodiment of such traditions with regard to Trajan, Virgil, and Statius, in the Divina Comedia of Dante. Still sufficient difficulties remain to prevent an implicit acquiescence in this hypothesis. Though no author quotes the theological works of Boethius before Huncius (a. d. 850), yet there is no trace of any doubt as to their genuineness; and also, though the general tone of the Consolatio is heathen, a few phrases seem to savour of a belief in Christianity, &c. "angelica virtute (iv. 5), patriam for "heaven" (v. 1, iv. 1), etc. provisus tamino (iv. 1).

After all, however the critical question be settled, the character of Boethius is not much affected by it. For as it must be determined almost entirely from the "Consolatio," in which he speaks with his whole heart, and not from the abstract statements of doctrine in the theological treatises, which, even if genuine, are chiefly compiled with hardly an expression of personal feeling, from the works of St. Augustin, on the one hand the general silence on the subject of Christianity in such a book at such a period of his life, proves that, if he was a Christian, its doctrines could hardly have been a part of his living belief; on the other hand, the incidental phrases above quoted, the strong religious theism which pervades the whole work, the real belief which it indicates in prayer and Providence, and the unusually high tone of his public life, prove that, if a heathen, his general character must have been deeply tinged by the contemporaneous influence of Christianity.

The middle position which he thus occupied by his personal character and belief, he also occupies in the general history and literature of the world.
Being the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece, and living on the boundary of the ancient and modern world, he is one of the most important links between them. As it had been the great object of his public life to protect the declining fortunes of Rome against the oppression of the barbarian invaders, so it was the great object of his literary life to keep alive the expiring light of Greek literature amidst the growing ignorance of the age.

The complete ruin of the ancient world, which followed almost immediately on his death, imported to this object an importance and to himself a celebrity far beyond what he could ever have anticipated. In the total ignorance of Greek writers which prevailed from the 6th to the 14th century, he was looked upon as the head and type of all philosophers, as Augustius was of all theology and Virgil of all literature, and hence the tendency throughout the middle ages to invest him with a distinctly Christian and almost mimeticus character.

In Danto, etc. etc. He is thus described (Parad. x. 124) —

"Per veder ogni ben dentro vi gode
L' anima santa, che l' mondo fallace
Fa manifesto a chi di lei ben ode;
Lo corpo, o'd elia caceata, giace
Giuso in Cielo, ed essa da martiro
Da e cosio venne a questa pace."

After the introduction of the works of Aristotle into Europe in the 13th century, Boëthius's fame gradually died away, and he affords a remarkable instance of an author, who having served a great purpose for nearly 1000 years, now that that purpose has been accomplished, will sink into obscurity as general has been once his celebrity. The first author who quotes Boëthius is Hincmar (i. 211, 460, 474, 521), a. d. 850, and in the subsequent literature of the middle ages the Consolatio gave birth to imitations, translations, and commentaries, innumerable.

(Warton's Eng. poet. ii. 342, 343.) Of four classics in the Paris library in a. d. 1300 this was one. (Ib. i. p. cxxi.) Of translations the most famous were one into Greek, of the poetical portions of the work, by Maximus Planudes (first published by Weber, Darmstadt, 1833), into Hebrew by Ben Bamesch (Wolf. Bibl. Hebr. i. 239, 1092, 244, 354, 869; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), into old High German at the beginning of the 11th century, by St. Gallen; into French by J. Meun, in 1308, at the order of Philip the Fair; but above all, that into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great, which does so much honor to the Anglo-Saxon literature of the earliest specimens of Anglo-Saxon literature; (2) as the chief literary relic of Alfred himself, whose own mind appears not only in the freedom of the translation, but also in large original insertions relative to the kingly office, or to Christian history, which last fact strikingly illustrates the total absence of such in Boëtius's own work.

Of imitations may be mentioned (1), Chaucer's Testament of Love. (Warton's Eng. poet. ii. 293.)

2. Consolatio Monachorum, by Echard, 1130.

Boëtius's own works are as follow:—1. De Consolatio Philosophiae. Of its moral and religious character no more need be said. In a literary point of view, it is a dialogue between himself and Philosophy, much in the style of the Pastor of Hecataeus—a work which it resembles in the liveliness of personification, though inferior to it in variety and superior in Construction. The alternation of prose and verse is thought to have been suggested by the nearly contemporary work of Marcius Capella on the nuptials of Mercury and Philology. The verses are almost entirely borrowed from Senec.

The chief ancient authorities for his life are the Epistles of Eunomius and Cassiodorus, and the History ofProcopius. The chief modern authorities are Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15; Timbaevi, vol. iii. lib. i. cap. 4; Hand, in Eras and Gruber's Encyclopaedia; Barborini, Crit. storica Esposizione della Vita di San Dioscoro, Paris, 1783; Heyne, Censoris ingenii, &a. Boethi, Gotting. 1806. A. F. S.

BOETHUS (Boëtus). 1. A Stoic philosopher who perhaps lived even before the time of Chrysippus, and was the author of several works. One of them was entitled πει ΠΟΤΟΡΕΣ, from which Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 149) quotes his opinion about the essence of God; another was called πει ΕΛΗΛΙΟΓΕΡΜΕΝ, of which the same writer (vii. 149) mentions the eleventh book. This latter work is, in all probability the one to which Cicero refers in his treatise on Divination (i. 8, ii. 21). Philo (de Mund. incurs. ii. p. 497, ed. Mangely) mentions him together with Posidonius, and it is impossible that this Boëtius is the one mentioned by Plutarch. (De Plat. Plut. iii. 2.)

2. An Epicurean philosopher and geometrical, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Pyth. Oure. p. 396, d), and is introduced by the same writer in the Sympoesic a (v. 1, p. 675, c); but nothing further is known about him.

3. A Platonic philosopher and grammarian, who wrote a Lexicon to Plato's works (ενεργηγεί ΛΕΞΕΩΝ ΠΛΑΤΟΝΙΚΩΝ), dedicated to Melanthus, which Photius (Cod. 154) preferred to the similar work of Timaeus still extant. Another work on the ambiguous words of Plato (πει των πολυ ΠΛΑΤΩΝ ἀπαραγόμενων ΛΕΞΕΩΝ) was dedicated to Athenagoras. (Pliot. Cod. 155.) Whether he is the same as the Boëthius who wrote an exegesis to the Phaenomena of Aratus (Gemini, introd. ad Phaen. 14) is uncertain, and also whether he is the same against whom Porphyry quotes his works. πει ψΥΧΗΣ. (Euseb. Prep. Iwag. xiv. 10, xx. 11, 16; comp. Hesych. s. v. διὰ πατρὸς κρίνεις; Athenaeas, Gaz. Theophr. p. 16.) [L. S.] BOLUSUS (Boðoðh), a town near Sidon, was born in Sidon in Phoenicia. As he is called a disciple of the Peripatetic Aristocles of Rhodes (Ammon, Herm. Commen. in Aristot. Categ. p. 8, ed. Ald. 1546), he must have travelled at an early age to Rome and Athens, in which cities Andronicus is known to have taught. Strabo (xiv. p. 757), who mentions him and his brother Diodotus among the celebrated persons of Sidon, speaks of him at the same time as his own teacher in the Peripatetic philosophy. Among his works, all of which are now lost, there was one on the nature of the soul, and also a commentary on Aristotle's Categories, which is mentioned by Ammonius in his commentary on the same work of Aristotle. Ammonius quotes also an opinion of Boethus concerning the study of the works of Aristotle, viz. that the student should begin with the Physics (καὶ τὰς ψευδες γινεταν), whereas Andronicus had maintained that the beginning should be made from the Logicae, igitur per τὰς διδαςεις γινεταν. (Fabric. Bibl. Graece iii. p. 400; Schneider, Epimeth. p. 11; ed Aristot. Hist. Anim. p. xxxiv.; Buhle, Aristot. Opera, i. p. 397; Stahn, Aristotelis, p. 129, &c.)

[B. S.]

BOETHUS (Bōðhhs), the author of an epitaph in the Greek Anthology in praise of Pylades, a pantomime in the time of Augustus, was a native of Tarsus. Strabo (xiv. p. 674) describes him as a bad citizen and a bad poet, who gained the favour of Antony by some verses on the battle of Philippi, and was set by him over the gymnasium and public games in Tarsus. In this office he was guilty of peculation, but escaped punishment by flattering Antony. He was afterwards expelled from Tarsus by Athenodorus, with the approbation of Augustus. [P. S.]

BOETUS (Bōðhhs), a sculptor and embosser or charger of Carthage (Paus. v. 17, § 1) of uncertain age. Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxii. 12. § 55) praises his excellence in embossing and (xxiv. 8. § 10) in sculpture. Müller (Handb. d. Arch. p. 159. 1) suspects, and without good reason, that the reading κοπεδονος is corrupted out of καλλιθεανος. The artist would then not be an inhabitant or even a native of the barbarian Carthage, but of the Greek town of Chalecedon in Asia Minor. [Acragan.]

[B. E.]

BOEUS (Boðys), a son of Heracle, and founder of the Laconian town of Boeae, to which he led colonists from Eetia, Aphrodisias, and Sinda. (Paus. ii. 29, § 9.)

[Bozor.]

BOEUS. [Bozor.] BOGES (Bōgo), the Persian governor of Eion in Thrace, when Xerxes invaded Greece in B.C. 480. Boges continued to hold the place till B.C. 476, when it was besieged by the Athenians under Cinon. Boges, finding that he was unable to defend the town, and refusing to surrender it, killed his wife, children, and family, and set fire to the place, in which he himself perished. (Herod. vii. 113, 107; Plut. Cleon. 7, who calls him Bogetis; Paus. viii. 8, § 5, who calls him Bogos; Polyen. vii. 24, who calls him Bogres; comp. Diod. x. 60.)

BOGUD (Boygus) was king of Mauretanian Tingitana, in which title he was conferred by Julius Caesar, n. c. 49, as a reward for his adherence to him in opposition to the party of Pompey. (Dion Cass. xii. 42; comp. Cic. ad Fam. x. 32; Sueton. Jul. 52.) Accordingly, while Caesar was engaged with his rival in Greece, B.C. 48, we find Bogud zealously lending his aid to Cassius Longinus, Caesar's pro-praetor in further Spain, to quell the sedition in that province. (Hist. Bell. Alex. 62.) Again, during Caesar's campaign in Africa, B.C. 46, Mauretania was invaded unsuccessfully by the young Cn. Pompey; and when Juba, the Numidian, was hastening to join his forces to those of Q. Metellus Scipio, Bogud attacked his dominions at the instigation of the Roman exile P. Sicius, and obliged him to return for defence. (Hist. Bell. Afric. 23, 25, comp. c. 95; Dion Cass. xiii. 3.) In Caesar's war in Spain against Pompey's sons, B.C. 45, Bogud joined the former in person; and it was indeed by his attack on the camp of Cn. Pompey at the battle of Munda that Labienus was drawn from his post in the field to cover it, and the scale was thus turned in Caesar's favour. (Dion Cass. xiii. 38.) After the murder of Caesar, Bogud espoused the side of Antony, and it was perhaps for the furtherance of these interests that he crossed over to Spain in B.C. 38, and so lost his kingdom through a revolt of his subjects, fomented in his absence by Bocchus. This prince's usurpation was confirmed by Octavius, and seems to have been accompanied with the gift of a freer constitution to the Timgitans. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 45.) Upon this, Bogud betook himself into Greece to Antony, for whom we afterwards find him holding the town of Methone, at the capture of which by Agrippa he lost his life about the end of B.C. 33 or the beginning of 31. (Dion Cass. i. 11.)

BOIOCALUS, the leader of the Ascalbari, a German people, was a man of great renown, and had long been faithful to the Romans, but made war against them in A.D. 59. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55, 56.)

[Boio] BIORIX, a chief of the town of the Boii, who in B.C. 194, together with his two brothers, excited their countrymen to revolt from the Romans, and fought an indecisive battle with Trib. Sempronius, the consul, who had advanced into his territory. The Boii continued to give the Romans trouble for several successive years, till their reduction by Scipio in B.C. 191; but of Biorix himself we find no further mention in Livy. (Liv. xxxiv. 46, 47, 56, xxxv. 4, 5, 40, xxxvi. 38, 39.) [B. E.]

BOLANUS, a friend of Cicero's, recommended by him to P. Sulpicius in B.C. 54. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 77.)

Bolanus also occurs in Horace (Sat. i. 9, 11) as the name of a well-known furions fellow, who would not submit to any insult or impertinence. (BOLANUS, VITTIUS, commanded a legion under Corbulo in the war against Tigranes in Armenia, A.D. 63, and was appointed governor of Britain in 69, in the place of Trebellius Maximus. In the civil war between Vespasian and Vitellius, Bolanus did not declare in favour of either; and, during his government of the province, he attempted nothing against the Britons, and allowed his troops great licence. But, as his administration was marked by integrity, he was popular in the province. The praises which Statius bestows upon Bolanus in the poem (Silv. v. 2, 34, &c.), addressed to his son Cirsiinus, must be set down to flattery. (Tac. Ann. xv. 3, Hist. ii. 65, 97, Agric. 3, 16.)

BOLIS. [Achabut. p. 8, a.]

BOLUS (Bōlo). Under this name Suidas, and Eudocius after him, mention a Pythagorean philosopher of Mende, to whom they ascribe several works, which are otherwise entirely unknown. From this Pythagorean, Suidas distinguishes a Bulos who was a philosopher of the school of Democritus, who wrote on medicine and also on historical work. But, from a passage of Columella (vii. 5; comp. Stobaeus, Serm. 51), it appears that Bulos of Mende and the follower of Democritus were one and the same person; and he seems to have lived subsequently to the time of Theophrastus, whose work on plants he appears to have known. (Steph. Byz. s. a. "Aphobos; Schol. ad Nicand. Thesaur. i. 9.)

BOMILCAR (Βομιλκάρ, Βομιλκάρ). A commander of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, n. c. 310. In the first battle with the invaders, Bomilcar, his colleague Hann in falling, betrayed the fortune of the day to the enemy, with the view, according to Diodorus, of humiliating the spirit of his countrymen, and so making himself tyrant of Carthage. (Diod. xx. 10, 12; comp. Arist. Polit. v. 11, ed. Bekk.) Two years after this, n. c. 308, after many delays and misgivings, he attempted to seize the government with the aid of 500 citizens and a number of mercenaries; but his followers were induced to desert him by promises of pardon, and he himself was taken and crucified. (Diod. xx. 43, 44; Justin. xxii. 7.)

2. Father of the Hammo who commanded a portion of Hannibal's army at the passage of the Rhone, n. c. 218. This Bomilcar seems to have been one of the Carthaginian Suffs (now not prorator; see Göttling, Excerpt. iii. ad Arist. Polit. p. 484), and to have presided in that assembly of the senate in which the second Punic war was resolved on. (Polyb. iii. 32, 42; Liv. xxii. 18, 27, 28.)

3. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies which were voted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, n. c. 216, and with which he arrived in Italy in the ensuing year. (Liv. xxiii. 13, 41.) In n. c. 214, he was sent with fifty-five ships to the aid of Syracuse, then besieged by the Romans; but, finding himself unable to cope with the superior fleet of the enemy, he withdrew to Africa. (Liv. xxiv. 36.) Two years after this, we again find him at Syracuse; for we hear of his making his escape out of the harbour, carrying to Carthage intelligence of the perilous state of the city (all of which, except Agrigentum, was in the possession of Marcellus), and returning within a few days with 100 ships. (Liv. xxv. 25.) In the same year, on the destruction by pestilence of the Carthaginian land-forces under Hippocrates and Himilco, Bomilcar again sailed to Carthage with the news, and returned with 120 ships, but was prevented by Marcellus from reaching Syracuse. He then proceeded to Tarentum, apparently with the view of cutting off the supplies of the Roman garrison in that town; but, as the presence of his force only increased the scarcity under which the Tarantine themselves suffered, they were obliged to dismiss him. (Liv. xxv. 27, xxvi. 20; comp. Polyb. Spicil. Rel. iv. 1; Schweig. ad loc.)

4. A Numidian, deep in the confidence of Jugurtha, by whom he was employed on many secret services. In particular, when Jugurtha was at Rome, in n. c. 103, Bomilcar undertook and effected for him the assassination of Masinissa, who happened to be at Rome at the same time, and who, as well as Jugurtha himself, was a grandson of Masinissa, and a rival claimant to the throne of Numidia. The murder was discovered and traced to Bomilcar, who was obliged to enter into large recognizances to appear and stand his trial; but, before the trial came on, his master privately sent him back to Africa. (Sall. Jug. 35; comp. Liv. Epit. 64.) In the ensuing year, we find him commanding a portion of Jugurtha's army, with which he was defeated in a skirmish at the river Mutul by Rufilius, Lieutenant of Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 49, 52, 53.) In the winter of the same year Metellus, after his unsuccessful attempt on Zama, engaged Bomilcar by promises of Roman favour to desist from his atrocities and to offer himself as a hostage, according to his instigation that the king sent ambassadors to make offers of unconditional submission to Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 61, 62.) In consequence of this advice Bomilcar seems to have become an object of suspicion to his master, which urged him the more towards the execution of his treachery. Accordingly he formed a plot with Nabdalsa, a Numidian nobleman, for the seizure or assassination of the king; but the design was discovered to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or secretary, and Bomilcar was put to death. (Sall. Jug. 70, 71.)

BONA DEA, a Roman divinity, who is described as the sister, wife, or daughter of Faunus, and was herself called Fauna, Fatun, or Oma. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 814; Macrobi. Sat. i. 12.) She was worshipped at Rome from the earliest times as a chaste and prophetic divinity; and her worship was so exclusively confined to women, that men were not even allowed to know her name. Faunus himself had not been able to overcome her aversion to men, except by changing her into a serpent. (Cic. de Harusp. resp. 17; Var. ap. Lactant. i. 22; Serv. l. c.) She revealed her oracles only to females, as Faunus did only to males. Her sanctuary was a grotto in the Aventine, which had been consecrated to her by Claudian, a pure maiden. (Macrob. i. c.; Ov. Fast. v. 148, &c.) In the time of Cicero, however, she had also a sanctuary between Aricia and Bovalius. (Cic. pro Mil. 81; Ascon. ad Profl. p. 32.) Her festival, which was celebrated every year on the 1st of May, was held in the house of the consul or praetor, as the sacrifices on that occasion were offered on behalf of the whole Roman people. The solemnities were conducted by the Vestals, and only women, usually of the higher orders, were allowed to take part in them. (Cic. ad Att. i. 13, de Harusp. resp. i. i. o.; Dion Cass. xcviii. 45.) During the solemnity, no male person was allowed to be in the house, and portraits of men were tolerated only when they were covered over. It is a well-known fact, that P. Claudius profaned the sacred ceremonies on such an occasion by entering the house of Caesar in the disguise of a woman. (Juv. vi. 429; Senec. Epist. 97; Plin. Nat. Hist. 39. 20; Cic. Porr. 4, ad Att. ii. 4.) The women who celebrated the festival of Fauna had to prepare themselves for it by abstaining from various things, especially from intercourse with men. The house of the consul or praetor was decorated by the Vestals as a temple, with flowers and foliage of every kind except myrtle, on account of its symbolic meaning. The head of the goddess's statue was adorned with a garland of vine-leaves, and a serpent surrounded its base. The women were decorated in a similar manner. Although no one was BONIFACIUS. allowed to bring wine with her, a vessel filled with wine, stood in the room, and from it the women made their libations and drank. This wine, however, was called milk, and the vessel containing it mellarium, so that the name of wine was avoided altogether. The solemnity commenced with a sacrifice called danaion (the priestess who performed the name danaia, and the goddess danaia; Fest. t. n. Danaia, who however gives an absurd account of these names). One might suppose that the sacrifice consisted of a chamoeis (danaia) or some kind of substitute for a chamoeis; but Pliny (H.N. x. 77) seems to suggest, that the sacrifice consisted of hens of various colours, except black ones. After this sacrifice, the women began to Bacchic dances, and to drink of the wine prepared for them. (Juv. vi. 314.) The goddess herself was believed to have set the example for this; for, while yet on earth, she was said to have intoxicated herself by emptying a large vessel of wine, whereupon Faunus killed her with a myrtle staff, but afterwards raised her to the rank of a goddess. (Var. opp. Laoc. 1. c.; Arnob. adv. Gent. v. 18; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 20.) This whole ceremony took place at night, whence it is usually called sacræa oporten, or sacra oportent. (Cic. de Legg. ii. 3, ad Att. I. 13.) Faunus was also regarded as a goddess possessed of healing powers, as might be inferred from the serpent being part of her worship; but we know that various kinds of medicinal herbs were sold in her temple, and bought largely by the poorer classes. (Macrobi., Plut., Arnob. ii. c.c.) Greek writers, in their usual way, identify the Bona Dea with some Greek divinity, such as Semelé, Medea, Hecate, or Persephone. The Anglia of the Mar- sians seems to have been the same goddess with them as the Bona Dea with the Romans. (Augu- tia; comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. ii. p. 195, etc.) [L. S.]

BONIFACIUS, a Roman general, tribune, and comes in the province of Africa under Valen- tinian III. In the early part of his career he was distinguished for his prompt administration of justice, and also for his activity against the barbarians, as at Massilia in a.d. 413 against the Gothic king Ataulphus (Olymp. et Prop. p. 59, Bekker), and in 422 against the Vandals in Spain. (Prosper.) His high character procured for him the friendship of Augustus, whom he consulted with regard to enforcing the imperial laws against the Donatists, and to scruples which he entertained against continuing military pursuits, and (on the death of his wife) even against remaining in the world at all. These scruples Augustus wisely allayed, only recommending to him resolutions, which he adopted, of confining himself to defensive warfare against the barbarians, and of leading a single life. (August. Ep. 195, 196.) (a. d. 417, 418.)

The abandonment of this last resolution, in his second marriage with a rich Arian lady of the name of Pelagia, seems to have exercised a perni- cious influence over his general character. Although he so far maintained his own religious convictions as to insist on the previous conversion of his wife, yet he so far gave them up as to allow his child to receive Arian baptism; and as the first breach of even slight scruples may prepare a conscience naturally tender for the commission of actual crimes, he is afterwards reported to have lived with concu- bins. (August. Ep. 290.) (a. d. 424.) Whilst in the unsettled state consequent on this change of life, he was, in 427, entrapped by his rival Atilius [Atilius] into the belief that the empress Placidia was bent on his destruction; and under this impression he yielded to the temptation of inviting Genseric, king of the Vandals, to settle in Africa. (Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. 4.) Bitterly reproached for his crime by Augustus (Ep. 220), and discovering the fraud when it was too late, he took arms against Genseric, but was driven by him into Hippo (A. d. 430), and thence, after a year's siege, during which he witnessed the death of his friend, Augustus, he escaped with a great part of the inhabitants to Italy, where he was restored to the favour of Pla- cidia, and even enjoyed the almost unprecedented honour of having coins struck in honour of his imaginary victories, with his own head on the reverse. Atilius, however, challenged him to single combat, shortly after which, either by a wound from the longer spear of his adversary (Marcellinus in anno or from illness (Prosper), he expired, expressing his forgiveness to Atilius, and advising his widow to marry him. (A. d. 432.)

His career is singularly and exactly the reverse of that of his rival, Atilius. Uniting true Roman courage and love of justice with true Christian piety, he yet by one fatal step brought on his church and country the most severe calamities which it had in the power of any of the barbarian invaders to inflict on either of them. (Prosper.) The authorities for his life are Procopius, Bell. Vandal. i. 3, 4; Olymp. op. Phot. pp. 59, 63; Augustin. Ep. 185 (or 50), 189 (or 95), 220 (or 70); and, of modern writers, Gibbon, c. 33; at greater length, Tillemont, Mon. Eccl. xii. pp. 712 —886, in which last (note 77) is a discussion on a correspondence of sixteen smaller letters, falsely ascribed to him and Augustus. [A. P. S.]

BONO[SUS], was born in Spain; his ancestors were from Britain and Gaul. The son of a humble schoolmaster, he displayed a marked inaptitude for literary pursuits; but, having entered the army, gradually rose to high military rank, and was in- dicted for much of his success in life to the singular fact that he possessed of being able to drink to excess (audi quantum cornum nonus) without be- coming intoxicated or losing his self-command. Aurelian, resolving to take advantage of this na- tural gift, kept him near his person, in order that when ambassadors arrived from barbarian tribes, they might be tempted to deep potations by Bono- sus, and so led to betray the secrets of their mission. In pursuance of this plan, the emperor caused him to wed Hunlia, a damsel of the noblest blood among the Goths, in hopes of gaining early information of the schemes in agitation among her kinsmen, which they were apt to divulge when under the influence of wine. How the husband- spy discharged this task we are not told; but we find him at a subsequent period in the command of troops upon the Illyrian frontier, and afterwards stationed on the Rhine. The Germans having succeeded in destroying certain Roman vessels in consequence of some carelessness or breach of duty on his part, in order to avoid immediate punish- ment, he prevailed upon his soldiers to proclaim him emperor. After a long and severe struggle, he was vanquished by Probus, and hanged himself. The conqueror magnanimously spared his two sons and pensioned his widow. No medals are extant except those published by Gothicus, which are spar- ious. (Vopiscus, Viti. Bonos.) [W. R.] BOSTAR.

BOPTIS (Βοπτίς), an epitaph commonly given to Harm in the Homeric poems. It has been said, that the goddess was thus designated in allusion to her having metamorphosed Io into a cow; but this opinion is contradicted by the fact, that other divinities too, such as Euryphassa (Horn. Hymn. in Del. 2) and Pluto (Hesiod. Theog. 553), are mentioned with the same epithet; and from this circumstance it is clear, that Boptis was intended to the Roman poet to express by it nothing but the sublime and majestic character of these divinities.

[Longus.]

BO'REAS (Βόρεας or Βορεας), the North wind, was, according to Hesiod (Theog. 579), a son of Astraeeus and Eos, and brother of Hesperus, Zephyrus, and Notus. He dwelt in a cave of mount Haemon in Thrace. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 63.) He is mixed up with the early legends of Attica in the story of his having carried off Osethya, the daughter of Erechtheus, by whom he begot Zetes, Calais, and Cleopatra, the wife of Phileas, who are therefore called Boreades. (Ov. Met. vi. 685, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 211; Apollod. iii. 15. § 2; Paus. i. 19. § 6.) In the Persian war, Boreas showed his friendly disposition towards the Athenians by destroying the ships of the barbarians. (Herod. vii. 189.) He also assisted the Megalopolitans against the Spartans, for which he was honoured at Megalopolis with annual festivals. (Paus. viii. 36. § 3.) According to an Homeric tradition (II. xx. 223), Boreas begot twelve horses by the mares of Eriphthions, which is commonly explained as a mere figurative mode of expressing the extraordinary swiftness of these horses. On the chest of Cyrus he was represented in the act of carrying off Osethya, and here the place of his legs was occupied by tails of serpents. (Paus. v. 19. § 1.) Respecting the festivals of Boreas, celebrated at Athens and other places, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Boreas.

BORITUS (Βορίτους), a son of Upius, a Mariandynian, was a youth distinguished for his extraordinary beauty. Once during the time of harvest, when he went to a well to fetch water for the reapers, he was drawn into the well by the nymphs, and never appeared again. For this reason, the country people in Bithynia celebrated his memory every year at the time of harvest with plaintive songs (Βορίτους) with the accompaniment of their flutes. (Athen. xiv. p. 620; Aeschyl. Pers. 941; Schol. ad Dionys. Perieg. 721; Pollux, iv. 54.)

[Longus.]

BORUS (Βόρος), two mythical personages, of whom no particulars are related. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 1; Paus. ii. 18. § 7.)

BOSTAR (Βοστάρ), Polyb. iii. 98; Bostaros, Polyb. i. 30; Bostethos, Diod. Ecol. xxiv.). I. A Carthaginian general, who, in conjunction with Hamilcar and Harsudal, the son of Hanno, commanded the Carthaginian forces sent against M. Atilius Regulus when he invaded Africa in B. C. 266. Bostar and his colleagues were, however, quite incompetent for their office. Instead of keeping to the plains, where their cavalry and elephants would have been formidable to the Romans, they retired to the mountains, where these forces were of no use; and they were defeated, in consequence, near the town of Aulis, with great slaughter. The generals, who had fled, were taken prisoners; and we learn from Diodorus that Harsudal, the son of Hanno, was put to death after the death of Regulus, delivered up his family, who belonged to him with such barbarity, that Bostar died of the treatment he received. The cruelty of the family, however, excited so much odium at Rome, that the sons of Regulus thought it advisable to burn the body of Bostar, and send his ashes to Carthage. This account of Diiodorus, which, Niebuhr remarks, is probably taken from Philinus, must be regarded as of doubtful authority. (Polyb. i. 98; Oros. iv. 81. Bortop. i. 143. But Plut. Pan. xcvii. Dicae. xxxix.; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 600.)

2. The Carthaginian commander of the mercenary troops in Sardinia, was, together with all the Carthaginians with him, killed by these soldiers when they revolted in B. C. 240. (Polyb. i. 79.)

3. A Carthaginian general, who was sent by Hasdrubal, the commander-in-chief of the Carthaginian forces in Spain, to prevent the Romans under Scipio from crossing the Iberus in B. C. 217. But not daring to do this, Bostar fell back upon Saguntum, where all the hostages were kept which had been given to the Carthaginians by the different states in Spain. Here he was persuaded by Abaelos, who had secretly come over to the Roman side, to set these hostages at liberty, because such an act would secure the affections of the Spanish people. But the hostages had no sooner left the city, than they were betrayed by Abaelos into the hands of the Romans. For his simplicity on this occasion, Bostar was involved in great danger. (Polyb. iii. 98, 99; Liv. xxii. 22.)

4. One of the ambassadors sent by Hannibal to Philip of Macedon in B. C. 215. The ship in which they sailed was taken by the Romans, and the ambassadors themselves sent as prisoners to Rome. (Liv. xxiii. 34.) We are not told whether they obtained their freedom; and consequently it is uncertain whether the Bostar who was governor of Capua with Hanno, in 211, is the same as the preceding. (Liv. xxvi. 5. 12; Appian, Ann. 43.)

BOTACHUS (Βοτάχος), a son of Teotius and grandson of Lycurgus, from whom the demos Botachidai or Potachides at Tegae was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 45. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. v. Botaciodai.)

BOTANIDES. [NEPHORUS III.]

BOTYRAS (Βοτύρας), of Myndus, is one of the writers whom Ptolemy, the son of Hephaestion made use of in compiling his "New History." (Phot. p. 147, a. 21, ed. Bekker.)

BOTYRS (Βότρος), a native of Messana in Sicily, was the inventor of the lassive poems called Βοτρινα. (Athen. vii. p. 322, a.; Polyb. xii. 13; Suidas, s. v. Διοκρής.)

BOTYRS (Βότρος), a Greek physician, who must have lived in Greece before the first century after Christ. His writings are not now extant, but they were used by Pliny for his Natural History. (Ind. to H. N. xiii. xiv.) One of his prescriptions is preserved by Galen. (De Compos. Medic. sc. Locos. iii. 1. vol. ii. p. 640.) [W. A. G.]

BOTHAUS (Βοθαύς), is mentioned along with Scylax of Curyanda by Marcianus of Heraclea (p. 63) as one of those who wrote a Periplus.

BRACHYLLES or BRACHYLLUS (Βραχύλλης, Βραχύλλος), was the son of Neus, a Boeotian, who studiously courted the favour of the Macedonian king Antigonus Doson; and accordingly, when the latter took Sparta, B. C. 293, he contributed the boundary of the city. (Polyb. xx. 5; comp. ii. 70, v. 9, ix. 30.) After the death of Antigonus, B. C. 220, Brachyllus con-BRASIDAS.

continued to attack himself to the interests of Macedon
under Philip V., whom he attended in his conference with Flamininus at Nicaea in Locris, 5. c. 198. (Polyb. xvi. 1; Liv. xxxii. 32.) At the battle of Cynoscaphaeia, n. c. 197, he commanded the Boeotian troops in Philip's army; but, together with the rest of his countrymen who had
on that occasion fallen into the Roman power, was sent home in safety by Flamininus, who wished to conciliate Boeotia. On his return he was elected Ectebarch, through the influence of the Macedonian party at Thebes; in consequence of which Zeuxippus, Peisistratus, and the other leaders of the Roman party, caused him to be assassinated as he was returning home one night from an entertainment, n. c. 196. Polybius tells us, what Livy omits to state, that Flamininus himself was privy to the crime. (Polyb. xviii. 26; Liv. xxiii. 27, 28; comp. xviii. 47, xxvii. 6.) [B. E.]

BRANCHUS (Brachyus), a son of Apollo or Sminther Delphi. His mother, a Milesian woman, dreamt at the time she gave birth to him, that the sun was passing through her body, and the sun appeared to her as a favourable sign.
Apollo loved the boy Branchus for his great beauty, and endowed him with prophetic power, which he exercised at Didyma, near Miletus. Here he found an oracle, of which his descendants, the Branchidae, were the priests, and which was held in great esteem, especially by the Ionians and Aeolians. (Herod. i. 157; Strab. xiv. p. 684, xv.
p. 814; Lutat. ad Stat. Theb. viii. 198; Conon, Narrat. 48; Lucas. Dial. Decr. 2; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oraculam.)

BRANCHUS, king of the Allobroges, had been deprived of his kingdom by his younger brother, but was restored to it by Hannibal in n. c. 218.
(Liv. xxi. 31.)

BRONGAS (Brogyas), a son of the Thracian king Stremion, and brother of Herseus and Olythus. When the last of these three brothers had been killed during the chase by a lion, Brongas buried him on the spot where he had fallen, and called the town which he subsequently built there Olythus. (Conon, Narrat. 4; Steph. Byz. s. v.
"Olytheus"; Athen. viii. p. 394, who calls Olythus a son of Heracles.)

[6. S.]

BRAS'IDAS (Braisidas), son of Tellis, the most distinguished Spartan in the first part of the Peloponnesian war, signalized himself in its first year
(b. c. 431) by throwing a hundred men into Methone, while besieged by the Athenians in their first ravage of the Peloponnesian coast. For this ex-plot, which was the only one he ever performed, he received the first in the war, public commendation at Sparta; and perhaps in consequence of this it is we find him in September appointed Ephor Eponymus. (Xen.
Hell. ii. 3, § 10.) His next employment (b. c.
429) is as one of the three consuls sent to assist Chermis, after his first defeat by Phormion;
and his name is also mentioned after the second defeat in the attempt to surprise the Peireneus, and we may not improbably ascribe to him the attempt, and its failure to his colleagues. In 427 he was united in the same, but a subordinate, capacity, with Achillas, the new admiral, on his return from his Ionian voyage; and accompanying him to Chalcis, he persuaded Themistocles to tell us, he have vainly urged him to attack the city, which immediately after their victory in the first engagement, Next, as triarch in the attempt to dislodge Demosthenes from Pylos (425), he is described as running his galley ashore, and, in a gallant endeavour to land, to have fainted from his wounds, and falling back into the ship to have lost in the water his shield, which was afterwards found by the Athenians and used in their trophy. Early in the following year we find him at the Isthmian games preparing for his expedition to Chalcis (424), but suddenly called off from this by the danger of Megara, which but for his timely and skilful succour would no doubt have been lost to the enemy.
Shortly after, he set forth with an army of 700
boletes and 1000 mercenaries, arrived at Hermione, and, by a rapid and dexterous march through the hostile country of Theassaly, effected a junction with Pericles of Macedon. The events of his career in this field of action were (after a brief expedition against Arbippa, a revolted vassal of the king's) the acquisition, 1st, of Acarnthus, effected by a most politic exposition of his views (of which Timotheus gives us a representation), made before the popular assembly; 2nd, of Stae-ginis, its neighbour; 3rd, of Amphipolis, most important of all the Athenian tributaries in that part of the country, accomplished by a sudden attack after the commencement of winter, and followed by an unsuccessful attempt on Eion, and by the accession of Myrcinus, Galepasus, Aesyme, and most of the towns in the peninsula of Athos;
4th, the reduction of Torone, and expulsion of its Athenian garrison from the post of Lectum. In the following spring (423) we have the revolt of Seione, falling a day or two after the ratification of the truce agreed upon by the government at home—a mischance which Brasidas scrupled not to remedy by denying the fact, and not only retained Seione, but even availed himself of the consequent revolt of Mende, on pretext of certain infringements on the other side. Next, a second expedition with Pericles, against Arbippa, resulting in a perilous but most skilfully conducted retreat:
the loss, in the meantime, of Mende, recaptured
by the new Athenian armament; and in the winter an ineffectual attempt on Potidæa. In 422, Brasidas with no reinforcements had to oppose a large body of the flower of the Athenian troops under Cleon. Torone and Galepasus were lost, but Amphipolis was saved by a skilful sally,—the closing event of the war,—in which the Athenians were completely defeated and Cleon slain, and Brasidas himself in the first moment of victory received his mortal wound.

He was interred at Amphipolis, within the walls—an extraordinary honour in a Greek town
— with a magnificent funeral, attended under arms
by all the allied forces. The tomb was raised off, and his memory honoured by the Amphipioltans,
by yearly sacrifices offered to him there, as to a hero, and by games. (Paus. iii. 14. § 1; Aristot.
Eth. N. v. 7; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Brasidas.)
Regarding him as their preserver, they transferred to him all the honours of a founder hitherto paid to Hagnon. Pausanias mentions a cenotaph to him in Sparta, and we hear also (Plut. Lycom. 1) of a treasury at Delphi, bearing the inscription, "Brasidas and the Ac-thians from the Athenians." Two or three of his sayings are recorded in Plutarch's "Aphorisms upon Socrates," but none were characteristic.
Brasidas gives three speeches in his name, the first and longest at Acarnthus; one to his forces in the Little is known of him and his Gauls till they came into immediate contact with the Romans, and even then traditionary legends have very much obscured the facts of history.

It is clear, however, that, after crossing the Apenines (Diod. xiv. 113; Liv. v. 36), Brennus attacked Clusium, and unsuccessfully. The valley of the Clanis was then open before him, leading down to the Tiber, where the river was fordable; and after crossing it he passed through the country of the Sabines, and advanced along the Sabine road towards Rome. His army now amounted to 70,000 men. (Diod. xiv. 114.) At the Allia, which ran through a deep ravine into the Tiber, about 12 miles from the city, he found the Roman army, consisting of about 40,000 men, strongly posted. Their right wing, composed of the proletarians and irregular troops, was drawn up on high ground, covered by the ravine in front and some woody country on the flank; the left and centre, composed of the regular legions, filled the ground between the hills and the Tiber (Diod. xiv. 114), while the left wing rested on the river itself. Brennus attacked and carried this position, much in the same way as Frederick of Prussia defeated the Austrians at Leuthen. He fell with the whole strength of his army on the right wing of the Romans, and quickly cleared the ground. He then charged the exposed flank of the legions on the left, and routed the whole army with great slaughter. Had he marched at once upon the city, it would have fallen, together with the Capitol, into his hands, and the name and nation of Rome might have been swept from the earth. But he spent the night on the field. His warriors were busy in cutting off the heads of the slain (Diod. l. c.), and then abandoned themselves to plunder, drunkenness, and sleep. He delayed the whole of the next day, and thus gave the Romans time to secure the Capitol. On the third morning he burst open the gates of the city. Then followed the massacre of the eighty priests and old patriarchs (Zonar. ii. 23), as they sat, each in the portico of his house, in their robes and chairs of state; the plunder and burning of all the city, except the houses on the Palatine, where Brennus established his quarters (Diod. xiv. 115); the famous night attack on the Capitol, and the gallant exploit of Manlius in saving it.

For six months Brennus besieged the Capitol, and at last reduced the garrison to offer 1000 pounds of gold for their ransom. The Gaul brought unskill weights to the scales, and the Roman tribune remonstrated. But Brennus then flung his broadsword into the scale, and told the tribune, "What if the weight is not right? that it means "va victis esse," that the weakest goes to the wall."

Polybius says (ii. 18), that Brennus and his Gauls then gave up the city, and returned home safe with their booty. But the vanity of the Romans and their popular legends would not let him so escape. According to some, a large detachment was cut off in an ambush near Caere (Diod. xiv. 117); according to others, these were none others than Brennus and those who had besieged the Capitol. (Strab. v. p. 220.) Last of all, Camillus and a Roman army are made to appear suddenly just at the moment that the gold is being weighed for the Capitol, Brennus is defeated in two battles, he himself is killed, and his whole army slain to a man. (Liv. v. 49.)
BRENNUS.

2. The leader of a body of Gauls, who had settled in Pannonia, and who moved southwards and broke into Greece, c. 279, one hundred and eleven years after the taking of Rome. Pyrrhus of Epirus was then absent in Italy. The infamous Ptolemy Ceramus had just established himself on the throne of Macedon. Athens was again free under Olympiodorus (Paus. i. 29), and the old Achaean league had been re-established, with the promise of brighter days in the Peloponnesus, when the ascendancy of the barbarians threatened all Greece with desolation.

Brennus entered Macedonia at the same time that two other divisions of the Gauls invaded Thrace and Macedonia. On returning home, the easy victory which his countrymen had gained over Ptolemy in Macedonia, the richness of the country, and the treasures of the temples, furnished him with arguments for another enterprise, and he again advanced southward with the enormous force of 150,000 foot and 61,000 horse. (Paus. x. 18.)

After ravaging Macedonia (Justin. xxiv. 6) he marched through Thessaly towards Thermopylae. Here an army of above 20,000 Greeks was assembled to dispute the pass, while a fleet of Athenian triremes lay close in shore, commanding the narrow road between the foot of the cliffs and the beach.

On arriving at the Sporades, Brennus found the bridges broken, and a strong advanced post of the Greeks on the opposite bank. He waited therefore till night, and then sent a body of men down the river, to cross it where it spreads itself over some marshy ground and becomes fordable. On the Gauls gaining the right bank, the advanced post of the Greeks fell back upon Thermopylae. Brennus repaired the bridges and crossed the river, and advanced hastily by Naucratis towards the pass. At daybreak the fight began. But the ill-armed and undisciplined Gauls rushed in upon the Grecian phalanx, and after repeated attacks of incredible fury they were forced to retire with great loss. Brennus then despatched 49,000 of his men across the mountains of Thessaly into Aetolia, which they ravaged with horrible barbarity. This had the intended effect of detaching the Aetolians from the allied army at Thermopylae, and about the same time some Heracleots betrayed the pass over the mountains by which, two hundred years before, the Persians had descended on the rear of the devoted Spartans. The Gaul followed the same path. But the Greeks this time, though again surrounded, escaped; for the Athenian fleet carried them safely away before the Gauls attacked them. (Paus. x. 22.)

Brennus, without waiting for those whom he had left on the other side of the pass, pushed on to the plunder of Delphi. Justin says the barbarians laughed at the notion of devotion to the gods (xxiv. 6): “The gods were so rich themselves that they could afford to be receivers instead of receivers”; and as he approached the sacred hill, he pointed out the statues, and chariots, and other offerings, which were conspicuous around the temple, and which he promised as the golden prizes of the victory. (Justin. xxiv. 8.)

The Delphians had collected about 4000 men on the rock,—a small number to oppose the host of Brennus. But they were strongly posted, and the advantage of the ground, and their own steady conduct, manfully saved the temple without the supernatural help of Apollo, which is given to them by the Greek and Roman historians. As the Gauls rushed on from below, the Greeks pried their darts, and rolled down broken rocks from the cliff upon them. A violent storm and intense cold (for it was winter) increased the confusion of the assailants. They nevertheless pressed on, till Brennus fainted from his wounds, and was carried out of the fight. They then fled. The Greeks, exasperated by their barbarities, hung on their retreat, through a difficult and mountainous country, and beyond were prevented from escaping to their companions, whom they found left behind at Thermopylae. (Paus. x. 22.) Brennus was still alive, and might have recovered from his wounds, but according to Pausanias he would not survive his defeat, and put an end to his life with large draughts of strong wine—a more probable account than that of Justin (xxiv. 8), who says that being unable to bear the pain of his wounds, he stabbed himself. [A. G.]

BREUNT (Bréntos), a son of Hercules, who was regarded as the founder of the town of Brestesium or Brundusium, on the Adriatic. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bréntos.)

BRIARUS. [ASYMABON.]

BRETTUS (Bréttos), a son of Hercules, from whom the Tyrrhenian town of Brettus and the country of Brettia derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. a.)

BRIENNUS, JOANNEs, a Greek scholiast on the Basilica, of uncertain date and history. (Basilica, vol. iii. p. 186, Fabr.)

BRIETES, a painter, the father of Panasus of Sicyon. (Plin. H. N. xxxv., 11. 40.) [W. I.]

BRIGANTICUS, JULIUS, was born among the Batavi, and was the son of the sister of Civilis, who hated and was in turn hated by his nephew. Brigantius commanded a squadron of cavalry, with which he first revolted to Caeция, the general of Vitellius, and afterwards to Vespasian, in A. D. 70. He served under Cerialis in Germany against his uncle Civilis, and fell in battle in this war, a. D. 71. (Tac. Hist. ii. 23, iv. 70, v. 21.)

BRIMO (Brímos), the angry or the lightning, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Hecate or Persophone (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 861, 1211; Tzetza. ad Lyoph. 117), Demeter (Arnob. v. p. 170), and Cybele. (Theodoret. Theor. i. 699.) The Scholiast on Apollonius (i. 40) gives a second derivation of Brimo from Bróhos, so that it would refer to the cracking of the fire, as Hecate was conceived bearing a torch. [L. S.]

BRINNO, a German of noble birth, was chosen leader of his people, the Caminates, in their attack upon the Romans in A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 15.)

BRISAEUS (Bríras), a surname of Dionysus, derived from mount Brisa in Lesbos (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bélera), or from a nymph Brisa, who was said to have brought up the god. (Schol. ad Pers. Sot. i. 76.)

BRISÉIS (Bríri), a patronymic from Brisaeus, and the name of Hippodameim, the daughter of Achilles, and upon whom the quarrel arose between Achilles and Agamemnon. (Hom. Il. i. 184, &c.; Achilles.)

BRISÉUS (Bríro), the father of Brisæus, was a son of Ardys and king of the Leleges at Pedasus, or a priest at Lyonesus. (Hom. H. i. 593, ii. 689.)

Brisæus is said to have hanged himself when he lost his daughter. (Dict. Celt. ii. 17.) [L. S.]
BRITANNICUS.

Briso, M. ANTIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 137, opposed the tabellaria lex of his colleague L. Cassius Longinus, but was induced by Scipio Africanus the Younger to withdraw his opposition. (Cic. Brut. 25.)

BRITANNICUS, son of Claudius and Messalina, appears to have been born in the early part of the year A.D. 42, during the second consulsip of his father, and was originally named Claudius Tiberius Germanicus. In consequence of victories, or pretended victories, in Britain, the senate bestowed on the emperor the title of Britannicus, which was shared by the infant prince and retained by him during the remainder of his life as his proper and distinguishing appellation. He was cherished as the heir apparent to the throne until the disgraceful termination of his mother's scandalous career (A.D. 48); but Claudius, soon after his marriage with the ambitious and unscrupulous Agrippina, was prevailed upon by her wiles and the intrigues of the freedman Pallais, her paramour, to adopt L. Domitius, her son by a former husband, to grant him Octavia, sister of Britannicus, in marriage, and to give him precedence over his own offspring. This preference was publicly manifested the year following (51), for young Nero was prematurely invested with the manly gown, and received various marks of favour, while Britannicus still wore the simple dress of a boy. Indications of jealousy were upon this occasion openly displayed by Britannicus towards his adopted brother, and Agrippina seized upon his conduct as a pretext for removing by banishment or death the most worthy of his preceptors, and substituting creatures of her own in their place. Claudius is said before his death to have given tokens of remorse for his conduct, and to have hastened his own fate by instantly dropping some expressions which seemed to denote a change of purpose. After the accession of Nero, Britannicus perhaps might have been permitted to live on in harmless insignificance, had he not been employed as an instrument by Agrippina for working upon the fears of her rebellious son. For, when she found her wishes and commands alike disregarded, she threatened to bring the claims of the lawful heir before the soldiery and publicly to assert his rights. Nero, alarmed by these menaces, resolved at once to remove a rival who might prove so dangerous: poison was procured from Locusta—the same apparently whose infancy has been immortalized by Juvenal—and administered, but without success. A second dose of more potent efficacy was mixed with a draught of wine, and presented at a banquet, where, in accordance with the usage of those times, the children of the imperial family, together with other noble youths, were seated at a more fragal board apart from the other guests. Scarcely had the cup touched the lips of the ill-fated prince, when he fell back speechless and breathless. While some fled, and others remaining gazing in dismay at the horrid spectacle, Nero calmly ordered him to be removed, remarking that he had from infancy been subject to fits, and would soon revive. The obsequies were hurried over the same night; historians concur in reporting, that a terrible storm burst forth as the funeral procession moved through the forum towards Campus Martius and Dion adds, that the rain, descending in torrents, washed away from the face of the murdered boy the white paint with which it had been smeared, and revealed to the gaze of the populace the features swollen and blackened by the force of the deadly poison.

There is some doubt and confusion with regard to the date of the birth of Britannicus. The statement of Suetonius (Clau. 27), that he was born in the second consulsip of Claudius and on the twentieth day of his reign, is inconsistent with itself; for Claudius became emperor on the 24th of January, A.D. 41, and did not enter upon his second consulsip until the 1st of January, A.D. 42. Tacitus also has committed a blunder upon the point, for he tells us, in one place (Ann. xiii. 25), that Britannicus was two years younger than Nero; and we learn from another (Ann. xiii. 13), that he was murdered at the beginning of A.D. 55, a few days before he had completed his fourteenth year. But we can prove, from Tacitus himself (Ann. xiii. 56, xiii. 5), that Nero was born A.D. 37, and from Suetonius that the event took place upon the 15th of December; therefore, according to this last assertion, Britannicus must have been born in the year 39 or at the beginning of 40 at latest; but this would bring him to the completion of his fifteenth year in 55. If Britannicus was born on the twelfth day after his father's accession, then he would be on the eve of completing his fourteenth year in January, 55; if he was born in the second consulsip of Claudius, and this seems to be the opinion of Dion Cassius (I. 12), he was only about to enter upon his fourteenth year. Under the first supposition, he was somewhat more than three years younger than Nero; under the second, somewhat more than four. (Tact. Ann. xi. 4, 26, 32, xii. 2, 25, 41, xiii. 15, 16; Suet. Claud. 27, 43; Nero. 6, 7, 33; Dion Cass. Ix. 12, 22, 34, Ixi. 7.)

W. R.

COIN OF BRITANNICUS.

BRITOMARTIS, a leader of the Senonian Gauls, who induced his countrymen to murder the Roman ambassadors who had been sent to complain of the assistance which the Senones had rendered to the Britons who had been in civil war with Rome. The corpse of the Roman ambassadors were mangled with every possible indignity; and as soon as the Roman consul, P. Cornelius Dolabella, heard of this outrage, he marched straight into the country of the Senones, which he reduced to a desert, and murdered all the males, with the exception of Britomarhis, whose death he reserved for his triumph. (Appian, Sarm. v. 1, 2, p. 55, ed. Schwy., Gall. xi. p. 83; comp. Polyb. ii. 19; Liv. Epit. 12.)

BRITOMARTIS (Bporta/pris), appears to have originally been a Cretan divinity of hunters and fishermen. Her name is usually derived from θηρίον, sweet or blessing, and απερί, α, μπρεπερ, a maid, so that the name would mean the sweet or blessing maidens. (Paus. iii. 14. § 2; Solin. 11.) After the introduction of the worship of Artemis into Crete, Britomartis, between whom and Artemis there were several points of resemblance, was placed in some relation to her: Artemis, who loved her, assumed her name and was worshiped under it, and in the end the two divinities became completely identified, as we see from the story which makes Britomartis a daughter of Leto. (Callim. Hyg. in Dion. 189, with the Schol.; Paus. ii. 30. § 8; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 1402; Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 126; Aristoph. Ran. 1383; Virg. Aen. 305.) The myths of Britomartis is given by some of the authorities just referred to. She was a daughter of Zeus and Carne, the daughter of Euathlus. She was a nymph, took great delight in wandering about hunting, and was beloved by Artemis. Minos, who likewise loved her, pursued her for nine months, but she fled from him and at last threw herself into the nets which had been set by fishermen, or leaped from mount Dictytnaeum into the sea, where she became entangled in the nets, but was saved by Artemis, who now made her a goddess. She was worshiped not only in Crete, but appeared to the inhabitants of Aegina, and was there called Aphaea, whereas in Crete she received the surname Dictymna or Dictyna (from δικτυνα, a net; comp. Diod. v. 76). According to another tradition, Britomartis was fond of solitude, and had vowed to live in perpetual maidenhood. From Phoenix (for this tradition calls her mother Carne, a daughter of Phoenix) she went to Argos, to the daughters of Brasius, and thence to Cephalenia, where she received divine honours from the inhabitants under the name of Lephrin. From Cephalenia she came to Crete, where she was pursued by Minos; but she fled to the sea-coast, where fishermen concealed her under their nets, whence she derived the surname Dictyna. A sailor, Andromede, carried her from Crete to Aegina, and when, on landing there, he made an attempt upon her chastity, she fled from his vessel into a grove, and disappeared in the sanctuary of Artemis. The Aegianians now built a sanctuary to her, and worshiped her as a goddess. (Anton. Lib. 40.) These wanderings of Britomartis unquestionably indicate the gradual diffusion of her worship in the various maritime places of Greece mentioned in the legend. Her connexion and ultimate identification with Artemis had naturally a modifying influence upon the notions entertained of each of them. As Britomartis had to do with fishermen and sailors, and was the protectress of harbours and navigation generally, this feature was transferred to Artemis also, as we see especially in the Arcadian Artemis; and the temples of the two divinities, therefore, stood usually on the banks of rivers or on the sea-coast. As, on the other hand, Artemis was considered as the goddess of the moon, Britomartis likewise appears in this light: her disappearance in the sea, and her identification with the Aegianian Aphaea, who was undoubtedly a goddess of the moon, seem to contain sufficient proof of this, which is confirmed by the fact, that on some coins of the Roman empire Dictyna appears with the crescent. Lastly, Britomartis was like Artemis drawn into the mystic worship of Hecate, and even identified with her. (Eurip. Hippol. 141, with the Schol.; comp. Muller, August. p. 163, &c.; Höck, Kreut., ii. p. 158, &c.; Diet. of Ant. s. v. Δικτυνα.)

BRIZO (βρίζος), a prophetic goddess of the island of Delos, who sent dreams and revealed their meaning to man. Her name is connected with βρίζων, to fall asleep. The women of Delos offered sacrifices to her in vessels of the shape of boats, and the sacrifices consisted of various things: but fishes were never offered to her. Prayers were addressed to her that she might grant everything that was good, but especially, that she might protect ships. (Athen. viii. p. 335; Bustadh, ad Hom. p. 1720; Hesych. s. v. Βρίζων.)

BROCHUS, a Roman cognomen, was originally applied to a person who had teeth standing out. It was the name of a family of the Furius gens, and occurs on coins. In the one annexed, the obverse is III VIR Brocchus with the head of Ceres, and the reverse L. Fvri Cn. F. with a sella curulis and fases on each side of it. This Brocchus is not mentioned by ancient writers: he may have been a trimmivir of the mint or for the purchase of corn. Pighius assigns the surname of Brocchus to several persons of the Furius gens: but the only Brochi of this gens mentioned by ancient writers, as far as we are aware, are:

1. T. (Furius) Brocchus, the uncle of Q. Ligarius. (Cic. pro Leg. 4.)
2. CN. Furius Brocchus, detected in adultery, and grievously punished. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)

BROCHUS, C. ANNÆUS, or ANNÆUS, a Roman senator, who was plundered by Symmachus, one of the Venerii, a new class of publicani instituted by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 40.)

BROCHUS, ARMENTIUS, a proseconul in the time of Domitian. (Plin. Ep. x. 71.)

BROCTIARUS, a Gallo-Grecian, a son-in-law of king Deiotarus. He was an unworthy and nefarious person, who has become known only through the fact, that P. Clodius, in his tribunship, c. 58, sold him, by a lex tribunicia, for a large sum of money, the office of high priest of the Magna Mater at Pessinus, and the title of king. (Cic. pro Sest. 26, de Harusp. Resp. 13, comp. ad Q. Frat. ii. 9.)

BROME or BROMIE, one of the nymphs who brought up Dionysus on mount Nysa. (Hygin. Fab. 182; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 15.)

BROMIUS (βρωμιος), a surname of Dionysus, which some explain by saying, that he was born during a storm of thunder and lightning (Didym. iv. 5; Dion Chrys. Or. 27); others derive it from the nymph Brome, or from the noise of the Bacchantic processions, whence the verb βρομαεις, to rage like a Bacchant (Orv. Met. iv. 11; Orph. Lyc. xviii. 77.) There is also a mythical personage of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

BRONTES. (Cyclop.)

BRONTYNUS (βροντυνος), of Metapontum, a Pythagorean philosopher, to whom, as well as to Leon and Bathyllus, Alcmaeon dedicated his works. According to some accounts, Brontynus married Thenea, the daughter of Pythagoras. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 83; Suidas, s. v. Θενεα; Iamb. Vital. Phys. § 267.) Iamblichus (Vill. Anec. Gr. vol. ii. p. 198) quotes a work of Brontynus.

BROTEAS (βρότεας). 1. A son of Vulcan and Minerva, who burnt himself that he might not be tainted with his ugliness. (Ov. Íbis, 517.)

2. One of the singers at the marriage of Phineus. (Ov. Met. v. 106.)

3. A Lapith, who was slain at the marriage of Pirithous. (Ov. Met. xii. 290.)

4. The father of Tantalus, who had been married to Clytmnestra before Agamemnon. The common account, however, is, that Thypedes was the father of this Tantalus. (Paus. ii. 22. § 4.)

5. A son of Tantalus, who, according to a tradition of the Magnesians, had made the most ancient statue of the mother of the gods on the rock of Coddinos. (Paus. iii. 22. § 4.) [L. S.]

BRUNITCHIUS (Bouoçhιος), a chronographer of uncertain date, referred to by Joannes Malala (vol. i. p. 259), the title of whose work was Εἰκατερία Bouoçhιοι Ρωμαίου χρονογράφου. [L. S.]

BRUSUS (Bouoös), a son of Emathius, from whom Brusis, a portion of Macedon, was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bouoös.) [L. S.]

BRUTIUS NIGER. [Niger.]

BRUTIUS (Boues), an historian and chronographer, is called by the writer of the Alexandrian chronicle (p. 90), who quotes some things from him respecting Damius and Persesus, διοικήτων τοῦτο τοῦ Περσεούς, as preserved in the Chronicle of Eusebius; and Scaliger, in his notes upon this passage (p. 305), has conjectured, that he may be the same as the Brutius Proseconus whose daughter, Brutia Crispina, married L. Aurelius Commodus, the son of M. Aurelius; but this is quite uncertain. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 409, ed.-Westerman.)

BRUTTIA/NUS LUSTRICUS. [Lustricus.]

BRUTTIUS, 1. A Roman knight, for whom Cicero wrote a letter of introduction to M. Acilius Gallio, proconsul in Sicily in B.C. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 38.)

2. A philologist, with whom M. Cicero, the son of the orator, studied at Athens, in B.C. 44. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 21.)

BRUTTIUS SURA. [Sura.]

BRUTTULUS PAPIUS, a man of noble rank and great power among the Samnites, who persuaded his countrymen to undertake a second war against the Romans; but the Samnites, after their disasters in B.C. 322, became anxious for peace, and resolved to deliver up Bruttilus to the Romans. His corpse, however, was all that they could give their enemies; for Bruttilus put an end to his own life, to avoid persisting by the hands of the Romans. (Liv. vii. 39.)

BRUTUS, the name of a plebeian family of the Junius genus, which traced its descent from the first consul, L. Junius Brutus. (Comp. Cic. Phil. i. 6, Brut. 4.) It was denied by many of the ancients that this family could be descended from the first consul, first, because the latter was a patrician, and secondly, because his race became extinct at his death, as he had only two sons, who were executed by his own orders. (Dionys. v. 18, comp. vi. 79; Dion. Cass. xiv. 12; Plat. Brut. 1.) Posidonius, indeed, asserted that there was a third son, who was a child when his brothers were put to death, and that the plebeian family was descended from him; and he even pretended to discover a likeness in many of the Brutii to the statute of the first consul. (Plut. c. c.) But this tale about a third son is such an evident invention, to answer an objection that had been started by those who espoused the other side of the question, that it deserves no credence; and nothing was more natural than that the family should claim descent from an illustrious ancestor, especially after the murder of Caesare, when M. Brutus was represented as the liberator of his country from tyranny, like his name-sake of old. It is, however, by no means impossible, that the family may have been descended from the first consul, even if we take for granted that he was a patrician, as we know that patricians sometimes passed over to the plebeians; while this descent becomes still more probable, if we accept Niebuhr's conjecture (Rom. Hist. i. p. 522, &c.), that the first consul was a plebeian, and that the consulship was, at its first institution, shared between the two orders.

The surname of Brutus is said to have been given to L. Junius, because he pretended idiocy in order to save himself from the last Tarquin, and the word is accordingly supposed to signify an "idiot." (Liv. i. 56; Dionys. iv. 67, who translates it Πλατύνος; Nonius, p. 77.) Festus, however, in a passage (s. v. Brutum) which is pointed out by Arnold (Rom. Hist. i. p. 104), tells us, that Brutus, in old Latin, was synonymous with Grusus; which, as Arnold remarks, would show a connexion with ἄπορος. The word may, therefore, as a surname, have been originally much the same as Severus. This conjecture we think more probable than that of Niebuhr, who supposes it to mean a "runaway slave," and connects it with the Bretii, "revolted slaves," whence the Brutii are supposed to have derived their name (Suid. v. p. 225; Diol. xvi. 18; Gell. x. 8); he further observes, that this name might easily have been applied by the Tarquins to Brutus as a term of reproach. (Rom. Hist. i. pp. 63, 98, 515.)

1. L. JUNIUS BRUTUS, was elected consul in B.C. 509, according to the chronology of the Fasti, upon the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome. His story, the greater part of which belongs to poetry, ran as follows: The sister of king Tarquin the Proud, married M. Brutus, a man of great wealth, who died leaving two sons under age. Of these the elder was killed by Tarquin, who coveted their possessions; the younger escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy, whence he received the surname of Brutus. After a while, Tarquin became alarmed by the prophecy of a serpent crawling from the altar in the royal palace, and accordingly sent his two sons, Titus and Aruns, to consult the oracle at Delphi. They took with them their cousin Brutus, who propitiated the priests with the gift of a golden stick enclosed in a hollow staff. After executing the king's commission, the youths asked the priests who was to reign at Rome after Tarquin, and the reply was, "He who first kisses his mother." Thereupon the sons of Tarquin agreed to draw lots, which of them should first kiss their mother upon arriving at Rome; but Brutus, who better understood the meaning of the oracle, stumbled upon the ground as they quitted the temple, and kissed the earth, mother of them all. Soon after followed the rape of Lavinia; and Brutus accompanied the unfortunate father to Rome, when his daughter sent for him to the camp at Ardea. Brutus was present at her death, and the moment had now come.
for avenging his own and his country's wrongs. In the capacity of Tribunus Celerum, which office he then held, and which bore the same relation to the royal power as that of the Magister Equitum did to the dictatorship, he summoned the people, obtained the banishment of the Tarquins, and was elected consul with L. Tarquinius Collatinus in the comitia centuriata. Resolved to maintain the freedom of the infant republic, he loved his country better than his children, and accordingly put to death his two sons, when they were detected in a conspiracy with several other of the young Roman nobles, for the purpose of restoring the Tarquins. He moreover compelled his colleague, L. Tarquinius Collatinus, to resign his consulship and leave the city, that none of the hated family might remain in Rome. And when the people of Veii and Tarquinii attempted to bring Tarquin back by force of arms, Brutus marched against them, and, fighting with Aruns, the son of Tarquin, he and Aruns both fell, pierced by each other's spears. The murrons mourned for Brutus a year, and a bronze statue was erected to him on the capitol, with a drawn sword in his hand. (Liv. i. 56—60, ii. 1—7; Dionys. iv. 67—83, v. 1—18; Macrobr. ii. 16; Dion. Cass. xiii. 45; Plut. Brut. 1.)

The contradictions and chronological impossibilities in this account have been pointed out by Niebuhr. (p. 511.) Thus, for instance, the last Tarquin is said to have reigned only twenty-five years, and yet Brutus is represented as a child at the beginning of his reign, and the father of young men at the close of it. Again, the tale of his idocy is irreconcilable with his holding the responsible office of Tribunus Celerum. That he did hold this office seems to be an historical fact (Pompon. de Orig. Juris, Dig. 1. tit. 2. n. 2. 15); and the story of his idocy probably arose from his surname, which may, however, as we have seen, have had a very different meaning originally.

2. T. Junius Brutus, and

3. T. Junius Brutus, the sons of the first consul and of Vetulius (Liv. ii. 4), were executed by their father's orders, as related above. (Dionys. v. 6—8; Liv. ii. 4, 5.)

4. L. Junius Brutus, one of the leaders of the plebeians in their secession to the Sacred Mount, n. c. 494, is represented by Dionysius as a plebeian, who took the surname of Brutus, that his name might be exactly the same as the first consul. He was, according to the same authority, chosen one of the first tribunes of the plebs in this year, and also plebeian aedile in the year that Coriolanus was brought to trial. (Dionys. vi. 70, &c. 87—89, vii. 14, 26.) This Brutus is not mentioned by any ancient writer except Dionysius, and Plutarch (Coriol. 7) who copies from him. The old reading in Asconius (in Coriol. p. 76, ed. Orelli) made L. Junius C. F. Paternecus one of the first tribunes; but Junius was an alteration made by Manutius, and Paternecus nowhere occurs as a cognomen of the Junia gens; the true reading is Albinus. [ALBINUS.] Niebuhr supposes (p. 617) that this L. Junius Brutus of Dionysius is an entirely fictitious person.

5. D. Junius Brutus Scævola, magister equitum to the dictator Q. Publius Philo, b.c. 339, and plebeian consul in 325 with the patrician L. Furius Camillus. He carried on war in his consulship against the Vестина, whom he conquered in battle, after a hard contest, and took two of their towns, Cutium and Cingilia. (Liv. viii. 12, 29; Dion. xviii. 2.)

6. D. Junius D. F. Brutus Scaeva, legate b. c. 293 in the army of the consul Sp. Carvilius Maximus, and consul in 292. (Liv. x. 43, 47.) In his consulship he conquered the Faliscans: Sp. Carvilius, the consul of the preceding year, served under him as legate by command of the senate. (Zonar. vii. 1.)

7. D. Junius Brutus, probably a son of the preceding, exhibited, in conjunction with his brother Marcus, the first gladiatorial combat at Rome in the Forum Boarium, at his father's funeral in n. c. 264. (Liv. Epit. 16; Val. Max. ii. 4, § 7.)

8. M. Junius Brutus, brother of the preceding. (Val. Max. l. c.)

9. M. Junius Brutus, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 195, endeavoured with his colleague P. Junius Brutus to prevent the repeal of the Oppia lex, which restrained the expenses of women. He was praetor in 191, and had the jurisdiction in the city, while his colleagues obtained the provinces. During his praetorship he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, on which occasion the Megalensian games were performed for the first time. (Dict. of Aut. n. a. Megalensia.) He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 189, to settle the terms of peace with Antiochus the Great. (Liv. xxxiv. 1; Val. Max. ix. 1, § 3; Liv. xxxv. 24, xxxvi. 2, 36, xxxvii. 55.) This M. Junius Brutus may be the same as No. 12, who was consul in 178.

10. P. Junius Brutus, probably the brother of the preceding, was his colleague in the tribunate, n. c. 195. He was curule aedile in 192, and praetor in 190; in the latter office he had the province of Etruria, where he remained as procurator in the following year, 189. From thence he was sent by the senate into Further Spain, which was decreed to him as a province. (Liv. xxxiv. 1; Val. Max. ix. 1, § 3; Liv. xxxv. 41, xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 50, 57.)

11. D. Junius Brutus, one of the tribunes for founding a colony in the territory of Sipontum, n. c. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 35.)

The annexed stemma exhibits the probable family connexion of the following persons, Nos. 12 to 17 inclusive.

14. M. Junius Brutus, the accuser. cos. n. c. 77.

17. D. Junius Brutus Albinus, one of Caesar's assassins.

12. M. Junius M. F. L. N. Brutus, the son of No. 9, unless he is the same person, was consul b. c. 178, and had the conduct of the war against the Istri, whom he subdued in the following year, and compelled them to submit to the Romans. (Liv. xl. 59, xli. 9, 14, 15; Orosius 62.) He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 171, to exhort the allies to assist the Romans in their war against Persia. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship in 169. (Liv. xlii. 48, xliii. 10.)
BRUTUS

13. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS, an eminent Roman jurist, who, judging from his phenomena and the time in which he is said to have lived, was probably a son of Junius Brutus the Elder, by the marriage of P. Mucius and Manilius, as one of the three founders of civil law; and it may be inferred from Pomponius, that though he was practor, he never attained the rank of consul. The passage of Pomponius, according to the reading which has been suggested, is as follows: —Post hos fuerunt P. Mucius et Manilius et Brutus [vulg. Brutus et Manilius], qui fundaverunt jus civile. Ecce his P. Mucius etiam deum Bellum veligiam, septem Manilius, Brutus tres [vulg. Brutus septem, Manilius tres]. Ilii duo consulares fuerunt, Brutus praetorius, P. Antonius Mucius et Pontius Macrinius. The transposition of the names Brutus and Manilius makes the clause Ilii duo consulares fuerunt, Brutus praetorius, consistent with the former part of the sentence. It also makes the testimony of Pomponius consistent with that of Cicero, who reports, on the authority of Scaevola, that Brutus left no more than three genuine books de iure civile. (De Orat. ii. 55.) That more, however, was attributed to Brutus than he really wrote may be inferred from the particularity of Cicero's statement. Brutus is frequently referred to as a high authority on points of law in ancient classical and legal authors (e. g. compare Cic. de Fin. i. 4, and Dig. 7. tit. 1. s. 68, pr.; again, compare Cic. ad Fam. vii. 22, and Gel. xvii. 7). In the books of Brutus are contained some of the responsa which he gave to clients, and he and Cato are censured by Cicero for publishing the actual names of the persons, male and female, who consulted them. In these there were anything in a name. (De Orat. ii. 83.) From the fragments we possess (de Orat. ii. 55), Brutus certainly appears to enter into unlawyer-like details, giving us the very names of the villains where he happened to be. Whether Servius Sulpicius commented upon Brutus is a much disputed question. Ulpian (Dig. 14. tit. 3. s. 5. § 1) cites Servius libro primo ad Brutum, and Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44) asserts that Servius dux libros ad Brutum pergam brevisissimae ad Edictum subscriptos veligerit. It is commonly supposed that Servius, instead of commenting on the work of the juriconcilius, dedicated his short notes on the Edict to M. Junius Brutus, the assassin of Julius Caesar, or else to the father of the so-called tyrannicide. (Zimmerm., R. R. G. § 75; Majomius, vol. i. pp. 127—140.)

14. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS, a son of the preceding, studied law like his father, but, instead of seeking magistracies of distinction, became so notorious for the vehemence and harshness of his proceedings, that he was named Accursator. (Cic. de Off. ii. 14.) He did not spare the highest rank, for among the objects of his attack was M. Aemilius Scaurus. (Cic. pro Font. 13.) He was a warm and impassioned orator, though his oratory was not in good taste. It should be remarked that all we know of the son is derived from the unfavourable representations of Cicero, who belonged to the opposite political party. Brutus, the father, was a man of considerable wealth, possessing bathes and three country seats, which were all sold to support the extravagance of the son. Brutus, the son, in the accusation of Cn. Plancius, made some charges of inconsistency against L. Licinius Crassus, the orator; and Cicero twice (de Orat. ii. 55, pro Scaevola) relates the bone mota (scire dicta) of Crassus, reiterating upon the extravagance of the accuser.

15. D. JUNIUS M. F. M. N. BRUTUS GALLAECUS (CALLAECUS) of CALLAECUS, son of No. 12 and brother of No. 13, was a contemporary of the Gracchi, and one of the most celebrated generals of his age. He belonged to the aristocratical party, and in his consulsiphan with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, in b. c. 136, distinguished himself by his opposition to the tribunes. He refused to bring before the senate a proposition for the purchase of corn for the people; and when the tribunes wished to have the power of exempting ten persons apiece from the military levies, he and his colleague refused to allow them this privilege. In consequence of this they were committed to prison by the tribune C. Caturianus. (Val. Max. iii. 7, § 3; Liv. Epit. 55; Cic. de Leg. iii. 9.) The province of Further Spain was assigned to Brutus, whither he proceeded in the same year. In order to pacify the province, he assigned lands to those who had served under Viriathus, and founded the town of Valenta. But as Lusitania continued to be over-run with parties of marauders, he laid waste the country in every direction, took numerous towns, and advanced as far as the river Lethe or Obilio, as the Romans translated the name of the river, which was also called Limsa, Limia or Belon, now Linn, (Strab. iii. p. 153; Meis, ii. 1; Plin. H. N. iv. 22. s. 53.) Here the soldiers at first refused to march further; but when Brutus seized the standard from the enemy, and began to cross the river, they immediately followed him. From thence they advanced to the Minius (Minho), which he crossed and continued his march till he arrived at the ocean, where the Romans saw with astonishment the sun set in its waters. In this country he subdued various tribes, among whom the Brecari are mentioned as the most warlike. He also conquered the Gallaeci, who had come to the assistance of their neighbours with an army of 60,000 men, and it was from his victory over them that he obtained the surname of Gallaecus. The work of subjugation, however, proceeded but slowly, as many towns after submission again revolted, among which Talabriga is particularly mentioned. In the midst of his successes, he was recalled into Neerther Spain by his relations, Aemilius Lepidus (Appian, Hisp. 30), and from thence he proceeded to Rome, where he celebrated a splendid triumph, b. c. 136, for his victories over the Lusitanians and Gallaeci. Drusmann (Gesch. Roms, vol. iv. p. 8), miracle apparently by a passage in Eutropius (iv. 19), places his triumph in the same year as that of Scipio's over Numantia, namely, in b. c. 132. (Liv. Epit. 55, 56; Appian, Hisp. 71—73; Flor. ii. 17. § 12; Oros. v. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 5; Cic. pro Balb. 17; Plut. Quo. Rom. 34, Th. Gracch. 21; Val. Max. vi. 4, extem. 1.)

With the booty obtained in Spain, Brutus erected temples and other public buildings, for which he paid L. Licinius with the inscription in verse. (Cic. pro c. 11, 11; Plin. xxxvi. iv. 5, § 7; Val. Max. viii. 14. § 2.) The last time we hear of Brutus is in b. c. 129, when he served under C. Sempronius Tuditanus against the Japydes, and by his military skill gained a victory for the consuls, and thereby repaired the losses which the latter had sustained at the commencement of the campaign. (Liv. Epit. 59.)

Brutus was a patron of the poet L. Accius, and for the times was well versed in Greek and Roman literature; he could not deficient the oratorical talent. ( Cic. Brut. 28.) We are cited from Cicero (de Am. 2.), that he was an orator. The Clodia mentioned by Cicero in a letter to Atticus (xii. 22), whom Orelli supposes to be the mother of this Brutus, was in all probability his wife, and the mother of the consul of n. c. 77. [No. 16.] (Dru mann, l. c.)

16. D. Junius D. P. M. N. BRUTUS, son of the preceding, distinguished himself by his opposition to Saturninus in b. c. 100. (Cic. pro Rubir. perd. 7.) He belonged to the aristocratical party, and is alluded to as one of the aristocrats in the oration which Sallust puts into the mouth of Lapidius against Sulla. (Sall. Hist. i. p. 937. ed. Appian.) He was consul in b. c. 77, with Murencius Lepidus (Brutus, 2), and as he had secured the safety for P. Junius before Verres, the praetor urbanus. (Cic. Verr. i. 55, 57.) He was well acquainted with Greek and Roman literature. (Cic. Brut. l. c.) His wife Sempronia was a well-educated, but licentious woman, who carried on an intrigue with Catiline; she received the ambassadors of the Allobroges in his husband’s house in 63, when he was absent from Rome. (Sall. Ov. 40.) We have no doubt that the preceding D. Brutus is the person meant in this passage of Sallust, and not D. Brutus Albinus, one of Caesar’s assassins [No. 17], as some modern writers suppose, since the latter is called an adolescent by Caesar (B. G. iii. 11) in 56, and therefore not likely to have had Sempronia as his wife in 53; and because we know that Paulina Valeria was to marry Brutus Albinus in 50. (Caes. ad Fam. viii. 7.)

17. D. Junius BRUTUS ALBINUS, one of Caesar’s assassins, who must not be confounded with the more celebrated M. Junius Brutus, was in all probability the son of No. 16 and of Sempronia, as we know that they had children (Sall. Cat. 26), and the persons are the same. This D. Brutus was adopted by A. Postumius Albinus, who was consul b. c. 99 [Albinus, No. 22], whence he is called Brutus Albinus; and this adoption is commemorated on a coin of D. Brutus figured on p. 93. (Plut. Cæs. 61, &c., Ant. 11; Dion Cass. xiv. 14.) We first read of him as serving under Caesar in Gaul when he was still a young man. Caesar gave him the command of the fleet which was sent to attack the Veneti in b. c. 56. (Caes. B. G. iii. 11; Dion Cass. xxxix. 40—42.) He seems to have continued in Gaul till almost the close of the war, but his name does not occur frequently, as he did not hold the rank of legatus. He served against Vercingetorix in 52 (Caes. B. G. vii. 9), and appears to have returned to Rome in 50, when he married Paulina Valeria. (Caes. ad Fam. viii. 7.) On the breaking out of the civil war in the following year (49), he was recalled to active service, and was placed by Caesar over the fleet which was to besiege Massilia. D. Brutus, though inferior in the number of his ships, gained a victory over the enemy, and at length obtained possession of the city. (Plut. C. B. 22; Dion Cass. xii. 19—22.) After this, he had the command of Further Gaul entrusted to him where he gained a victory over the Bellocavi; and so highly was he esteemed by Caesar, that on his return from Spain through Italy, in 43, Caesar conferred upon him the honour of riding in his carriage along with Antony and his nephew, the young Octavius. (Plut. Ant. 11.) Caesar gave him most signal favours in his favour by promising him the government of Cisalpine Gaul, with the praetorship for 44 and the consulship for 42. In Caesar’s will, read after his death, it was found that D. Brutus had been made one of his heirs in the second degree; and so entirely did he possess the confidence of Caesar, that the other murderers sent him to conduct their victim to the senate-house on the day of the assassination. The motives which induced D. Brutus to take part in the conspiracy against his friend and benefactor are not stated; but he could have no excuse for his crime; and among the instances of base ingratitude shown on the ides of March, none was so foul and black as that of D. Brutus. (Liv. Epit. 114, 116; Dion Cass. xiv. 14, 18, 55; Appian, B. C. 43, 113, 124, 137; Suet. Cass. 81, 83; Vell. Pat. ii. 56.)

After Caesar’s death (44), D. Brutus went into his province of Cisalpine Gaul, and when Antony obtained from the people a grant of this province, Brutus refused to surrender it to him. This conduct was warmly praised by Cicero and the senatorial party; but so little was he prepared to resist Antony, that when the latter crossed the Rubicon towards the close of the year, D. Brutus dared not meet him in the field, but threw himself into Mutina, which was forthwith besieged by Antony. In this town he continued till April in the following year (43), when the siege was raised by the consul Hirtius and Pansa, who were accompanied by Octavius. Antony was defeated, and fled across the Alps; and as Hirtius and Pansa had fallen in the battle, the command devolved upon D. Brutus, since the senate was unwilling to entrust Octavius with any further power. He was not, however, in a condition to follow up his victory against Antony, who meantime had collected a large army north of the Alps, and was preparing to march again into Italy. Octavius also had obtained the consulship, notwithstanding the ill-will of the senate, and had procured the enactment of the lex Pedida, by which the murderers of Caesar were outlawed, and the execution of the sentence entrusted to himself. D. Brutus was now in a dangerous position. Antony was marching against him from the north, Octavius from the south; his own troops could not be depended upon, and L. Plancus had already deserted him and gone over to Antony with three legions. He therefore determined to cross over to M. Brutus in Macedonia; but his soldiers deserted him on the march, and he was betrayed by Camillus, a Gaulish chief, upon whom he had formerly conferred some favours, and put to death, by order of Antony, by one Capenus, a Sequan, n. c. 43. (Cicero’s Letters and Philippics; Liv. Epit. 117—120; Dion Cass. xiv. 9, 14, xvi. 85, &c., 85; Appian, B. C. iii. 74, 81, 97, 98; Vell. Pat. ii. 64.)

18. M. Junius BRUTUS, praetor in b. c. 88, was sent with his colleague Servinius by the senate, at the request of Marius, to command Sulla, who was in Greece, to advance nearer Rome. (Plut. Sull. 2.) On Sulla’s arrival in Rome, Brutus was prescribed with ten other senators. (Appian, B. C. i. 60.) He subsequently served under Ca. Papirius Carbo, the consul, a. c. 82, and was sent by him in a fishing-boat to Lilybaeum; but finding himself surrendered by Pompey's fleet, he put an end to his own life, that he might not fall into the hands of his enemies. (Liv. Epit. 59.)
BRUTUS.

Cicero, in a letter to Atticus (ix. 14), mentions a report, that Caesar intended to revenge the death of M. Brutus and Carbo, and of all those who had been put to death by Sulla with the assistance of Pompey. This M. Junius Brutus is not to be confounded, as he often is, with L. Junius Brutus Damascippus, praetor in 82 [No. 19], whose surname we know from Livy (Epit. 86) to have been Lucius; nor with M. Junius Brutus [No. 20], the father of the so-called tyrannicide.

19. L. Junius Brutus Damascippus, an active and unprincipled partizan of Marius. The younger Marius, reduced to despair by the blockade of Praeneste (n. c. 82), came to the resolution that his greatest enemies should not survive him. Accordingly he managed to despatch a letter to L.
Brutos, who was then praetor urbs in Rome, desiring him to make the attempt in the name of false pretext, and to procure the assassination of
P. Antistius, of C. Papirius Carbo, L. Domitius, and Scaevola, the pontifex maximus. The cruel and treacherous order was too well obeyed, and the dead bodies of the murdered senators were thrown unburied into the Tiber. (Appian, B. C.
i. 88; Vell. Pat. ii. 26.)

In the same year L. Brutus made an ineffectual attempt to relieve Praeneste: the consul of Cn.
Papirius Carbo, despairing of success, fled to Africa;
but L. Brutus, with others of his party, advanced towards Rome, and were defeated by Sulla. L.
Brutus was taken prisoner in the battle, and was sent to death by Sulla. (Appian, B. C. ii. 92, 93; Sull. Cit. 51; Dion Cass. Frag. 193, p. 54, ed.
Reimar.)

Some confusion has arisen from the circumstance that the subject of this article is sometimes spoken of with the cognomen Damascippus, and sometimes with that of Brutus. (Duker, ad Flor. iii. 21.
p. 685.) He appears now as L. Damascippus, and now as Junius Brutus. Perhaps he was adopted by one of the Licinis, for the cognomen Damascippus belonged to the Licinian gens (Cic. ad Fam. vii.
23); and an adoptive name, in reference to the original name, was often alternative, not cumulative. The same person may have been L. Junius Brutus and L. Licinius Damascippus.

20. M. Junius Brutus, the father of the so-called tyrannicide [No. 21] is described by Cicero as well skilled in public and private law; but he will not allow him to be numbered in the rank of orators. (Cic. Brut. 36.) He was tribune n. c. 83
(Cic. pro Quinct. 29); and the M. Brutus who is spoken of with some asperity by Cicero for having made an impious attempt to colonize Capua (de Leg. Agr. ii. 23, 24, 36), in opposition to omen and auspice, and who is said, like all who shared in that enterprise, to have perished miserably, is supposed by Ernst (Clav. Cic.) after Maximus 217) to have been the pater interfectoris. He no doubt made this attempt in his tribunate.

M. Brutus married Servilia, who was the daughter of Q. Servilius and of Livia, the sister of dru-sus, and thus was half-sister of Cato of Utica by the mother's side. Another Servilia, her sister, was the wife of Lucullus. The Q. Servilius Caepio, who afterwards adopted her son, was her brother.
She traced her descent from Servilius Ahala, the assassin of Sp. Maelius. (Plut. Brut. 1.) This asserted descent explains the proum ester in the masculine gender in a passage of Cicero's Orator
(c. 45), which was addressed to the younger Brutus:
"Quomodo enim ester axilla ala factus est, nisi fuga liteme vastiora." It is in reference to this descent that we find the head of Servilius Ahala on the coins of the so-called tyrannicide: one is figured on p. 88. Servilia was a woman of great ability, and had much influence with Cato, who became the father-in-law of her son.

Brutus, besides his well-known son, had two dughters by Servilia, one of whom was married with M. Lepidus, the triumvir (Vell. Pat. ii. 88; compare Cic. ad Fam. xii. 2), and the other to C.
Casina. The name, other than Junia, of the former, is not known. Asconius, in his commentary on the speech pro Milone, mentions Cornelis, cajis castulis pro exemplo habita est, as the wife of Lepi-dus; but perhaps Lepidus was married twice, and her name is not known, nor has she been one of the family-name Cornelis. The wife of Casina was named Teritia, or, by way of endearment, Tertulla.
Some have supposed, without reason, that Brutus had but one daughter, Tertia Junia, who was married successively to Lepidus and Cassius; and Lipsius (cited Orelli, Onomast. Cie. s. v. Tertia) erroneously (see ad Att. xiv. 20) makes Tertia the daughter of Servilia by her second husband.

There is much reason to suspect that Servilia intrigued with Caesar (Plut. Brut. 5), who is said to have believed his assassin to have been his own son; but this cannot have been, for Caesar was only fifteen years older than the younger Brutus.
Scandal went so far as to assert, that Tertia, like her mother, was one of Caesar's mistresses; and Suetonius (Cass. 30) has preserved a double exten-sio of Cicero in allusion to Servilia's supposed compliance at her daughter's shame. This anecdote refers to a time subsequent to the death of the elder Brutus. The death of Tertia, A. D. 22, when she must have been very old, is recorded by Tacitus
(Ann. iii. 76), who states that the images of twenty of the noblest families grace her funeral; "sed peplulcebat Cassiis atque Brutus, eo ipso, quod effigies eorum non visebantur."

The knowledge of these family connexions gives additional interest to the history of the times. The though the reputed dishonour of his wife did not prevent the father from actively espousing the political party to which Caesar belonged, yet it is possible, but not very probable, that the rumour of Cassius's amours with a mother and a sister may afterwards have deepened the hostility of the son.

When Lepidus, B. C. 77, endeavoured to succeed to the leadership which had become vacant by the death of Sulla, Brutus was placed in command of the forces in Cisalpine Gaul; and, at Mutina, he for some time withheld the attack of Pompey's hitherto victorious army; but, at length, either finding himself in danger of being betrayed, or voluntarily determining to change sides, he put himself and his troops in the power of Pompey, on the understanding that their lives should be spared, and, sending a few horsemen before him, retired to the small town of Rhegium near the Eades. There, on the next day, he was slain by one Geniius, who was sent by Pompey for that purpose. Pomphey (who had forwarded despatches on successive days to the senate to announce first the surrender and then the death of Brutus) was much and justly blamed for this cruel and pernicious act. (Plut. Pomp. 16; Appian, B. C. II. 111; Liv. Epit. 90.)

21. M. Junius Brutus, the son of No. 20, by Servilia, was born in the autumn of B. C. 85. He was subsequently adopted by his uncle Q. Servilus Caepio, which must have happened before B. C. 59, and hence he is sometimes called Caepio or Q. Caepio Brutus, especially in public documents, on coins, and inscriptions. (On the coin annexed the inscription on the reverse is CAEPIO BRUTUS PROCO.) He lost his father at the early age of eight years, but his mother, Servilia, assisted by her two brothers, continued to conduct his education with the utmost care, and he acquired an extraordinary love for learning, which he never lost in after-life. M. Porcius Cato became his great political model, though in his moral conduct he did not follow his example. In 59, when J. Caesar was consul and had to silence some young and vehement republicans, L. Vettius on the instigation of the tribune, P. Vatinius, denounced Brutus as an accomplice in a conspiracy against Pompey's life; but as it was well known that Brutus was perfectly innocent, Caesar put a stop to the prosecution. When it was thought necessary in 58 to remove from Rome some of the leading republicans, Cato was sent to Cyprus, and Brutus accompanied him. After his return to Rome, Brutus seems for some years to have taken no part in public proceedings, and not to have attached himself to any party. In 53 he followed Appius Claudius, whose daughter Claudia he had married, to Cilicia, where he did not indeed, like his father-in-law, plunder the provincials, but could not resist the temptation to lend out money at an exorbitant rate of interest. He probably did not return to Rome till 51. During his absence Cicero had defended Milo, and Brutus also now wrote a speech, in which he endeavoured to show that Milo not only deserved no punishment, but ought to be rewarded for having murdered Clodius. This circumstance, together with Cicero's becoming the successor of Appius Claudius in Cilicia, brought about a sort of connexion between Cicero and Brutus, though each disliked the sentiments of the other. Cicero, when in Cilicia, took care that the money which Brutus had lent was remitted, but at the same time endeavoured to prevent his transgressing the laws of usury, at which Brutus, who did not receive as high a per centage as he had expected, appears to have been greatly offended. In 50 Brutus defended Appius Claudius, against whom two serious charges were brought, and succeeded in getting him acquitted. When the civil war broke out in 49 between Caesar and Pompey, it was believed that Brutus would join the party of Caesar; but Brutus, who saw in Pompey the champion of the aristocracy, suppressed his personal feelings towards the murder of his father, and followed the example of Cato, who declared for Pompey. Brutus, however, did not accompany Cato, but went with P. Scipio to Cilicia, probably to arrange matters with his debtors in Asia, and to make preparations for the war. In 48, he distinguished himself in the engagements in the neighbourhood of Dyrhachium, and Pompey treated him with great distinction. In the battle of Pharsalia, Caesar gave orders to kill Brutus, probably for the sake of Servilia, who implored Caesar to spare him. (Plut. Brut. 5.) After the battle, Brutus escaped to Larissa, but did not follow Pompey any further. Here he wrote a letter to Caesar soliciting his pardon, which was generously granted by the conqueror, who even invited Brutus to come to him. Brutus obeyed, and, if we may believe Plutarch (Brut. 6), he informed Caesar of Pompey's flight to Egypt. As Caesar did not require Brutus to fight against his former friends, he withdrew from the war, and spent his time either in Greece or at Rome in his favourite literary pursuits. He did not join Caesar again till the autumn of 47 at Nicaea in Bithynia, on which occasion he endeavoured to interfere with the conqueror on behalf of a friend of King Deiotarus, but Caesar refused to comply with the request. In the year following Brutus was made governor of Cisalpine Gaul, though he had been neither praetor nor consul; and he continued to serve the dictator Caesar, although the latter was making war against Brutus's own relatives in Africa. The provincials in Cisalpine Gaul were delighted with the mild treatment and justice of Brutus, whom they honoured with his monuments: Caesar also testified his satisfaction with his administration. As his province was far from the scene of war, Brutus as usual devoted his time to study. At this time, Cicero made him one of the speakers in the treatise which bears the name of Brutus, and in 46 he dedicated to him his Orator. In 45, Brutus was succeeded in his province by C. Vibius Pansa, but did not go to Rome immediately. Before his return, he published his eulogy on Cato, in which Cicero found sentiments that hurt his vanity, as his suppression of the conspiracy of Catiline was not spoken of in the terms he would have liked. Accordingly, upon the arrival of Brutus at one of his country-seats near Rome, a certain degree of coldness and want of confidence existed between the two, although they wrote letters to each other, and Cicero advised Atticus, even dedicated to him his work De Legibus. About this time, Brutus divorced Claudia, apparently for no other reason than that he wished to marry Portia, the daughter of Cato. After the close of Caesar's war in Spain, Brutus went from Rome to meet him, and, in the beginning of August, returned to the city with him. In 44 Brutus was praetor urbanus, and C. Cassius, who had been disappointed in his hope of obtaining the praetorship, was as much enraged against Brutus as against the dictator. Caesar promised Brutus the province of Macedonia, and also held out to him hopes of the consulship. Up to this time Brutus had borne Caesar's dictatorship without expressing the least displeasure; he had served the dictator and paid homage to him, nor had he thought it contumelious in his principles to accept favours and offices from him. His change of mind which took place at this time was not the result of his reflections or principles, but of the influence which Cassius exercised over him. He was persuaded by Cassius to join the conspirators who murdered Caesar on the 15th of March, 44. After the deed was perpetrated he went to the forum to address the people, but found no favour. The senate, indeed, pardoned the murderers, but this was only a farce played by M. Antony to obtain their sanction of the Julian laws. The murderers then assembled the people on the Capitol, and Brutus in his speech promised that they should receive all that Caesar had destined for them. All parties were apparently reconciled. But the arrangements which Antony made for the funeral of Caesar, and in consequence of which the people made an assault upon the houses of the conspirators, showed them clearly the intentions of Antony. Brutus withdrew into the country, and during his stay there he gave, in the month of July, most splendid Ludi Apollinares, hoping thereby to turn the disposition of the people in his favour. But in this he was disappointed, and as Antony assumed a threatening position, he sailed in September to Athens with the intention of taking possession of the province of Macedonia, which Caesar had assigned him, and of repelling force by force. After staying at Athens a short time in the company of philosophers and several young Romans who attached themselves to his cause, and after receiving a very large sum of money from the quasestor M. Appuleius, who brought it from Asia, Brutus intended to proceed to Macedonia. But the senate had now assigned this province to Antony, who, however, towards the end of the year, transferred it to his brother, the praetor C. Antonius. Before, however, the latter arrived, Brutus, who had been joined by the scattered troops of Pompey, marched into Macedonia, where he was received by Q. Hortensius, the son of the orator, as his legitimate successor. Brutus found an abundance of arms, and the troops stationed in Illyricum, as well as several other legions, joined him. C. Antonius, who also arrived in the meantime, was unable to advance beyond the coast of Illyricum, and at the beginning of 43 was besieged in Apollonia and compelled to surrender. Brutus disregarded all the decrees of the senate, and resolved to act for himself. While Octavianus in the month of August 43 obtained the condemnation of Caesar's murderers, Brutus was engaged in a war against some Thracian tribes to procure money for himself and booty for his soldiers. About this time he assumed the title imperator, which, together with his portrait, appear on many of his coins. The things which were going on meantime under his own eyes in Rome and in his own home at Cassius, but after the triumvirate was established, Brutus began to prepare for war. Instead, however, of endeavouring to prevent the enemy from landing on the coast of the Ianian sea, Brutus and Cassius separated their forces and ravaged Rhodes and Lycaon. Loaded with booty, Brutus and Cassius met again at Sardis in the beginning of 42, but it was only the fear of the triumvirs that prevented them from falling out with each other. Their carelessness was indeed so great, that only a small fleet was sent to the Ianian sea under the command of Stadius Mürchus. Before leaving Asia, Brutus had a dream which foreboded his death at Philippi, and in the autumn of 42 the battle of Philippi was fought. In the first engagement Brutus conquered the army of Octavianus, while Cassius was defeated by Antony. But in a second battle, about twenty days later, Brutus was defeated and fell upon his own sword.

From his first visit to Asia, Brutus appears as a man of considerable wealth, and he afterwards increased it by lending money upon interest. He possessed an extraordinary memory and a still more extraordinary imagination, which led him into superstitions differing only from those of the multitude by a strange admixture of philosophy. He was deficient in knowledge of mankind and the world, whence he was never able to foresee the course of things, and was ever surprised at the results. Hence also his want of independent judgment. The quantity of his varied knowledge, which he had acquired by extensive reading and his intercourse with philosophers, was beyond his control, and was rather an encumbrance to him than anything else. Nothing had such charms for him as study, which he prosecuted by day and night, at home and abroad. He made abridgements of the historical works of C. Pannius and Caesius Antipater, and on the eve of the battle of Pharsalus he is said to have been engaged in making an abridgment of Polybius. He also wrote several philosophical treatises, among which we have mention of one On Duties, On Patience, and On Virtue. The best of his literary productions, however, appear to have been his orations, though they are censured as having been too dry and serious, and deficient in animation. Nothing would enable us so much to form a clear notion of his character as his letters, but we unfortunately possess only a few (among those of Cicero), the authenticity of which is acknowledged, and a few passages of others quoted by Plutarch. (Brut. 2, 22, Cat. 45.) Even in the time of Plutarch (Brut. 55) there seem to have existed forged letters of Brutus; and the two books of "Epistola ad Brutum," usually printed among the works of Cicero, are unquestionably the fabrications of a later time. The name of Brutus, his fatal deed, his fortunes and personal character, offered great temptations for the forgery of such documents; but these letters contain gross blunders in history and chronology, to which attention was first drawn by Erasmus of Rotterdam. (Epist. 1.) Brutus is also said to have attempted to write poetry, which does not seem to have possessed much merit. (Cicero, in the passages collected in Orelli's Oeconom. Taub. ii. pp. 219—224; Plut. Life of Brutus; Appian, B. C. ii. 11—iv. 132; Dion Cass. lib. xlii.—xlviii. Respecting his oratory and the extant fragments of it, see Mayor, Orat. Rom. Fragm. pp. 434, 435, 2nd edit. ; comp. Wehr, "Post. Vet. Rhetor. lib. 125; Drummond, loc. cit. pp. 15—44.)

BRYAXIS (Braxe), an Athenian statue in stone and metal, cast a bronze statue of Seleucus, king of Syria (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), and, together with Scopas, Timotheus, and Leochares, adorned the Mausoleum with bas-reliefs. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4.) He must have lived accordingly a. e. 372—312. (Silius, Catal. Art. s. v.) Besides the two works above mentioned, Bryaxis executed five colossal statues at Rhodes (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7. s. 18), an Asclepius (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), a Liber, father of Cacus (H. N. xxxvi. 5), and a statue of Phasiea. (Tatian, ad Graec. 54.) If we believe Clement of Alexandria (Protr. p. 30, c), Bryaxis attained so high a degree of perfection, that two statues of his were ascribed by some to Phidias.

[W. I.] 25
BRYENNUS, JOSEPHUS (Ιωσηφ Βρυέννος), a Greek priest and eloquent preacher, died between A.D. 1431 and 1438. He is the author of a great number of treatises on religious subjects, as well as of several letters to distinguished persons of his time respecting theological and ecclesiastical matters. His works were first published under the title "Ioäσηφ Μοναχὸς του Βρυεννοῦ τε εφεξής & τε επιμελη του Εὐγενῆ, Δαμασκὸν τῆς Βουγκραίας, ἐν τῷ πρῶτῳ τοῦ θεοῦ εκδήσει," three volumes, Ενω, Leipzig, 1769—1764. This edition contains only the Greek text. Eugenius, diaconus in Bulgaria, was in possession of a fine manuscript of the works of Bryennus. It is this author of a life of Bryennus contained in the preface to the Leipzig edition. The works of Bryennus were known and published in extracts long before the complete edition of them appeared. Leo Allatius refers to, and gives extracts from, several of his treatises, such as "Orationes II de Futuro Judicio et Septem Beritidum," in which the author maintains peculiar views respecting purgatory; "Oratio de Sancta Trinitate;" "Oratio de Transfiguratione Domini;" "Oratio de Domini Crucifixione;" &c. The style of Bryennus is remarkably pure for his time. (Leo Allat. De Libris et Rebus Eccles. Graec. p. 188, 141, 143, 397, &c., 311, 329—328, De Concensibus Utriusque Ecclesiae, pp. 529, 537, 863, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter. Appendix, p. 121; Fab. Bibt. Graec. xi. p. 659, &c.)

BRYENNUS, MA'NUEL (Μανουὴλ Βρυέννος), a Greek writer on music, is probably identical with one Manuel Bryennus, the contemporary of the emperor Andronicus I, who reigned from 1282 till 1328. Bryennus wrote Αρμονικα, or a commentary on the theory of music, which is divided into three books, in the first of which he frequently dwells upon the theory of Euclid, while in the second and third books he has chiefly in view that of Ptolemy the musician. The learned Meibomius intended to publish this work, and to add it to his "Antiquae Musicae Autors Septem," Amsterdam, 1652; but he was prevented from accomplishing his wished-for design by his death. His work, however, has the merit of having attracted the attention of John Wallis, who perused the Oxford MSS., he published it in 1680 together with the " Harmonica" of Ptolemy and some other ancient musicians; he also added a Latin translation. The " Harmonica" of both Bryennus and Ptolemy are contained in the third volume of Wallis's works, Oxford, 1699. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. pp. 648, 649; Labbe, Biblioth. Nov. MSS. p. 118.)

BRYENNUS, NICOPHORUS (Νικόφορος Βρυέννος), the accomplished husband of Anna Comnena, was born at Orestias in Macedonia in the middle of the eleventh century of the Christian era. He was the son, or more probably the nephew, of another Nicophorus Bryennus, who is renowned in Byzantine history as one of the first generals of his time, and who, having revoluted against the emperor Michael VII. Duca Parapinae, assumed the imperial title at Dyrsscham in 1071. Popular opinion was in favour of the usurper, but he had to contend with a third rival, Nicophorus Botanistes, who was supported by the aristocracy and clergy, and who succeeded in depositing Michael and in becoming recognized as emperor under the name of Nicophorus III. The contest then lay between Nicophorus Botanistes and Nicophorus Bryennus, against whom the former sent an army commanded by Alexis Comnenus, who afterwards became emperor. Bryennus was defeated and made prisoner by Alexis near Calabria in Thrace; he was treated by the victor with kindness; but Basil, the emperor's minister, ordered his eyes to be put out. His son, or nephew, the subject of this article, escaped the fate of his relative; and no sooner had Alexis Comnenus ascended the throne (1081), than the name of Bryennus became infamous as the emperor's most faithful friend.

Bryennus was not only distinguished by bodily beauty and military talents, but also by his learning, the affability of his manners, and the wisdom he shewed in the privy council of the emperor. During the first differences with the crusaders, he was one of the chief supports of the throne; and, in order to reward him for his eminent services, Alexis created for him the dignity of panhypersebastos—a title until then unknown in the code of Byzantine ceremonies, and which gave the bearer the rank of Caesar. But Bryennus is also called Caesar, and we must therefore suppose that this title was formally conferred upon him. The greatest mark of confidence, however, which Alexis bestowed upon him was the hand of his daughters, Anna Comnena, with whom Bryennus lived in happiness during forty years. Bryennus distinguished himself in the war between Alexis and Bohemond, prince of Antioch, and negotiated the peace of 1108 to the entire satisfaction of his sovereign.

Anna Comnena and the empress Irene tried to persuade the emperor to name Bryennus his successor; but Alexis would not deprive his son John of his natural rights. After the death of Alexis in 1118, and the accession of John, Anna and Bryennus conspired against the young emperor, but the conspiracy failed. [ANNA COMNENA.]

The cause of its failure was the refusal of Bryennus to act in the decisive moment, for which he was severely blamed by his haughty wife. They were punished with confiscation of their estates and banishment to Cencos, now Ulcinj, on the Black Sea, where they led a retired life during several years. Bryennus afterwards recovered the favour of the emperor. In 1137 he went to Cilicia and Syria with the intention of relieving the siege of Antioch by the crusaders; but ill health compelled him to return to Constantinople, where he died soon afterwards.

Bryennus is the author of a work entitled Υπεροπλασίας, which is a history of the reign of the em- perors Isaac I. Comnenus, Constantine XI. Duca, Romanus III. Diogenes, and Michael VII. Duca Parapinae; his intention was to write also the history of the following emperors, but death prevented him from carrying his design into execution. This work, which is divided into four books, is one of the most valuable of the Byzantine histories, and is distinguished by the clearness of the narrative. Its principal value arises from its author's eing not only a witness but also one of the chief Leaders in the events which he relates, and from his being accustomed to, and having the power of forming a judgment upon, important affairs. The edicto principes forms part of the Paris collection of the Byzantines, and was published by Pierre Pousinianat the end of Procopius, Paris, 1561, fol., with notes and a Latin translation. The editor, who dedicated the work to Christina, queen of Sweden, perused two MSS., one of Cujas, and the other of Parve de St.
BUBASTIS.

Joire. Du Cange has written excellent notes upon it, which form an appendix to his edition of Cinnamus, Paris, 1670, fol. Cousin (le président) translated it into French in his usual extravagant and inaccurate way, which induced Gibbon to say, "did he ever think?" A new and careful edition has been published by Meineke, together with Cinnamus ("Nicephori Bryennii Commentarii," Bonn, 1836, 8vo.), which forms part of the Bonn collection of the Byzantines. It contains the notes of Pierre Pous- sines and Du Cange, and the Latin translation of the former revised by the editor. (Anna Commens, Alex.: Cinnamus, i. 1-30; Fabre. Bibl. Grœc. vol. i. p. 64; Paus. ii. 4; Dionysius, de Byzant. Rer. Scæv. Corn., pp. 492—495.)

BRYSON (Βρυσών), mentioned by Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth., c. 32) as one of those youths whom Pythagoras instructed in his old age. He was perhaps the same writer that is mentioned in the extract from the Theopompos found in Athenaeus (xi. p. 508), where Plato is charged with having borrowed from Bryson, the Heraclæt, and others, a great deal that he introduced into his dialogues as his own. A saying of Bryson's is refuted by Aristot- les in his Rhet. iii. 2, 13. [A. G.]

BUBAÆUS (Βοῦβαϊος), the son of Megabazus, a Persian, was sent into Macedonia to make inquiries after the missing Persian envoy, whom Alexander, the son of Amyntas I, had caused to be murdered at his father's court, about b. c. 507. Alexander induced Bubæus to pass the matter over in silence, by giving him great presents and also his sister Gyanea in marriage. By this Gyneai Bubæus had a son, who was called Amyntas after his grandfather. (Herod. v. 21, vii. 136.)

In conjunction with Armathæus, Bubæus superintended the construction of the canal which Xerxes made across the isthmus of Athos. (Herod. vii. 22.)

BUBASTIS (Βοῦβαστις), an Egyptian divinity whom the Greeks used to identify with their own Artemis, and whose genealogy they explain accordingly. (Herod. ii. 127, 155; Steph. Byz., s. v. Βοῦβαστις.) She was the daughter of Osiris and Isis. Though both Horus (Apollo) and Isis, entrusted Bubastis and Horus to Buto, to protect them from Typhon. In the town of Buto there was a temple of Bubastis and Horus, but the principal seat of the worship of Bubastis was in the town of Bubastus or Bubastis. Here her sanctuary was surrounded by two canals of the Nile, and it was distinguished for its beautiful situation as well as for the style of the building. (Herod. ii. 127, 138.) An annual festival was celebrated to the goddess here, which was attended by immense crowds of people (Herodotus, ii. 60, estimates their number at 700,000), and was spent in great merriment. But the particulars, as well as the object of the solemnity, are not known, though the worship of Bubastis continued to a very late time. (Ov. Met. iv. 587; Gnidius, De Venat. 42.) The animal sacred to Bubastis was the cat; and according to Stephanus of Byzantium, the name Bubastis itself signified a cat. When cats died they were carefully embalmed and conveyed to Bubastis. (Herod. ii. 67.) The goddess herself was represented in the form of a cat, or of a female with the head of a cat, and some specimens of such representations, though not many, are still extant. This is explained in the legend of Bubastis by the story, that when the gods fled from Typhon, Bubastis (Artemis, Diana) concealed herself by assuming the appearance of a cat. (Ov. Met. v. 329; Anton. Lib. 28.) But it seems more natural to suppose here, as in other instances of Egyptian religion, that the worship of Bubastis was originally the worship of the cat itself, which was subsequently refined into a mere symbol of the goddess. The fact that the ancients identify Bubastis with Artemis or Diana is to us a point of great difficulty, since the information which we possess respecting the Egyptian goddess presents little or no resemblance between the two divinities. The only point that might seem to account for the identification, is, that Bubastis, like Artemis, was regarded by the ancients as the protector of those small animals, and also was believed by the ancients to stand in some relation to the moon, for Plutarch (De Is. et Os. 63) says, that the cat was the symbol of the moon on account of her different colours, her busy ways at night, and her giving birth to 28 young ones during the course of her life, which is exactly the number of the phases of the moon. (Comp. Phot. Bibl., p. 348, a., ed. Bekker; Demetrius. Phal. Πενταρεμνἀ, § 153, ed. Oxford.) It might, therefore, seem that Bubastis, being the daughter of Osiris (the sun) and Isis (the moon), was considered as the symbol of the new moon. But the interpretation given by Plutarch cannot be regarded as decisive, as the idea of the passage (De Is. et Os. 74) he gives a different account of the symbolic meaning of the cat. Another point in which some think that Bubastis and Artemis coincide, is the identity of the two with Eileithyia. But although Artemis and Eileithyia may have been the same, it does not follow that Bubastis and Eileithyia were likewise identical, and originally they must have been different, as the mode of worship of the latter was incompatible with the religion of the Egyptians. (Manetho, ap. Plut. De Is. et Os. 73; Herod. ii. 45;Macrobr. i. 7.) We must, therefore, be content with knowing the simple fact, that the Greeks identified the Egyptian Bubastis with their own Artemis, and that in later times, when the attributes of these were mixed up, it was in some ways, the features peculiar to Eileithyia were transferred to Bubastis (Antol. Grœc. xii. 81) and Isis. (Ov. Amor. ii. 13.) Josephus (Ant. Jud. xiii. 3. § 2) mentions Bubastis with the surname dyra, or the rustic, who had a temple near Leontopolis in the nomes of Heliopolis, which had fallen into decay as early as the reign of Ptolemy Philometer. (Comp. Jahnoffsky Patith. Amy. iii. 3; Pignorius, Expos. Tab. Isiacæ, p. 66, ed. Amstelod.) [L. S.]

BUBONIA. The Romans had two divinities whom they believed to be the protectors of stables, viz. Bubocia and Eponus, the former being the protector of oxen and cows, and the latter of horses. Small figures of these divinities were placed in niches made in the wall (vexillaria), or in the pillar supporting the roof; sometimes also, they were only painted over the manger. (Augustin. De Civ. Dei, iv. 34; Tertull. Apol. 16; Minuc. Fel. Oct. 28; Apul. Met. p. 60; Juven. viii. 157.) [L. S.]

BUBULCUS, the name of a family of the Jumia gens. (Plin. H. N. xviii. 37; comp. Pint. Poplic. 11.) There are only two persons of this family mentioned, both of whom bear the name of Brutus also; of these, one is called in the Fasti Capitolini Bubulus Brutus, and the other Brutus Bubulus: they may therefore have belonged to the Brutii, and not to a distinct family of the Jumia gens. 2 i. 2 had on his approach to Rome from Nola, in b. c. 88. (Plut. Sulp. 9.) On the obverse is the head of Venus, with L. Bvca; on the reverse a man sleeping, to whom Diana appears with Victory. (Eckhel, v. p. 121.)

2. L. AEMILIUS BUCA, the son, supplicated the judges on behalf of M. Scarrus at his trial in b. c. 54. (Ascon. l. c.) The following coin is supposed to refer to him, on the obverse of which is the head of Caesar, with PERPETVO CAESAR, and on the reverse Venus seated holding a small statue of Victory, with the inscription L. Bvca. There are several other coins belonging to this Buca, on some of which we find the inscription, L. AEMILIUS BUCA VIVIT, from which it would appear that he was a tricinium of the mint. (Eckhel, vii. pp. 8, 9.)

M. BUCCHILEUS, a Roman, not unversed in legal studies, although, in the treatise De Oratore (l. 59), Cicero puts into the mouth of L. Crassus a master sarcastic sketch of his character. Bucchileus is there described by Crassus as sibi predictas pecudae, nove iustice stultus, et suo valde sapiens. An anecdote is then given of his want of legal caution. Upon the conveyance of a house to L. Fufus, he covenanted that the lights should remain in the state in which they then were. Accordingly Fufus, whenever any building however distant was raised, which could be seen from the house, commenced an action against Bucchileus for a breach of agreement. (J. T. G.)

BUCILLANUS, one of Caesar's assassins, b. c. 44 (Cic. ad Att. xxv. 17, vii. 4), is called Bucillanus by Appian (B. C. ii. 113, 117), from whom we learn that he had been one of Caesar's friends.

BUCCOLON (Boukolos), a son of Lacedemon and the nymph Calybe, who had several sons by Abarbarus. (Hom. Il. vi. 21, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12. § 3; Abarbarus.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 1; Paus. viii. 5. § 3.)

BUCOLUS (Boukolos), two mythical personages, one a son of Hæmelus, and the other of Hippocoon. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6, iii. 10. § 6.) [L.S.]

BUDERIA (Bdeeria). 1. [AThen.] A Boeotian woman, the wife of Clymenus and mother of Egeus, from whom the town of Budeion derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1076.) From the Scholast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 185), it appears that she was the same as Bazyge. Others derived the name of the town of Budeion from an Argive hero, Budeios. (Eustath. l. c.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Bodeia.) [L. S.]

BULARCHUS, a very old painter of Asia Minor, whose picture representing the defeat of the Magnesians (Magnesium proeliem, Plin. H. N. xxxv. 34; Magnesium euidem, ib. vii. 39) is said to have been paid by Candaces, king of Lydia, with so much gold as was required to cover the whole of its large surface. This is either a mistake of Pliny, who calls Candaces died in b. c. 716, and the only destruction of Magnesia that is known of took place after b. c. 676 (see Heyne, Art. Tempor. Olym. v. p. 349); or, what is more probable, BUPALUS.

The whole story is fictitious, as Welcker has shown. (Archiv für Philol. 1839, Nos. 9 and 10.) [W. L.]

BULBUS, a Roman senator and an unprincipled man, was one of the judges at the trial of Opianicus. Stephas, another of the judges at the trial, had a sum of money to secure the acquittal of Opianicus; but, although Bulbus had obtained a share of it, he and Staienus condemned Opianicus. Bulbus was afterwards condemned on a charge of treason (megetos) for attempting to corrupt a legion in Illyricum. (Cic. pro Cluent. 26, 35, e. Vern. ii. 32.)

BULBUs, C. A'TI'Llus, was consul in B.C. 245, a second time in 235, and censor in 234. In his second consulship, in which he had T. Manlius Torquatus for a colleague, the temple of Junus was closed for the first time after the reign of Numa. (Fast. Capitol.; Cat. tout. ii. 3; Oros. iv. 12; Plat. Num. 20; comp. Liv. i. 24.)

BULBUs, C. Nor'BANUS. [NorBANUS.]

BULUS (Boslaus) and Sperthias (Baerphi's), two Spartans of noble rank, voluntarily offered to go to Xerxes and offer themselves to punishment, when the hero Taltythibus was enraged against the Spartans on account of their having murdered the heralds whom Darius had sent to Sparta; but, upon their arrival at Susa, they were dismissed unjubred by the king. Their names are written somewhat differently by different authors. (Herod. vi. 154, &c.; Plut. Appol. Luc. 60, p. 235, f.; Plut. Rom. ii. 3; 6, 813, e.; Lucian, Dem. Bso. 32; Suidas, s. v.; Stobaeus, Scrm. vii. p. 93.) There was a mournful song upon this Sperthias or Sperchius, as he is called by Theocritus, which seems to have been composed when he and his companion fled to Sparta. (Suidas, s. v., Suff. 98.)

BULON (Boile), the founder of the town of Bulis in Phocis. (Paus. x. 37. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Boile.) [L. S.]

BUNEA (Bouvaix), a surname of Her, derived from Bunu, the son of Hermes and Alaida-mena, who is said to have built a sanctuary to Hera on the road which led up to Acrocorinthus. (Paus. ii. 4. § 7, 3. § 8.) [L. S.]

BUPALUS, an architect and sculptor of the island of Chios, where his family is said to have exercised the art of statuary from the beginning of the Olympiads. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 5; comp. Thiersch, Ephor. Ann. p. 58.) Bupalus and his brother Athenis are said by Pliny (l.c.) and Stilbes (s. v. *Irbalov) to have made caricatures of the famous illibamgous poet Hippax, which the poet re- quited by the bitterest satires. (Welcker, Hipp. fragm. p. 12.) This story, which we have no grounds for doubting, gives at once a very certain date for the age of the two artists, for Hippax was a contemporary of Dareios (B. c. 524—485); and it also accounts for their abilities, which for their time must have been uncommon. This is proved moreover by the fact, that Augustus adorned most of his temples at Rome with their works. It is to be noticed that marble was their material. In the earlier period of Greek art wood and bronze was the common material, until by the exertions of Dipoons and Scyllis, and the two Cilian brothers, Bupalus and Athenis, marble became more general. Welcker (Rhein. Museen, iv. p. 254) has pointed out the great importance which Bupalus and his brother acquired by forming entire groups of statues, which before that time had been wrought as isolated figures. The father of Bupalus and ATHENIS, likewise a celebrated artist, is generally called Athenius, which being very differently spelt in the different MSS., has been rejected by Welcker (Cat. art. Athenis), who proposes to read Archemius. The reading Athenius for the son’s name instead of Athenis has long been generally given up. [W. I.]

BUPHIAGUS (Boi'phiagos). 1. A son of Iapetus and Thornax, an Arcadian hero and husband of Promne. He received the wounded Iphicles, the brother of Hercules, into his house, and took care of him until he died. Buphagus was afterwards killed by Artemis for having pursued her. (Paus. viii. 14. § 6; 27. § 11.)

2. A surname of Hercules, Lephyrus, and others, who were believed to have eaten a whole bull at once. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7, 9; 11; Aelian, V. H. i. 24; Strab. ad Hom. p. 1523.) [L. S.]

BURA (Boipa), a daughter of Ion, the ancestral hero of the Ionians, and Halic, from whom the Aeacian town of Burn derived its name. (Paus. vii. 25. § 5; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

BURACUS (Buraikos), a surname of Her- aules, derived from the Aeacian town of Burn, near which he had a statue on the river Burnicus, and an oule in a cave. Persons who consulted this oracle first said prayers before the statue, and then took four dice from a heap which was always kept ready, and threw them upon a table. These dice were marked with certain characters, the meaning of which was explained with the help of a painting which hung in the cave. (Paus. vii. 25. § 6.)

BURDO, JULIUS, commander of the fleet in Germany, A. D. 70, was obstinately to the soldiers, because he was thought that he had had a hand in the death of Fontius Capito; but he was protected by Vitellius from the vengeance of the soldiers. (Tac. Hist. i. 58.)

BURICHUS (Bophiygos), one of the command- ers of Demetrius Poliorcetes in the sea-fight off Cyprus, A. C. 306, was one of the flatterers of the king, to whom the Athenians erected an altar and a hermon. (Diod. xx. 53; Athen. vii. p. 233, a.)

BURRINUS, praetor urbanius about A. C. 82. (Cic. pro Qint. 6, 21.)

BURRUS or BURRUS, APRANLIUS, a distinguished Roman general under Claudius and Nero, who was appointed by Claudius sole praefectus praetorio, A. D. 52, upon the recommendation of Agrippina, the wife of the emperor, as she hoped to obtain more influence over the praetorian cohorts by one man being their praefect instead of two, especially as Burrus was made to feel that he owed his elevation to her. Burrus and Seneca conducted the education of Nero, and although they were men of very different pursuits, yet they agreed in their endeavours to bring up the young prince in virtuous habits. When Claudius died in A. D. 55, Burrus accompanied Nero from the palace to the praetorians, who, at the command of their praefect, received Nero with loud acclamations. It appears, indeed, that Nero owed his elevation to the throne chiefly to the influence of Burrus. The executions which Agrippina ordered in the beginning of Nero’s reign were strenuously opposed by Burrus and Seneca. When Nero had given orders in A. D. 60 to put his mother Agrippina to death, and was informed that she had escaped with a slight wound, he consulted Burrus and Seneca; hoping that they would assist him in carrying his BUSA, an Apulian woman of noble birth and great wealth, who supplied with food, clothing, and provisions for their journey, the Roman soldiers who fled to Cannae after the battle of Cannae, n. c. 216. For this act of liberality thanks were afterwards returned her by the senate. (Liv. xxii. 52, 54; Val. Max. iv. 8, § 2.)

BUSIRIS (Busiris), according to Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5), a son of Aegyptus, who was killed by the Dyrbis Autagates; but according to Diodorus (i. 17), he was the governor whom Osiris, on setting out on his expedition through the world, appointed over the north eastern portion of Egypt, which bordered on the sea and Phoenicia. In another place (i. 45) he speaks of Busiris as an Egyptian king, who followed after the 52 successors of Menas, and states that Busiris was succeeded by eight kings, who descended from him, and the last of whom likewise bore the name of Busiris. This last Busiris is described as the founder of the city of Zeus, which the Greeks called Thesiesz. Apollodorus, too (ii. 5. § 11), mentions an Egyptian king Busiris, and calls him a son of Poseidon and Lyceanassa, the daughter of Hippasus. Concerning this Busiris the following remarkable story is told:—Egypt had been visited for nine years by uninterrupted scarcity, and at last there came a soothsayer from Cyprus of the name of Phraesus, who declared, that the scarcity would cease if the Egyptians would sacrifice a foreigner to Zeus every year. Busiris made the beginning with the prophet himself, and afterwards sacrificed all the foreigners that entered Egypt. Heracles on his arrival in Egypt was likewise seized and led to the altar, but he broke his chains and slew Busiris, together with his son Amphimenes or Iphimades, and his herald Chabales. (Apollod. l. c.; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 1396; comp. Herod. ii. 45; Gell. ii. 6; Macrobr. Sat. vi. 7; Hygin. Fab. 18.) This story gave rise to various disputes in later times, when a friendly intercourse between Greece and Egypt was established, both nations being anxious to do away with the stigma it attached to the Egyptians. Herodotus (i. c.) expressly denies that the Egyptians ever offered human sacrifices, and Isocrates (Bus. 12) endeavours to upset the story by shewing, that Heracles must have lived at a much later time than Busiris. Others again said, that it was a tale invented to show up the inhuman character of the inhabitants of the town of Busiris, and that there never was a king of that name. (Strab. xvii. p. 802.) Diodorus (i. 88) relates on the authority of the Egyptians themselves that Busiris was not the name of a king, but signified the tomb of Osiris, and that in ancient times the kings used to sacrifice at this grave men of red colour (the colour of Typhon), who were for the most part foreigners. Another story gives a Greek origin to the name Busiris, by saying that when Isis had collected the limbs of Osiris, who had been killed by Typhon, she put them together in a wooden cow (Boara), whereof the name of the town of Busiris was derived (Diod. i. 88), which contained the principal sanctuary of Isis. (Herod. ii. 58.) If we may judge from the analogy of other cases, the name of the town of Busiris was not derived from a king of that name; and indeed the dynasties of Melanthon do not mention a king Busiris, so that the whole story may be a mere invention of the Greeks, from which we can scarcely infer anything else than that, in ancient times, the Egyptians were hostile towards all foreigners, and in some cases sacrificed them. Modern scholars, such as Creuzer and G. Hermann, find a deeper meaning in the myth of Busiris than it can possibly suggest. (Eckhel, v. p. 237; &c.)

BUTAS (Buthros), a Greek poet of uncertain age, wrote in elegiac verse an account of early Roman history, from which Plutarch quotes the fabulous origin of the Lupercalia. He is supposed to have been called Afrus, like a work of Callimachus, because it gave the causes or origin of various fables, rites, and customs. (Plut. Rom. 31; Arnob. v. 18.)

BUTEFO, the name of a family of the patrician Fabia gens. This name, which signifies a kind of hawk, was originally given to a member of this gens, because the bird had on one occasion seated upon his ship with a favourable omen. (Plin. H.N. x. 8. s. 10.) We are not told which of the Fabii first obtained this surname, but it was probably one of the Fabii Ambusti. (Ammianus.)

1. N. Fabius M. P. M. N. Buto, consul n. c. 247, in the first Punic war, was employed in the siege of Drepanum. In 234 he was magister equitum to the dictator L. Caecilius Metellus. (Zonar. ii. 3; Fast. Capitol.)

2. M. Fabius M. P. M. N. Buto, brother apparently of the preceding, was consul n. c. 245. Florus says (ii. 2, §§ 30, 31), that he gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians and afterwards suffered shipwreck; but this is a mistake, as we know from Polybios, that the Romans had no fleet at that time. In 216 he was elected dictator.

without a master of the knights, in order to fill up the vacancies in the senate occasioned by the battle of Cannae: he added 177 new members to the senate, and then laid down his office. (Liv. xxxiii. 22, 23; Plut. Fab. Max. 9.) We learn from Livy, who calls him the oldest of the ex-consuls, that he had filled the latter office; and it is accordingly conjectured that he was the colleague of C. Aurelius Cotta in the censorship, B.C. 241. In the Fasti Capitolini the name of Cotta's colleague has disappeared.

3. Fabricius Butero, son of the preceding, was accused of theft, and killed in consequences by his own father. (Oros. iv. 13.) This event, from the order in which it is mentioned by Orosius, must have happened shortly before the second Punic war.

4. M. Fabricius Butero, curule aedile b.c. 203, and praetor 201, when he obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxx. 26, 40.)

5. Q. Fabricius Butero, praetor b. c. 196, obtained the province of Further Spain. (Liv. xxxiiii. 24, 26.)

6. Q. Fabricius Butero, praetor b. c. 181, obtained the province of Caisalpine Gaul, and had his command prolonged the following year. In 179 he was appointed one of the triumvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of the Pisani, and in 168 one of the quinquervi to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Iunenses respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Liv. xi. 16, 26, 49, xiv. 13.)

7. N. Fabricius Butero, praetor b. c. 178, obtained the province of Nearer Spain, but died at Massilia on his way to the province. (Liv. xlii. 32, xiii. 1, 4.)

8. (Q.) Fabricius Butero, son of the brother of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, the younger, must have been the son of Q. Fabricius, who was adopted by Q. Fabricius Maximus, the conqueror of Hannibal. Butero was elected quaestor in b. c. 134, and was entrusted by his uncle, Scipio, with the command of the 4000 volunteers who enlisted at Rome to serve under Scipio in the war against Numantia. (Val. Max. viii. 15. § 4; Appian, Hisp. 94.)

Butero, a rhetorician in the first century of the Christian era, is frequently mentioned by the elder Scaevola, who tells us, that he was a pupil of Pterius Latro, and a dry declaimer, but that he divided all his subjects well. (Contriv. 1, 6, 7, 13, 36.)

BUTES (Boëts). 1. A son of Boreas, a Thracian, was hostile towards his step-brother Lycurgus, and therefore compelled by his father to emigrate. He accordingly went with a band of colonists to the island of Strongyle, afterwards called Naxos. But as he and his companions had no women, they made predatory excursions, and also came to Thessaly, where they carried off the women who were just celebrating a festival of Dionysus. Butes himself took Corinna; but she invoked Dionysus, who struck Butes with madness, so that he threw himself into a well. (Diod. v. 50.)

2. A son of Telesias and Zeuxippe. Others call his father Pandion or Amycus. He is renowned, as an Athenian shepherd, ploughman, warrior, and an Argonaut. (Apollod. i. 9. §§ 16, 25, iii. 14. § 8, 15. § 1.) After the death of Pandion, he obtained the office of priest of Athena and the Ereccthean Poseidon. The Attic family of the Butaetae or Tethobutae derived their origin from him, and in the Erechtheum on the Acropolis there was an altar dedicated to Butes, and the walls were decorated with paintings representing scenes from the history of the family of the Butaetae. (Paus. i. 26. § 6; Harpocr. Etym. M., Hesych. s. v.; Orph. Arg. 138; Val. Flacc. i. 394; Hygin. Fab. 14.) The Argonaut Butes is also called a son of Poseidon (Eustath. ad Hom. xiii. 43); and it is said, that when the Argonauts passed by the Sirens, Orpheus commenced a song to counteract the influence of the Sirens, but that Butes alone leaped into the sea. Aphrodite, however, saved him, and carried him to Lilybaenum, where she became by him the mother of Eryx. (Apollod. i. 9. § 25; Serv. ad Aen. i. 574, v. 94.) Diodorus (iv. 88), on the other hand, regards this Butes as one of the native kings of Sicily.

There are at least four more mythical persons of this name, respecting whom nothing of interest can be said. (Ov. Met. vii. 590; Dion. v. 59; Virg. Aen. xi. 680, &c. ix. 646, &c.)

BUTO (Bóuó), an Egyptian divinity, whom the Greeks identified with their Leto, and who was worshipped principally in the town of Buto, which derived its name from her. Festivals were celebrated there in her honour, and there she had also an oracle which was in high esteem among the Egyptians. (Herod. ii. 59, 83, 111, 138, 152, 155; Aelian, V. H. ii. 41; Strab. xvii. p. 602.) According to Herodotus, she belonged to the eight great divinities; and in the myths of Osiris and Isis she acts the part of a nurse to their children, Horus and Dubasti. Isis entrusted the two children to her, and she saved them from the persecutions of Typhon by concealing them in the floating island of Chemnis, in a lake near the sanctuary at Buto, where afterwards Dubasti and Horus were worshipped, together with Buto. (Herod. ii. 156; Plut. de Is. et Os. 18, 38.) Stephanus of Byzantium appears (s. v. Ἐγγύσια ὁδός) to speak of an earlier worship of Buto (Leto) at Lolopolis near Memphis; but Letopolis was in later times known only by its name, and was destroyed long before the time of Cambyses. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. ii. 15. § 1.) As regards the nature and character of Buto, the ancients, in identifying her with Leto, transferred their notions of the latter to the former, and Buto was accordingly supposed to be the mother of the twin children who were worshipped at Lepcis Magna. (Plutarch. de Nat. Dar. 2; Plut. Ap. Eusebl. Præf. Liv. iii. 1.) This opinion seemed to be confirmed by the peculiar animal which was sacred to Buto, viz. the shrew-mouse (mæραλ) and the hawk. Herodotus (ii. 67) states, that both these animals were, after their death, carried to Buto; and, according to Antoninus Liberalis (29), Leto (Buto) changed herself into a shrew-mouse in order to escape the persecution of Typhon. About this mouse Plutarch (Sympos. iv. 5) relates, that it was believed to have received divine honours in Egypt because it was blind, and because darkness preceded light. This opinion of the ancients respecting the nature of Buto has been worked out with some modifications by modern writers on Egyptian mythology. (Jaholmsky, Panth. Arg. iii. 4. § 7; Champollion, Panth. Egypt., text to plate 25.)

BUTORIDES, one of the authors who wrote upon the pyramids of Egypt. From the order in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12. s. 17), it would appear that he must have lived after Alexander the Polyhistor and before Apion, that is, either in the first century before or the first century after Christ. [ARISTOGORAS.]

BUZYGE. [BUDAIA.]

BYBLIS (Βυβλίς), a daughter of Mileitus and Eidothea (others call her mother Tragasia or Areia), and sister of Cannus. The story about her is related in different ways. One tradition is, that Cannus loved his sister with more than brotherly affection, and as he could not get over this feeling, he quit his father's home and Mileitus, and settled in Lyceia. Byblis, deeply grieved at the flight of her brother, went out to seek him, and having wandered about for a long time, hung herself by means of her girdle. Out of her tears arose the well Byblis. (Parthen. Erot. 11; Conon, Nor- mat. 2.) According to another tradition, Byblis herself was seized with a hopeless passion for her brother, and as in her despair she was on the point of leaping from a rock into the sea, she was kept back by nymphs, who sent her into a profound sleep. In this sleep she was made an immortal Hamadryas; and the little stream which came down that rock was called by the neighbouring people the tears of Byblis. (Antonin. Lib. 30.)

A third tradition, which likewise represented Byblis in love with her brother, made her reveal to him her passion, whereupon Cannus fled to the country of the Lokyges, and Byblis hung herself. (Parthen. l.c.) Ovid (Met. ix. 446-466) in his description combines several features of the different legends; Byblis is in love with Cannus, and as her love grows from day to day, she escapes; but she follows him through Caris, Lyceia, &c., until at last she sinks down worn out; and as she is crying perpetually, she is changed into a well. The town of Byblus in Phoenicia is said to have derived its name from her. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

BYZAS (Βιζάς), a son of Poseidon and Ceréthia, the daughter of Zeus and Io. He was believed to be the founder of Byzantium. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Diod. iv. 49.) This transplantation of the legend of Io to Byzantium suggests the idea, that colonists from Argos settled there. The leader of the Megarians, who founded Byzantium in 2. 656, was likewise called Byzas. (Müller, Dor. i. 6. S. 4.) [L. S.]

C.

CAANTHUS (Κανθος), a son of Oceanus and brother of Melia. He was sent out by his father in search of his sister who had been carried off, and when he found that she was in the possession of Apollo, and that it was impossible to rescue her from his hands, he threw fire into the sacred grove of Apollo, called the Isemium. The god then killed Caanthus with an arrow. His tomb was shown by the Thobuna on the spot where he had been killed, near the river Isemium. (Paus. ix. 10, § 5.) [L. S.]

CABADIES. [SASSANTAE.]

CABARNUS (Καβάρνος), a mythical personage of the island of Paros, who revealed to Demeter the fact of her daughter having been carried off, and from whom the island of Paros was said to have been called Cabarnis. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Πάρος.)

From Hesychius (s. v. Καβάρνος) it would seem that, in Paros, Cabarnus was the name for any priest of Demeter. [L. S.]

CABAŚILAS, NEILUS (Νεῖλος Καβασίλας), archbishop of Thessalonica, lived according to some about A.D. 1314, and according to others somewhat later, about 1340, in the reign of the emperor Joannes Cantacuzenus. He was a bitter opponent of the doctrines of the Latin Church, whence he is severely censured by modern writers of that church, whereas Greek and even Protestant writers speak of him in terms of high praise. Cabasils is the author of several works, of which, however, two only have yet appeared in print. 1. An oration on the cause of the schism between the Latin and Greek churches (μεταξύ τῶν αἵτων τῆς εκκλησίας Βασιλείων), and 2. A small work on the primacy of the pope (Πατριαρχία Πάπας). The first edition of the latter treatise, with a Latin translation by Mathias Flacus, appeared at Frankfurt in 1555, in small 8vo. This was followed by the editions of B. Vulcanius, Lugd. Bat. 1595, 8vo. and of Salmasius, Hanover, 1608, 8vo. This last edition contains also a work of Barham, on the same subject, with notes by the editor, and also the first edition of the oration of Cabasils on the schism between the two churches, which Salmasius has printed as the second book of the work on the primacy of the pope. Of this latter work there is an English translation by Thomas Gresopp, London, 1560, 8vo. A list of the works of Neilus Cabasils which have not yet been printed is given by Fabri- cius. (Bibl. Græc. x. p. 30, &c.; comp. Wharton’s Appendix to Cave’s Hist. Lit. ii. p. 34, &c., vol. ii. p. 521, &c. ed. London.) [L. S.]

CABAŚILAS, NICOLAUS (Νικόλαος Καβασίλας), archbishop of Thessalonica, was the nephew and successor of Neilus Cabasils, with whom he has often been confounded. He lived about A.D. 1350. He first held a high office at the imperial court of Constantinople, and in that capacity he was sent in 1346 by Joannes, patriarch of Constan- tinople, to the emperor Cantacuzenus to induce him to resign the imperial dignity. In the year following he was sent by the emperor Cantacuzenus himself, who had then conquered and entered the city, to the palace of the empress Anna, to lay before her the terms of peace proposed by the conqueror. (Cantas. Hist. Byz. iv. 38, &c. xiv. 16.) Nicolaus Cabasils, who was a man of great learning, wrote several works, of which however only a few have been published, perhaps because he was, like his uncle, a vehement antagonist of the Latin church. The following works have appeared in print: 1. Περὶ τῶν εἰς καθαραίας, &c., that is, a comendious explanation of the holy mass or liturgy. It first appeared in a Latin translation by Gentianus Herculanus, Venice, 1648, 8vo, from whence it was reprinted in the "Liturgia SS. Patrum," edited by J. S. Andreas and F. G. de Saintes, Paris, 1650, fol. and Antwerp, 1652, 8vo, and also in the Biblioth. Patr. xxvi. p. 178, ed. Lugd. The Greek original was first edited by Fronto Ducas in the Auctarium to the Bibli. Patr. of 1624, vol. ii. p. 200, &c. 2. A work on the life of Christ, in six books, in which, however, the au- thor treats principally of baptism, the last supper, and the eucharist. This work is as yet published only in a Latin version by J. Pontanus, together with some other works, and also an oration of Nicol. Cabasils against usury, Riga, 1604. 4to. From this edition it was reprinted in the Bibli. Patr. xxvi. p. 136, ed. Lugd. In some MSS. this work consists of seven books, but the seventh has never appeared in print. 3. An oration on Usury and against Usurers, of which a Latin translation was published by J. Pontanus together with Cabæus’s life of Christ. The Greek original of this oration appeared at August. Vindel. 1595 by D. Hoesschel, and was afterwards published in a more correct form, together with the oration of Ephiphanus on the burial of Christ, by S. Simonides, Samoëi, 1604, 4to. The many other orations and theological works of Nicolaus Cabæus, which have not yet been printed, are enumerated in Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. x. p. 28, &c.; comp. Wharton’s Appendix to Cuvio’s Hist. Ed. 1. p. 44, ed. London [L. S.]

CABÆI (Καβαῖοι), mystic divinities who occur in various parts of the ancient world. The obscurity that hangs over them, and the contradictions respecting them in the accounts of the ancients themselves, have opened a wide field for speculation to modern writers on mythology, each of whom has been tempted to propound a theory of his own. The meaning of the name Cabæi is quite uncertain, and has been traced to nearly all the languages of the East, and even to those of the North; but one etymology seems as plausible as another, and etymology in this instance is a real ignis fatuus to the inquirer. The character and nature of the Cabæi are as obscure as the meaning of their name. All that we can attempt to do here is to trace and explain the various opinions of the ancients themselves, as they are presented to us in chronological succession. We chiefly follow Lobec, who has collected all the passages of the ancients upon this subject, and who appears to us the most sober among those who have written upon it. (Aglæopæam, pp. 1202—1281.)

The earliest mention of the Cabæi, so far as we know, is in a drama of Aeschylus, entitled Ká-κες, in which the poet brought them into contact with the Argonauts in Lemnos. The Cabæi promised the Argonauts plenty of Lemnian wine. (Plut. Sympos. ii. 1; Pollux, vi. 23; Bekker, Anecd. p. 115.) The opinion of Welecker (Die Aeschyl. Tragödie, p. 230), who infers from Dionysus (i. 68, &c.) that the Cabæi had been spoken of by Aretins, has been satisfactorily refuted by Lobec and others. From the passage of Aeschylus here alluded to, it appears that he regarded the Cabæi as original Lemnian divinities, who had power over everything that contributed to the good of the inhabitants, and especially over the vineyards. The fruits of the field, too, seem to have been under their protection, for the Pelasgians once in a time of scarcity made vows to Zena, Apollo, and the Cabæi. (Myrillus, ap. Dionys. i. 23.) Strabo in his discussion about the Curetes, Daetyis, &c. (p. 466), speaks of the origin of the Cabæi, deriving his statements from ancient authorities, and from him we learn; that Aeanaeus called Camillus a son of Cabæus and Hephaestus, and that he made the three Cabæi the sons, and the Cabæian nymphs the daughters, of Camillus. According to Pherecydes, Apollo and Rhyxia were the parents of the nine Corybantes who dwelled in Samothrace, and the three Cabæi and the three Cabæian nymphs were the children of Cabæus, the daughter of Proteus, by Hephaestus. Sacrifices were offered to the Corybantes as well as the Cabæi in Lemnos and Imbros, and also in the towns of Troas. The Greek logographers, and perhaps Aschylus too, thus considered the Cabæi as the grandchildren of Proteus and as the sons of Hephaestus, and consequently as inferior in dignity to the great gods on account of their origin. Their inferiority is also implied in their jocose conversation with the Argonauts, and their being repeatedly mentioned along with the Curetes, Daetyis, Corybantes, and other beings of inferior rank. Herodotus (ii. 57) says, that the Cabæi were worshipped at Memphis as the sons of Hephaestus, and that they resembled the Phoenician dwarf-gods (Hé-redés) whom the Phoenicians fixed on the prows of their ships. As the Dioscuri were then yet unknown to the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 61), the Cabæi cannot have been identified with the Dioscuri at that time. Herodotus proceeds to say, “the Athenians received their phallic Hermæ from the Pelasgians, and those who are initiated in the mysteries of the Cabæi will understand what I am saying; for the Pelasgians formerly inhabited Samothrace, and it is from them that the Samothracians received their orgies. But the Samothracians had a sacred legend about Hermes, which is explained in their mysteries.” This sacred legend is perhaps no other than the one spoken of by Cicero (De Nat. Deor. iii. 22), that Hermes was the son of Cocius and Dice, and that Prasepine desired to embrace him. The same is perhaps alluded to by Plutarch (De Is. et Os.), when he says that Mercury (Hermes) had connexions with Brimo, who is probably the goddess of Pherae worshipped at Athens, Sicyon, and Argos, whom some identified with Proserpine (Persephone), and others with Hecate or Artemis. (Sparh. ad Callim. hymn. in Dion. 259.) We generally find this goddess worshipped in places which had the worship of the Cabæi, and a Lemnian Artemis is mentioned by Galen. (De Med. Spl. i. 2. p. 246, ed. Chart.) The Tyrrhenians, too, are said to have taken away the statue of Artemis at Brauron, and to have carried it to Lemnos. Aristophanes, in his “Lemnian Women,” had mentioned Bendis along with the Brauronian Artemis and the great goddess, and Nummus (Dionys. xxx. 45) states that the Cabæus Aemnon banished Euryphoe, Scironos, Sarpodes, so that we may draw the conclusion, that the Samothracians and Lemnians worshipped a goddess akin to Hecate, Artemis, Bendis, or Persephone, who had some sexual connexion with Hermes, which revelation was made in the mysteries of Samothrace.

The writer next to Herodotus, who speaks about the Cabæi, and whose statements we possess in Strabo (p. 472), though brief and obscure, is Stephanobrus. The meaning of the passage in Strabo is, according to Lobec, as follows: Some persons think that the Corybantes are the sons of Cronos, others that they are the sons of Zeus and Calliope, that they (the Corybantes) went to Samothrace and were the same as the beings who were there called Cabæi. But as the doings of the Corybantes are generally known, whereas nothing is known of the Samothracian Corybantes, those persons are obliged to have recourse to saying, that the doings of the latter Corybantes are kept secret or are mystic. This opinion, however, is contested by Demetrius, who states, that nothing was revealed in the mysteries either of the deeds of the Cabæi or of their having accompanied Rhea or of their having brought up Zeus and Dionysus. Demetrius also mentions the opinion of Stephanobrus, that the lepē were performed in Samothrace to the Cabæi, who derived their name from mount Cabeiri. But here again opinions differed very much, for while some believed that the lepá Kašelupō were thus called from their having been instituted and conducted by the Cabeiri, others thought that they were celebrated in honour of the Cabeiri, and that the Cabeiri belonged to the great gods.

The Attic writers of this period offer nothing of importance concerning the Cabeiri, but they intimate that their mysteries were particularly calculated to protect the lives of the initiated. (Arístoph. Pax 298; comp. Etymol. Gud. p. 289.) Later writers in making the same remark do not mention the name Cabeiri, but speak of the Samothracian gods generally. (Diod. iv. 43, 49; Aelian, Fringm. p. 320; Callim. Ep. 36; Lucian. Ep. 15; Plut. Moral. 58.) There are several instances mentioned of lovers swearing by the Cabeiri in promising fidelity to one another (Juven. iii. 144; Hiserius, Orat. i. 12); and Suidas (s. v. Δαλαμαξιάς) mentions a case of a girl invoking the Cabeiri as her avenger against a lover who had broken his oath.

But from these oaths we can no more draw any inference as to the real character of the Cabeiri, than from the fact of the protecting the lives of the initiated; for these are features which they have in common with various other divinities. From the account which the scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius (i. 913) has borrowed from Athenien, who had written a comedy called The Samothracians (Athen. xiv. p. 661), we learn only that he spoke of two Cabeiri, Dardanus, and Jason, whom he called sons of Zeus and Electra. They derived their name from mount Cabeiri in Phrygia, from whence they had been introduced into Samothrace.

A more ample source of information respecting the Cabeiri is opened to us in the writers of the Alexandrine period. The two scholia on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 913) contain in substance the following statement: Mnaseas mentions the names of three Cabeiri in Samothrace, viz. Axieros, Axioceras, and Axioerothius; the first is Demeter, the second Persphone, and the third Hades. Others add a fourth, Cadmus, who according to Dionysius is identical with Hercules. It thus appears that these accounts agree with that of Steinsibrotus, who reckoned the Cabeiri among the great gods, and that Mnaseas only added their names. Herodotus, as we have seen, had already connected Hercules with Persphone; the worship of the latter as connected with that of Demeter in Samothrace is attested by Artemidorus (op. Strab. iv. p. 198); and there was also a part in Samothrace, which derived its name Demetrium, from Demeter. (Liv. xiv. 6.) According to the authors used by Dionysius (i. 58), the worship of Samothrace was introduced there from Arcadia; for according to them Dardanus, together with his brother Jason or Iasus and his sister Harmonia, left Arcadia and went to Samothrace, taking with them the Palladium from the temple of Pallas. Cadmus, however, who appears in this tradition, is king of Samothrace: he made Dardanus his friend, and sent him to Tenea in Thessaly. Cadmus himself, again, is sometimes described as a Cretan (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 167); sometimes as an Asiatic (Steph. s. v. Δαλαμαξιας; Bakstath. ad Dionys. Perig. 391), while Arrian (op. Istath. p. 581) makes him come out of Thrace. According to the Roman, brother Jason or Iasus, the accounts likewise differ very much; but for while some writers describe him as going to Samothrace either from Parrhasia in Arcadia or from Crete, a third account (Dionys. i. 61) stated, that he was killed by lighting for having entertained improper desires for Demeter, and Arrian (loc. cit.) says that Jason, being inspired by Demeter and Kore, went to Sicily and many other places, and there established the mysteries of these goddesses, for which Demeter rewarded him by yielding to his embraces, and became the mother of Parius, the founder of Paros.

All writers of this class appear to consider Dardanus as the founder of the Samothracian mysteries, and the mysteries themselves as solemnized in honour of Demeter. Another set of authorities, on the other hand, regards them as belonging to Rhea (Diod. v. 51; Schol. ad Arist. p. 105; Samb. Excerpt. ib. vii. p. 511, ed. Almelev; Lucian, De Dea Sgr. 97), and suggests the identity of the Samothracian and Phrygian mysteries. Pherecydes too, who placed the Cabeiri, the companions of the great mother of the gods, in Samothrace, and Steinsibrotus, who derived the Cabeiri from mount Cabeiri in Phrygia, and all those writers who describe Dardanus as the founder of the Samothracian mysteries, naturally ascribed the Samothracian mysteries to Rhea. To Demeter, on the other hand, they were ascribed by Mnaseas, Artemidorus, and even by Herodotus, since he mentions Hermes and Persphone in connexion with these mysteries, and Persphone has nothing to do with Rhea. Now, as Demeter and Rhea have many attributes in common—both are mythos Strou, and the festivals of each were celebrated with the same kind of enthusiasm; and as peculiar features of the one are occasionally transferred to the other (e. g. Eurip. Helen. 1304), it is not difficult to see how it might happen, that a Samothracian goddess was sometimes called Demeter and sometimes Rhea. The difficulty is, however, increased by the fact of Venus (Aphrodite) too being worshipped in Samothrace. (Plin. H. N. v. 6.) This Venus may be either the Thracian Bondis or Cybele, or may have been one of the Cabeiri themselves, for we know that Thebes possessed three ancient statues of Aphrodite, which Harmonia had taken from the ships of Cadmus, and which may have been the Harrake that resembled the Cabeiri. (Paus. xvi. § 4; Herod. iii. 97.) In connexion with this Aphrodite we may mention that, according to some accounts, the Phoenician Aphrodite (Astarte) had commonly the epithet Elkar or Elkalora, an Arabic word which signifies the great and the noble, and the Cabeiri considers Astarte as identical with the Seledi Kabeira, which name P. Lipsius saw on a gem.

There are also writers who transfer all that is said about the Samothracian gods to the Dioscuri, who were indeed different from the Cabeiri of Aeolus, Pherecydes, and Asclepius, but yet might easily be confounded with them; first, because the Dioscuri are also called great gods, and secondly, because they were also regarded as the protectors of persons in danger either by land or water. Hence we find that in some places where the sacres were worshipped, it was uncertain whether they were the Dioscuri or the Cabeiri. (Paus. x. 39. § 3.) Nay, even the Roman Pontes were sometimes reckoned as identical with the Dioscuri, the Cabeiri (Darm. ib. 379); and Velleius thought that the Pontes were carried by Dardanus from the Arcadian town Pheneos to Samothrace,
The account of Pausanias about the origin of the Boeotian Cabeiri savours of rationalism, and is, as Lobeck justly remarks, a mere fiction. It must further not be supposed that there existed any connexion between the Boeotian Cabeiri and the Thelas Cudamus; for tradition clearly describes them as beings of different origin, race, and dignity. Pausanias (ix. 22, § 3) further mentions another sanctuary of the Cabeiri, with a grove, in the Boeotian town of Anthison; and a Boeotian Cabeirus, who possessed the power of averting dangers and increasing man's prosperity, is mentioned in an epitaph of Diodorus. (Brannck. Anal. ii. p. 185.) A Macedonian Cabeirus occurs in Lactantius. (i. 15, 8; comp. Firmicus, de Evor. Prof. p. 33; Clem. Alex. Protrep. p. 16.) The reverence paid by the Macedonians to the Cabeiri may be inferred from the fact of Philip and Olympias being initiated in the Samothracian mysteries, and of Alexander erecting altars to the Cabeiri at the close of his Eastern expedition. (Plut. Alex. 2; Philostor. de Vit. Apoll. ii. 43.) The Pyrgaeonian Cabeiri are mentioned by Pausanias (i. 4, § 6), and those of Berytus by Sanchonianthus (ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. p. 31) and Damascius. (Vit. Isidor. hist. 573.) Respecting the mysteries of the Cabeiri in general, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Calypsa; Lobeck, Apoth. p. 1281, &c. For the various opinions concerning the nature of the Cabeiri, see Creuzer, Symbol. Hist. p. 892, &c.; Schelling, Uber die Götter von Samothrake, Stuttgart, 1816; Welcker, Aschyl. Trag.; Klaussn., Aeneas u. die Penat. [L. S.]

CACA or CACIA, a sister of Cacus, who, according to some accounts, betrayed the place where the cave was concealed which Cacus had purchased from Hercules or Recanamus. She was rewarded for it with divine honours, which she was to enjoy for ever. In her sanctuary a perpetual fire was kept up, just as in the temple of Vesta. (Lactant. i. 20, 36; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 190.) [L. S.]

CACUS, a fabulous Italian shepherd, who was believed to have lived in a cave, and to have committed various kinds of robberies. Among others, he also stole a part of the cattle of Hercules or Recanamus; and, as he dragged the animals into his cave by their tails, it was impossible to discover their traces. But when the remaining oxen passed by the cave, those within began to bellow, and were thus discovered. Another tradition stated, that Caca, the sister of Cacus, betrayed the place of their concealment. Cacus was slain by Hercules. (Liv. i. 7.) He is usually called a son of Vulcan, and Ovid, who gives his story with considerable embellishments, describes Cacus as a fearful giant, who was the terror of the whole land. (Or. Past. i. 554; comp. Virg. Aen. viii. 190, &c.; Propert. iv. 9; Dionys. i. 52, 43; Aurel. Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 6.) Evander, who then ruled over the country in which Cacus had resided, showed his gratitude to the conqueror of Cacus by dedicating to him a sanctuary, and appointing the Potiti and Pinarit as his priests. The common opinion respecting the original character of Cacus is, that he was the personification of some evil daemon, and this opinion is chiefly founded upon the descriptions of him given by the Roman poets. Hirtius (De Relief, de Rit. i. 319, &c.), however, thinks that Cacus, whom he identifies with Cacus (Diod. iv. 21; Solin. i. 1), and his sister Caca were Roman penates, whose names he connects with scelos, CALCAE, and Pauus. There were at Rome various things connected with the legend of Cadmus.

On the side of the Palatine hill, not far from the west end of the Campus Martius, which is still known as the Campus Martius, was the Temple of Romulus.

CAKHITINA. [Rupus.]

CAKMILUS, CASMMILUS, or CADMUS (Kādmos, Kasōkh, or Kēdmos), according to Aelianus (ap. Strab. x. p. 472) a son of Hephaestus and Cabeiro, and father of the Samothracian Cabeiri and the Cabeiran nymphs. Others consider Cadmus himself as the fourth of the Samothracian Cabeiri. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 917; comp. Cabiri.)

[LS 8.]

CADMUS (Kēdmos), a son of Agenor and Telephassa, and brother of Europa, Phoenic, and Cilix. When Europe was carried off by Zeus to Crete, Agenor sent out his sons in search of their sister, enjoining them: "Find her out, and return without her." Telephassa accompanied her sons. All researches being fruitless, Cadmus and Telephassa settled in Thrace. Here Telephassa died, and Cadmus, after burying her, went to Delphi to consult the oracle respecting his sister. The god commanded him to abstain from further seeking, and to follow a cow of a certain kind, and to build a town on the spot where the cow should sink down with fatigue. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 638, ad Aristoph. Rha. 1256; Paus. ix. 12. § 1.)

Cadmus found the cow described by the oracle in Phocis among the herds of Pelagon, and followed her into Boeotia, where she sank down on the spot on which Cadmus built Thebes, with the acropolis, Cadmus. As he intended to sacrifice the cow here to Athena, he sent some persons to the neighbouring well of Ares to fetch water. This well was guarded by a dragon, a son of Ares, whom killed the men sent by Cadmus. Hereupon, Cadmus slew the dragon, and, on the advice of Athena, sowed the teeth of the monster, out of which armed men grew up, who slew each other, with the exception of five, Echion, Udeaus, Chthonius, Hyperenor, and Polos, who, according to the Theban legend, were the ancestors of the Thbans. Cadmus was punished for having slain the dragon by being obliged to serve for a certain period of time, some say one year, others eight years. After that Athena assigned to him the government of Thebes, and Zeus gave him Harmonia for his wife. The marriage solemnity was honoured by the presence of all the Olympic gods in the Cadmeia. Cadmus gave to Harmonia the famous σχοινά and necklace which he had received from Hephaestus or from Europa, and became by her the father of Autonoia, Ire, Semele, Agave, and Polydorus.

Subsequently Cadmus and Harmonia quitted Thebes, and went to the Cenachelians. This people was at war with the Illyrians, and had received an oracle which promised them victory if they took Cadmus as their commander. The Cenachelians accordingly made Cadmus their king, and conquered the enemy. After this, Cadmus had another son, whom he called Ilyrius. In the end, Cadmus and Harmonia were changed into dragons, and were re

This is the account given by Apollodorus (iii. 1. § 1, &c.), which, with the exception of some particulars, agrees with the stories in Hyginus (Fab. 179) and Pausanias (ix. 5. § 10, § 12, § 1, &c.). There are, however, many points in the story of Cadmus in which the various traditions present considerable differences. His native country is commonly stated to have been Phoenicia, as in Apollodorus (comp. Dio. iv. 2; Strab. vii. p. 521, &c.), and sometimes called a Tyrian (Herod. ii. 49; Eurip. Phoen. 559), and sometimes

A Sidonius. (Eurip. Bacch. 171; Od. X. v. 571.) Others regarded Cadmus as a native of Thebes in Egypt (Dio. i. 23; Paus. ix. 12. § 2), and his parentage is modified accordingly; for he is also called a son of Antiope, the daughter of Belus, or of Argiope, the daughter of Neleus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 5, with Val. note; Hygin. Fab. 179, 179.) He is said to have introduced into Greece from Phoenicia or Egypt an alphabet of sixteen letters (Herod. v. 58, &c.; Dio. iii. 67, v. 57; Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Hygin. Fab. 277), and to have been the first who worked the mines of mount Pangaion in Thrace. The teeth of the dragon which Cadmus took away were sacred, according to some accounts, by Athena herself; and the spot where this was done was shown, in aftertimes, in the neighbourhood of Thebes. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 670; Paus. ix. 10. § 1.) Half of the teeth were given by Athena to Aeaces, king of Colchis. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1183; Apollon. i. 9. § 23; Serv. ad Verg. Geog. ii. 141.) The account of his quitting Thebes was also the same in all traditions; for some related, that he was expelled by Amphion and Zethus, or by Dionysus. (Syncell. p. 296, ed. Dindorf.) A tradition of Brasaei stated, that Cadmus, after discovering the birth of Dionysus by his daughter Semele, shut up the mother and her child in a chest, and threw them into the sea. (Paus. ii. 24. § 3.) According to the opinion of Herodotus (ii. 49), however, Medamnus learned and received the worship of Dionysus from Cadmus, and other traditions too represent Cadmus as worshiping Dionysus. (e. g. Eurip. Bacch. 181.) According to Euripides, Cadmus resigned the government of Thebes to his grandson, Pentheus; and after the death of the latter, Cadmus went to Illyria, where he built Bathoë (Bacch. 43, 1311, &c.), in the government of which he was succeeded by his son Ilius or Polydorus.

The whole story of Cadmus, with its manifold poetical embellishments, seems to suggest the immigration of a Phoenician or Egyptian colony into Greece, by means of which civilisation (the alphabet, art of mining, and the worship of Dionysus) came into the country. But the opinion formed on this point must depend upon the view we take of the early influence of Phoenicia and Egypt in general upon the early civilisation of Greece. While Buttmann and Creuzer admit such an influence, C. O. Müller denies it altogether, and regards Cadmus as a Pelasgian divinity. Cadmus was worshipped in various parts of Greece, and at Sparta he had a heroum. (Paus. ii. 13. § 6; comp. Buttmann, Mythol. ii. p. 171; Müller, Ochom., p. 111, &c.)

CADMUS (Kēdmos), the son of Scythe, a man renowned for his integrity, was sent by Gelon to Delphi, in the 5th year, with great treasures, to await the issue of the battle between the Greeks and Persians, and with orders to give them to the Persians if the latter conquered, but to bring them back to Sicily if the Greeks prevailed. After the defect of Xerxes, Cadmus returned to Sicyon with the treasures, though he might easily have appropriated them to his own use. (Herod. vi. 163, 164.) Herodotus calls Cadmus a Con, and states further, that he received the tyranny of Cos from his father, but gave the state its liberty of his own accord, merely from a sense of justice; and that about thirty years after his death, he was identified with the Samians at Zancle, afterwards called Messana. Müller (Dor. i. 8, § 4, note q.) thinks that this Cadmus was the son of the Sicyonians, tyrant of Zancle, who was driven out by the Samians (a c. 497), and who fled to the court of Persia, where he died. (Herod. vi. 23.) In reply to the objection, that Herodotus speaks of Cadmus having inherited the tyranny from his father, but of Sicyon having died in Persia, Müller remarks that the government of Cos was probably given to his father by the Persians, but that he notwithstanding continued to reside in Persia, as we know was the case with Histaenes. If this conjecture is correct, Cadmus probably resigned the tyranny of Cos through desire of returning to his native town, Zancle. He was accompanied in his flight to Sicily by the poet Epicharmus. (Suidas, s. v. Erxetit).

CADMUS (Καδμος). 1. Of Miletus, a son of Pandion, and in all probability the earliest Greek historian or logographer. He lived, according to the vague statement of Josephus (c. Apion. i. 2; comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 267), very shortly before the Persian invasion of Greece; and Suidas makes the singular statement, that Cadmus was only a little younger than the mythical poet Orpheus, which arises from the thorough confusion of the mythical Cadmus of Phoenicia and the historian Cadmus. But there is every probability that Cadmus lived about B.C. 540. Strabo (i. p. 18) places Cadmus first among the three authors whom he calls the earliest prose writers among the Greeks: viz. Cadmus, Pherecydes, and Hecataeus; and from this circumstance we may infer, that Cadmus was the most ancient of the three—an inference which is also confirmed by the statement of Pliny (H. N. v. 31), who calls Cadmus the first that ever wrote (Greek) prose. When, therefore, in another passage (vii. 56) Pliny calls Pherecydes the most ancient prose writer, and Cadmus of Miletus simply the earliest historian, we have probably to regard this as one of those numerous inconsistencies into which Pliny fell by following different authorities at different times, and forgetting what he had said on former occasions. All, therefore, we can infer from his contradicting himself in this case is, that there were some ancient authorities who made Pherecydes the earliest Greek prose writer, and not Cadmus; but that the latter was the earliest Greek historian, seems to be an undisputed fact. Cadmus wrote a work on the foundation of Miletus and the earliest history of Thracia generally, in four books (Κρίται Μακαρόην καὶ τῆς Θρᾴκης Τόκων). This work appears to have been lost at a very early period, for Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Jad. de Theod. 23) expressly mentions, that the work known in his time under the name of Cadmus was considered a forgery. When Suidas and others (Bekker's Anecd. p. 781), call Cadmus of Miletus the inventor of the alphabet, this statement must be regarded as the result of a confusion between the historical Cadmus, who emigrated from Phoenicia into Greece; and Suidas is, in fact, obviously guilty of this confusion, since he says, that Cadmus of Miletus introduced into Greece the alphabet which the Phoenicians had invented. (Comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. ii. p. 454, 3rd edition.)

2. Of Miletus, the Younger, is mentioned only by Suidas, according to whom he was a son of Archemus, and a Greek historian, concerning whose time nothing is said. Suidas ascribes to him two works. 1. A History of Attica, in sixteen books, and the second on the deliverance from the sufferings of love, in fourteen books. [L. S.]

CAECILIA. CAIA, is said to have been the genuine Roman name for Tanagru, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 74; Val. Max. Epit. de Proven. in fin.; Festus, s. v. Geza; Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 271, c.) Both her names, Caiia and Caeceilia, are of the same root as Caecilia, and the Roman Caeceiliæ are supposed to have derived their origin from the Praenestine Caeculæ. (Fest. s. v. Caeceulæ.) The story of Caiia Cæcilia is related under TANAGRI; and it is sufficient to say here, that she appears in the early legends of Rome as a woman endowed with prophetic powers, and closely connected with the Hebrews. That she was, at the same time, looked upon as a model of domestic life, may be inferred from the fact, that a newly married woman, before entering the house of her husband, on being asked what her name was, answered, "My name is Caiia." (Val. Max. l. c.; Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 271, c.) [L. S.]

CAECILIA, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, who is called Cæcilia, because her father took the name of his uncle, Q. Cæcilius, by whom he was adopted. She was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. (Atticus, p. 415, a.)

CAECILIA or METELLA, 1 and 2. Daughters of Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, consul B.C. 145, one of whom married C. Servilius Vatia, and was by him the mother of P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus, consul in 79, and the other P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul in 111, and was the grandmother of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio, consul in 52, (Cic. pro Dom. 47, post Red. ad Quir. 3, Brut. 58.)

3. The daughter of L. Caecilius Metellus Calvus, consul in B.C. 142, and the brother of Metellus Numidicus, consul in 109, was married to L. Licinius Lucullus, praetor in 103, and was by him the mother of the celebrated Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates. Her moral character was in bad repute. (Plut. Lucull. 1; Cic. de Ver. iv. 66; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 62.)

4. Daughter of Q. Caecilius Metellus Balernaicus, consul in B.C. 123, was the wife of Ap. Claudius Pulcher, consul in 79, and the mother of Ap. Claudius Pulcher consul in 54, and of P. Claudius Pulcher, tribune of the plebs in 58. (Cic. de Dic. i. 2, 44, pro Rosc. Am. 10, 50: in the former of the latter passages she is erroneously called Nepotis fìtis instead of Nepotis sovor.) Her brother was Q. Metellus Nepos, consul in 98, and we according find his two sons, Metellus Celer and Metellus Nepos, called the fratries (cousins) of her sons Ap. Claudius and P. Claudius. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3, ad Fam. v. 3, pro Cael. 34.)

Cicero relates (de Dic. ii. cc.), that in consequence of a dream of Caecilia's in the Marian war, the temple of Juno Sospita was restored.

5. Daughter of L. Caecilius Metellus Balernaicus, consul in B.C. 123, was the wife of Q. Corn. Pius, the pontifex maximus, consul in 80, as has been inferred from Plutarch. (Sall. 6.) Her father's praenomen is Lucas, and he is said to have rebuilt the temple of the Diocletian (Cic. *pro Scaur. 2, §§ 45, 46, with the commentary of Asconius), which point to L. Dalmaticus as her father. She was first married to M. Aelinius Scaurus, consul in 115, by whom she had three children, the eldest of whom was the M. Scaurus defended by Cicero (Cic. *l. c. *pro Sest. 47; *Plut. Sull. 55, *Pomp. 9; *Plin. H. N. 35: 11, a. 24: 6), and afterwards to the dictator Sulla, who always treated her with the greatest respect. When she fled from Cinna and Carbo in Italy to her husband's camp before Athens, she was insulted from the walls of the city by Aristion and the Athenians, for which they paid dearly at the capture of the city. She fell ill in 81, during the celebration of Sulla's triumphal feast; and as her recovery was hopeless, Sulla for religious reasons sent her a bill of divorce, and had her removed from his house, but honoured her memory by a splendid funeral. (Plut. Sull. 6, 18, 22, 85.) She purchased a great deal of the property confiscated in the proscriptions. (Plin. *l. c.)

6. The wife of P. Lentulus was the younger, whose niece was the Cicerone in-law (Cic. *ad Att. xi. 23), and also, as it appears, with Assopus, the son of the actor. (Hor. *Sat. ii. 3, 239.) She was divorced by her husband in 45. (Cic. *ad Att. xii. 52, xiii. 7.) Her father is not known.

CAECELIA GENS, plebeian; for the name of T. Caecilius in Livy (iv. 7, comp. 5), the patrician consulary tribune in b. c. 444, is a false reading for T. Caelius. A member of this gens is mentioned in history as early as the fifth century b. c. but the first of the Caecilius who obtained the consulship was L. Caecilius Metellus Denter, in 294. The family of the Metelli became from this time one of the most distinguished in the state. Like other Roman families in the later times of the republic, they traced their origin to a mythical personage, and pretended that they were descended from Caeculus, the founder of Praeneste [CAECILIUS], or Caecas, the companion of Aeneas. (Festus, s. v. Caecus.) The cognomina of this gens under the republic are Bassus, Denter, Metellus, Niger, Penna, Rufus, of which the Metelli are the best known: for those whose cognomen is not mentioned, see CAECILIUS.

CAECILIUS, a senator, punished in a. d. 32 for falsely accusing Cotta. (Tac. *Ann. vii. 7.)

CAECILIUS, a deacon of the church at Carthage, was chosen bishop of the see in a. d. 81, upon the death of the African primate, Mon- surius. The validity of this appointment was im- pugned by Donatus, stimulated, it is said, by the malicious intrigues of a woman named Lucilla, upon three grounds: 1. That the election had been irregular. 2. That the ordination was null and void, having been performed by Felix, bishop of Apthunga, a traditor, that is, one of those who, in obedience to the edicts of Diocletian, had yielded to the civil power, and delivered up the sacred vessels used in places of worship, and even the Holy Scriptures. 3. That Caecilian had displayed marked hostility towards the victims of the late persecution. These charges were brought under the consider- ation of the synod of sacred Roman and Nicomerian bishops, who declared the see vacant, and, proceeding to a new election, made choice of Majorinus. Both parties called upon the praefect Anulinus to interfere, but were referred by him to the emperor, and accordingly the rival prelates repaired to Rome, each attended by ten leading ecclesiastics of his own faction. The cause was judged by a council composed of three Gallic and fifteen Italian bishops, who met on the 2nd of October, 313, and gave their decree in favour of Caecilian and Felix. An appeal was lodged with Constantine, who agreed to summon a second and more numerous council, which was held at Arles on the 1st of August, 314, when the decision of the council of Rome was con- firmed. The struggle was, however, obstinately prolonged by fresh complaints on the part of the Donatists, who, after having been defeated before various tribunals and commissions to which the determination of the dispute was delegated by the supreme government, at length openly refused to submit, or to acknowledge any authority whatever, if hostile to their claims. The formidable schism which was the result of these proceedings is spoken of more fully under DONATUS. (Opitius, i. 19, &c.) [W. R.]

CAECILIUS ANIUS, DOMITIUS, Roman knight, friend of Thrasea, who informed him of his condem- nation by the senate in a. d. 67. (Tac. *Ann. xvi. 34.)

CAECILIUS ANIUS, MA'GIUS, praetor, falsely accused of treason in a. d. 21, was acquitted, and his accusers punished. (Tac. *Ann. iii. 37.)

CAECILIUS. 1. Q. CAECILIUS, tribune of the plebs, a. c. 439. (Livy. iv. 16.)

2. Q. CAECILIUS, a Roman knight, the husband of Catiline's sister, who had taken no part in public affairs, was killed by Catiline himself in the time of Sulla. (Q. Cic. *de Petit. Con. 2; Ascon. in *Trog. Claud. p. 94, ed. Orelli.) This is perhaps the same Q. Caecilius who is mentioned in connexion with the trial of P. Gabinus, who was praetor in 99. (Cic. *Dist. 20.) Zumpt remarks, that he can hardly have belonged to the noble family of the Metelli, as Cicero says that he was overborne by the influence and rank of Piso.

3. Q. CAECILIUS, a Roman knight, a friend of L. Lucullus, and the uncle of Atticus, acquired a large fortune by lending money on interest. The old usurer was of such a crabbed temper, that no one could put up with him except his nephew Atticus, who was in consequence adopted by him in his will, and obtained from him a fortune of ten mil- lions of sestercii. He died in a. c. 57. (Nepos, *Att. 5; Cic. *ad Att. i. 12, ii. 19, 20, iii. 20.)

4. T. CAECILIUS, a centurion of the first rank (prima pila) in the army of Armenia, was killed at the battle of Harpa, a. d. 49. (Cass. *B. C. i. 1, 46.)

CAECILIUS. We generally fail included among the writings of Lactantius a book divided into fifty-two chapters, entitled De Mortuibus Persecutorum, containing an outline of the career of those emperors who displayed active hostility towards the church, an account of the death of each, to- gether with a sketch of the different persecutions from Nero to Diocletian. The object of the nar- rative is to point out that the signal vengeance of God in every case overtook the enemies of the faith, and to deduce from this circumstance, from the preservation of the new religion amidst all the dangers by which it was surrounded, and all the attacks by which it was assailed, and from its final triumph over its foes, an irresistible argument in favour of its heavenly origin. The work appears from internal evidence to have been composed after the victory of Constantine over Maxentius, and before his quarrel with Licinius, that is to say, between a. d. 312 and 315. The text is corrupt and mutilated, and the statements which it contains must be received with a certain degree of caution in the one tone in which they are delivered, and the high colouring and trimming employed throughout to suit the particular design proposed. But notwithstanding these drawbacks, the treatise is extremely valuable on account of the light which it sheds on many obscure passages of ecclesiastical and civil history, and is peculiarly famous as containing a contemporary record of the alleged vision of Constantine before the battle of the Milvian bridge, in consequence of which he ordered the soldiers to engrave upon their shields the well-known monogram representing the cross together with the initial letters of the name of Christ (c. 44).

This piece is altogether wanting in the earlier editions of Lactantius, and was first brought to light by Stephen Baluze, who printed it at Paris in his Miscellanea (vol. ii., 1679) from a very ancient MS. in the Bibliotheca Colbertina, bearing simply the inscription LUCI CECELII INCIPIT LIBER AD DONATUM CONSESSOREM DE MORTIBUS PERSECUTORUM. Baluze entertained no doubt that he had discovered the tract of Lactantius quoted by Hieronymus as De persecutione Libr. Unum, an opinion corroborated by the name prefixed [LACTANTIUS], by the date, by the dedication to Donatus, apparently the same person with the Donatus addressed in the discourse De Ira Dei, and by the general resemblance in style and expression, a series of considerations no one of which would be in itself conclusive, but which when combined form a strong chain of circumstantial evidence. Le Nourry, however, sought to prove that the production in question must be assigned to some unknown L. Caecilius altogether different from Lactantius, and published it at Paris in 1710 as "Lucii Ceceilii Libri ad Donatum Confessorem de Mortibus Persecutorum hactenus Lucio Ceceilio Firmiano Lactantio adscripti, ad Colerianum codicem denouo emendaturos," to which is prefixed an elaborate dissertation. His ideas have been adopted to a certain extent by Paff, Wach, Lo Clerc, Lardner, and Gibbon, and controverted by Heumann and others. Although the question cannot be considered as settled, and indeed does not admit of being absolutely determined, the best modern critics seem upon the whole disposed to acquiesce in the original hypothesis of Baluze.

The most complete edition of the De Mortibus Persecutorum in a separate form, is that published at Utrecht in 1693, under the inspection of Bouldri, with a very copious collection of notes, forming one of the series of Variorum Classics in Vta. Other editions are enumerated in the account given of the works of LACTANTIUS. [W. R.]

SEX. CAECILIUS. A Roman jurist of this name is occasionally cited in the Corpus Juris, and is suspected by some authors to be distinct from and earlier than Africans. [Africanus, Sex. Caecilius.] In support of this opinion, not to mention the corrupt passage of Latothius (Alius, Sec. 68), they hold that there is no proof, that the Sex. Caecilius Africans to whom Julianus returned an answer upon a legal question (Dig. 35. tit. 3. s. 4) was identical with Africans. He may have been a private person and distinct from the jurists Sex. Caecilius and Africans. This inconclusive passage is the only connecting link between Africans and Sex. Caecilius, for elsewhere in the Digest the name Africans always appears alone. Africans was probably rather later (say they Cn. Julius), whom he occasionally cites (Dig. 12. tit. 6. s. 38; Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 45, pr.). On the other hand, Caecilius (they proceed) appears to be anterior to Africans, for he is cited by Jovelenus (Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 64), who was the master of Julianus. (Dig. 40. tit. 2. s. 5.) Again, Sex. Caecilius is represented by Gellius as conversing with Favorinus, and is spoken of in the Noticia Atticae as a person deceased. "Sixtus Caecilius, in disciplina juris atque legibus populi Romani nescendis interpretandisque scientia, usus, nectarizaque illustri fuls." (Gell. xx. 1, pr.) Now Favorinus is known to have flourished in the reign of Hadrian, and Gellius to have completed the Noticia Atticae before the death of Antoninus Pius. (A. D. 161.) The passage in Gellius which would make the conversation take place nearly 700 years after the laws of the Twelve Tables were enacted, must be, if not a false reading, an error or exaggeration; for at most little more than 600 years could have elapsed from A. u. c. 500 in the lifetime of Gellius. If 600 be read for 700, the scene would be brought at furthest to a period not far from the commencement (A. D. 138) of the reign of Antoninus Pius.

These arguments are not sufficient to destroy the probability arising from Dig. 35. tit. 3. s. 3. § 4, that Sex. Caecilius and Africans are one person. In Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 64, some have proposed to read Cececellus instead of Caecilius, and thus get rid of the passage which is the principal ground for assigning an earlier date to Sex. Caecilius; but this mode of cutting the knot, though it is assisted by fair critical analogies, is unnecessary, for Jovelenus, as we learn from Capitolinus (Autos. Pius, 12), was living in the reign of Antoninus Pius, and a contemporary of Jovelenus and Julianus might easily cite the younger, and be cited by the elder of the two. The pupil in the master's lifetime may have acquired greater authority than the master.

To assist the inquirer in investigating this question—one of the most difficult and celebrated in the biography of Roman jurists—we subjoin a list of the passages in the Corpus Juris where Caecilius or Caecilius Sexius is cited—Caecilius (Dig. 15. tit. 2. s. 1. § 7; 21. tit. 1. s. 14. § 3 (al. Caecilias); 21. tit. 1. s. 14. § 10; 24. tit. 1. s. 64; 35. tit. 2. s. 36. § 4; 48. tit. 5. s. 2. § 5; Cod. 7. tit. 7. s. 1, pr. Sex. Caecilius: Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 2; 33. tit. 9. s. 9. § 9 (qu. Sex. Aedius; compare Gell. iv. 1); 35. tit. 1. s. 71. pr.; 40. tit. 9. s. 12. § 2; 40. tit. 9. s. 12. § 6; 48. tit. 5. s. 13. § 1.

A jurist of the name Sexius is thrice quoted by Ulpian in the Digest (29. tit. 5. s. 1. § 27; 30. tit. 11. s. 32. pr.; 42. tit. 4. s. 7. § 17). Whether this Sexitus be identical with Sex. Caecilius must be a matter of doubt. There may have been a Sexitus, known, like Gais, by a single name. There are, moreover, several jurists with the praenomen Sexius named in the Digest, e. g. Sex. Aedius, Sex. Pedius, Sex. Pomponius. That there were two jurists named Pomponius has been inferred from Dig. 23. tit. 5. s. 41, where Pomponius appears to quote Sex. Pomponius. From this and from the other passages where Sex. Pomponius is named in full (Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 44; 29. tit. 2.
CADELLUS.

s. 30, § 6), the praenomen Sextus has been supposed to be distinctive of the elder Pomponius. But that Sextus, alone, did not designate any one named Pomponius is clear from the phrase "tae Sextus quum Pompeius" in Dig. 30, tit. 11, s. 30, pr., and from the similar phrase "Sextus quoque et Pompeium" occurring in Vat. Fr. 89, § 1 though Beltram-Hellweg, the last editor (in the Bonn Corp. Jur. Rom. Antiquat. i. p. 255), has thought proper to omit the et. From Dig. 42, tit. 4, a. 7, § 19, Vat. Fr. 88, and Galus, ii. 218, we infer, that Sextus was contemporary with Justinianus, Celsus, the son, and that some of his works were digested by Julianus. If, then, Sextus be identified with Sextus Caecilius and Africanus, Africanus must have lived rather earlier than is usually supposed, and can scarcely have been a pupil of Julianus. That, however, a pupil should have been annotated by his preceptor is not without example, if we understand in its ordinary sense the expression "Servius apud Alfenum notatus," in Dig. 17, tit. 2, s. 33, § 6. (See contra, Otto, in Thes. Jur. Rom. Antiquat. ii. p. 6.)

A jurist named Publicius Caecilius is spoken of by Rufilius (Vita J. C. IV. 35) as one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius; but the name Publicius Caecilius is a mere conjectural emendation for Publicius Gallius, who figures in the text of Pompeius, Dig. 1 tit. 2. 1. men. § 44. The conjecture was invited by the unusual blending of two family names in Publicius Gallius. (Menagius, Amoen. Jur. cc. 22, 23; Heiniccius, de Sexto Pompeio, Opera, ed. Genez. iii. 77.) [J. T. G.]

CADELLUS (Kaulias) of Argos, is mentioned by Athenaeus (L. pi. 13) among the writers on the art of fishing; but nothing farther is known about him. [L. S.]

CADELLUS BION. [Bion.]

CADELLUS CALACTIUS (Kaulias Es. Kaktos), or, as he was formerly, though erroneously, surnamed CALANTIANUS, a Greek rhetorician, who lived at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a native of Calo Acte in Sicily (whence his name Calactius). His parents are said by Suidas to have been slaves of the Jewish religion; and Caecilius himself, before he had obtained the Roman franchise, is said to have borne the name Archagathus. He is mentioned by Quintilianus (li. II. § 10, comp. iii. 6, § 47, v. 10, § 7, ix. 1. § 12, 3, §§ 36, 46, 89, 91, 97) along with Dionysius of Halicarnassus as a distinguished Greek rhetorician and grammarian. Respecting the sphere of his activity at Rome, and his success as a teacher of rhetoric, nothing is known; but, from the title of one of his works, we see that he studied Roman oratory along with that of the Greeks. He wrote a great number of works on rhetoric, grammar, and also on historical subjects. All these works are now lost; but they were in high repute with the rhetoricians and critics of the imperial period. (Plut. Dem. 3, Viti. X. Ora. pp. 632, 633, 636, 638, 649; Phot. Bibl. pp. 20, 485, 486, 489, ed. Bekker.) Some of his works were of a theoretical character, others were commentaries on the Greek orators, and others again were of a grammatical or historical kind. The following list is compiled from what is said by Theodorus, and from some passages of other writers: 1. Peri hērōn, (Suid.; Quintil. li. c.) 2. Peri ἀσχήμων. (Alex. de Figur. ii. 9; Theor. de Figur. passim.) 3. Peri χαρακτήρας τῶν δείκτων ἄριστων. 4. Peri Δυναστῶν ἀσφαλείας. (Longin. de Sub. Lib. 32.) 5. Peri Ἀφήνεσιν ἀσφαλείας. (Plut. Vit. X. Ora. pp. 532, c.) 6. Ἀποκτήσεις Δημαρχείων καὶ Δαυταν. 7. Ἀκραίας Δημαρχείων καὶ Καίρων. (Plut. Dem. 3.) 8. Peri Ἰστορίας. (Athen. xi. p. 466.) 9. Τὸν Ἰσαύρην ἐν Αἰγιλί (ἐπιγραφὴν τοῦ Δαυταν. 10. Peri Κλέατας προς τὸν Ἰσαύρην, ἀνάμεσα καὶ τῶν νόμων. 11. Peri τῶν καὶ Ἰσαύρην ἐπιγραφῆς τῶν μύθων. 12. Peri δουλειῶν πολέμων. (Athen. vi. p. 272.) 13. Κάτο τοῦ Σειρίου διο. 14. Εὐκρίτην Λέξεως καὶ Στοιχείων. This work has been much used by Suidas. (See his prefix.) 15. Peri Ἰθώμας, was the first work with this title in antiquity. (Longin.) 1); compare Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit. (§§ 88, notes 10, &c, § 47, note 6, §§ 57, note 4.) [L. S.]

CADELLUS CORNUTUS. [Cornutus.]

CADELLUS CYPRIANUS. [Cyprianus.]

Q. CAECILIUS EPICURU'TA, a grammarian, born at Tarseum, was a freedman of T. Pomponius Atticus, and taught the daughter of his patron, who was afterwards married to M. Agrippa. But, suspecting Agrippus of entertaining designs upon his daughter, he was dismissed. He then lived on the most intimate terms with Cornellius Gallus; and, after the death of the latter, he opened a school at Rome for young men, and is said to have been the first to dispute in Latin extempore, and to give lectures upon Virgil and other modern poets. (Suet. Ire. Gram. 16.)

CADELLUS EUTYCHIDES. [Eutychides.]

CADELLUS NATAL'IS. [Natalis.]

CADELLUS RUFINUS. [Rufinus.]

CADELLUS SIMPLEX. [Simplex.]

CADELLUS STATUUS, a Roman comic poet, the immediate predecessor of Terentius was, according to the accounts preserved by Auclus Gallus (iv. 20) and Hieronymus (in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. cl. 2), by birth an Insulian Gaul, and a native of Milan. Being a slave he bore the servile appellation of Statius, which was afterwards, probably when he received his freedom, converted into a sort of cognomen, and he became known as Caecilius Statius. His death happened b. c. 168, one year after that of Ennius and two years before the representation of the Andria, which had been previously submitted to his inspection and had excited his warm admiration. (Sueton. Vit. Terent.)

The names of at least forty drams by Caecilius have been preserved, together with a considerable number of fragments, but all of them are extremely brief, the two longest extending one (ap. Ant. Gell. ii. 23) to seventeen lines, and the other (Cic. de N. D. xix.) to twelve only. Hence we must rest satisfied with collecting and recording the opinions of those who had the means of forming an estimate of his powers, without attempting to judge independently. The Romans themselves, then, seem to agree in placing Caecilius in the first rank of his own department, classing him for the most part with Plautus and Terence. "Caecilius excels in the arrangement of his plots, Terentianus in the development of character, Plautus in dialogue;" and again, "None rival Titinius and Terentius in depicting character, but Traha and Attillus and Caecilius at once command our feelings," are the observations of Varro (ap. Non. s. = Pocce: Charis. lib. ii. sub fin.)—"We may pronounce Ennius chief among epic poets, Pacuvius among tragic poets, perhaps Caecilius among comic poets." CAECINA.

says Cicero (De Optim. Gen. Div. i.), although in other passages he censures his latinity as impure, (Ad Att. viii. 3, Brut. c. 74.) The dictum of the fashionable critics of the Augustan age is embodied by Horace in the lines (Ep. ii. 1. 59), "Vinere Caecilius gravitate, Terentius arte." Varro's declaration (ii. 17), that "the works of Latin wit were brilliantly displayed by Caecilius, Terentius, and Afranius." "We are most lame in comedy, although the ancients extol Caecilius," is the testimony of Quintilian (x. 1. § 99), while Vulcius Sedigius in an epigram preserved in the Noctes Atticae (xv. 24) pronounces Caecilius first among the nine comic poets there enumerated, the second place being assigned to Plautus, and the sixth to Terence.

This popularity, however, was not acquired at once, for the speaker of the prologue to the Heycnia, while he apologises for reproducing a piece which had already twice failed, reminds the audience that although the works of Caecilius were now listened to with pleasure, several had at first been driven off the stage, while others had with difficulty kept their ground. The whole of the forty plays alluded to above, as far as we can gather from their titles, belong to the class of Paliatiae, that is, were free translations or adaptations of the works of Greek writers of the new comedy. There is a curious chapter in Aulus Gellius (ii. 28), where a comparison is instituted between certain passages in the Ploecium of Caecilius and the corresponding portions of the drama by Menander, from which it was derived. We here gain some knowledge of the manner in which these translations were performed, and observe strongly impressed on them the characters of flatness and rapid heaviness of the Latin imitation when placed in juxtaposition with the sparkling brilliancy of the rich and racy original. To adopt the quaint simile of the grammarians, they resemble each other in the same degree as the bright and precious armour of Glauce resembled the dull and paltry harness of Diomede. [W. R.]

CAECINA, the name of an Etruscan family of Volterrae, one of the ancient cities of Etruria. It seems either to have derived its name from, or given it to, the river Caecina, which flows by the town. Persons of this name are first mentioned in the century before Christ, and they are expressly said to have been native of Volterrae. Under the name there is as frequent occurrence, and it is probable that all these Caecinae were of Etruscan origin. As late as the reign of Honorius, we read of the poet Declus Albinus Caecina [see below], residing at his villa in the neighbourhood of Volterrae; and there is, or was lately, a family of this name at the modern Volterra, which Italian antiquaries would make out to be descended from the ancient Caecinae. There has been discovered in the neighbourhood of Volterra the family tomb of the Caecinae, from which we learn that Caecinum was the Etruscan form of the name. In this tomb there was found a beautiful sarcophagus, on the face of which was inscribed the name of the family. It was divided into several branches, and we accordingly find on the funeral urns the cognomina Casnus and Taphunus: in Latin inscriptions we also meet with the surnames Quadratus and Placidus; and various others occur below. (Müller, Eutrusker, vol. i. p. 416, &c.) The most important persons of this name are:

1. A. CAECINA, of Volterrae, whom Cicero defended in a law-suit, b. c. 69. The argument of this oration, which is of a purely legal nature, cannot be understood without a knowledge of the Roman interdict. It is discussed at length by Keller in the second book of his Seminarium Civilis Libri VI. Turin, 1843. He was probably the father of the following, and not the same person. (Comp. Cic. ad Fam. vi. 9; Orell, Onom. Toll. s. v.)

2. A. CAECINA, son of the preceding, published a libellous work against Caesar, and was in consequence compelled to go into exile after the battle of Pharsalia, b. c. 48. In order to obtain Caesar's pardon, he wrote another work entitled Querelae, which he sent to Cicero for revision. In the collection of Cicero's letters there is rather a long one from Caecina to Cicero, and three of Cicero's to Caecina. (Suet. Caes. 75; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 5-8.)

In 47 Caecina was in Asia, and was recommended by Cicero to the proconsul P. Servilius, the governor of the province (ad Fam. xii. 6); from thence he crossed over to Sicily, and was again recommended by Cicero to Furius Flaccus, the governor of Sicily. (Ad Fam. vi. 9.) From Sicily he went into Africa, and, upon the defeat of the Pompeians there in the same year, b. c. 46, surrendered to Caesar, who spared his life. (Hist. Bell. Afr. 89.)

Caecina was the author of a work on the "Etruscan Discipline," which is referred to by Pliny as one of his authorities for his second book; and it is probably from this work that Seneca quotes (Quaest. Nat. ii. 89) some remarks of Caecina upon the different kinds of lightning. Cicero tells us (ad Fam. vi. 6. § 9), that Caecina was trained by his father in the art of oratory; and Cicero himself otherwise as a man of talent, and possessed of oratorical powers. Seneca (Quaest. Nat. ii. 50) says, that he would have had some reputation in eloquence if he had not been thrown into the shade by Cicero. This must be the same Caecina whose work on the Etruscan Discipline is quoted in the Veronese scholia on the Aeneid (x. 198, ed. Mai).

3. CAECINA of Volterrae, a friend of Octavius, sent by the latter to Cicero in b. c. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 8.) Cicero speaks of him as "Caeccinam quendam Volteramum," which would seem to show that he could not have been the same as the preceding, nor even his son, with whom also Cicero was well acquainted. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 5.)

Caecina was sent by Octavius with proposals to Antony in 41. (Appian, B. C. v. 60.)

4. A. CAECINA SEVERUS, a distinguished soldier and general in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, had served forty campaigns by the year A. D. 15, and lived several years afterwards. (Tac. Ann. i. 64, iii. 33.) He was governor of Moesia in A. D. 6, when the formidable insurrection under the two Batus broke out in the neighbouring provinces of Dalmatia and Pannonia. (Baty.) He immediately marched against the Bucedans in Pannonia, whom he defeated after a long siege, and although many of his troops fell, but was recalled almost immediately afterwards to his own province by the invasions of the Dacians and Sarmatians. In the following year, he gained another victory over the insurgents, who had attacked him while on his march from Moesia to join Germanicus in Pannonia. (Dion Cass. l. 29, 30, 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 112.)

In A. D. 14, Caecina had the command, as legate of Germanicus, of the Roman army in Lower Germany, and was employed by Germanicus, in the following year, in the war against Armenia. With the view of distracting the attention of the enemy, Cæcina was sent with four cohorts through the territory of the Bruciatus to the river Amisia; and when Germanicus determined upon retreating after a hard-fought but indecisive battle with Arminius, he ordered Cæcina to lead back his division of the army to the Rhine. His way lay through an extensive marsh, over which there was a causeway known by the name of the Long Bridges. Here his army was attacked and nearly destroyed by Arminius; but he eventually defeated the Germans with great slaughter, and reached the Rhine in safety. [Arminius.] On account of this victory, he received the insignia of a triumph. (Tac. Ann. ii. 31, 93, 56, 59, 63—68, 72.)

This is the last military command which Cæcina appears to have held. He is mentioned in A. D. 20 as the author of a proposition in the senate that an altar should be erected to the goddess of Vengeance, on account of the suppression of Piso’s conspiracy; and again in A. D. 21, as proposing that the governors of provinces should not be allowed to take their wives with them into their provinces. Tacitus gives a speech of his on the latter of these motions, in which he states, that he had always lived in harmony with his wife, who had borne him six children. His motion, which was opposed by Valerius Messalla and Drusus, was not carried. (Tac. Ann. iii. 18, 53, 84.)

5. Cæcina in Africa was sent to death by the emperor Claudius in A. D. 42. The heroism of his wife Arria on this occasion is mentioned under Arria. His daughter married Thrasea, who was put to death by Nero. (Plin. Ep. iii. 16; Dion Cass. ix. 18; Martial, i. 14; Zonar. xii. 9.)

6. C. Cæcina Largus, consul A. D. 42 with the emperor Claudius, inhabited the magnificent house which formerly belonged to Securunus, the contemporary of Cicero. (Dion Cass. ix. 10; Ascon. in Scour. p. 27, ed. Orelli; Plin. H. N. xvii. 1.)

7. P. Cæcina Largus, one of the chief friends of the emperor Claudius, was perhaps the brother of No. 6, unless indeed he is the same person, and C. should be read in Tacitus instead of P. (Tac. Ann. ii. 31, 54.)

8. Cæcina Turcius, the son of Nero’s nurse, had been appointed in A. D. 56, according to Fabius Rusticus, praefect of the Praetorian troops in the place of Afranius Burrus, but did not enter upon the office, as Burrus was retained in the command through the influence of Sceene. Cæcina was subsequently appointed governor of Egypt by Nero, but was afterwards banished for making use of the baths which had been erected in anticipation of the emperor’s arrival in Egypt. He probably returned from banishment on the death of Nero, A. D. 68, as we find him in Rome in the following year. (Tac. Ann. xii. 20; Suet. Ner. 53; Dion Cass. xxiii. 18; Tac. Hist. iii. 36.)

9. A. Cæcina Albinus (called in the Fasti A. Licinii Cæcina), was quaestor in Baetica in Spain at the time of Nero’s death, A. D. 68, and was one of the foremost in joining the party of Galba. He was rewarded by Galba with the command of a legion in Upper Germany; but, being shortly afterwards detected in embroiling some of the public money, the emperor ordered him to be prosecuted. Cæcina, in revenge, induced his troops to revolt to Vitellius. Cæcina was a great favourite with the soldiers. His personal presence was commanding; he was tall in stature, comely in person, and upright in gait; he possessed considerable ability in speaking; and, as he was ambitious, he used every means to win the favour of his troops. After persuading them to espouse the side of Vitellius, he set out at the beginning of the year (A. D. 69), on his march towards Italy at the head of an army of 30,000 men, the main strength of which consisted in one legion, the twenty-first. In his march through Switzerland, he ravaged the country of the Helvetians in a frightful manner, because they had refused to own the authority of Vitellius. He crossed the Great St. Bernard and marched through northern Italy without meeting with any opposition. Upon entering Italy, he observed greater discipline than he had done previously, and prevented his troops from plundering the country; but his dress gave great offence to the citizens, because he wore in receiving them a military cloak of various colours, and also trousers, which were reckoned as characteristic of barbarians. People were also scandalized at his wife Salonia riding as it were in state upon a beautiful horse, and dressed in purple.

As Placentia was garrisoned by the troops of Otho, who had now succeeded Galba, Cæcina crossed the Po, and proceeded to attack that city. He was, however, repulsed in his attack with considerable loss, and thereupon recrossed the Po and retired to his camp. He was then summoned by Suetonius Paulinus and Calbas, the former a general of great skill and military experience, who frustrated all the plans of Cæcina. Anxious to retrieve his honour before he was joined by Fabius Valens, who was advancing with the other division of the German army, Cæcina determined to make a vigorous effort to gain some decisive advantage. He accordingly laid an ambush at a place called Castorium, twelve miles from Cremona; but his plans were betrayed to the enemy, and he suffered a signal defeat. Shortly afterwards, he was joined by Fabius Valens, and their united forces then gained a victory over Otho’s troops at Bedriacum, which established the power of Vitellius in Italy. The unhappy emperor, however, was now exposed to pillage in every direction, as neither Cæcina nor Valens attempted to restrain his soldiers, the former through desire of preserving his popularity with them, the latter because he himself took part in the plunder.

After obtaining possession of Rome, Cæcina and Valens were advanced to the consulship, and entered upon the office on the 1st of September, A. D. 69. Meantime, Antonius Primus, who had declared in favour of Vespasian, was preparing to invade Italy, and Cæcina was accordingly sent against him. Cæcina met with Antonius in the neighbourhood of Verona, and might with his numerically superior army have easily crushed him; but he resolved to desert the cause of Vitellius, and, concerted measures for that purpose with Lucullus Bassus, who mediated the same treachery and had the command of Vitellius’s fleet. But when he attempted to persuade his soldiers to take the oath of allegiance to Vespasian, they rose against him and put him in irons. In this state of things, they were attacked by Antonius, who conquered them near Bedriacum, and forthwith proceeded to assault Cremona, where most of the conquered had taken refuge. Affirmed at the success of Antonius, Cæcina was released CAECULUS, by his soldiers, and sent to Antonius to intercede on their behalf. Antonius despatched Caecinus to Vespasian, who treated him with great honour. When the news of his treachery reached Rome, he was deprived of his consulate, and Roscius Regulus elected in his stead. (Tib. Hist. i. 52, 53, 61, 67—70, ii. 20—25, 30, 41—44, 71, 99, 100, iil. 13, 14, 31; Dion Cass. lxxv. 10, 14; Joseph. B. J. iv. 11. § 3.)

Nothing more is heard of Caecinus till the latter end of the reign of Vespasian (A. D. 70), when he entered into a plot against the emperor, and was slain, by order of Titus, as he rose from a banquet in the imperial palace. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 16; Suet. Tit. 6.) According to Aurelius Victor (Epit. 10), Caecina was put to death by Titus because he suspected him of intriguing with his mistress Berenice. 10. LUCINUS CAECINA, a senator attached to Otho's party. A. D. 69 (Tib. Hist. ii. 53), may perhaps be the Lucinna Caecina, a man of praetorian rank, mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xx. 18. s. 76.)

CAECINA, DECIVS ALBUNCUS, a Roman satirist who flourished under ArcADIUS and Honorius. Rutilius Namatanianus in his Itinerary (i. 590) addresses a certain Decius, a man of high station, whom he styles "Luculli nobile pignum," and whose father he pronounces to be not inferior as a poet to Tumus and juvenile. But this Decius, the son, is supposed to be the same person with the Decius, son of Albinus, introduced by Macrobius as conversing with Postumianus (Saturn. i. 2, init.), and Decius the father is identified with Caecina Albinus, represented in the same chapter of the unnaturalist as the friend and companion of Aurelius Symmachus. Moreover, it is maintained that the elder Decius, the satirist, is the individual to whom several of the epistles of Symmachus are addressed (Ep. vii. 35—65, comp. viii. 21), that he was praefectus urbi in A. D. 302 (Cod. Theod. 7, tit. 15. s. 18; Gruter, Corp. Inscr. p. xclxxvii.), and that from the success with which he followed in the foot-steps of Auruncanus's bard, he was known as the Lucilius of his day. Hence the expression "Lu- cilli (Luculli) nobile pignum" applied to his son, and hence the mistake of some historians of literature who have included a Lucullus or Lucolius (corrupt forms of Lucilius) among the satirical writers of the fifth century. It is beyond question that the above opinions believe that the epigrams in the Greek Anthology bearing the name of Lucilius, and assigned by Fabricius to a writer who lived at the end of the fourth century, are in reality the productions of the subject of this article. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 719.)

The web of conjecture by which all these facts are connected has been very ingeniously woven by Wernsdorf, but in many places the thread is too frail to bear rough handling. (Wernsdorf, Postol. Latin. Min. vol. iii. p. xxiii., vol. iv. p. 192.) [W. R.]

C. CAECICUS, a friend of Lentulus Spinther, the younger, spoken of by Cicero in b. c. 40. (Cic. ad Att. tiii. 13.)

CAECULUS, an ancient Italian hero of Praeneste. The account which Servius (ad Aen. vii. 676) gives of him runs as follows: At Praeneste there were pontifices and dii indigetes as well as at Rome. There were however two brothers called indigetes (the common reading is ditii instead of indigetes, but is evidently wrong) who had a sister. One occasion, while she was sitting by the fire of the hearth, a spark fell into her lap, whereby she became the mother of a son, whom she exposed near the temple of Jupiter. Here the infant was found, lying by the side of a fire, by maidens who happened to come to fetch water. The fire near which he had been found led to his being considered a son of Vulcan. This child was Caeculus, who, after growing up to manhood, and living for a time as a robber, together with a number of comrades who were shepherds, built the town of Praeneste. He invited the neighbourhood to the celebration of public games at Praeneste, and when they were assembled, he called upon them to settle in the newly built town, and he gave weight to his demand by declaring that he was a son of Vulcan. But when the people disbelieved his assertions, he prayed Vulcan to send a sign, whereupon the whole assembly was surrounded by a bright flame. This miracle induced the people to recognize him as the son of Vulcan, and to settle at Praeneste. The substance of this story is also given by Solinus (ii. 9). The two brothers (caecules) mentioned in this story are, according to Hirtung, the well-known twins who were worshipped at Rome as Lucrus and Penates, and their sister a priestess of the hearth. Caeculus, too, is, like Vulcan, a divinity of the hearth, because he is the son of Vulcan, was conceived by a priestess of the hearth, and was found near a hearth (fire). For the same reason, Hirtung connects the name Caeculus with alex and caleo. The manner in which Caeculus obtains settlers for his new town resembles the means by which Romulus contrived to get women for his Romans; but a still greater similarity exists between the stories of the conception of Caeculus and of king Servius Tullius. This resemblance, together with the connexion of Servius Tullius with Cnae Caecina, seem to indicate that Servius Tullius was the representative of the same idea at Rome as Caeculus was at Praeneste. (Hirtung, Die Relig. d. Röm. i. p. 88, &c.; Klauser, Aeneas u. d. Penat. p. 761, &c.)

CAECUS, a surname of Ap. Claudius, censor b. c. 312 and consul in 307 and 296. His life is related under Claudius, as he is better known under the latter name.

CAECYDAE, GENS, plebeian. A person of this name was a tribune of the plebs as early as b. c. 475, and perhaps one of the gens who obtained the consulship was Q. Claudius Nucum, in b. c. 359. The only cognomen occurring in this gens is NOCTUA: for those who have no surname, see CAECIDUS. The name does not occur at all in the later times of the republic; but a Caecidius is mentioned twice by Juvenal (xii. 197, xvi. 46).

CAECIDIVS. 1. L. CAECIDIVS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 475, brought to trial Sp. Servilius Priscus Structus, the consul of the preceding year. (Liv. ii. 32; Dionys. ix. 28.)

2. M. CAECIDIVS, is said to have told the tribune of the plebs, in b. c. 391, that he had heard, in the silence of the night, a superhuman voice, commanding him to inform the magistrates that the Gauls were coming. (Liv. v. 32; Plut. Camill. 14; Zonaras, vii. 23.) This appears to be the same Caecidius, a centurion, who was elected as their commander by the Romans that had fled to Veii after the destruction of the city by the Gauls, b. c. 390. He led out his countrymen against the Etruscans, who availed themselves of the misfortunes of the Romans to plunder the Veientine territory. After this he proposed that Camillus should be invited to become their general, and according to another account he himself carried to Carillus the decree of the senate appointing him to the command. (Liv. v. 45, 46; Appian, Celt. 5.)

3. C. CAELIUS, one of the legates of the consul L. Papirius Cursor, commanded the cavalry in the great battle with the Samnites in b. c. 293. (Fest. i. 40.)

4. Q. CAELIUS Q. F. Q. N., consul b. c. 286, died in his consulsate, and was succeeded in the office by M. Attilius Regulus. (Fast. Capit.)

CAEDEICUS, two mythical personages in Virgil’s Aeneid (ix. 360, x. 747). [L. S.]

CAELAS or CAELIUS VIBERNA, the leader of an Etruscan army, who is said to have come to Rome at the invitation of one of the early Roman kings, and to have settled with his troops on the hill called after him the Caelian. In whose reign however he came, was differently stated, as Tacitus observes. (Ann. iv. 65.) Tacitus himself places his arrival at Rome in the reign of Tarquinus Priscus, and this is in accordance with a manuscript reading of the Fasti Romani (c. Turrivium), in which, moreover, Caeles and Vibenna are spoken of as brothers. Festus, however, in another passage (c. Caelius Monas), Dionysius (ii. 36), and Varro (L. L. v. 46, ed. Müller), state that Caelus came to Rome in the age of Romulus to assist him against the Sabines. The Etruscan story, which is preserved in the speech of the emperor Claudius, of which considerable fragments were discovered at Lyons, differs considerably from the preceding ones. According to the Etruscan account, Servius Tullius, afterwards king of Rome, was originally a follower of Caelus Vibenna, whose fortunes he shared, and that afterwards overcame by a multitude of disasters he migrated to Rome with the remains of the army of Caelus, and occupied the Caelian hill, which he called after the name of his former commander. It is probable that these different accounts refer to two distinct Etruscan migrations to Rome, and that Caelus Vibenna is thus represented as the leader of each. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 381, &c.; Müller, Etrustr., vol. i. p. 116, &c.)

CAELSTINUS, an historian of the Empire referred to by Trebellius Pollio in the biography of the younger Varicinius. We know nothing more about him. [W. R.]

CAELIA or CAELIA, the third wife of the dictator Sulla, (whom he divorced on account of her wantonness. (P. R. Suet. v. 6.)

CAELIA or CAELIA GENS, plebeian. In manuscript the name is usually written Caelius, while on coins it generally occurs in the form of Coelius or Coelius, though we find on one coin L. Caelius Tarx. (Fechel, v. pp. 156, 175.) From the similarity of the names, Caelius is frequently confounded with Caelius. The gens traced its origin to the Etruscan leader, Caelus Vibenna, in the time of the Roman kings, but no members of it obtained the higher offices of the state till the beginning of the first century b. c.; the first who obtained the consulship was C. Caelius Calidus in b. c. 89. There were only two family-names in this gens. Caelius and Rubres; the other cognomina are personal surnames, chiefly of freedmen. For those without a surname see CAELIUS.

CAELIOMONTANUS (not Coelionomatus), the name of a family of the Virginia gens. Almost all the members of this gens had the surname Tri-

CAELIUS. costus, and the name of Caelionomantus was undoubtedly given to the family dwelling on the Caelian hill, to distinguish it from others of the same gens.

1. T. VIRGILII TRICOSTUS CAELIOMONTANUS, consul b. c. 400 with A. Postumius Albus Regilomnis, in which year, according to some annalists, the battle of the lake Regillus was fought. According to the same accounts, Postumius resigned the consulsate because he suspected his colleague, and was afterwards made dictator. The battle, however, is usually placed two years earlier. [Arb. No. 1.] (Liv. ii. 21; Dionys. vi. 2.)

2. A. VIRGILII A. F. TRICOSTUS CAELIOMON-

TANUS, called by Dionysius A. Virginius Montanus, consul b. c. 494, the year in which the plebs ascended to the Sacred Mountain. Previous to the accession he had marched against the Volsci, whom he had defeated in battle, and had taken one of their chief towns, Velitrae. He is mentioned by Dionysius as one of the ten envoys sent by the senate to treat with the plebs. (Liv. ii. 29–30; Dionys. vi. 34, 42, 69; Ascon. in Orat. p. 76, ed. Orell.)

3. A. VIRGILII A. F. A. N. TRICOSTUS CAE-

LIOMONTANUS, son of No. 2, consul in 469, marched against the Aquii, whom he eventually defeated through the valour of his soldiers, though his army was nearly destroyed in consequence of his own negligence. (Liv. ii. 63; Dionys. ix. 66; Diod. xi. 70.)

4. SP. VIRGILII A. F. A. N. TRICOSTUS CAELI-

OMONTANUS, son of No. 2, consul b. c. 456, in whose consulship the lud suicide are said to have been celebrated the second time. (Liv. iii. 31; Dionys. x. 31; Diod. xii. 4; Censor. de Dio Nat. 17.)

5. T. VIRGILII T. F. TRICOSTUS CAELIOMON-

TANUS, consul b. c. 448. (Liv. iii. 65; Dionys. xi. 51; Diod. xii. 27.)

CAELIUS or COELIUS. 1. M. CAELIUS, tribune of the plebs in the time of M. Cato, the censor, whom Cato attacked in a speech, in which among other hard things he said, that Caelius would speak or hold his tongue for a piece of bread. (Gell. i. 15.)

2. L. CAELIUS, commanded as legate in Ilyrium in the war against Perseus, b. c. 169, and was defeated in an attempt which he made to obtain possession of Uscana in the country of the Penezae, a town which was garrisoned by the Macedonians. (L. xiii. 21.)

3. P. CAELIUS, was placed in the command of Piacetia by the consul Cn. Octavius, b. c. 87, and when the town was taken by Cinsa’s army, he caused himself to be put to death by L. Petronius, that he might not fall into the hands of the Marian party. (Val. Max. iv. 7, § 5.)

4. P. CAELIUS, perhaps a son of the preceding, praetor with Verres, b. c. 74. (Cic. c. Ferr. i. 60.)

5. M. CAELIUS, a Roman knight, from whom Verres took away, at Lilybaemon, several silver vases. (Cic. Ferr. i. 47.) As Cecero says that this Caelius was still young at this time, b. c. 71, he may be the same M. Caelius who is mentioned in the oration for Flaccus, b. c. 59. (Cic. pro Flacc. 4.)

6. C. CAELIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 51, put his veto with several of his colleagues upon the decrees of the senate directed against Caesar (C. Cael. ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8.)
CAEUS.

7. Q. Caecilius, a friend and follower of M. Antonius, attacked by Cicero. (Phil. xiii. 2, 12.)

8. Caecilius, an usherer, with whom Cicero had some dealings. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 5, 6, vii. 3, xiii. 3.)

CAECILIUS ANTIEMETER. [ANTIEMETER.]
CAECILIUS APICCIUS. [APICIUS.]
CAECILIUS AURELIANUS. [AURELIANUS.]
CAECILIUS BALBINUS. [BALBINUS.]
CAECILIUS CURSOR. [CURSOR.]
CAECILIUS POLLIO. [POLIO.]
CAECILIUS ROSCIUS. [ROSCIUS.]
CAECILIUS SABINUS. [SABINUS.]
CAECILIUS FIRMIANUS SYMPOSIUS. [SYMPOSIUS.]
CAECILIUS VINCIANUS. [VINCIANUS.]

CAENAS. The concubine of Vespasian, was originally a freed woman of Antonia, the mother of the emperor Claudius. After the death of his wife, Flavia Domitilla, Vespasian took her to live with him and treated her almost as his legal wife. She had very great influence with Vespasian, and acquired immense wealth from the presents presented to her by the emperors. After her death, Vespasian kept many concubines in her place. ('Dion Cass. liv. 14; Suet. Vesp. 3, 21, Dom. 12.)

CAEPIO.

M. CAEPARIUS. 1. Of Tarracon, a town in Lattim, was one of Catiline's conspirators, who was to incite the shepherds in Apulia to rise, and who was on the point of leaving Rome for the purpose when the conspirators were apprehended by Cicero. He escaped from the city, but was overtaken in his flight, carried back to Rome, and committed to the custody of Cn. Terentius. He was afterwards executed with the other conspirators in the Tamillum, b.c. 63. (Cic. in Cat. III. 6; Sall. Cat. 46, 47, 55.)

2. A different person from the preceding, mentioned by Cicero in b.c. 46. (Ad Fam. ix. 23.)

C. and L. CAEPASII, two brothers, contemporaries of the orator Hortensius, obtained the quiescentia, though they were unknown men, by means of their oratory. They were very industrious and laborious, but their oratory was of rather a rude and unpolished kind. (Cic. Brut. 69, pro Cluent. 29, 21; Julius Victor, P. 248, ed. Orelli; Quintil. iv. 2 § 19, vi. 1 § 41, 3 § 39.)

CAEPIAS was, according to Dion Cassius (xliv. 1), the surname of C. Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus. This cognomen, however, is not mentioned by any other writer, nor even by Dion Cassius himself in any other passage.

CAEPIO, the name of a patrician family of the Servilia gens.

STEMMA CAEPIONUM.

9. Q. Servilius Caepio, Tribunes Militum, b.c. 72.

12. Q. Servilius Caepio Brutus, the murderer of C. Julius Caesar. The son of No. 10, but adopted by No. 9.

BRUTUS, No. 21.

1. CN. SERVILIUS CN. F. CN. N. CAEPIO, consul b.c. 253, in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, C. Sempornius Blaneas, to the coast of Africa. For an account of this expedition, see BLANIE, No. 1.

2. CN. SERVILIUS CN. F. CN. N. CAEPIO, was probably a grandson, and not a son, of No. 1. He was elected pontiff in the place of C. Papirius Maos, b.c. 213; curule aedile in 207, when he celebrated the Roman games three times; praetor in 205, when he obtained the city jurisdiction; and consul in 203. In his consulate he had Bruttia assigned to him as his province, and he was the last Roman general who fought with Hannibal in Italy. The engagement took place in the neighbourhood of Crotona, but no particulars of it are preserved. When Hannibal quitted Italy, Caepio passed over into Sicily, with the intention of crossing from thence to Africa. In order to prevent this, the senate, who feared that the consuls would not obey their commands, created a dictator, P. Sulpicius Galba, who recalled Caepio to Italy. In b.c. 192, Caepio was sent with other legates into Greece, to encourage the Roman allies in the prospect of the war with Antiochus. He died in the pestilence in 174. (Liv. xiv. 22, xxviii. 10, 28, 45, xxix. 36, xxx. 1, 19, 24, xxxv. 23, xli. 20.)

3. CN. SERVILIUS CN. F. CN. N. CAEPIO, son of...
No. 2 (Liv. xii. 26) curule aedile b. c. 179, when he celebrated the Roman games over again, on account of prodigies which had occurred; and praetor b. c. 174, when he obtained the province of Further Spain. On his return to Italy, he was one of the ambassadors sent into Macedonia to renounce the Roman alliance with Perseus; and he was consul in 169 with Q. Marcus Philippus. Caepio remained in Italy; his colleague had Macedonia as his province. (Liv. xl. 59, xii. 26, xii. 25, xii. 13, 14, 17; Cic. Brut. 20, de Senect. 5.)

4. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, son of No. 3, consul in b. c. 142, was adopted by Q. Fabius Maximus. [Maximus.]

5. CN. Servilius CN. f. CN. N. CAEPIO, son of No. 3, was consul b. c. 141 (Cic. Att. xii. 5, de Pite. ii. 10). Rome conquered in 125. In his ownership one of the aqueducts, the Aqua Tupula, for supplying Rome with water, was constructed. (Frontin. de Aquaed. 8; Cic. Ver. i. 55; Vell. Pat. ii. 10.)

6. CN. Servilius CN. f. CN. N. CAEPIO, son of No. 3, consul b. c. 140 with C. Laelius (Cic. Brut. 43; Obsequi. 82), succeeded his brother, Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, in the conduct of the war against Viriathus in Lusitania. His brother had made a treaty of peace with Viriathus, which had been confirmed by the senate; but Caepio, by representing that the treaty was unfavourable to the interests of Rome, persuaded the senate to allow him at first to injure Viriathus, as far as he could, secretly, and finally to declare open war against him. Hereupon, Viriathus sent two of his most faithful friends to Caepio to offer terms of peace; but the consul persuaded them, by promises and great rewards, to assassinate their master. Accordingly, on their return to their own party, they murdered Viriathus while he was asleep in his tent, and afterwards fled to Caepio. But this murder did not put an immediate stop to the war. After burying the corpse of Viriathus with great magnificence, his soldiers elected Tantalus as their general, who undertook an expedition against Seguntum. Re­pulsed from thence, he crossed the Bootes, closely pursued by Caepio, and, despairing of success, at length surrendereed his forces to the Roman general. Caepio deprived them of their arms, but assigned them a certain portion of land, that they might not turn robbers from want of the necessaries of life. (Appian. Hisp. 70, 75, 76; Liv. Epit. 54; Flor. ii. 17; Evutrop. iv. 16; Oros. v. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 1; Val. Max. ix. 6, § 4; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Hist. 71; Diod. xxxii. Ecl. 4.) Caepio trented his soldiers with great cruelty and severity, which rendered him so unpopular, that he was nearly killed by his cavalry on one occasion. (Dion Cass. Frag. xiii. p. 33, ed. Reimar.)

The two last-mentioned brothers; Nos. 5 and 6, are classed by Ciceró (Brut. 25) among the Roman orators. He says, that they assisted their clients much by their advice and oratory, but still more by their authority and influence. They appeared as witnesses against Q. Pompeius. (Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1; Cic. pro Font. 7.)

7. Q. Servilius Q. F. CN. N. CAEPIO, son of No. 6, was praetor about b. c. 110, and obtained the province of Further Spain, as we learn from the triumphal Fasti, that he triumphed over the Lusitanians, as praetor, in b. c. 108. His triumph is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (vi. 9, § 13); but Eutropius (iv. 27) is the only writer, as far as we are aware, who refers to his victories in Lusitania. He was consul, b. c. 106, with C. Attius Secundus, and proposed a law for restoring the judicata to the senators, of which they had been deprived by the Sempronian lex of C. Gracchus. That this was the object of Caepio's law, appears tolerably certain from a passage of Tacitus (Ann. xii. 60); though many modern writers have inferred, from Julius Obsequens (c. 101), that his law opened the judicata to the senate and the equites in common. It seems, however, that this law was repealed shortly afterwards.

As the Cimbri and Tuatomes were threatening Italy, Caepio received the province of Gallia Narbonensis. The inhabitants of Tolosa, the capital of the Teutoeae, had revolted to the Cimbri; and Q. Titus, one of the most wealthy cities of the province, was seized by their allies and allies in Gaul in the following year (b. c. 105), in which some writers place the sack of Tolosa; and, that there might be a still stronger force to oppose the Cimbri, the consul Cn. Mallius, or Marinus, was sent with another consular army into Gallia Narbonensis. As however Caepio and Mallius could not agree, they divided the province between them, one having the country west, and the other the country east, of the Rhone. Soon afterwards, M. Aurelius Senurus was defeated by the Cimbri, and Mallius went for Caepio, that they might unite their forces to oppose the common enemy. Caepio at first refused to come, but afterwards, fearing lest Mallius should reap all the glory by defeating the Cimbri, he promised the Rhone and marched towards the consul. Still, however, he would hold no communication with him; he encamped separately; and that he might have an opportunity of finishing the war himself, he pitched his camp between the consul and the enemy. At this juncture, with such a formidable enemy in their front, the utmost prudence and unanimity were needed by the Roman generals: their discord was fatal. The Roman soldiers saw this, and compelled Caepio, against his will, to unite his forces with those of Mallius. But this did not mend matters. The discord of Mallius and Caepio increased more and more, and they appear to have separated again before they were attacked by the Cimbri, as Florus speaks of the defeat of Mallius and Caepio as two separate events. But whether they were attacked together or separately, the result was the same. Both armies were utterly defeated; 80,000 soldiers and 40,000 camp-followers perished; only ten men are said to have escaped the slaughter. It was one of the most complete defeats which the Romans had ever sustained; and the day on which it happened, the 6th of October, became one of the black days in the Roman calendar. (Dion Cass. Frag. xviii. xix. pp. 41, 42; Liv. Epit. 67; Oros. v. 10; Sall. Juv. 114; Flor. iii. 3; Tac.
CAEPIO.

Germ. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Val. Max. iv. 7 § 3; Plut. Mor. 19, Sect. 3, Lucull. 37.

Caepio survived the third tunica. He was deprived of the imperium by the people. Ten years afterwards (a. c. 95) he was brought to trial by the tribune C. Norbanus on account of his misconduct in this war, and although he was defended by the orator L. Licinius Crassus, who was consul in that year (Cic. Brut. 44), and by many others of the Roman aristocracy, he was condemned and his property confiscated. He himself was cast into prison, where according to one account he died, and his body, mangled by the common executioner, was afterwards exposed to view on the Gemonian steps. (Val. Max. vi. 9 § 13.) But according to the more generally received account, he escaped from prison through the assistance of the tribune L. Antistius Regulus, and lived in exile at Smyrna. (Val. Max. iv. 7 § 3; Cic. pro Balb. ll. 11.)

8. Q. Servilius Caepio, questor urbanus in B.C. 100. He may have been the son of No. 7, but as the latter in all probability obtained the consulship at the usual age, it is not likely that he had a son old enough to obtain the questorship six years afterwards. In his questorship Caepio opposed the lex fragmentaria of the tribune L. Saturninus, and when Saturninus insisted upon putting the law to the vote, notwithstanding the veto of his colleagues, Caepio interrupted the voting by force of arms, and thus prevented the law from being carried. This accused in consequence of treason (oneiurias), and it was perhaps upon this occasion that T. Betulius Barrus spoke against him. The oration of Caepio in reply was written for him by L. Aelius Præconemius Silo, who composed orations for him as well as for other distinguished Romans at that time. (Auct. ad Herenn. i. 12; Cic. Brut. 46, 56.)

In the contests of the year B.C. 91, Caepio deposed the cause of the senate and espoused that of the equites in opposition to the lex judicaria of the tribune M. Livius Drusus, who proposed to divide the judicium between the senate and the equites. Caepio and Drusus had formerly been very intimate friends, and had exchanged marriage vows, which Caepio was anxious to understand, that Caepio had married a sister of Drusus and Drusus a sister of Caepio, and that they had exchanged wives, as some modern writers would interpret it. The enmity between the brothers-in-law is said to have arisen from competition in bidding for a ring at a public auction (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 1. s. 6), but whatever may have been its origin, it was now of a most determined and violent character. The city was torn asunder by their contentions, and seemed almost to be divided between two hostile armies. To strike terror into the senate, Caepio accused two of the most distinguished leaders of the body, M. Aurelius Scarpus and Quintus Cassius, both of whom were accused of extortion (repetulcius), and L. Marcus Philippus, the consul, of bribery (emulus). Both accusations, however, seem to have failed, and Scarpus, before his trial came on, retaliated by accusing Caepio himself. (Dion Cass. Frug. cix. ex. p. 45; Flor. iii. 17; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 9. 41; Cic. pro Dom. 46, Brut. 62, pro Scaur. 1; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 21, ed. Orelli.) The assassination of Drusus shortly afterwards was supposed by some to have been committed at the instigation of Caepio. (Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 66.)

On the breaking out of the social war in the following year, B.C. 90, Caepio again accused his old enemy Scarpus under the provisions of the Varius, but this had been passed to bring all to trial who had been instrumental in causing the revolt of the allies. (Cic. pro Scaur. 1; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 22.) Caepio took an active part in this war, in which he served as the legate of the consul P. Rutillus Lupus, and upon the death of the latter he received, in conjunction with C. Marius, the command of the consular army. Caepio at first gained some success, but was afterwards decoyed into an ambush by Pompeius, the leader of the enemy's army, who had pretended to revolt to him, and he lost his life in consequence. (a. c. 90.)

(Appian, B. C. i. 40, 44; Liv. Epit. 73.)

9. Q. Servilius Caepio, son of No. 8, was a tribune of the people in the wars against Sestius, B.C. 72. He died shortly afterwards at Aenus in Thrace, on his road to Asia. He is called the father of Cato Uticensis, because his mother Livia had been married previously to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis. (Plut. Cat. Min. 8, 11.)

10. 11. Serviliae. [Serviliae.]

12. Q. Servilius Caepio Brutus. [Brutus, No. 21.]

13. Q. Servilius Caepio, the father of Servilia, the wife of Claudius, perished by shipwreck. Who he was is uncertain. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 20.)

14. 15. Q. Servilius Caepio, consul in B.C. 50, one of Caesar's supporters in his consulship (a. c. 59) against Bibulus. He had been betrothed to Caesar's daughter, Julia, but was obliged to give her up in favour of Pompey. As a compensation for her loss, he received the promise of Pompey's daughter, who had likewise been betrothed to Faustus Sulla. (Appian, B. C. i. 14; Suet. Cas. 21; Plut. Cas. 14, Pomp. 47; comp. Dion Cass. xxxviii. 9.)

CAEPIO, FANNIUS, conspired with Murena against Augustus in B.C. 27. He was accused of treason (majestas) by Tiberius, and condemned by the judges in his absence, as he did not stand his trial, and was shortly afterwards put to death. (Dion Cass. iv. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 91; Suet. Aug. 19, 12; Senec. de Clem. 9, de Invent. Vit. 5.)

CAEPIO CRISPIPUS, questor in Bithynia, accused Numius Marcellus, the governor of that province, of treason in A.D. 15. From this time he became one of the state informers under Tiberius. (Tusc. Ann. i. 74.) He may be the same as the Caepio mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 4. s. 10), who lived in the reign of Tiberius, and seems to have written a work on botany.

CAEREILLIA, a Roman lady of the time of Cicero, who was distinguished for her requirements and a great love of philosophical pursuits. She was connected with Cicero by friendship, and studied his philosophical writings with great zeal. She was a woman of considerable property, and had large possessions in Asia. These estates and their procurators were strongly recommended, in B.C. 46, by Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 72) to the care of P. Servilius. Cicero, in his recommendatory letter, speaks of her as an intimate friend, though, on other occasions, he seems to be rather inclined to sneer at her. (Ad Att. xii. 51, xiii. 21, 22, xiv. 19, xx. 1, 26.) Q. Fufius Calenus charges Cicero with having, in his old age, had an adulterous connexion with Caerellia. (Dion Cass. xvi. 12.) How far this charge may be true, it is not easy to say; the only facts which are attested beyond a doubt.
are, that Cicero was intimate with her during the latter period of his life, and that letters of his addressed to her were extant in the days of Quintilian. (vi. 3. § 112.) The charge of Calenus would acquire some additional weight, if it were certain that in the 13th Idyll of Ausonius the name Cicero has dropped out before the words in proceps omnibus ostentor coercitatem, in epistola ad Caeciliam subesse postulatam.

[LS]

CAESAR, the name of a patrician family of the Julia gens, which was one of the most ancient in the Roman state, and traced its origin to Iulus, the son of Aeneas. [JULIA GENSI.] It is uncertain which member of this gens first obtained the surname of Caesar, but the first who occurs in history is Sex. Julius Caesar, praetor in B.C. 208. The origin of the name is equally uncertain. Scaurus, in his life of Aelius Verus (c. 2), mentions four different opinions respecting its origin:

1. That the word signified an elephant in the language of the Moors, and was given as a surname to one of the Julii because he had killed an elephant.
2. That it was given to one of the Julii because he had been cut (cesari) out of his mother's womb after her death; or
3. Because he had been born with a great quantity of hair (cesarii) on his head; or
4. Because he had azure-coloured (caesi) eyes of an almost supernatural kind. Of these opinions the third, which is also given by Festus (s. v. Caesar), seems to come nearest the truth. Caesar and cesarius are both probably borrowed with the Sanskrit idea, "hair," and it is quite in accordance with the Roman custom for a surname to be given to an individual from some peculiarity in his personal appearance. The second opinion, which seems to have been the most popular one with the ancient writers (Serv. ad Verg. Aen. I. 290; Plin. H. N. vii. 7. s. 9; Solin. I. § 62; Zonar. x. 11), arose without doubt from a false etymology. With respect to the first, which was the one adopted, says Sparaissius (L. c.), by the most learned men, it is impossible to disprove it absolutely, as we know next to nothing of the ancient Moorish language: but it has no inherent probability in it; and the statement of Servius (L. c.) is undoubtedly false, that the grandfather of the dictator obtained the surname on account of killing an elephant with his own hand in Africa, as there were several of the Julii with this name before his time.

An inquiry into the etymology of this name is of some interest, as no other name has ever obtained such celebrity—"clarum et duratum cum aternitate mundi nomen." (Sap. Adel. Ver. 1.) It was assumed by Augustus as the adopted son of the dictator, and was by Augustus handed down to his adopted son Tiberius. It continued to be used by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members either by adoption or female descent of Caesar's family; but though the family became extinct with Nero, succeeding emperors still retained it as part of their titles, and it was the practice to prefix it to their own name, as for instance, Imperator Caesar Divi Filius Augustus. When Hadrian adopted Aelius Verus, he allowed the latter to take the title of Caesar; and from this time, though the title of Augustus continued to be confined to the reigning prince, that of Caesar was also granted to the second person in the state and the heir presumptive to the throne.

In the following stemma the connexion of the earlier members of the family is to a considerable extent conjectural. A full account of the lives of all the Caesars mentioned below is given in Drummam's Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 113, &c.

17. Sex. Julius Caesar
    Cos. B. c. 91.
1. Sex. Julius Caesar, praetor B. C. 208, obtained the province of Sicily. On his return he was one of the ambassadors sent to the consul T. Quinctius Crispinus, after the death of the other consul, Marcellus, to tell him to name a dictator, if he could not himself come to Rome to hold the comitia. (Liv. xxvii. 21, 22, 23.)

2. L. Julius Caesar, grandfather of No. 6, as we learn from the Capitoline Fasti.

3. L. Julius (Caesar), probably son of No. 2, praetor B. C. 183, had the province of Gallia Cisalpina, and was commanded to prevent the Transalpine Gauls, who had come into Italy, from building the town of Aquileia, which they had commenced. (Liv. xxxix. 49.)

4. Sex. Julius Caesar, probably son of No. 2, of the soldiers, B. C. 181, in the army of the consul L. Aemilius Paullus. In 170 he was sent, as a legate, with C. Sempronius Blaesus to restore Abdera to liberty. (Liv. xl. 27, xliii. 4.)

5. L. Julius (Caesar), probably son of No. 3, praetor B. C. 186. (Liv. xiv. 44.)

6. Sex. Julius Sex. F. L. N. Caesar, curule aedile B. C. 165, exhibited, in conjunction with his colleague Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, the Heyra of Terence at the Megalesian games. (Tit. Heyr. Ter.) He was consul in 157 with L. Aurelius Orestes. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3. s. 17; Polyb. xxxii. 20; Fast. Capit.)

7. Sex. Julius Caesar, probably son of No. 6, praetor urbanae in B. C. 123. (Cic. pro Dom. 53; ad Her. ii. 13.)

8. L. Julius Caesar, son of No. 6, and father of No. 9 (Fast. Cap.), married Popillia, who had been previously married to Q. Catulus.

9. L. Julius L. F. Sex. N. Caesar, called erroneously by Appian, Sex. Julius Caesar, son of No. 8, was consul, B. C. 90, with P. Rutilius Lupus, when the Social war broke out. His legions in this war were Sulla, Caesarus, P. Lentulus, T. Diarius, and M. Marcellus. He commenced the campaign by attacking the Samnites, but was defeated by their general, Vettius Catō, and fled to Asser- nia, which still remained faithful to the Romans. Having, however, received a reinforcement of Gallic and Numidian auxiliaries, he was soon able to face the enemy again, and pitched his camp near Acerrae in Campania, which was besieged by the enemy. Here a great number of the Numidians deserted, and Caesar, suspecting the fidelity of the remainder, sent them back to Africa. Encouraged by this defection, Papius Mutilus, the general of the enemy, proceeded to attack Caesar’s camp, but was repulsed with a loss of 6000 men. This victory caused great joy at Rome; and the citizens laid aside the military cloaks (saga), which they had assumed at the beginning of the war. It was not followed, however, by any important results: on the contrary, Caesar withdrew from Acerrae almost immediately afterwards, without having relieved the town. Meanwhile, the other consul, Rutilius Lupus, had been defeated and slain in battle by Vettius Catō; and Caesar himself, while marching to Acerrae to make another attempt to raise the siege of the town, was defeated with great loss by Marius Egnatius. (Appian, B. C. i. 40—42, 45; Vell. Pat. ii. 15; Liv. Epit. 73; Plin. H. N. ii. 29. s. 30; Obsequ. c. 115; Cic. de Div. i. 3, pro Font. 15, pro Plane. 21; Flor. iii. 18. § 12; Oros. v. 18.)

These disasters, the fear of a war with Mithridates, and apprehension of a revolt of all the allies, induced Caesar to bring forward a law for granting the citizenship to the Latins and the allies which had remained faithful. (Lect. Caesar. II.) It appears, however, to have contained a provision, giving each allied state the opportunity of accepting what was offered them; and many preferred their original condition as federate states to incurring the obligations and responsibilities of Roman citizens. (Cic. pro Dab. 8; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Gell. iv. 4.)

In the following year, B. C. 39, Caesar’s command was prolonged. He gained a considerable victory over the enemy, and afterwards proceeded to besiege Asculum, before which he died of disease, according to the statement of Appian. (B. C. i. 48.) This, however, is clearly mistaken: he was probably ordered to leave the army in consequence of serious illness, and was succeeded in the command by C. Baebius. He was censor in the same year with P. Licinius Crassus (Cic. pro Arch. 5; Plin. H. N. xiii. 3. s. 5, xiv. 14. s. 16; Festus, s. v. Referri), and was engaged in carrying into effect his own law and that of Silvanus and Carbo, passed in this year, for conferring the citizenship upon some of the other Italian allies. These citizens were enrolled in eight or ten new tribes, which were to vote after the thirty-five old ones. (Appian, B. C. i. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 20.)

On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 87, L. Caesar and his brother Caius, who were opposed to Marius and Cinna, were killed by Fibinia. (Appian, B. C. i. 72; Flor. iii. 21. § 14; Ascon. in Sest. iv. 254, ed. Orelli; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 9; Cic. de Orat. iii. 8; Taccul. v. 19.)

CAESAR.

7. § 10; Plin. H. N. xvii. 3. s. 4), son of No. 8, and brother of No. 9. He commenced his public career in b.c. 108, when still young, by accusing T. Albucius, who had been praetor in Sicily, of extortion (repetundae) in that province. Ca. Pompeius Strabo, who had been quaestor to Albucius, wished to conduct the prosecution, but was obliged to give way to Caesar. Albucius was condemned, and the speech which Caesar delivered on this occasion was much admired, and was afterwards closely imitated by his great namesake, the dictator, in the speech which he delivered upon the appointment of an accuser against Dolabella. (Suet. Caes. 55.) He was curule aedile in b.c. 90 in the consulsipship of his brother, and not in the following year, as some modern historians state; for his election, the story was told in the tribunateship of C. Curio, which we know was in the year 90. In b.c. 88 he became a candidate for the consulship, without having been praetor, and was strongly supported by the aristocracy, and as strongly opposed by the popular party. This contest was, indeed, as Ascomius states, one of the immediate causes of the civil war. The tribunes of the plebs, P. Sulpicius and P. Antiatus, contended, and with justice, that Caesar could not be elected consul without a violation of the lex Annalii; but since he persevered in spite of their opposition, the tribunes had recourse to arms, and thus prevented his election. He escaped to Spain, and thence to Rome, and expelled the leaders of the popular party; but upon his departure to Greece to prosecute the war against Mithridates, Marius and Cinna obtained possession of the city (b.c. 87), and C. Caesar was put to death, together with his brother Lucius. It may be added, that C. Caesar was a member of the college of pontiffs.

C. Caesar was regarded as one of the chief orators and poets of his age, and is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in the second book of his "De Oratore." Wit was the chief characteristic of Caesar's oratory, in which he was superior to all his contemporaries; but he was deficient in power and energy. His tragedies were distinguished by ease and polish, though marked by the same defects as his oratory. His contemporary Accius appears, from a story related by Valerius Maximus (iii. 7. § 11), to have regarded Caesar's poetry as very inferior to his own. The names of two of his tragedies are preserved, the "Afaratus" and "Tessera." (Orelli, "Onomast. Tll." ii. p. 301, where all the passages of Cicero are quoted; Gall. iv. 6; Appian, B. C. i. 72; Val. Max. v. 3. § 3; Suet. Cal. 90; Vell. Pat. ii. 9. § 2. The fragments of his orations are given by Meyer, "Orat. Romani. Fragment. p. 330, &c. Respecting his tragedies, see Weidler, "Die Griechischen Tragedien," p. 1398; and Weichert, "Post. Lat. Rel." p. 127.)

11. L. Julius L. F. L. N. Caesar, son of No. 9, and uncle by his sister Julia of M. Antony the triumvir. He was consul b.c. 64 with C. Marcus Figulus, and belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party. In the debate in the senate, in b.c. 63, respecting the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators, he voted for the death of the conspirators, among whom was the husband of his own sister, P. Lentulus Sura. L. Caesar seems to have remained at Rome some years after his consulsipship without going to any province. In b.c. 52, we find him in Gaul, as legate to C. Caesar, afterwards the dictator. Here he remained till the breaking out of the civil war in b.c. 49, when he accompanied C. Caesar into Italy. He took, however, no active part in the war; but it would appear that he deserted the aristocracy, for he continued to live at Rome, which was in the dictator's power, and he was even entrusted with the care of the city in 47 by his nephew M. Antony, who was obliged to leave Rome to quell the revolt of the legions in Italy. L. Caesar, however, was now advanced in years, and did not possess sufficient energy to keep the turbulent spirits at Rome in order; hence much confusion and contention arose during Antony's absence.

After the death of the dictator in 44, L. Caesar preserved neutrality as far as possible, though he is said to have died in the same year as his brother, and his name was added to that of Antony. He retired from Rome soon after this event, and spent some time at Neapolis, where Cicero saw him, at the beginning of May, dangerously ill. From Neapolis he went to Aricia, and from hence returned to Rome in September, but did not take his seat in the senate, either on account, or under the plea, of ill-health. L. Caesar had expressed to Cicero at Neapolis his approbation of Dolabella's opposition to his colleague Antony; and as soon as the latter left Rome for Mutina, at the close of the year, he openly joined the senatorial party. It was on the proposal of L. Caesar, in b.c. 48, that the agrarian law of Antony was repealed; but, of course, his wishes of the more violent of his party, who desired war to be declared against Antony as an enemy of the state, and who carried a proposition in the senate that the contest should be called a "numim," and not a war. In the same spirit, he proposed that P. Sulpicius, and not C. Cassius or the consul Hirtius and Pansa, as the more violent of his party wished, should be entrusted with the war against Dolabella. His object then was to prevent matters coming to such extremities as to preclude all hopes of reconciliation; but, after the defeat of Antony in the middle of April, he was one of the first to express his opinion in favour of declaring Antony an enemy of the state. On the establishment of the triumvirate, at the latter end of this year, L. Caesar was included in the prosecution; his name was the second in the list, and the first which was put down by his own uncle. He took refuge in the house of his sister, Julia, who, with some difficulty obtained his pardon from her son. From this time we hear no more of him. He was not a man of much power of mind, but had some influence in the state through his family connexions and his position in society. (Orelli, "Onomast. Tll." ii. p. 314; Sall. Cal. 17; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 6, 10; Caes. B. G. vi. 55, B. C. i. 8; Dion Cass. xiii. 39; xlvii. 6, 8; Appian, B. C. iv. 12, 57; Plut. Ant. 19, Civ. 49; Liv. Epit. 120; Vell. Pat. ii. 57; Flor. iv. 6. § 4.)

12. Julia, the daughter of No. 9, and sister of No. 11. [Julia.]

13. L. Julius L. F. L. N. Caesar, son of No. 11, with whom he is sometimes confounded by modern writers, though he is usually distinguished from his father by the addition to his name of filius or adolescentis. On the breaking out of the civil war in b.c. 49, the younger L. Caesar joined the Pompeian party, although his father was Caesar's legatee. It was probably for this reason, and on account of his family connexion with Caesar, that Pompey sent him with the praetor Roscius to Caesar, who was then at Ariminum, with some proposals for peace. Although these did not amount to much, Caesar availed himself of the opportunity to send back to L. Caesar the terms on which he would withdraw from Italy. Cicero saw L. Caesar at Minturnae on his way back to Pompey, and whether he was jealous at not having been employed himself, or for some other reason, he speaks with the utmost contempt of Lucius, and calls him a bundle of loose broom-sticks (scopae solutae). Pompey sent him back again to the enemy with fresh proposals, but the negotiation, as is well known, came to nothing. (Caes. B. C. i. 8, 9, 10; Cic. ad Att. vii. 13, 14, 16; Dion Cass. xii. 5.)

In the course of the same year (n. c. 49), L. Caesar repaired to Africa, and had the command of Cnepae entrusted to him, which he deserted, however, on the approach of Curio from Sicily, who came with a large force to oppose the Pompeian party. (Caes. B. C. ii. 20; Dion Cass. xii. 41.)

Three years afterwards (n. c. 46), we find L. Caesar serving as proconsul to Cato in Utica. After the death of Cato, who committed his son to his care, he persuaded the inhabitants of Utica to surrender the town to the dictator, and to throw themselves upon his mercy. Lucius himself was pardoned by the dictator, according to the express statement of Hirtius, though other writers say that he was put to death by his order. It is certain that he was murdered shortly afterwards; but it was probably not the dictator's doing, as such an act would have been quite opposed to Caesar's usual clemency, and not called for by any circumstance. He probably fell a victim to the fury of the dictator's soldiers, who may have been exasperated against him by the inhuman instance mentioned by Suetonius. (Hirt. B. Afr. 88, 89; Plut. Cat. Mtr. 66; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 7; Dion Cass. xiii. 12; Suet. Caes. 75.)

14. C. Julius Caesar, the grandfather of the dictator, as we learn from the Fasti. It is quite uncertain who the father of this Caius was. Drummann conjectures, that his father may have been a son of No. 4 and a brother of No. 6, and perhaps the C. Julius, the senator, who is said to have written a Roman history in Greek, about n. c. 143. (Liv. Epit. 55.) We know nothing more of the grandfather of the dictator, except that he married Marcia, whence his grandson traced his descent from the king Ancus Marcius. (Suet. Caes. 6.) It is conjectured by some writers, that the proctor Caesar, who died suddenly at Rome, is the same as the subject of the present notice. (Plin. H. N. vii. 53. s. 54.)

15. C. Julius Caesar, the son of No. 14, and the father of the dictator, was praetor, though in what year is uncertain, and died suddenly at Pisae in n. c. 84, while dressing himself, when his son was sixteen years of age. The latter, in his eulogy of his father, of which he speaks with great affection, exhibited games in his father's honour. (Suet. Caes.; Plin. H. N. vii. 53, 54, xxxiii. 9, 16.) His wife was Aurelia. (Aurell.)

17. Sex. Julius C. f. Caesar, son of No. 14, and the uncle of the dictator, was consul in n. c. 81, just before he breaking out of the Social war. (Pl. H. N. ii. 83, s. 85, xxxiii. 3, 17; Environ. v. 3; Flor. iii. 18; Oros. v. 18; Obsequ. 114.) The name of his grandfather is wanting in the Capitoline Fasti, through a break in the stone; otherwise we might have been able to trace further back the ancestors of the dictator. This Sex. Caesar must not be confounded, as he is by Appian (B. C. 40), with L. Julius Caesar, who was consul in n. c. 80, in the year of the Social war. [See No. 9.]

The following coin, which represents on the obverse the head of Pallas winged, and on the reverse a woman driving a two-horse chariot, probably belongs to this Caesar.

18. C. Julius C. f. C. n. Caesar, the dictator, son of No. 15 and Aurelia, was born on the 12th of July, n. c. 100, in the consulship of C. Marius (V.) and L. Valerius Flaccus, and was consequently six years younger than Pompey and Cicero. He had nearly completed his fifty-sixth year at the time of his murder on the 15th of March, n. c. 44. Caesar was closely connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julii with the great Marius, who obtained the election of his nephew to the dignity of flaminius dialis, when he was only thirteen years of age. (n. c. 87.) Marius died in the following year; and, notwithstanding the murder of his own relations by the Marian party, and the formidable forces with which Sulla was preparing to invade Italy, Caesar attached himself to the popular side, and even married, in n. c. 83, Cornelia, the daughter of L. Cinna, one of the chief opponents of Sulla. He was then only seventeen years old, but had been already married to Cautisil, a wealthy heiress belonging to the equestrian order, to whom he had probably been betrothed by the wish of his father, who died in the preceding year. Caesar divorced Cautisil in order to marry Cinna’s daughter; but such an open declaration in favour of the popular party provoked the anger of Sulla, who had returned to Rome in n. c. 82, and who now commanded him to put away Cornelia, in the same way as he ordered Pompey to divorce Antistia, and M. Piso his wife Annia, the widow of Cinna. Pompey and Piso obeyed, but the young Caesar refused to part with his wife, and was consequently proscribed, and deprived of his priesthood, his wife’s dowry, and his own fortune. His life was now in great danger, and he was obliged to conceal himself for some time in the country of the Sabines, till the Vestal virgins and his friends obtained his pardon from the dictator, who granted it with difficulty, and is said to have observed, when they pleaded his youth and inexperience, “that that boy would some day or another be the ruin of the aristocracy, for that there were many Mariuses in him.”

This was the first proof which Caesar gave of the resolution and decision of character which distinguished him throughout life. He now withdrew from Rome and went to Asia in n. c. 81, where he served his first campaign under M. Minucius Thermus, who was engaged in the siege of Mytilene, which was the only town in Asia that held out against the Romans after the conclusion of the first Mithridatic war. Thermus sent him to Nico-medes III. in Bithynia to fetch his fleet, and, on his return to the camp, he took part in the capture of Mytilene (n. c. 80), and was rewarded by the Roman general with a civic crown for saving the life of a fellow-soldier. He next served under P. Sulpicius, in Cilicia, in n. c. 78, but had scarcely entered upon the campaign before news reached him of the death of Sulla, whereupon he immediately returned to Rome.

He was not active in the consulship, but the consul, had already attempted to rescind the acts of Sulla. He was opposed by his colleague Q. Catulus, and the state was once more in arms. This was a tempting opportunity for the leaders of the popular party to make an effort to recover their former power, and many, who were less sagacious and long-sighted than the youthful Caesar, eagerly availed themselves of it. But he saw that the time had not yet come; he had not much confidence in Lepidus, and therefore remained neutral.

Caesar was now twenty-two years of age, and, according to the common practice of the times, he busied himself, in the following year (n. c. 77). Qn. Dolabella defeated in his province of Macedon, Qn. Dolabella, who had been consul in 81, belonged to Sulla’s party, which was an additional reason for his being singled out by Caesar; but, for the same reason, he was defended by Cotta and Hortensius, and acquitted by the judges, who were now, in accordance with one of Sulla’s laws, chosen from the senate. Caesar, however, gained great fame by this prosecution, and shewed that he possessed powers of oratory which bid fair to place him among the first speakers at Rome. The popularity he had gained induced him, in the following year (n. c. 76), at the request of the Greeks, to accuse C. Antonius (afterwards consul in n. c. 63) of extortion in Greece; but he too escaped conviction. To render himself still more perfect in oratory, he went to Rhodes in the winter of the same year, to study under Apollonius Molon, who was also one of Cicero’s teachers; but in his voyage thither he was captured off Miletus, near the island of Pharmacia, by pirates, with whom the seas of the Mediterranean then swarmed. In this island he was detained by them till he could obtain fifty talents from the neighbouring cities for his ransom. Immediately he had obtained his liberty, he manned some Milesian vessels, overpowered the pirates, and conducted them as prisoners to Pergamus, where he shortly afterwards crucified them—a punishment he had frequently threatened them with in sport when he was their prisoner. He then repaired to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius for a short time, but soon afterwards crossed over into Asia, on the outbreak of the Mithridatic war again in n. c. 74. Here, although he held no public office, he collected troops on his own authority, and repulsed the commander of the king, and then returned to Rome in the same year, in consequence of having been elected pontiff, in his absence, in the place of his uncle C. Aurelius Cotta.

On his return to Rome, Caesar used every means to increase his popularity. His affable manners, and still more his unbounded liberality, won the hearts of the people. As his private fortune was not large, he soon had recourse to the usurers, who looked for reprieve to the offices which he was sure to obtain from the people. It was about this time that the people elected him to the office of military tribune instead of his competitor, C. Popilius; but he probably served for only a short time, as he is not mentioned during the next three years (n. c. 75–71) as serving in any of the wars which were carried on at that time against Mithridates, Spartacus, and Sertorius.

The year n. c. 70 was a memorable one, as some of Sulla’s most important alterations in the constitution were then repealed. This was chiefly owing to Pompey, who, although the son-in-law of Sulla, had been one of Sulla’s steady supporters, and was now at the height of his glory; but his great power had raised him many enemies among the aristocracy, and he was thus led to join to some extent the popular party. It was Pompey’s doing that the tribunical power was restored in this year; and it was also through his support that the law of L. Aurelius Cotta, Caesar’s uncle, was carried, by which the judicicata were taken away from the senate, who had possessed them exclusively for ten years, and were shared between the senate, equites, and tribuni militarum. These measures were also strongly supported by Caesar, who thus came into close connexion with Pompey. He also spoke in favour of the Plutus lex for recalling from exile those who had joined M. Lepidus in n. c. 78, and had fled to Sertorius after the death of the latter.

Caesar obtained the questorship in n. c. 68. In this year he lost his aunt Julia, the widow of Marius, and his own wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna. He pronounced orations over both of them in the forum, in which he took the opportunity of passing a panegyric upon the former leaders of the popular party. The funeral of his aunt produced a great sensation at Rome, as he caused the images of Marius, who had been declared an enemy of the state, to be carried in the procession: they were welcomed with loud acclamations by the people, who were delighted to see their former favorites brought, as it were, into public again. After the funeral of his wife, he went, as questor to Antistius Vetus, into the province of further Spain. On his return to Rome, in n. c. 67, Caesar married Pompeia, the daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus and Cornelia, the daughter of the dictator Sulla. This marriage with one of the Pompeian house was doubtless intended to cement his union still more closely with Pompey, who was now more favourably inclined than ever to the popular party. Caesar eagerly promoted all his views, and rendered him most efficient assistance; for he saw, that if the strength of the aristocracy could be broken by means of Pompey, he himself would soon rise to power, secure as he was of the favour of the people. He accordingly supported the proposal of the tribune Gabinius for conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates with unlimited powers: this measure was viewed with the utmost jealousy by the aristocracy, and widened still further the breach between them and Pompey. In the same year, Caesar was elected one of the superintendents of the Appian Way, and acquired fresh popularity by expending upon its repairs a large sum of money from his private purse.

In the following year, n. c. 66, Caesar again assisted Pompey by supporting, along with Cicero, the Manilian law, by which the Mithridatic war was committed to Pompey. At the end of this year, the first Catilinarian conspiracy, as it is called, was formed, in which Caesar is said by some writers to have taken an active part. But this is probably a sheer invention of his enemies in later times, as Caesar had already, through his favour with the people and his combination with Pompey, every prospect of obtaining the highest offices in the state. He had been already elected to the curule aedilship, and entered upon the office in the following year (b. c. 65), with M. Bibulus as his colleague. It was usual for those magistrates who wished to win the affections of the people, to spend large sums of money in their aedilship upon the public games and buildings; but the aedilship of Caesar and Bibulus surpassed in magnificence all that had preceded it. Caesar was obliged to borrow large sums of money again; he had long since spent his private fortune, and, according to Plutarch, was 1300 talents in debt before he held any public office. Bibulus contributed to the expenses, but Caesar got almost all the credit, and his popularity became unbounded. Anxious to revive the recollection of the people in favour of the Marian party, he caused the statues of Marius and the representations of his victories in the Jugurthine and Cimbrian wars, which had been all destroyed by Sulla, to be privately restored, and placed at night in the Capitol. In the morning the city was in the highest state of excitement:
the veterans and other friends of Marius cried with joy at the sight of his countenance again, and Deborah passed Caesar with shouts of applause; the senate assembled, and Q. Catulus accused Caesar of a breach of a positive law; but the popular excitement was so great, that the senate dared not take any measures against him. He now attempted to obtain by a delegation an extraordinary mission to Egypt, with the view probably of obtaining money to pay off his debts, but was defeated in his object by the aristocracy, who got some of the tribunes to put their veto upon the measure.

In n. c. 64 he was appointed to preside, in place of the praetor, as judex questiones, in trials for murther, and in that capacity held persons guilty of murther who had put any one to death in the proscriptions of Sulla, although they had been specially exempted from punishment by one of Sulla's laws. This he probably did in order to pave the way for the trial of C. Rabirius in the following year. He also, in the next year, sup-sported a bill against a law of the tribune P. Ser-villus Rufus, which was brought forward at the close of n. c. 64, immediately after the tribunes entered upon their office. The provisions of this law were of such an extensive kind, and conferred such large and extraordinary powers upon the commissioners for distributing the lands, that Caesar could hardly have expected it to be carried;
and he probably did not wish another person to
to obtain the popularity which would result from such a measure, although his position compelled him to support it. It was of course resisted by the aristocracy; and Cicero, who had now atached himself to the aristocratical party, spoke against it on the first day that he entered upon his consulship, the 1st of January, n. c. 65. The law was shortly afterwards dropped by Rufus himself.

The next measure of the popular party was adopted at the instigation of Caesar. Thirty-six years before, in n. c. 100, L. Appuleius Saturninus, the tribune of the plebs, had been declared an enemy by the senate, besieged in the Capitol, and put to death when he was obliged to surrender through want of water. Caesar now induced the tribune
T. Atius Labienus to accuse C. Rabirius, an aged senator, of this crime. He was doubtless through desire to make the old senator a sacrifice for Caesar set this accusation afoot, but he wanted to frighten the senate from resorting to arms in future against the popular party, and to strengthen still further the power of the tribunes. Rabirius was accused of the crime of perfidium or treason against the state, a species of accusation which had almost gone out of use, and been supplanted by that of majestas. He was brought to trial before the duumvirid perduelliones, who were usually appointed for this purpose by the comitia centuriata, but on the present occasion were nominated by the praetor.
Caesar himself and his relative L. Caesar were the two judges; they forthwith condemned Rabirius, who according to the old law would have been hung or buried down from the Tarpeian rock.
Rabirius, however, availed himself of his right of appealing to the people; Cicero spoke on his behalf;
the people seemed inclined to ratify the decision of the duumvirs, when the meeting was broken up by the praetor Q. Metellus Celer removing the military flag which floated on the Janiculum.
This was in accordance with an old law, which was intended to protect the comitia centuriata in the Campus Marius from being surprised by the enemy, when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city, and which was still maintained as a useful engine in the hands of the magistrates. Rabirius therefore escaped, and Caesar did not think it necessary to remove the prosecution, as the object for which it had been instituted had been already in great measure attained.

Caesar next set on foot in the same year (n. c.
65) an accusation against C. Piso, who had been consult in n. c. 67, and afterwards had the government of the province of Gallia Narbonensis.
Piso was acquitted, and became from this time one of Caesar's deadliest enemies. About the same time the office of pontifex maximus became vacant by the death of Q. Metellus Pius. The candidates for it were Q. Lutatius Catulus, Q.
Servilius Isauricus, and Caesar. Catulus and Servilius had both been consuls, and were of the party of the Aemilii and the Horatii. The object of this movement was the extension of the greatest influence in the senate; but so great was Caesar's popularity, that Catulus became apprehensive as to his success, and fearing to be defeated by one so much his inferior in rank, station, and age, privately offered him large sums to liquidate
his debts, if he would withdraw from the contest.
Caesar, however, replied, that he would borrow still more to carry his election. He was elected on the sixth of March, and obtained more votes even in the tribes of his competitors than they had themselves. Shortly after this he was elected praetor for the following year. Then came the detection of Catiline's conspiracy. The aristocracy thought this a favourable opportunity to get rid of their restless opponent; and C. Piso and Q. Catulus used every means of persuasion, and even bribery, to induce Cicero to include him among the conspirators. That Caesar should both at the time and afterwards have been charged by the aristocracy with participation in this conspiracy, as he was in the former one of Catiline in n. c. 66, is nothing surprising; but there is no satisfactory evidence of his guilt, and we think it unlikely that he would have embarked in such a rash scheme.
For though he would probably have had little scruple as to the means he employed to obtain his ends, he was still no rash, reckless adventurer, who could only hope to rise in a general scramble for power: he now possessed unbounded influence with the people, and was sure of obtaining the consulship; and if his ambition had already reached loftier plans, he would have had greater reason to fear a loss than an increase of his power in universal anarchy. In the debate in the senate on the 5th of December respecting the punishment of the conspirators, Caesar, though he admitted their guilt, opposed their execution, and contended, in a very able speech, that it was contrary to the principles of the Roman constitution for the senate to put Roman citizens to death, and recommended that they should be kept in custody in the free towns of Italy. This speech made a great impression upon the senate, and many who had already given their opinion in favour of death began to hesitate; but the speech of M. Cato confirmed the voting, and carried the question in favour of death. Cato openly challenged Caesar as a party to the conspiracy, and as he left the senate-house his life was in danger from the Roman knights who guarded Cicero's person.

The next year, b. c. 62, Caesar was praetor. On the very day that he entered upon his office, he brought a proposition before the people for depriving Q. Catulus of the honour of completing the restoration of the Capitol, which had been burnt down in b. c. 83, and for assigning this office to Pompey. This proposal was probably made more for the sake of gratifying Pompey's vanity, and humbling the aristocracy, than from any desire of taking wages against Caesar's political enemy. As however it was most violently opposed by the aristocracy, Caesar did not think it advisable to press the motion. This, however, was a tripping matter; the state was soon almost torn asunder by the proceedings of the tribune Q. Metellus Nepos, the friend of Pompey. Metellus openly accused Cicero of having put Roman citizens to death without trial, and at length gave notice of a rogation for recalling Pompey to Rome with his army, that Roman citizens might be protected from being illegally put to death. Metellus was supported by the eloquence and influence of Caesar, but met with a most determined opposition from one of his colleagues, M. Cato, who was tribune this year. Cato put his vote upon the rogation; and when Metellus attempted to read it to the people, Cato tore it out of his hands; the whole forum was in an uproar; the two parties came to blows, but Cato eventually remained master of the field. The senate took upon themselves to suspend both Metellus and Caesar from their offices. Metellus fled to Pompey's camp; Caesar continued to administer justice, till the senate sent armed troops to drag him from his tribunal. Then he dismissed his lictors, threw away his praetexta, and hurried home. The senate, however, soon saw that they had gone too far. Two days after the peoples' throne was restored to the house of Caesar, and offered to restore him to his dignity. He assailed the tumult; the senate was summoned in haste, and felt it necessary to make concessions to its hated enemy. Some of the chief senators were sent to Caesar to thank him for his conduct on the occasion; he was invited to take his seat in the senate, loaded with praises, and restored to his office. It was a complete defeat of the aristocracy. But, not disheartened by this failure, they resolved to aim another blow at Caesar. Proceedings against the accomplices in Catiline's conspiracy were still going on, and the aristocracy got L. Vettius and Q. Curius, who had been two of the chief informers against the conspirators, to accuse Caesar of having been privy to it. But this attempt equally failed. Caesar called upon Cicero to testify that he had of his own accord given him evidence respecting the conspiracy, and so complete was his triumph, that Curius was deprived of the rewards which had been voted him for having been the first to reveal the conspiracy, and Vettius was cast into prison.

Towards the end of Caesar's praetorship, a circumstance occurred which created a great stir at the time. Clodius had an intrigue with Pompeia, Caesar's wife, and had entered Caesar's house in disguise at the festival of the Bona Dea, at which men were not allowed to be present, and which was always celebrated at the house of one of the higher magistrates. He was detected and brought to trial; but though Caesar divorced his wife, he would not appear against Clodius, for the latter was a favourite with the people, and was closely connected with Caesar's party. In this year Pompey returned to Rome from the Mithridatic war, and quietly disbanded his army.

At the expiration of his praetorship Caesar obtained the province of Further Spain, b. c. 61. But his debts had now become so great, and his creditors so anxious for payment, that he was obliged to apply to Clodius for assistance before leaving Rome. This he readily obtained; Caesar became surety for him, as well as for others of his friends; but these and other circumstances detained him so long that he did not reach his province till the summer. Hitherto Caesar's public career had been confined almost exclusively to political life; and he had had scarcely any opportunity of displaying that genius for war which has enrolled his name among the greatest generals of the world. He was now for the first time at the head of a regular army, and soon showed that he knew how to make use of it. He commenced his campaign by subduing the mountainous tribes of Lasiania, which had plundered the country, took the town of Brilantium in the country of the Gallaeci, and gained many other advantages over the enemy. His troops saluted him as imperator, and the senate honoured him by a public thanksgiving. His civil reputation procured him equal renown, and he left the province with great reputation, after enriching both himself and his army.

Caesar returned to Rome in the summer of the following year, b. c. 60, a little before the consular elections, without waiting for his successor. He laid claim to a triumph, and at the same time wished to become a candidate for the consulship. For the latter purpose, his presence in the city was necessary; but as he could not enter the city without relinquishing his triumph, he applied to the senate to be exempted from the usual law, and to become a candidate in his absence. As this, however, was strongly opposed by the opposite party, Caesar at once relinquished his triumph, entered the city, and became a candidate for the consulship. The other competitors were L. Lucceius and M. Calpurnius Bibulus: the former belonged to the popular party, but the hitter, who had been Caesar's colleague in the sedileship and praetorship, was a warm supporter of the aristocracy. Caesar's great popularity combined with Pompey's interest rendered his election certain; but that he might have a colleague of the equestrian party, the aristocracy used immense exertions, and contributed large sums of money in order to carry the election of Bibulus. And they succeeded. Caesar and Bibulus were elected consuls. But to prevent Caesar from obtaining a province in which he might distinguish himself, the senate assigned as the provinces of the consuls the care of the woods and of the public pastures. It was apparently after his election, and not previously as some writers state, that he entered into that coalition with Pompey and M. Crassus, usually known by the name of the first triumvicate. Caesar on his return to Rome had found Pompey more estranged than ever from the aristocracy. The senate had most unwisely opposed the ratification of Pompey's acts in Asia and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. For the conqueror of the east and the greatest man in Rome to be thus thwarted in his purpose, and not to have the power of fulfilling the promises which he had made to his Asiatic clients and his veteran troops, were insults which he would not brook; and all the less, because he might have entered Rome, as many of his enemies feared he intended, at the head of his army, and have carried all his measures by the sword. He was therefore quite ready to desert the aristocracy altogether, and to join Caesars, who promised to obtain the confirmation of his acts. Caesar, however, represented that they should have great difficulty in carrying their point unless they detached M. Crassus from the aristocracy, who, by his position, connexions, and still more by his immense wealth, had great influence at Rome. Pompey and Crassus had for a long time past been deadly enemies; but they were reconciled by means of Caesar, and the three entered into an agreement to support one another, and to divide the power between themselves. This first triumvicate, as it is called, was therefore merely a private agreement between the three most powerful men at Rome; it was not a magistracy like the second; and the agreement itself remained a secret till the day of Caesar's consularship showed, that he was supported by a power against which it was in vain for his enemies to struggle.

In b. c. 59, Caesar entered upon the consulship with M. Bibulus. His first proceeding was to render the senate more amenable to public opinion, by causing all its proceedings to be taken down and published daily. His next was to bring forward an agrarian law, which had been long demanded by the people, but which the senate had hitherto prevented from being carried. We have seen that the agrarian law of Rullus, introduced in b. c. 93, was dropped by its proposer; and the agrarian law of Scaurus, which had been proposed in the preceding year (b. c. 60), had been successfully opposed by the aristocracy, although it was supported by the whole power of Pompey. The provisions of Caesar's agrarian law are not explicitly stated by the ancient writers, but its main object was to divide the rich Campanian land which was the property of the state among the poorest citizens, especially among those who had three or more children; and if the domain land was not sufficient for the object, more was to be purchased. The execution of the law was to be entrusted to a board of twenty commissioners. The opposition of the aristocratical party was in vain. Bibulus, indeed, declared before the people, that the law should never pass while he was consul; but Pompey and Crassus spoke in its favour, and the former declared, that he would bring both sword and buckler against those who used the sword. On the day on which the law was put to the vote, Bibulus, the three tribunes who opposed it, and all the other members of the aristocracy were driven out of the forum by force of arms: the law was carried, the commissioners appointed, and about 20,000 citizens, comprising of course a great number of Pompey's veterans, received allotments subsequently. On the day after Bibulus had been driven out of the forum, he summoned the senate, narrated to them the violence which had been employed against him, and called upon them to support him, and declare the law invalid; but the aristocracy was thoroughly frightened; not a word was said in reply; and Bibulus, despairing of being able to offer any further resistance to Caesar, shut himself up in his own house, and did not appear again in public till the expiration of his consulship.

In his retirement he published "Edicts" against Caesar, in which he protested against the legality of his measures, and bitterly attacked his private and political character.

It was about this time, and before the agrarian law had been passed, that Caesar united himself still more closely with Pompey by giving his daughter Julia to Servilius Caepio. Caesar himself, at the same time, married Calpurnia, the daughter of L. Piso, who was consul in the following year.

By his agrarian law Caesar had secured to himself more strongly than ever the favour of the people; his next step was to gain over the equites, who had rendered efficient service to Cicero in his consulship, and had hitherto supported the aristocratical party. An excellent opportunity now occurred for accomplishing this object. In their eagerness to obtain the farming of the public taxes in Asia, the equites were willing to pay to Caesar too large a sum, and had accordingly petitioned the senate in b. c. 61 for more favourable terms. This, however, had been opposed by Metellus Celer, Cato, and others of the aristocracy; and Caesar therefore now brought forward a bill in the comitia to relieve the equites from one-third of the sum which they had agreed to pay. This measure, which was also supported by Pompey, was carried. Caesar next obtained the confirmation of Pompey's acts; and having thus gratified the people, the equites, and Pompey, he was easily able to obtain for himself the province which he wished. The senate, as we have seen, had previously assigned him the care of the woods and the public pastures as his province, and he therefore got the tribune Vatinius to propose a bill to the people, granting to him the province of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum with three legions for five years. This was of course passed; and the senate added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, with another legion, for five years also, as they plainly saw that a bill would be proposed to the people for that purpose, if they did not grant the province themselves.
It is not attributing any great foresight to Caesar to suppose, that he already saw that the struggle between the different parties at Rome must eventually be terminated by the sword. The same causes were still in operation which had led to the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, which Caesar had himself witnessed in his youth; and he must have been well aware that the aristocracy would not hesitate to call in the assistance of the sword if they should ever succeed in detaching Pompey from his interests. It was therefore of the first importance for him to obtain an army, which he might attach to himself by victories and rewards. But he was preceded by the wealth of Asia to sustain a command in the East, for he would then have been at too great a distance from Rome, and would gradually have lost much of his influence in the city. He therefore wisely chose the Gallic provinces, as he would thus be able to pass the winter in the north of Italy, and keep up his communication with the city, while the disturbed state of further Gaul promised him sufficient materials for engaging in a series of wars, in which he might employ an army that would afterwards be devoted to his purposes. In addition to these considerations, Caesar was doubtless actuated by the desire of finding a field for the display of those military talents which his countrymen in Spain showed that he possessed, and also by the ambition of subduing for ever that nation which had once sacked Rome, and which had been, from the earliest times, more or less an object of dread to the Roman state.

The consuls of the following year (11. c. 58), L. Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius, were devoted to Caesar’s interests; but among the praetors, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and C. Memmius attempted to invalidate the acts of Caesar’s consulship, but without success. Caesar remained a short time in the city, to see the result of this attempt, and then left Rome, but was immediately accused in his absence by the tribune Antistius. This accusation, however, was dropped; and all these attempts of the enemy were as ineffectual as they were fruitless, since they only showed more strongly than ever the weakness of his adversaries. But although Caesar had left Rome, he did not go straight to his province; he remained with his army three months before Rome, to support Clodius, who had passed over from the partisans to the plebs in the previous year, was now tribune, and had resolved upon the ruin of Cicero. Towards the latter end of April, Cicero went into exile without waiting for his trial, and Caesar then proceeded forthwith into his province.

During the next nine years Caesar was occupied with the subjugation of Gaul. In this time he conquered the whole of Transalpine Gaul, which had hitherto been independent of the Romans, with the exception of the part called Provine; he twice crossed the Rhine, and carried the terror of the Roman arms across that river, and he twice landed in Britain, which had been hitherto unknown to the Romans. To give a detailed account of these campaigns would be impossible in the limits of this work; we can only offer a very brief sketch of the principal events of each year.

Caesar left Rome, as has been already remarked, towards the latter end of April, and arrived at Geneva in eight days. His first campaign was against the Helvetii, a powerful Gallic people situated to the north of the lake of Geneva, and be-

country. In consequence of these representations, Caesar commanded Ariovistus, who had received the title of king and friend of the Roman people in Caesar's name, to withdraw from, and not enter into, any more Germans into Gaul, to restore the hostages to the Aedui, and not to attack the latter or their allies. But a haughty answer was returned to these commands, both parties prepared for war. Caesar advanced northwards through the country of the Sequani, and took possession of Vesontio (Besançon), an important town on the Dubis (Doubs), and some days afterwards fought a decisive battle with Ariovistus, who suffered a total defeat, and fled with the remains of his army to the Rhine, a distance of fifty miles. Only a very few, and among the rest Ariovistus himself, crossed the river; the rest were cut to pieces by the Roman cavalry. [Ariovistus.]

Having thus completed two very important wars in one summer, Caesar led his troops into their quarters for the winter early in the autumn, where he left them under the command of Labienus, while he himself went into Cisalpine Gaul to attend to his civil duties in the province.

The following year, n. c. 57, was occupied with the Belgic war. Alarmed at Caesar's success, the various Belgic tribes, which dwelt between the Sequani (Seine) and the Rhine, and were the most warlike of all the Gauls, had entered into a confederacy to oppose Caesar, and had raised an army of 300,000 men. Caesar meantime levied two new legions in Cisalpine Gaul, which increased his army to eight legions; but even this was but a small force compared with the overwhelming numbers of the enemy. Caesar was the first to expose the campaign by marching into the country of the Remi, who submitted at his approach, and entered into alliance with him. He then crossed the Axona (Aisne), and pitched his camp on a strong position on the right bank. But, in order to make a diversion, and to separate the vast forces of the enemy, he sent Diviciacus with the Aedui to attack the country of the Belgae from the west. The enemy had meantime laid siege to Bibron (Bibrave), a town of the Remi, but retired when Caesar sent troops to its assistance. They soon, however, began to suffer from want of provisions, and hearing that Diviciacus was approaching the territories of the Belgae, they came to the resolution of breaking up their vast army, and retiring to their own territories, where each could obtain provisions and maintain themselves. This disorganization was fatal to them: together they might possibly have conquered; but once separated, they had no chance of contending against the powerful Roman army. Hitherto Caesar had remained in his entrenchments, but he now broke up from his quarters, and resumed the offensive. The Sequiones, the Belgae, and Ambiani were subdued in succession, or surrendered of their own accord; but a more formidable task awaited him when he came to the Nerii; the most warlike of all the Belgic tribes. In their country, near the river Sabas (Sambre), the Roman army was surprised by the enemy while engaged in marking out and fortifying the camp. This part of the country was surrounded by woods, in which the Nerii had concealed themselves; and it seems, as Napoleon has remarked, that Caesar was on this occasion guilty of great imprudence in not having explored the country properly, as he was well provided with light armed troops. The attack of the Nerii was so unexpected, and the surprise so complete, that before the Romans could form in line of battle, the enemy was upon them. The Roman soldiers began to give way, and the battle seemed entirely lost. Caesar used every effort to amend his first error; he hastened from post to post, freely exposed his own person in the first line of the battle, and discharged alike the duties of a brave soldier and an able general. His exertions and the discipline of the Roman troops at length triumphed; and the Nerii were defeated with such immense slaughter, that out of 60,000 fighting-men only 600 remained in the state. The Aquitania, who were on their march to join the Nerii, returned to their own country when they heard of Caesar's victory, and shut themselves up in one of their towns, which was of great natural strength, perhaps on the hill called at present Falaise. Caesar marched to the place, and laid siege to it; but when the barbarians saw the military engines approaching the walls, they surrendered to Caesar. In the night, however, they attempted to surprise the Roman camp, but, being repulsed, paid dearly for their treachery; for on the following day Caesar took possession of the town, and sold all the inhabitants as slaves, to the number of 50,000. At the same time he received intelligence that the Veneti, Unelli, and various other states in the north-west of Gaul, had submitted to M. Crassus, whom he had sent against them with one legion. Having thus subdued the whole of the north of Gaul, Caesar led his troops into winter-quarters in the country of the Parisii, Aedui, and Armoricani, and in the region of Ligeris (Loire), in the central parts of Gaul, and then proceeded himself to Cisalpine Gaul. When the senate received the despatches of Caesar announcing this victory, they decreed a public thanksgiving of fifteen days—a distinction which had never yet been granted to any one: the thanksgiving in Pompey's honour, after the Mithridatic war, had lasted for ten days, and that was the longest that had hitherto been decreed.

At the beginning of the following year, n. c. 56, which was Caesar's third campaign in Gaul, he was detained some months in Italy by the state of affairs at Rome. There had been a misunderstanding between Pompey and Crassus; and L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had become a candidate for the censorship, threatened to deprive Caesar of his army and provinces. Caesar accordingly invited Pompey and Crassus to come to him at Luca (Lucca), where he reconciled them to one another, and arranged that they should be the consuls for the following year, and that Crassus should have the province of Syria, and Pompey the two Spains. They on their part agreed to obtain the prolongation of Caesar's government for five years more, and pay for his troops out of the public treasury. It was not through any want of money that Caesar made the latter stipulation, for he had obtained immense booty in his two campaigns in Gaul; but it appears that the state of society at Rome, that he knew it would be difficult for him to retain his present position unless he was able to bribe the people and the leading men in the city. The money which he had acquired in his Gallic wars was therefore freely expended in carrying the elections of those candidates for public offices who would support his interests, and also in present to the senators and other influential men who flocked to him at Luca to pay him their respects and share in his liberality. He held almost a sort of court at Luca: 200 senators waited upon him, and so many also that were invested with public offices, that 120 lictors were seen in the streets of the town.

After settling the affairs of Italy, Caesar proceeded to his army at the latter end of the spring of b. c. 56. During his absence, a powerful confederacy had been formed against him by the maritime states in the north-west of Gaul. Many of these had submitted to P. Crassus in the preceding year, alarmed at Caesar’s victories andードしの等; but, when the news of the defeat of the Veneti in Bosphur, they had now all risen in arms against the Romans.

Facing a general insurrection of all Gaul, Caesar thought it advisable to divide his army and distribute it in four different parts of the country. He himself, with the main body and the fleet which he had caused to be built on the Ligurian, undertook the conduct of the war against the Veneti; while he sent T. Titurius Sabinus with three legions into the country of the Uelli, Curiosolite, and Lexovii (Normandy). Labienus was despatched eastwards with a cavalry force into the country of the Treviri, near the Rhine, to keep down the Belgians and to prevent the Germans from crossing that river. Caesar was sent with twelve legionary cohorts and a great number of cavalry into Aquitania, to prevent the Basque tribes in the south of Gaul from joining the Veneti. The plan of the campaign was laid with great skill, and was crowned with complete success. The Veneti, after suffering a great naval defeat, were obliged to surrender to Caesar, who treated them with merciless severity in order to strike terror into the surrounding tribes: he put all the senators to death, and sold the rest of the people as slaves. About the same time, Titurius Sabinus conquered the Veneti and the surrounding people; and Crassus, though with more difficulty, the greater part of Aquitania. The presence of Labienus, and the severe defeat they had experienced in the preceding year, seem to have deterred the Belgians from any attempt at revolt. Although the season was far advanced, Caesar marched against the Morini and Menapii (in the neighbourhood of Calais and Boulogne), as they were the only people in Gaul that still remained in arms. On his approach, they retired into the woods, and the rainy season coming on, Caesar was obliged to lead his troops into winter-quarters. He accordingly recrossed the Sequana (Seine), and stationed his soldiers for the winter in Normandy in the country of the Aulerii and Lexovii. Thus, in three campaigns, Caesar may be said to have conquered the whole of Gaul; but the spirit of the people was not yet broken. They therefore made several attempts to recover their independence; and it was not till their revolts had been again and again put down by Caesar, and the flower of the nation had perished in battle, that they learnt to submit to the Roman yoke.

In the next year, b. c. 55, Pompey and Crassus were consuls, and proceeded to carry into execution the arrangement which had been entered into at Luca. They experienced, however, more opposition than they had anticipated: the aristocracy, headed by Cato, threw every obstacle in their way, but was unable to prevent the two bills proposed by the tribune Trebonius from being carried, one of which assigned the provinces of the Spain and Syria to the consuls Pompey and Crassus, and the other prolonged Caesar’s provincial government for five additional years. By the law of Vatinus, passed in b. c. 59, Gaul and Illyricum were assigned to Caesar for five years, namely, from the 1st of January, b. c. 58 to the end of December, b. c. 54; and now, by the law of Trebonius, the provinces were continued to him for five years more, namely, from the 1st of January, b. c. 53 to the end of the year 49.

In b. c. 55, Caesar left Italy earlier than usual, in order to make preparations for a war with the Germans. He had concluded a preliminary peace with the Gauls and made a journey to his friendly camp in Gaul. The Gauls had suffered too much in the last campaigns to make any further attempt against the Romans at present; but Caesar’s ambition would not allow him to be idle. Fresh wars must be undertaken and fresh victories gained to keep him in the re-collection of the people, and to employ his troops in active service. Two German tribes, the Usipetes and the Tenchthéri, had been driven out of their own country by the Suevi, and had crossed the Rhine, at no great distance from its mouth, with the intention of settling in Gaul. This, however, Caesar was resolved to prevent, and accordingly prepared to attack them. The Germans were driven back and compelled to cross the Rhine; but before they were going on, a body of their cavalry attacked and defeated Caesar’s Gallic cavalry, which was vastly superior in numbers. On the next day, all the German chiefs came into Caesar’s camp to apologize for what they had done; but, instead of accepting their excuse, Caesar detained them, and straightway led out his troops to attack the enemy. Deprived of their leaders, and taken by surprise, the Germans after a feeble resistance took to flight, and were almost all destroyed by the Roman cavalry. The remainder fled to the confines of the Mosel (Meuse) and the Rhine, but few crossed the river in safety. To strike terror into the Germans, Caesar resolved to cross the Rhine. In ten days he built a bridge of boats across the river, probably in the neighbourhood of Cologne, and, after spending eighteen days on the eastern side of the river, and ravaging the country of the Sigambri, he returned to Gaul and broke down the bridge.

Although the greater part of the summer was now gone, Caesar resolved to invade Britain. His object in undertaking this expedition at such a late period of the year was more to obtain some knowledge of the island from personal observation, than with any view to permanent conquest at present. He accordingly took with him only two legions, with which he sailed from the port Ituns (probably Witsand, between Calais and Boulogne), and effected a landing somewhere near the South Foreland, after a severe struggle with the natives. Several of the British tribes hereupon sent offers of submission to Caesar; but, in consequence of the loss of a great part of the Roman fleet a few days afterwards, they took up arms again. Being however defeated, they again sent offers of submission to Caesar, who simply demanded double the number of hostages he had originally required, as he was anxious to return to Gaul before the season should be further advanced. He did not, therefore, wait for the hostages, but commanded them to be brought to him in Gaul. On his return, he punished the Morini, who had revolted in his absence; and, after leading his troops into winter quarters among the Belgians, repaired, as usual, to the north of Italy. Caesar had not gained any victories in this campaign equal to those of the three former years; but his victories over the Germans and far-distant Britons were probably regarded by the Romans with greater admiration than his conquests of the Gauls. The senate accordingly voted him a public thanksgiving of twenty days, notwithstanding the opposition of Cato, who declared, that Caesar ought to be delivered up to the Usipetes and Tenchtheri, to prevent the gods from visiting upon Rome his violation of the law of nations in seizing the sacred persons of ambassadors.

The greater part of Caesar's fifth campaign, B.C. 54, was occupied with his second invasion of Britain. After making an expedition into Ilyricum, and afterwards into the country of the Treviri, who had shown a disposition to revolt, he set sail from the port Itins with an army of five legions, and landed without opposition at the same place as in the former year. The British states had entrusted the supreme command to Cassivellanus, a chief whose territories were divided from the maritime states by the river Tamesis (Thames). The Britons bravely opposed the progress of the invaders, but were defeated in a series of engagements. Caesar crossed the Thames at the only place where it was fordable, took the town of Cassivellanus, and conquered great part of the counties of Essex and Middlesex. In consequence of these disasters, Cassivellanus sued for peace; and, after demanding hostages, and settling the tribute which Britain should pay yearly to the Roman people, Caesar returned to Gaul towards the latter part of the summer. Caesar gained no more by his second invasion of Britain than by his first. He had penetrated, it is true, farther into the country, but he had left no garrisons or military establishments behind him; and the people obeyed the Romans just as little afterwards as they had done before.

In consequence of the great scarcity of corn in Gaul, arising from a drought this year, Caesar was obliged, contrary to his practice in former years, to divide his forces, and station his legions for the winter in different parts of Gaul. This seemed to the Gauls a favourable opportunity for recovering their lost independence, and destroying their conquerors. The Eburones, a Gallic people between the Meuse and the Rhine, near the modern Tongres, led on by their chiefs, Ambiorix and Cotinius, were the first to begin the revolt, and attacked the camp of the legion and five cohorts under the command of T. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, only fifteen days after they had been stationed in their country. Alarmcd at the vast hosts which surrounded them, and fearing that they should soon be attacked by the Germans also, the Romans quitted their camp, with the intention of marching to the winter-quarters of the legions nearest them under promise of a safe-conduct from Ambiorix. This step was taken by Sabinus against the wish of Cotta, who mistrusted the good faith of Ambiorix. The result verified his fears: the Romans were attacked on their march by Ambiorix, and were destroyed almost to a man. This was the first great disaster that had befallen the Roman Gaul. Flushed with victory, Ambiorix and the Eburones now proceeded to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, who was stationed with one legion among the Nervii. The latter people and the Adatii readily joined the Eburones, and Cicero's camp was soon surrounded by an overwhelming host. Seconded by the bravery of his soldiers, Cicero, though in a weak state of health, roused the enemy in all their attempts to storm the camp, till he was at length relieved by Caesar in person, who came to his assistance with two legions, as soon as he heard of the dangerous position of his legate. The forces of the enemy, which amounted to 60,000, were defeated by Caesar, who then joined Cicero, and praised him and his men for the bravery they had shown. In consequence of the unsettled state of Gaul, Caesar resolved to remain with his army all the winter, and accordingly took up his quarters at Sanatobiiva (Amiens). About the same time, Indublumosar, a chief of the Treviri, attempted to form a confederacy against the Romans, but was attacked and killed by Labienus, who was stationed in the country of the Treviri.

In September of this year, B.C. 54, Julia, Caesar's daughter and Pompey's wife, died in childbirth; but her death did not at the time affect the relations between Caesar and Pompey. In order, however, to keep up a family connexion between them, Caesar proposed that his niece Octavia, the wife of C. Marcellus and the sister of the future emperor Augustus, should marry Pompey, and that he himself should marry Pompey's daughter, who was now the wife of Faustus Sulla. This proposal, however, was declined, but for what reason we are not told.

In the next year, B.C. 55, which was Caesar's sixth campaign in Gaul, the Gauls again took up arms, and entered into a most formidable conspiracy to recover their independence. The defection of the Roman troops under Sabinus and Cotta, and the unsettled state of Gaul during the winter, had led Caesar to apprehend a general rising of the natives; and he had accordingly levied two new legions in Cisalpine Gaul, and obtained one from Pompey, who was remaining in the neighbourhood of Rome as procenial with the imperium. Being thus at the head of a powerful army, he was able to subdue the nations that revolted, and soon compelled the Nervii, Senones, Carnutes, Monpli, and Treviri to return to obedience. But as the Treviri had been supported by the Germans, he crossed the Rhine again a little above the spot where he had passed over two years before, and having received the submission of the Ubii, proceeded to march into the country of the Suevi. The latter people, however, retired to their woods and fastnesses as he advanced; and, finding it impossible to come up with the enemy, he again recrossed the Rhine, having effected as little as in his previous invasion of the country. On his return, he made a vigorous effort to put down Ambiorix, who still continued in arms. The country of the Eburones was laid waste with fire and sword; the troops of Ambiorix were again and again defeated, but he himself always escaped falling into the hands of the Romans. In the midst of this war, when the enemy were almost subdued, Cicero's camp was surprised by a body of the Signabri, who had crossed the Rhine, and was almost taken. At the conclusion of the campaign, Caesar prosecuted an strict inquiry into the revolt of the Senones and Carnutes, and caused Acco, who had been the chief ringleader in the conspiracy, to be put to death. He then stationed his troops for the winter among... the Treviri, Lingones, and Senones, and departed to Cisalpine Gaul.

Upon Caesar's arrival in Cisalpine Gaul, he heard of the death of Clodius, who was killed by Milo at the latter end of January. n. c. 52. This event was followed by tumults, which rent both Rome and Italy asunder; and it was currently reported in Gaul that Caesar could not possibly leave Italy under these circumstances. The unsuccessful issue of last year's revolt had not yet damped the spirits of the Gauls; the execution of Acco had frightened all the chiefs, as every one feared that his turn might come next; the hatred of the Roman yoke was intense; and thus all the materials were ready for a general conflagration. It was first set alight by the Carnutes, and in an incredibly short time it spread from country to country, till almost the whole of Gaul was in flames. Even the Aedui, who had been hitherto the faithful allies of the Romans, and had assisted them in all their wars, subsequently joined to the general revolt. At the head of the insurrection was Vercingetorix, a young man of noble family belonging to the Arverni, and by far the ablest general that Caesar had yet encountered. Never before had the Gauls been so united: Caesar's conquests of the last six years seemed to be now entirely lost. The war, therefore, of this year, n. c. 52, was by far the most arduous that Caesar had yet carried on; but his genius triumphed over every obstacle, and rendered it the most brilliant of all.

It was in the depth of winter when the news of this revolt reached Caesar, for the Roman calendar was now nearly three months in advance of the real time of the year. Caesar would gladly have remained in Italy to watch the progress of events at Rome; but not merely were his hard-won conquests at stake, but also his army, the loss of which would have ruined all his prospects for the future. He was therefore compelled to leave Rome in Pompey's power, and set out to join his army. It was, however, no easy matter to reach his troops, as the intermediate country was in the hands of the enemy, and he could not order them to come to him without exposing them to be attacked on their march. Having provided for the safety of the province in Transalpine Gaul, he resolved to surprise the enemy by crossing the Cézennes and descending into the country of the Arverni (Avengres). With the forces already in the province, and with those which he had himself brought from Italy, he effected a passage over these mountains, though it was the depth of winter, and the snow lay six feet on the ground. The Arverni, who looked upon these mountains as an impregnable fortress, had made no preparations to resist Caesar, and accordingly sent to Vercingetorix to pray him to come to their assistance. This was what Caesar had anticipated: his only object was to direct the attention of the enemy to this point, while he himself stole away to his legions. He accordingly remained only two days among the Arverni, and leaving his troops there in command of D. Brutus, he arrived by rapid journeys in the country of the Lingones, where two of his legions were stationed, ordered the rest to join him, and had assembled his whole army before Vercingetorix heard of his arrival in that part of the country. He lost no time in attacking the chief towns in the hands of the enemy. Vellunodunum (in the country of Château-Landon), Gemalum (Oriéns), and Noviodunum (Nomm, between Orléans and Bourges), fell into his hands without difficulty. Alarmed at Caesar's rapid progress, Vercingetorix persuaded his countrymen to bury their waste and consume their towns, and destroy their towns, that Caesar might be deprived of all sustenance and quarters for his troops. This plan was accordingly carried into effect; but Avan-ticum (Bourges), the chief town of the Bituriges, and a strongly fortified place, was spared from the general destruction, contrary to the wishes of Vercingetorix. This town Caesar accordingly laid siege to, and, notwithstanding the heroic resistance of the Gauls, it was at length taken, and all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were indiscriminately butchered by the Roman soldiers.

Caesar now divided his army into two parts: one division, consisting of four legions, he sent under the command of T. Labienus against the Senones and Paris; the other, comprising six legions, he led himself into the country of the Arverni, and wished them laid siege to Gergovie (near Clezmont). The revolt of the Aedui shortly afterwards compelled him to raise the siege, but not until he had received a severe repulse in attempting to storm the town. Meantime, the Aedui had taken Noviodunum, in which Caesar had placed all his stores; and, as his position had now become very critical, he hastened northwards to join Labienus in the country of the Senones. By rapid marches he eluded the pursuit of the enemy, crossed the Ligeris (Loire), and joined Labienus in safety.

The revolt of the Aedui inspired fresh courage in the Gauls, and Vercingetorix soon found himself at the head of a much larger army than he had hitherto commanded. Pursuing now for the safety of the province, Caesar began to march again, and made his way through the country of the Lingones into that of the Sequani. The Gauls followed him in vast numbers, and attacked him on his march. After an obstinate engagement, in which Caesar is said to have lost his sword, the Gallic cavalry were repulsed by the German horse whom Caesar had procured from beyond the Rhine. Thereupon, Vercingetorix led off his infantry, and retreated towards Alesia (Allas in Burgundy, between Semur and Dijon), whither he was pursued by Caesar. After dismissing his cavalry, Vercingetorix shut himself up in the town, which was considered impregnable, and resolved to wait for succours from his countrymen. Caesar immediately laid siege to the place, and drew lines of circumscription around it. The Romans, however, were in their turn soon surrounded by a vast Gallic army, which had assembled to raise the siege. The Roman army was thus placed in imminent peril, and in no instance in Caesar's whole life was his military genius so conspicuous. He was between two great armies: Vercingetorix had 70,000 men in Alesia, and the Gallic army without consisted of between 250,000 and 300,000 men. Still, he would not raise the siege. He prevented Vercingetorix from breaking through the lines, entirely routed the Gallic army without, and finally compelled Alesia to surrender. Vercingetorix himself thus fell into his hands. The fall of Alesia was followed by the submission of the Aedui and Arverni. Caesar then led his troops into winter-quarters, and resolved to pass the winter himself at Bibraete, in the country of the Aedui. After receiving Caesar's despatches, the senate voted him a public thanksgiving of twenty days, as in the year 55.

The victories of the preceding year had determined the fate of Gaul; but many states still remained in arms, and entered into fresh combinations during the winter. The next year, b. c. 51, Caesar's eighth campaign in Gaul, was occupied in the reduction of these states, into the particulars of which we need not enter. It is sufficient to say, that he conquered in succession the Carnutes, the Bellovaci, and the Armorican states in western Gaul, took Uxellodunum, a town of the Cadurci (Cabors), and closed the campaign by the reduction of Aquitania. He then led his troops into winter-quarters, and passed the winter at Nemetocenna in Belgium. He here employed himself in the pacification of Gaul; and, as he already saw that his presence would soon be necessary in Italy, he was anxious to remove all causes for future wars. He accordingly imposed no new taxes, treated the states with honour and respect, and bestowed great presents upon the chiefs. The experience of the last two years had taught the Gauls that they had no hope of contending successfully against Caesar; and as he now treated them with mildness, they were the more readily induced to submit patiently to the Roman yoke. Having thus completed the pacification of Gaul, Caesar found that he could leave his army in the spring of b. c. 50, and therefore, contrary to his usual practice, repaired at the end of the winter to Cisalpine Gaul.

While Caesar had thus been actively engaged in Gaul during the last two years, affairs at Rome had taken a turn, which threatened a speedy rupture between him and Pompey. The death of Crassus in the Parthian war in b. c. 53 had left Caesar and Pompey alone at the head of the state. Pompey had been the chief instrument in raising Caesar to power; in order to serve his own ends, and never seems to have supposed it possible that the conqueror of Mithridates could be thrown into the shade by any man in the world. This, however, now began to be the case; Caesar's brilliant victories in Gaul were in every body's mouth; and Pompey saw with ill-disguised mortification that he was becoming the second person in the state. Though this did not lead him to break with Caesar at once, it made him anxious to increase his power and influence, and he had therefore resolved as early as b. c. 53 to obtain, if possible, the dictatorship. He accordingly used no effort to put an end to the disturbances at Rome between Milo and Clodius in that year, in hopes that all parties would be willing to accede to his wishes in order to restore peace to the city. These disturbances broke out into perfect anarchy on the death of Clodius at the beginning of the following year, b. c. 52, and led to the appointment of Pompey as sole consul with the concurrence of the senate. This, it is true, did not entirely meet Pompey's wishes, yet it was the first step which the aristocracy had taken to gratify Pompey, and it paved the way for a reconciliation with them. The acts of Pompey's consulship, which were all directed to the increase of his power, belong to Pompey's life; it is sufficient to mention here, that among other things he obtained the prolongation of his government in Spain for five years more; and as he was not yet prepared to break entirely with Caesar, he allowed some of the tribunes to carry a law exempting Caesar from the necessity of coming to Rome to become a candidate for the consulship. The ten years of Caesar's government would expire at the end of b. c. 49, and he was therefore resolved to obtain the consulship for b. c. 48, for otherwise he would become a private man. In the year, b. c. 51, Pompey entered into still closer connexions with the aristocracy, but at the same time was not willing to support all the violent measures of the consul M. Claudius Marcellus, who proposed to send a successor to Caesar, on the plea that the war in Gaul was finished, and to deprive him of the privilege of becoming a candidate for the consulship in his absence. At length a decree of the senate was passed, that the consuls of the succeeding year, b. c. 50, should on the first of March consult the senate respecting the disposal of the consular provinces, by which time it was hoped that Pompey would be prepared to take decisive measures against Caesar. The consuls for the next year, b. c. 50, L. Acilius Gallus and C. Claudius Marcellus, and the powerful tribune C. Curio, were all reckoned devoted partisans of Pompey and the senate. Caesar, however, gained over Paullus and Curio by large bribes, and with an unsparing hand distributed immense sums of money among the leading men of Rome. Thus this year passed by without the senate coming to any decision. The great fear which Pompey and the senate entertained was, that Caesar should be elected consul while he was still at the head of his army, and it was therefore proposed in the senate by the consul C. Marcellus, that Caesar should lay down his command by the 15th of November. This it could not be expected that Caesar would do; his proconsulate had upwards of another year to run; and if he had come to Rome as a private man to seek for the consulship, there can be little doubt that his life would have been sacrificed. Cato had declared that he would bring Caesar to trial as soon as he laid down his command; but the trial would have been only a mockery, for Pompey was in the neighbourhood of the city at the head of an army, and would have overawed the judges by his soldiery as at Milo's trial. The tribune Curio consequently interposed his veto upon the proposition of Marcellus. Meantime Caesar had come into Cisalpine Gaul in the spring of b. c. 50, as already mentioned. Here he was received by the municipal towns and colonies with the greatest marks of respect and affection; and after remaining there a short time, he returned to Transalpine Gaul and held a review of his whole army, which he had so long led to victory. Auxilius, to diminish the number of his troops, the senate had, under pretext of a war with the Parthians, ordered that Pompey and Caesar should each furnish a legion to be sent into the East. The legion which Pompey intended to devote to this service was the one he had lent to Caesar in b. c. 53, and which he now accordingly demanded back; and although Caesar saw that he should thus be deprived of two legions, which would probably be employed against himself, he did not think it advisable to break with the senate on this point, and felt that he was sufficiently strong to spare even two legions. He accordingly sent them to the senate, after beswearing liberal presents upon each soldier. Upon their arrival in Italy, they were not, as Caesar had anticipated, sent to the East, but were ordered to pass the winter at Capua. After this Caesar stationed his remaining eight legions in winter-quarters, four in Belgium and four among the Aeduini, and then repaired to Cisalpine Gaul. He took up his quarters at Ravenna, the last town in his province bordering upon Italy, and there met C. Curio, who informed him more particularly of the state of affairs at Rome.

Though war seemed inevitable, Caesar still shewed himself willing to enter into negotiations with the ariennacy, and, accordingly sent Curio with a letter addressed to the senate, in which he expressed his readiness to resign his command if Pompey would do the same, but intimated that he would continue to hold it if Pompey did not accede to his offer. Curio arrived at Rome on the first of January, n. c. 49, the day on which the new consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus and C.
Claudius Marcellus entered upon their office. It was with great difficulty that the tribunes M.
Antonius and Q. Cassius Longinus forced the se-num to allow the letter to be read, but they could not prevail upon the house to take the subject of it into deliberation and come to a vote upon it. The consuls, however, brought before the house the state of the republic in general; and after a violent debate the motion of Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, was carried, that Caesar should discharge his army by a certain day, and that if he did not do it he should be regarded as an enemy of the state.”

Upon this motion the tribunes M. Antonius and Q. Cassius put their veto; but their opposition was set at naught. Pompey had now made up his mind to crush Caesar, if possible, and accordingly the more violent counsels prevailed. Antonius and Cassius were ejected from the senate-house, and on the sixth of January the senate passed the decree, which was tantamount to a declaration of martial law, that the consuls and other magistrates “should provide for the safety of the state.”

Antonius and Cassius considering their lives no longer safe, fled from the city in disgrace to Caesar's army, and called upon him to protect the inviolable persons of the tribunes. War was now declared. The senate entrusted the whole management of it to Pompey, who distributed the provinces, divided the whole of Italy into certain districts, the defence of each of which was to be entrusted to some distinguished senator, determined that fresh levies of troops should be held, and voted a sum of money from the public treasury to Pompey. Pompey had had all along no apprehensions as to the result of a war; he seems to have regarded it as scarcely possible that Caesar should ever seriously think of marching against him; his great fame, he thought, would cause a multitude of troops to flock around him whenever he wished them; and thus in his confidence of success, he had neglected all means for raising an army. In addition to this he had been deceived as to the disposition of Caesar's troops, and had been led to believe that they were ready to desert their general at the first opportunity. Consequently, when the war broke out, Pompey had scarcely any troops except the two legions which he had obtained from Caesar, and on the fidelity of which he could by no means rely. So unpopular too was the senatorial party in Italy, that it was with great difficulty they could lev'y troops, and when lev'y'd, they took the first opportunity of passing over to Caesar.

As soon as Caesar learnt the last resolution of the senate, he assembled his soldiers, informed them of the wrongs he had sustained, and called upon them to support him. Finding them quite willing to follow him, he crossed the Rubicon which separated his province from Italy, and occupied Ariminum, where he met with the tribunes. He commenced his enterprise with only one legion, consisting of 5000 foot soldiers and 300 horses, but others had orders to follow him from Transalpine Gaul, and he was well aware of the importance of expedition, that the enemy might have no time to complete their preparations. Therefore, though it was the middle of winter, he pushed on with the utmost rapidity, and such was the popularity of his cause in Italy, that city after city opened its gates to him, and his march was like a triumphal progress. Arretium, Pissarum, Fanum, Ancona, Iguvium, and Auxinium, fell into his hands. These successes caused the utmost consternation at Rome; it was reported that Caesar's cavalry was already near the gates of the city; a general panic seized the senate, and they fled from the city even without taking with them the money from the public treasury, and did not recover their courage till they had got as far south as Capua. Caesar continued his victorious march through Picenum till he came to Corinum, which was the first town that offered him any vigorous resistance. L. Demittius Ahenobarbus, who had been appointed Caesar's successor in Gaul, had thrown himself into Corinum with a strong force; but as Pompey did not come to his assistance, he was unable to maintain the place, and fell himself into Caesar's hands, together with several other senators and distinguished men. Caesar, with the same elecency which he displayed throughout the whole of the civil war, dismissed them all uninjured, and hastened in pursuit of Pompey, who had now resolved to abandon Italy and was accordingly hasting on to Brundisium, intending from thence to sail to Greece. Pompey reached Brundisium before Caesar, but had not sailed when the latter arrived before the town. Caesar straightway laid siege to the place, but Pompey abandoned it on the 17th of March and embarked for Greece.

Caesar was unable to follow Pompey for want of ships, and therefore determined to march against Afranius and Petreius, Pompey's legates in Spain, who possessed a powerful army in that country. He accordingly marched back from Brundisium and repaired to Rome, having thus in three months become the supreme master of the whole of Italy.

After remaining in the neighbourhood of Rome for a short time, he set out for Spain, having left
M. Lepidus in charge of the city and M. Antonius in command of the troops in Italy. He sent Curio to drive Cato out of Sicily, Q. Valerius to take possession of Sardinia, and C. Antonius to occupy Illyrium. Curio and Valerius joined in possession of Sicily and Sardinia without opposition; and Curio then passed over into Africa, which was in possession of the Pompeian party.
Here, however, he met with strong opposition, and at length was defeated and lost his life in a battle with Juba, king of Mauritia, who supported
P. Attius Varus, the Pompeian commander. C.
Antonius also met with bad success in Illyrium, for his army was defeated and he himself taken prisoner. These events, however, happended at a later period in this year; and these disasters were more than counterbalanced by Caesar's victories in the meantime in Spain. Caesar left Rome about the middle of April, and on his arrival in Gaul found, that Massilia refused to submit to him. He forthwith laid siege to the place, but unable to take it immediately, he left C. Trebonius and D. Brutus with part of his troops to prosecute the siege, and continued his march to Spain. In this country Pompey had seven legions, three under the command of L. Afranius in the nearer provinces, two under M. Petreius in the further, and two under M. Terentius Varro also in the latter provinces west of the Annia (Quadrana). Varro remained in the west; but Afranius and Petreius on the approach of Caesar united their forces, and took up a strong position near the town of Ilerda (Lerida in Catalonia) on the right bank of the Secrion (Segre). Into the details of this campaign we cannot enter. It is sufficient to state, that, after experiencing great difficulties at first and some reverses, Caesar at length reduced Afranius and Petreius to such difficulties that they were obliged to surrender. They themselves were dismissed unharmed, part of their troops disbanded, and the remainder incorporated among Caesar's troops. Caesar then proceeded to march against Varro; but after the victory over Afranius and Petreius, there was no army in Spain capable of resisting the conqueror, and Varro accordingly surrendered to Caesar when the latter arrived at Corduba (Cordova). Having thus subdued all Spain, which had engaged him only forty days, he returned to Gaul. Massilia had not yet yielded, but the siege had been prosecuted with so much vigour, that the inhabitants were compelled to surrender the town soon after his arrival before the walls.

While Caesar was before Massilia, he received intelligence that he had been appointed dictator by the praetor M. Lepidus, who had been empowered to do so by a law passed for the purpose. This appointment, which was of course made in accordance with Caesar's wishes, was contrary to all precedent; for a praetor had not the power of nominating a dictator, and the senate was entirely passed over: but it is idle to talk of established forms under such circumstances; it was necessary that there should be a higher magistrate than praetor to hold the comitia for the election of the consuls; and Caesar wished to enter Rome invested with some high official power, which he could not do so long as he was merely proconsul. Accordingly, as soon as Massilia surrendered, Caesar hastened to Rome and entered upon his dictatorship, but laid it down again at the end of eleven days after holding the consular comitia, in which he himself and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus were elected consuls for the next year. But during these eleven days he caused some very important laws to be passed. The first, which was intended to relieve debtors, but at the same time to protect a great extent the rights of creditors, was in the present state of affairs a most salutary measure. (For the provisions of this lex, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Julia Lex de Finorn.) He next obtained the reversal of the sentences which had been pronounced against various persons in accordance with the laws passed in Pompey's last consularship; he also restored the liberty of several others. He further restored the descendants of those who had been proscribed by Sulla to the enjoyment of their rights, and rewarded the Transpadani by the citizenship for their faithful support of his cause.

After laying down the dictatorship, Caesar went in December to Brundisium, where he had procured one of his two ships to be ready. He had lost many men in the long march from Spain, and also from sickness arising from their passing the autumn in the south of Italy. Pompey had not been idle during the summer, and had employed his time in raising a large army in Greece, Egypt, and the East, the scene of his former glory. He thus collected an army consisting of nine legions of Roman citizens, and an auxiliary force of cavalry and infantry; and, though it is impossible to estimate its exact strength, as we do not know the number of men which each legion contained, it was decidedly greater than the army which Caesar had assembled at Brundisium. His fleet entirely commanded the sea, and so small was the number of Caesar's ships, that it seemed impossible that he should venture to cross the sea in face of Pompey's superior fleet. This circumstance, and also the time of the year caused M. Bibulus, the commander of Pompey's fleet, to relax in his guard; and thus when Caesar set sail from Brundisium, on the 4th of January, he arrived the next day in safety on the coast of Ephesus. In consequence, however, of the small number of his ships, Caesar was able to carry over only seven legions, which, for the causes previously mentioned, had been so thinned as to amount only to 16,000 foot and 500 horse. After landing this force, he sent back his ships to bring over the remainder; but part of the fleet was intercepted in its return by M. Bibulus, who cruelly put all the crews to death; and the Pompeian fleet kept up such a strict watch along the coast, that the remainder of Caesar's army was obliged for the present to remain at Brundisium. Caesar was thus in a critical position, in the midst of the enemy's country, cut off from the rest of his army; but he knew that he could thoroughly rely on his men, and therefore immediately commenced acting on the offensive. After gaining possession of Orcium and Apollonia, he hastened northwards, in hopes of surprising Dyrrhachium, where all Pompey's stores were deposited; but Pompey, by rapid marches, reached this town before him, and both armies then encamped opposite to each other. Pompey on the right and Caesar on the left bank of the river Apsus. Caesar was at length joined by the remainder of his troops, which were brought over from Brundisium with great difficulty by M. Antonius and Q. Fulvius Cælarus. Pompey's time had retied to some high ground near Dyrrhachium, and as he would not venture a battle with Caesar's veterans, Caesar began to blockade him in his position, and to erect lines of circumvallation of an extraordinary extent; but when these were nearly completed, Pompey forced a passage through Caesar's lines, and drove back his legions with considerable loss. Caesar thus found himself compelled to retreat from his present position, and accordingly commenced his march for Thessaly, pursued by Pompey's army, which was not however able to come up with him. Pompey's plan of avoiding a general engagement with Caesar's veterans till he could place more reliance upon his own troops, was undoubtedly a wise one, and had been fitted to crown with success; but his victory at Dyrrhachium and the retreat of the enemy inspired him with more confidence, and induced him to give heed to those of his officers who recommended him to bring the contest to an issue by an immediate battle. Ac-
His third dictatorship consequently begins before the termination of the year 47. The property of Pompey and of several other of the consuls was now confiscated and sold by public auction. That he might the more easily reward his own friends, the dictator increased the number of praetors and of the members of the priestly colleges, and also introduced a great number of his partizans into the senate. For the remainder of this year he elevated Q. Fufius Caenus and P. Vitellius to the consulsiphip, but he caused himself and his master of the horse, M. Aemilius Lepidus to be elected consuls for the next year. It was during this time that he quelled a formidable mutiny of his troops which had broken out in Campania.

Caesar did not remain in Rome more than two or three months. With his usual activity and energy, he set out to Africa before the end of the year (n. c. 48), in order to carry on the war against Scipio and Cato, who had collected a large army in that country. Their forces were far greater than Caesar could bring against them at present; but he was well aware of the advantage which a general has in acting on the offensive, and had too much reliance on his own genius to be alarmed by mere disparity of numbers. At the commencement of the campaign, however, Caesar was in considerable difficulties; but, having been joined by some of his other legions, he was able to prosecute the campaign with more vigour, and finally brought it to a close by the battle of Thapsus, on the 6th of April, n. c. 46, in which the Pompeian army was completely defeated. Cato, finding himself unable to defend Utica, put an end to his own life. The other towns in Africa submitted to the conqueror, and Caesar was thus able to be in Rome again by the latter end of July, according to the old calendar.

Caesar was now the undisputed master of the Roman world. As he drew near to Rome, great apprehensions were entertained by his enemies lest, notwithstanding his former clemency, he should imitate Marius and Sulla, and proscribe all his opponents. But these fears were perfectly groundless. A love of cruelty was no part of Caesar's nature; and, with a magnanimity which victors rarely show, and least of all those in civil wars, he freely forgave all who had borne arms against him, and declared that he should make no difference between Pompeians and Caesarians. His object was now to ally amicably, and to secure the lives and property of all the citizens of his new kingdom. As soon as the news of his African victory reached Rome, and before he himself arrived there, a public thanksgiving of forty days was decreed in his honour, and the dictatorship was bestowed upon him for ten years, and the censorship, under the new title of "Praefectus Muri," for three years. Caesar had never yet enjoyed a triumph; and, as he had now no further enemies to meet, he availed himself of the opportunity of celebrating his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa, and his four triumphs were celebrated in Rome. None of these, however, were in honour of his successes in the civil war; and consequently his African triumph was to commemorate his victory over Juba, and not over Scipio and Cato. These triumphs were followed by largesses of corn and money to the people and the soldiers, by public banquets, and all sorts of entertainments. Never before had the games of the circus and the amphitheatre been celebrated with such splendour; for Caesar well knew the temper of the Roman populace, and that they would be willing enough to surrender their so-called liberties if they were well fed and amused.

Caesar next appears in the character of a legislator. He now proceeded to correct the various evils which had crept into the state, and to obtain the enactment of several laws suitable to the altered condition of the commonwealth. He attempted by severe sumptuary laws to restrain the extravagance which pervaded all classes of society. In order to prevent any other general from following his own career, he obtained a law by which no one was to be allowed to hold a proconsular province for longer than one year, or a consular for more than two years. But the most important of his changes this year (B.C. 46) was the reformation of the calendar, which was a real benefit to his country and the civilized world, and which he accomplished in his character as pontifex maximus, with the assistance of Sosigenes, the Alexandrine mathematician, and the scribe M. Flavius, though he himself also was well acquainted with astronomy. The regulation of the Roman calendar had always been entrusted to the college of pontiffs, who had been accustomed to lengthen or shorten the year at their pleasure for political purposes; and the confusion had at length become so great, that the Roman year was three months in advance of the real time. To remedy this serious evil, Caesar added 90 days to this year, and thus made the whole year consist of 445 days; and he guarded against a repetition of similar errors for the future by adapting the year to the sun's course. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Calendarium.)

In the midst of these labours, Caesar was interrupted by intelligence of a formidable insurrection which had broken out in Spain, where the remains of the Pompeian party had again collected a large army under the command of Pompey's sons, Caecilius and Sextus. Having been previously designated consuls and dictators for the following year, Caesar set out for Spain at the latter end of B.C. 46. With his usual activity, he arrived at Oulosa near Corduba in twenty-seven days from the time of his leaving Rome. He found the enemy able to offer stronger opposition than he had anticipated; but he brought the war to a close by the battle of Munda, on the 17th of March, B.C. 45, in which he entirely defeated the enemy. It was, however, a hard-fought battle: Caesar's troops were at first driven back, and were only rallied again by their general's exposing his own person, like a common soldier, in the front line of the battle. Ca. Pompeius was killed shortly afterwards, but Sextus made good his escape. The settlement of the affairs in Spain detained Caesar in the province some months longer, and he consequently did not reach Rome till September. He entered the city at the beginning of October in triumph on account of his victories in Spain, although the victory had been gained over Roman citizens, and he also allowed triumphs to his legates Fabius Maximus and Q. Pedius. The senate received him with the most servile flattery. They had in his absence voted a public thanksgiving of fifty days on account of his victory in Spain, and various other honours decrees, and they now vied with each other in paying him every species of adulation and homage. He was to wear, on all public occasions, the triumphal robe; he was to receive the title of "Father of his country;" statues of him were to be placed in all the temples; his portrait was to be struck on coins; the month of Quintilis was to receive the name of Julius in his honour, and he was to be raised to a rank among the gods. But there were still more important decrees than these, which were intended to legalise his power and confer upon him the whole government of the Roman world. He received the title of Imperator for life; he was nominated consul for the next ten years, and both dictator and proconsul morum for life; his person was declared sacred; a guard of senators and knights was appointed to protect him, and the whole senate took an oath to watch over his safety.

If we now look at the way in which Caesar exercised his sovereign power, it cannot be denied that he used it in the main for the good of his country. He still pursued his former merciful course: no proscriptions or executions took place; and he began to revolve vast schemes for the benefit of the Roman world. He was at the same time obliged to reward his followers, and for that reason he greatly increased the number of senators, augmented the number of public magistrates, so that there were to be sixteen praetors, forty quaestors, and six aediles, and he added new members to the priestly colleges. Among his other plans of internal improvement, he proposed to frame a digest of all the Roman laws, to establish public libraries, to drain the Pompian marshes, to enlarge the harbour of Ostia, and to dig a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. To protect the boundaries of the Roman empire, he meditated expeditions against the Parthians and the barbarous tribes on the Danube, and had already begun to make preparations for his departure to the East. In the midst of these vast projects he entered upon the last year of his life, B.C. 44, and his fifth consulship and dictatorship. He had made M. Antony his colleague in the consulship, and M. Lepidus the master of the horse. Caesar had for some time past resolved to preserve the supreme power in his family; and, as he had no legitimate children, he had fixed upon his great-nephew Octavius (afterwards the emperor Augustus) as his successor. Possessing royal power, he now wished to obtain the title of king, which he might hand down to his successor on the throne, and accordingly got his colleague Antony to offer him the diadem in public on the festival of the Lupercalia (the 15th of February); but, seeing that the proposition was not favourably received by the people, he resolved to decline it for the present. Caesar's wish for the title of king must not be regarded as merely a desire to obtain an empty honour, the reality of which he already possessed. Had he obtained it, he would have availed it to his successor; he would have saved the state from many of the evils which subsequently arose from the anomalous constitution of the Roman empire as it was finally established by Augustus. The state would then have become an hereditary and not an elective monarchy, and would not have fallen into the hands of an insolent and rapacious soldiery.

Meantime, the conspiracy against Caesar's life had been already formed as early as the beginning of the year. It had been set afoot by Cassius, a personal enemy of Caesar's, and there were more than sixty persons privy to it. Personal hatred alone seems to have been the motive of Cassius, and probably of several others. Many of them had taken an active part in the war against Caesar, and had not only been forgiven by him, but raised to offices of rank and honour; but forgiveness by an enemy, instead of exciting gratitude, only renders the benefactor still more hateful to men of low and base minds. They pretended that their object was to restore liberty to the state, and some, perhaps M. Brutus among the rest, believed that they should be doing good service to their country by the assassination of its ruler. But the majority were undoubtedly actuated by the mere motive of restoring their own party to power; every open attempt to crush their enemy had failed, and his influence was consequently increased, only means of accomplishing their object. Their project was nearly discovered; but Caesar disregarded the warnings that had been given him, and fell by the daggers of his assassins in the Senate-house, on the ides, or fifteenth, of March, n. c. 44. Caesar's death was undoubtedly a loss not only for the Roman people, but the whole civilized world. The republic was utterly lost; it could not have been restored; and if there had been any possibility of establishing it again, it would have fallen into the hands of a profligate aristocracy, which would only have sought its own aggrandizement upon the ruins of its country. Now the Roman world was ruled for more than two hundred years by chieftains and bloodshed, till it rested again under the supremacy of Augustus, who had neither the talents, the power, nor the inclination to carry into effect the vast and salutary plans of his uncle. When we recollect the latter years of the Roman republic, the depravity and corruption of the ruling class, the scenes of anarchy and bloodshed which constantly occurred in the streets of the capital, it is evident that the last days of the republic had come, and that its only hope of peace and security was under the strong hand of military power. And fortunate was it in obtaining a ruler so mild and so beneficent as Caesar. Pompey was not naturally cruel, but he was weak and irresolute, and was surrounded by men who would have forced him into the most violent and sanguinary acts, if his party had prevailed.

Caesar was in his fifty-sixth year at the time of his death. His personal appearance was noble and commanding; he was tall in stature, of a fair complexion, and with black eyes full of expression. He never wore a beard, and in the latter part of his life his head was bald. His constitution was originally delicate, and he was twice attacked by epilepsy while transacting public business; but, by constant exercise and abstemious living, he had acquired strong and vigorous health, and could endure almost any amount of exertion. He took great pains with his person, and was considered to be effeminate in his dress. His moral character, as far as the connection of the sexes goes, was as low as that of the rest of the Romans of his age. His intrigues with the most distinguished Roman ladies were notorious, and he was equally lavish of his favours in the provinces.

If we now turn to the intellectual character of Caesar, we see that he was gifted by nature with the most various talents, and was distinguished by the most extraordinary genius and attainments in the most diversified pursuits. He was at one and the same time a general, a statesman, a lawyer, a jurist, an orator, a poet, an historian, a philologist, a mathematician and an architect. He was equally fitted to excel in all, and has given proofs that he would have surpassed almost all other men in any subject to which he devoted the energies of his extraordinary mind. Julius Caesar was the greatest man of antiquity; and this fact must be our apology for the length to which this notice has extended. His greatness as a general has been sufficiently shewn by the above sketch; but one circumstance, which has been generally overlooked, places his genius for war in a most striking light. Till his fortieth year, when he went as proconsul into Spain, Caesar had been almost entirely engaged in civil life. He had served, it is true, in some of the campaigns of secondary importance; he had never been at the head of an army, and his whole military experience must have been of the most limited kind. Most of the greatest generals in the history of the world have been distinguished at an early age: Alexander the Great, Hannibal, Frederick of Prussia, and Napoleon Bonaparte, gained some of their most brilliant victories under the age of thirty; but Caesar from the age of twenty-three to forty had seen nothing of war, and, notwithstanding, appears all at once as one of the greatest generals that the world has ever seen.

During the whole of his busy life Caesar found time for literary pursuits; and he always took pleasure in the society and conversation of men of learning. He himself was the author of many works, the majority of which has been lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his "Commentari," which are his only works that have come down to us. They relate the history of the first seven years of the Gallic war in seven books, and the history of the Civil war down to the commencement of the Alexandrine in three books. In them Caesar has carefully avoided all rhetorical embellishments; he narrates the events in a clear unassumed style, and with such apparent truthfulness that he carries conviction to the mind of the reader. They seem to have been composed in the course of his campaigns, and were probably worked up into their present form during his winter-quarters. The Commentaries on the Gallic War were published after the completion of the war in Gaul, and those on the Civil War probably after his return from Alexandria. The "Epitomaries" of Caesar must not be regarded as a separate work, but only as the Greek name of the "Commentari." Neither of these works, however, completed the history of the Gallic and Civil wars. The history of the former was completed in an eighth book, which is usually ascribed to Hirtius, and the history of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars were written in three separate books, which are also ascribed to Hirtius. The question of their authorship is discussed under Hirtius.

Besides the Commentaries, Caesar also wrote the following works, which have been lost, but the mere titles of which are a proof of his literary activity and diversified knowledge:— 1. "Orationes," some of which have been mentioned in the preceding account, and a complete list of which is given in Meyer's "Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta," p. 404, &c., 2nd ed. The ancient writers speak of Caesar as one of the first orators of his age, and describe him as only second to Cicero. (Quintil. x. 1. § 114; Vell. Pat. ii. 30;
CAESAR.

Cic. Brut. 72, 74; Tac. Ann. xiii. 3, Dic. de Oret. 21; Plut. Cæs. 3; Suet. Cæs. 35.) 2. "Epistola," of which several are preserved in the collection of Cicero's letters, but there were still more in the time of Suetonius (Cæs. 56) and Appian (B. C. ii. 79).

3. "Anteato," in two books, hence sometimes called "a work to reply to Cicero's "Cato," which the Roman orator wrote in praise of Cato after the death of the latter in B. C. 46. (Suet. L. c.; Gell. iv. 18; Cie. ad Att. xii. 40, 41, xiii. 50, 6c.) 4. "De Analogia," or as Cicero explains it, "De Ratione Latine loquenti," in two books, which contained investigations on the Latin language, and were written by Caesar while he was crossing the Alps in his return from his winter-quarters in the north of Italy to join his army in further Gaul. It was dedicated to Cicero, and is frequently quoted by the Latin grammarians. (Suet. L. c.; Cic. Brut. 72; Plin. H. N. vii. 30. s. 31; Gell. xix. 8.; Quintil. i. 7; § 54.)

5. "Libri Auspiciorum," or "Augurial." As pontifex maximus Caesar had a superintendence over the Roman religion, and seems to have paid particular attention to the subject of this work, which must have been of considerable extent as the sixteenth book is quoted by Macrobius. (Sat. i. 16; comp. Priscian, vi. p. 719, ed. Futsch.)

6. "De Astris," in which he treated of the movements of the heavenly bodies. (Macrobi. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xv. 25. s. 57, 6c.) 7. "Apophthegmata," or "Dicta collectanea," a collection of good sayings and witty remarks of his own and other persons. It seems from Suetonius that Caesar had commenced this work in his youth, but he kept making additions to it even in his dictatorship, so that it at length comprised several volumes. This was one of Caesar's works which Augustus suppressed. (Suet. I. c.; Cie. ad Fam. ix. 16.)

8. "Poenuln." Two of these written in his youth, "Laudes Herullii" and a tragedy "Oedipus," were suppressed by Augustus. He also wrote several epigrams, of which three are preserved in the Latin Anthology. (Nos. 68—70, ed. Meyer.) There was, too, an astronomical poem of Caesar's, probably in imitation of Aemus's, and lastly one entitled "Iter," descriptive of his journey from the city to Spain, which he wrote at the latter end of the year b. c. 46, while he was on this journey.

The chief princes of Caesar's Commentaries was printed at Rome in 1449, fol. Among the subsequent editions, the most important are by Jungkornn, containing a Greek translation of the seven books of the Gallic war by Plutarchus (Franct. 1606, 4to, and 1669, 4to); by Graevius, with the life of Caesar, ascribed to Julius Cæsars (Amst. 1697, 8vo, and Lug. Bat. 1713, 8vo); by Cellarius (Lips. 1705); by Davis, with the Greek translation of Plutarchus (Cant. 1706, 1727, 4to); by Oudenord (Lugd. Bat. 1737, 4to, Stuttgart, 1822, 8vo); by Morus (Lips. 1780, 8vo), re-edited by Oberlin (Lips. 1805, 1819, 8vo).

(Principal ancient sources for the life of Caesar are the biographies of him by Suetonius and Plutarch, the histories of Dion Cassius, Appian, and Velleius Paterculus, and the letters and orations of Cicero. The life of Caesar ascribed to Julius Cæsaris, of Consular date, who lived in the seventh century after Christ, is a work of Patrochus, as has been shown by C. E. Ch. Schmieder in his work entitled "Petrarcha's Historia Julli Cu-saris," Lips. 1827. Among modern works the best account of Caesar's life is in Drumman's "Cicchide's Roman." Caesar's campaigns have been criticized by Napoleon in the work entitled "Précis des Guerres de César par Napoléon," écrit par M. Marchand, à l'Ile Sainte-Héléne, sous la dictée de l'Empereur," Paris, 1836.)

For an account of Caesar's coins, see Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 1—7. His likeness is given in the two coins annexed; in the latter the natural baldness of his head is concealed by a crown of laurel. (See also p. 516.)

19, 20, 21. JULIAR. [JULIUS.] 22. CAESARIAN. [CAESARIUS.]

23. Sex. JULII CAESAR, son of No. 17, was Flamen Quirinalis, and is mentioned in the history of the year b. c. 57. (Cie. de Haruscp. Resp. 6.)

24. Sex. JULII CAESAR, son probably of No. 23, as he is called by Appian very young in b. c. 47, and is not therefore likely to have been the same as the preceding, as some have conjectured. He was in the army of the great Caesar in Spain in b. c. 49, and was sent by the latter as ambassador to M. Terentius Varro. At the conclusion of the Alexandrian war, b. c. 47, Sex. Caesar was placed over Syria, where he was killed in the following year by his own soldiers at the instigation of Cassilius Basus, who had revoluted against the dictator. (Cae. B. C. ii. 20; Hist. B. Aed. 66; Dion Cass. xvi. 26; Appian, B. C. iii. 77; comp. BASUS, CASSILIUS.)

C. CAESAR and L. CAESAR, the sons of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, and the grandsons of Augustus. Caius was born in b. c. 20 and Lucius in b. c. 17, and in the latter year they were both adopted by Augustus. In b. c. 13, Caius, who was then only seven years of age, took part with other patrician youths in the Trojan game at the dedication of the temple of Marcellus by Augustus. In b. c. 6, Caius accompanied Tiberius in his campaigns against the Sibyls in order to become acquainted with military exercises. Augustus carefully superintended the education of both the youths, but they early showed signs of an arrogant and overbearing temper, and importuned their grandfathers to bestow upon them public marks of honour. Their requests were seconded by the entreaties of the people, and granted by Augustus, who, under the appearance of a refusal, was exceedingly anxious to grant them the honours they solicited. Thus they were declared consuls elect and princes juveniles before they had laid aside the dress of childhood. Caius was nominated to the consuls in b. c. 5, but was not to enter upon his till five years afterwards. He assumed the toga virilis in the same year, and his brother in b. c. 2.
Cæsarius was sent into Asia in B. C. 1, where he passed his consulship in the following year, A. D. 1. About this time Phraates IV., king of Parthia, seized upon Armenia, and Cæsarius accordingly prepared to make war against him, but the Parthian king gave up Armenia, and settled the terms of peace at an interview with Cæsarius on an island in the Euphrates. (A. D. 2.) After this Cæsarius went to the provinces of Armenia, but was treacherously wounded before the town of Artagara in this country. Of this wound he never recovered, and died some time afterwards at Limyra in Lycia, on the 21st of February, A. D. 4. His brother Lucius had died eighteen months previously, on August 20th, A. D. 2, at Massilia, on his way to Spain. Their bodies were brought to Rome. Some suspected that their death was occasioned by their step-mother Livia. (Dion Cass. liv. 8, 18, 26, iv. 6, 9, 11, 12; Zonar. x. p. 539; Suet. Aug. 26, 56, 64, 65, Tib. 12; Vall. Pat. ii. 101, 102; Tac. Ann. i. 3, ii. 4; Florus, iv. 12. § 42; Lupici Anycranius.)

C. Caesar married Livia or Livilla, the daughter of Antonia [Aventia, No. 61], who afterwards married the younger Drusus, but he left no issue. (Tac. Ann. iv. 40.) L. Cæsarius was married to Lucilla Lepida, but died previously. (Ann. iii. 23.) There are several coins both of Cæsarius and Lucius: their portraits are given in the one annexed. (Eckhel, vi. p. 170.)

C. CAESAR CALIGULA. [CALIGULA.] CAESAR’ION, the son of Cleopatra, originally called Ptolemaeus as an Egyptian prince, was born soon after the departure of Julius Cæsar from Alexandria in B. C. 47, and probably accompanied his mother to Rome in the following year. Cleopatra said that he was the son of Julius Cæsar, and there seems little doubt of this from the time at which Cæsarian was born, from the favourable reception of his mother at Rome, and from the dictator allowing him to be called after his own name. Antonius declined the senate, doubting after Cæsarian's death and for the purpose of annoying Augustus, that the dictator had acknowledged Cæsarian as his son, but Otho wrote a treatise to prove the contrary.

In consequence of the assistance which Cleopatra had afforded Dolabella, she obtained from the triumvirs in B. C. 42 permission for her son Cæsarian to receive the title of king of Egypt. In B. C. 34, Antony conferred upon him the title of king of kings; he subsequently called him in his will the son of Cæsarian, and after the battle of Actium (n. c. 31) declared him and his own son Antony to be of age. When everything was lost, Cleopatra sent Cæsarian with great treasures by way of Aethiopia to India; but his tutor Rhodion persuaded him to return, alleging that Augustus had determined to give him the kingdom of Egypt. After the death of his mother, he was executed by order of Augustus. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 31; xlix. 4, l. 1, 3, l. 6; Suet. Cæs. 52, Aug. 17; Plut. Cæs. 49, Anton. 54, 81, 92.)

CAESARIUS, St. (Kaisaros), a physician who is however better known as having been the brother of St. Gregory Theologus. He was born of Christian parents, his father (whose name was Gregory) being bishop of Nazianza. He was carefully educated, and studied at Alexandria, where he made remarkable progress in music, astronomy, arithmetic, and medicine. He afterwards embraced the medical profession, and settled at Constantinople, where he enjoyed a great reputation, and became the friend and physician of the emperor Constantius, A. D. 337—360. Upon the accession of Julian, Cæsarius was tempted by the emperor to apostatize to paganism; but he refused, and chose rather to leave the court and return to his native country. After the death of Julian, he was recalled to court, and held in high esteem by the emperors Jovian, Valens, and Valentinian, by one of whom he was appointed governor of Bithynia. At the time of the earthquake at Nicæa, he was present in a very remarkable manner, in which his brother St. Gregory took occasion to write a letter (which is still extant, Ep. 20, vol. ii. P. 19, ed. Paris, 1840), urging upon him the duty of abandoning all worldly cares, and giving himself up entirely to the service of God. This he had long wished to do, but was now prevented from putting his design into execution by his death, which took place A. D. 369, shortly after his baptism. His brother pronounced a funeral oration on the occasion, which is still extant (Orat. 3, vol. i. p. 198), and from which the preceding particulars of his life are taken; and also wrote several short poems, or epitaphs, lamenting his death. (Opera, vol. ii. p. 1110, &c.) There is extant, under the name of Cæsarius, a short Greek work, with the title Pi6é6erov, PrxagwioTpanv xédpevov Et Philosopher, which, though apparently considered, in the time of Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 210), to belong to the brother of St. Gregory, is now generally believed to be the work of some other person. The contents of the book are sufficiently indicated by the title. It has been several times published with the works of his brother, St. Gregory, and in collections of the Fathers; and also separately, in Greek and Latin, August. Vindel. 1626, 4to. ed. Elias Ebinghor. The memory of St. Cæsarius is celebrated in the Roman Church on Feb. 28. (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 28, vol. v. p. 496; &c.; Lamiib. Biblioth. Vatf., vol. iv. p. 20, &c. ed. Kollth; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 435, 436.)

[W. A. O.]

CAESARIUS, a distinguished ecclesiastic of the fifth and sixth centuries, was born at Chalons in 468, devoted his youth to the discipline of a monastic life, and was elected bishop of Arles in 502. He presided over this see for forty years, during which period he was twice accused of treason, first against Alaric, and afterwards against Theodoric, but upon both occasions was honourably acquitted. He took an active share in the deliberations of several councils of the church, and gained peculiar celebrity by his strenuous exertions for the suppression of the Semiulplagian doctrines, which had been promulgated about a century before by Cassianus, and had spread widely in southern Gaul. A life of Cæsarius, which however must be considered rather on the right than a pro- gressive than of a sober biography, was composed by his friend and pupil, Cyril, bishop of Toule.
CAESIA. GENS.

Caesarius is the author of two treatises, one entitled Regula ad Monachos, and another Regula ad Virgines, which, together with three Euchortiones and some episcopalia, will be found in the 8th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, Leyden, 1677; and were printed in a separate volume, with the notes of Meynardi, at Poeliers (Petaviurn), 1621, 8vo. His Preface was written consent of some monks or nuns. Forty of these were published by Cognatius, at Basle, 1558, 4to, and 1560, fol., and are included in the Monumenta SS. Patrum Orthodoxographa of Grynaeus, Cologne, 1618, fol. p. 1861; a collection of forty-six, together with some smaller tracts, are in the 8th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum referred to above; and the 11th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (Venice, 1776) contains fourteen more, first brought to light by Baluze (Paris, 1699, 8vo); but, besides these, upwards of a hundred out of the 37 discourses falsely attributed to Augustin are commonly assigned to Caesarius. (Vita S. Caesarii, Episc. Arelatensis, a Cyprigiano, episc. Discipulo, et Messanio Presb., et Stephano Dioce, conscriptis discis libris, in Vitae SS. de Sulpicii, 27 August. p. 304. See also Dissertatio de Vita et Scriptis S. Caesarii, Arelatensis Archiep., by Oudin in his Comment. de Script. Eccles. vol. i. p. 1339; in addition to which, Functius, De Inert et Decrepita Saneitate Linguae Latinae, cap. vi. §§ 8.; and Baehr, Geschichte der Romanischen Literatur, Suppl. vol. ii. p. 425.)

W. R.

CAESENNIUS, the name of a noble Etruscan family at Tarquinii, two members of which are mentioned by Cicero, namely, P. Caesennius and Caesarina, first the wife of M. Fulvia, and afterwards of A. Caesennius. (Cic. pro Caelin. 4, 6, 10.) The name is found in several inscriptional dedications. (Müller, Inventar. 1, p. 433.)

CAESENNIUS LENTO. [LENTO.] CAESENNIUS PÆTIUS. [PÆTIUS.]

C. CAESÆTIUS, a Roman knight, who entertained Caesar to pardon Q. Ligarius. (Cic. pro Lig. 11.)

P. CAESÆTIUS, the quaestor of C. Verres. (Cic. Ver. iv. 65, v. 25.)

CAESÆTIUS FLAVUS. [FLAVUS.]

CAESÆTIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

CAESIA, a surname of Minerva, a translation of the Greek Ἐγκυκλίας. (Terent. Haed. v. 5, 18; Cic. de Nat. Doct. i. 30.)

[LS.]

CAESIA GENS, plebeian, does not occur till towards the end of the republic. [CAESIA.]

On the following coin of this gens, the obverse represents the head of a youthful god branching an olive sprig, whose bust is of who is usually supposed from the following passage of A. Guliers (v. 12) to be Apollo Velivis: "Simulacrum dei Velivis — sagittis tenet, quae sunt videlicet parata ad nocendum. Quapropter eum deum plerique Apollonum esse dixerunt." The two men on the reverse are Lare: between them stands a dog, and above them the head of Velica with a forceps. (Eckhel, v. p. 156, &c.)

CAESIANUS, APRONIUS. [APRONIUS, No. 3.]

CAESIUS. 1. M. CAESIUS, was praetor with C. Licinius SAcerdo in b. c. 75. (Cic. Ver. i. 50.) 2. M. CAESIUS, a rapacious farmer of the tithe in Sicily during the administration of Verres, b. c. 73. (Cic. Ver. iii. 30, 49.) 3. L. Caesius was one of Cicero's friends, and accompanied him during his proconsular administration of Cilicia, in b. c. 50. (Ad Quint. Frat. i. 1 § 4, 2 § 2.) He seems to be the same person as the Caesius who superintended the building of Q. Cicero's villa of the Manilium. (Ad Quint. Frat. iii. i. §§ 1, 2.) There is a Roman demaricus bearing the name L. Caesius (see above), but whether it belongs to our L. Caesius or not cannot be ascertained.

4. M. CAESIUS, of Arpinum, an intimate friend of Cicero, who held the office of aedile at Arpinum, the only municipium which had such a magistracy, in b. c. 47. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 11, 12.)

5. L. CAESIUS, a Roman eques of Ravena, received the Roman citizenship from Q. Pompeius, the father of Pompey the Great. (Cic. pro Balb. 22.) There is a letter of Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 51) addressed to P. Caesius (b. c. 47), in which Cicero recommends to him his friend P. Messius. From the manner in which Cicero speaks about (pro nostro et pro palerum amicitia), it would almost seem as if there was some mistake in the plena men, and as if the letter was addressed to M. Caesius of Arpinum. But it may be, that there had existed a friendship between Cicero and the father of Caesius, of which beyond this allusion is nothing known.

6. SEX. CAESIUS, a Roman eques, who is mentioned by Cicero (pro Flacco. 20) as a man of great honesty and integrity.

[LS.]

T. CAESIUS, a jurist, one of the disciples of Servius Sulphius, the eminent friend of Cicero. Pompeons (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. wis. § 44) enumerates ten disciples of Servius, among whom T. Caesius is mentioned, in a passage not free from the inaccuracy of expression which pervades the whole title De Origine Juris. His words are these: "Ab hoc (Servio) pluriim profecerunt: fere tamen hi libros conscripsit: AELINUS VARUS, A. OPLIUS, T. CAESIUS, APULIUS TOCCA, APULIIUS NAMUS, FLAVIUS PRECUS, AELIUS PAVIVIUS, LABEO ANTISTIUS, LABEO ANTISTIUS, CINNA, PUBLICIUS GELLIO. Ex his decem libros octo conscripsit, quoque omnes qui fuerunt libri digesti sunt ab Aulio Numus in centum quadragesimam libras." It is not clear from this account whether (according to the usual interpretation of the passage) only eight of the ten were authors, or whether (as appears to be the more correct interpretation) all the ten wrote books, but not more than eight wrote books which were digested by Aulius Numus. In the computation of the eight, it is probable that the compiler himself was not included. T. Caesius is nowhere else expressly mentioned in the Digest, but "Oplius, Caesellius, et Servii auditores, are cited Dig. 33. tit. 4. s. 6, § 1, and the phrase Servii auditores occurs also Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 12, pr. and Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 12, § 6. In Dig. 33. tit. 3. s. 1. § 6, where Servi auditores are or there of the Florentine manuscript of the Digest, Servii auditores has been proposed as a conjectural emendation. Under these names it has been supposed that the eight disciples servius, or rather Namus's Digest of their works, is referred to. If so, it is likely that the eight included T. Cassius, and did not include A. Olius. Dirksen (Beiträge zur Kunde des Röm. Rechts, p. 23, n. 52, et p. 329), who thinks this supposition unnecessary, does not, in our opinion, shake the probability. Cicero (de Gom. 5) quotes the words of a treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians from Alfenus, "in libro Digestorum trigesimo et quarto, Conjectazarum [al. Conjectazarum] autem secundo." As it is known from the Florentine Index, that Alfenus wrote forty books Digestorum, and as no other work of his is elsewhere mentioned, it has been supposed that the Conjectazarum or Conjectazar cited by Gelius is identical with the compilation of Namus in which were digested the works of Servii auditores. It must be observed, however, that the Florentine Index ordinarily enumerates those works only from which the compiler of the Digest made extemt, and that the Roman jurists frequently inserted the same passages verbatim in different treatises, practice which was common may be proved by glancing at the inscriptions of the fragments and the formulae of citation, as collected in the valuable treatise of Ant. Augustinus, de Nominalis Propriae Pandectarum. For example, in Dig. 4. tit. 4. a. 3. § 1, Ulpian cites Celsius, "Epistolarum libro undecimo et Digestorum secundo." (Bertrand, Dion Nom. 18; Guil. Grotilii, Vite di Cicerone, i. 11. § 3; Zimmern, R. R. G. i. § 79.) [J. T. G.]

CÆSÆRIUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]
CÆSÆRIUS CORDUS. [Cordus.]
CÆSÆRIUS NASTICA. [Nastica.]
CÆSÆRIUS TAURINUS. [Taurinus.]
CÆSÆONIA, or according to Dion Cassius (l. xvi. 29), MELONIA CÆSÆONIA, was at first the mistress and afterwards the wife of the emperor Caligula. She was neither handsome nor young when Caligula fell in love with her; but she was a woman of the greatest licentiousness, and, at the time when her intimacy with Caligula began, she was already mother of three daughters by another man. Caligula was then married to Lollia Paulina, whom however he divorced in order to marry Cæsonia, who was with child by him, A. D. 38. According to Suetonius (Cal. 25) Caligula married her on the same day that she was delivered of a daughter (Julia Drusilla); whereas, according to Dion Cassius, this daughter was born one month after the marriage. Cæsonia contrived to preserve the attachment of her imperial husband down to the end of his life (Suet. Cal. 35, 38; Dion Cass. l. xvi. 29); but she is said to have had this by love-potions, which she gave him to drink, and to which some persons attributed the unsettled state of Caligula's mental powers during the latter years of his life. Cæsonia and her daughter were put to death on the same day that Caligula was murdered, A. D. 41. (Suet. Cal. 59; Dion Cass. l. xvi. 29; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xix. 2. § 4.) [L. S.]

CÆSÆONIUS. [Piso.]
CÆSÆONIUS, SUPERIUS, was one of the parties accused A. D. 48, when Messalla, the wife of Claudius, went so far in contempt of her husband as to marry the young eunuchs, C. Silius. Tacitus says, that Cæsennius saved his life through his vices, and that on the occasion of Messalla's marriage he disguised himself in the basest manner. (Tac. Ann. xi. 38.) [L. S.]

CÆSIÆNA, one of the judges at Rome, an upright man, who displayed his integrity in the inquiry into the murder of Cluentius, n. c. 74, when C. Junius presided over the court. He was aedile elect with Cicero in n. c. 70, and consequently would not have been able to act as judge in the following year, as a magistrate was not allowed to discharge the duties of judge during his year of office. This was one reason among others why the friends of Verres were anxious to postpone his trial till n. c. 69. The praetorship of Cæsennius is not mentioned, but he must have obtained it in the same year as Cicero, namely, n. c. 66, as Cicero writes to Atticus in 65, that there was some talk of Cæsennius becoming a candidate with him for the consularship. (Cic. Verr. Act. i. 10; Pseud. Asenon. i. 56; Cic. ad Att. i. 1.) This Cæsennius is probably the one whom Cicero speaks of in n. c. 45. (Ad Att. xii. 11.)

CÆSÆONIUS MAXIMUS. [Maximus.]
L. CÆSÆELIUS CÆSÆNIUS, a Roman orator, who was already an old man, when Cicero heard him. (See above, p. 144.) Cicero (ad Att. 4. 4. 16) calls him a valuerentem, and adds, that he never heard any one who was more skillful in drawing suspicions upon persons, and in making them out to be criminals. He appears to have been one of the many low persons of those times, with whom accusation was a regular business. [L. S.]

C. CAETRONIUS, legate of the first legion in Germany at the accession of Tiberius in A. D. 14. A mutiny had broken out among the soldiers, but they soon repented, and brought their ring-leaders in chains before C. Cætorum, who tried and punished them in a manner which had never been adopted before, and must be considered as an usurpation of the soldiery. The legions (the first and twentieth) met with drawn swords and formed a sort of popular assembly. The accused individual was led to some elevated place, so as to be seen by all, and when the multitude declared him guilty, he was forthwith put to death. This sort of court-martial was looked upon in later times as a welcome precedent. (Tacit. Ann. i. 44; Ammian. Marc. xxii. 6.) [L. S.]

CAPRO or CAPHO, a centurion and one of Caesar's veteran soldiers, was a zealous supporter of Antony after the murder of Caesar in n. c. 44, and is accordingly frequently denounced by Cicero. (Phil. viii. 3, 3, x. 10, xii. 5.)

CAIANUS or GAIA CÆSÆNIUS (Taiaros), a Greek rhetorician and sophist, was native of Arabia and a disciple of Apelles and Gadara, and he accordingly lived in the reign of the emperors Maximus and Gordianus. He taught rhetoric at Berytus, and wrote several works, such as On Syntax (Προ Συνταξιον), in five books, a System of Rhetoric (Τέχνη Προτροπος), and Declamations (Μεταλογια) but no fragments of these works are now extant. (Snidus, n. e. Taiaros; Endoeq, p. 100.) [L. S.]

CAIUS and CAIUS (Kados), two mythical personages, one a son of Oeneus and Tethys (Hesiod, Theog. 343), and the other a son of Hermes and Ocyrrhoe, who threw himself into the river Aenares, henceforth called Caius. (Plut. de Feste. 21.) [L. S.]

CAIETA, according to some accounts, the nurse of Aeneas (Verg. Aen. viii. 1; Ov. Met. xiv. 442), and, according to others, the nurse of Creusa or Ascanius. (Serv. ad Aen. l. c.) The promontory of Caieta, as well as the port and town of this name on the western coast of Italy, were believed to have been called after her. (Klasmn, *Aeneas vi. d. Penat. p. 1044, &c.)

CAIUS or GAIUS (Titus). 1. The juris.

[GIJUS]

2. A Platonic philosopher who is mentioned as an author by Porphyry (Vit. Plot. 14), but of his writings nothing is known. Galen (vol. vi. p. 532, ed. Paris) states, that he heard the disciples of Caius, from which we must infer that Caius lived some time before Galen.

3. A Greek rhetorician of uncertain date. Stoebaeus has preserved the titles of, and given extracts from, six of his declamations. (Stoebaeus, *Florileg. vol. i. pp. 89, 206, vol. iii. pp. 3, 29, 56, &c., 104, 135, 305, &c.)

4. A presbyter of the church of Rome, who lived about A. D. 310. He was at a later time elected bishop of the gentiles, which probably means, that he received a commission as a missionary to some heathen people, and the power of superintending the churches that might be planted among them. (Phot. Cod. 48.) While he was yet at Rome he engaged in the celebrated dispute with Proclus, the champion of the Montanist heresy, and he subsequently published the whole transaction in the form of a dialogue. (Euseb. *H. E. i. 25, iii. 23, vi. 20.) He also wrote a work against the heresy of Artemon, and a third work, called Αἰσθητός, appears likewise to have been directed against Artemon. (Euseb. *H. E. x. 28; comp. Theodor. *H. E. iv. 21.) Caius is further called by Photius the author of a work Περὶ τῆς παράστασεως κληρικῶν, which some consider to be the same as the work Περὶ τοῦ παραστάτου, which is still extant, and is usually ascribed to Hippolytus. He denied the Epistle to the Hebrews to be the work of St. Paul, and accordingly omitted only 13 genuine epistles of that apostle. (Cave, *Hist. Lit. i. p. 65; Fabricius, *Bibl. Graec. x. p. 693, &c.)

CAIUS CAESAR. [CALIGULA.]

CAIACUBER. [QUINTUS SMYRNAEUS.]

CALACTYNUSS. [CABILLUS CALACTINUS.]

CAILAMIS (Κάλαμος), a stationary and embosser, whose birth-place and age are not mentioned by any of the ancient authors. It is certain, however, that he was a contemporary of Plutarch, for he executed a statue of Apollo Auxicius, which was believed to have been transported to the temple at Athens. (Paus. i. 3. § 3.) Besides he worked at a chariot, which Dimenenses, the son of Hecia, caused to be made by Onatas in memory of his father's victory at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 12, viii. 42, § 4.) This chariot was consecrated by Dimenenses after Hecia's death (n. c. 467), and the plaque at Athens ceased n. c. 429. The 38 years between these two dates may therefore safely be taken as the time in which Cailamis flourished. (Siliig. *Cat. Art. s. e.) Cailamis was one of the most diligent artists of all antiquity. He wrought statues in bronze, stone, gold, and ivory, and was, moreover, a celebrated embosser. (Plin. *H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 15, xxxvi. 4. s. 3.) Besides the Apollo Auxicius, which was of metal (Siliig. *Cat. Art. p. 117), there existed a marble statue of Apollo in the Servilian gardens in Rome (Plin. *H. N. xxxvi. 4, 5), and a third bronze statue of Apollo, 30 cubits high, which Lucullus carried to Rome from the Illyrian town Apollonia. (Strab. vii. p. 319.) A beardless Ασηπεὼς in gold and ivory, a Νῖκη, a Zeus Ammon (consecrated by Pindar at Thebes), a Dionysos, an Aphrodite, an Alene, and a Scouria, are mentioned as works of Cailamis. Besides the statues of gods and mortals he also represented animals, especially horses, for which he was very celebrated. (Plin. *H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 10.) Cicero gives the following opinion of the style of Cailamis, which was probably borrowed from the Greek authors:—

"Quis enim eorum, qui haec minor amovendae sunt, non intellegt, Canachi sigilla rigidae esse, quam ut flectatur ventre intempesti? Cailamides sua illa quidem, sed tamen mollia quàm Canachi, nondum Myronis satia ad veritatem addixerat." (Brat. 18; comp. Quintil. xii. 10.)

[VAIUS]

CALAMITES (Καλαμίτες), an Attic hero, who is mentioned only by Demeochanes (De Ca. p. 280), and is otherwise entirely unknown. (Comp. Juscy. and Suid. s. v., σαλαμινοκρατωρ.) The commentators on Demeochanes have endeavoured in various ways to gain a definite notion of Calamites: some think that Calamites is a false reading for Cyamites, and others that the name is a mere epithet, and that ἀρρέας is understood. According to the latter view, Calamites would be a hero of the art of surgery, or a being well skilled in handling the καλαμος or reed which was used in dressing fractured arms and legs. Others again find in Calamites the patron of the art of writing and of writing masters. (Comp. Jahn, *Jahrb. für Philol. a. Päcid. für 1838.)

CALAMUS (Καλαμός), one of the privileged gymnosophi of India, who followed the Macedonian army from Taxila in the desire of Alexander the Great; but when he was taken ill afterwards, he refused to change his mode of living, and in order to get rid of the sufferings of human life altogether, he solemnly burnt himself on a pyre in the presence of the whole Macedonian army, without evincing any symptom of pain. (Arrian, *Anab. vii. 2, &c.; Aelian, *V. H. ii. 41, v. 6; Plut. *Alex. 69; Strab. xvi. 107; Athen. x. p. 487; Lucian, *De M. Peregr. 28; Ctes. *Tha. ii. 22, De Diem. l. i. 20, 30; Val. Max. i. 8, Ext. 10.) His real name was, according to Plutarch (*Alex. 65), Sphines, and he received the name Calamus among the Greeks, because in saluting persons he used the form καλαμός instead of the Greek καλέω. What Plutarch here calls καλαμός is probably the Sanscrit form καलामा, which is commonly used in addressing a person, and signifies good, just, or distinguished. Josephus (s. *Aqu. i. p. 484) states, that all the Indian philosophers were called Καλαμίς, but this statement is without any foundation, and is probably a mere invention. (Lassen, in the *Rhen. Museum, für Philol. i. p. 176.)

CALAS or CALLAS (Κάλας, Καλάς). 1. Son of the traitor Harpalus of Efphimias, and first cousin to Antinous, king of Asia, held a command in the army which Philip sent into Asia under Parmenius and Attalus, n. c. 336, to further his cause among the Greek cities there. In n. c. 335, Calas was defeated in a battle in the Treb in Bemnon, the Hid, but took refuge in Bactheia. (Diod. xiv. 91, xvii. 7.) At the battle of the Granicus, n. c. 334, he led the Thessalian cavalry in Alexander's army, and was appointed by him in the same year to the satrapy of the Lesser or Helle-pontine Phrygia, to which Paphlogonia was soon after added. (Arr. *Anab. i. p. 14, e. ii. p. 31, d.; Curt. iii. 1. § 24; Diod. xvi. 17.) After this we do not hear of Calas: it would seem, however, that he died before the treason and flight of CALATINIUS, a distinguished Roman general in the first Punic war, who was twice consul and once dictator. His first consulship falls in B.C. 258, when he obtained Sicily as his province according to Polibius (i. 24), together with his colleague C. Salpicius Paternicus but according to other authorities alone, to conduct the war against the Carthaginians. He first took the town of Hippora, and afterwards the strongly fortified Mytilene, which he laid in ashes. (Zonar. viii. 11, where he is erroneously called Lutinus instead of Calatinius.) Immediately after he attacked Camarina, but during the siege he fell into an ambush, and would have perished with his army, had it not been for the generous exertions of a triumvir who is commonly called Companius Flamma, though his name is not the same in all authorities. (Liv. Epit. 17, xxii. 60; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6; Oros. iv. 8; Florus, ii. 2, 13, who erroneously calls Attius Calatinius dictator; Aurel. Vict. De Afr. Usit. 30; Gell. iii. 7; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 5, § 10.) After his escape from this danger, he conquered Camarina, Enna, Drepanum, and other places, which had till then been in the possession of the Carthaginians. Towards the close of the year he made an attack upon Lipara, where the operations were continued by his successor. On his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph. In B.C. 254 he was invested with the consulship a second time. Shortly before this event the Romans had lost nearly their whole fleet in a storm off Cape Pachynum, but Attius Calatinius and his colleague Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina built a new fleet of 220 ships in the short space of three months, and both the consuls then sailed to Sicily. The main event of that year was the capture of Panormus. (Polyb. i. 38; Zonar. viii. 14.) In B.C. 249 Attius Calatinius was appointed dictator for the purpose of carrying on the war in Sicily in the place of Claudius Gelia. But nothing of importance was accomplished during his dictatorship, which is remarkable only for being the first instance in Roman history of a dictator commanding an army out of Italy. (Liv. Epit. 19; Suet. Tibor. 2; Zonar. viii. 18; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 17.) Several years later, in B.C. 241, he was chosen as mediator between the proconsul C. Atilius Calatinus and the praetor Q. Valerius, to decide which of the two had the right to claim a triumph, and to decide also the sides of the coins to be struck. (Liv. Max. ii. 8, § 2.) Beyond the fact that he built a temple of Spes nothing further is known about him. (Cic. De Leg. ii. 11, De Nat. Deor. ii. 23; Tacit. Ann. ii. 49; comp. Liv. xxiv. 47, xxv. 7.) A. Attius Calatinius was a man highly esteemed both by his contemporaries and by posterity, and his tomb was adorned with the inscription "unum hunc plurimum consentiunt gentes populi primarum fuisse." (Cic. De Scect. 17, De Fin. ii. 35, pro Planc. 25.) (L.S.)

CALAVIUS, the name of a distinguished Campanian family or gens. In conjunction with some other Campanians, the Calavi are said to have set fire to various parts of Rome, in B.C. 591, in order to avenge themselves for what the Campanians had suffered from the Romans. A slave of the Calavi betrayed the crime, and the whole family, together with their slaves who had been accomplices in the crime, were arrested and punished. (Liv. xxvi. 27.)

1. 2. NOVIUS CALAVIUS and OVIUS CALAVIUS are mentioned as the leaders of the conspiracy which broke out at Capua in B.C. 314. C. Masinius was appointed dictator to coerce the insurgents, and the two Calavi, desiring the consequences of their conspiracy, are believed to have made away with themselves. (Liv. ix. 28.)

3. OVIUS CALAVIUS, son of Ovius Calavius, was a man of great distinction at Capua, and when in B.C. 321 the Campanians exulted over the defeat of the Romans at Cadizium, and believed that their spirit was broken, Ovius Calavius taught his fellow-citizens to look at the matter in another light, and advised them to be on their guard. (Liv. ix. 7.)

4. PACUVIUS CALAVIUS, a contemporary of Hannibal, and a man of great popularity and influence, who, according to the Roman accounts, acquired his power by evil arts, and sacrificed everything to gratify his ambition and love of dominion. In B.C. 217, when Hannibal had gained his victory on lake Trasimenum, Pacuvius Calavius happened to be invested with the chief magistracy at Capua. He had good reasons for believing that the people of Capua, who were hostile towards the senate, intended on the approach of Hannibal to murder all the senators, and surrender the town to the Carthaginians. In order to prevent this and to secure his ascendancy over both parties, he had recourse to the following stratagem. He assembled the senate and declared against a revolt from Rome; first, because he was connected with the Romans by marriage, his own wife being a daughter of Appius Claudius, and one of his daughters married to a Roman. He then revealed to the senate the intentions of the people, and declared that he would save the senators if they would entrust themselves to him. Fear induced the senators to do as he desired. He then shut all the senators up in the senator-house, and had the doors well guarded, so that no one could leave or enter the edifice. Upon this he assembled the people, told them that all the senators were his prisoners, and advised them to subject each senator to a trial, but before executing one, to elect a better and juster one in his stead. The sentence of death was easily pronounced upon the first senator that was brought to trial, but it was not so easy to elect a better one. The dispute about a successor was protracted, and the people were disgusted with their own proceedings, which led to no results. They accordingly ordered that the old senators should retain their dignity and CALDUS. be liberated. Calvibus, who by this stratagem had laid the senators under great obligations to himself and the popular party, not only brought about a reconciliation between the people and the senate, but secured to himself the greatest influence in the republic, which he employed to induce his fellow-citizens to espouse the cause of Hannibal. After the battle of Cannae, in b. c. 216, Hannibal took up his winter-quarters at Capua. Perulla, the son of Calvius, had been the strongest opponent of the Carthaginians, and had sided with Decius Magnus, but his father obtained his pardon from Hannibal, who even invited father and son to a great entertainment which he gave to the most distinguished Campanians. But Perulla could not conquer his hatred of the Carthaginians, and went to the rear armed with a sword, intending to murder Hannibal. When Paucavius Calvius left the banquet-room, his son followed him and told him of his plan; but the father worked upon the young man's feelings, and induced him to abandon his bloody design. (Liv. xxiii. 2—4, 3, 9.)

CALVIIUS SABINUS. [SABINUS.]

CALCHAS (Καλχάς), a son of Thestor of Mycenae or Megara, was the wisest soothsayer among the Greeks at Troy. (Hom. I. i. 68, &c., xiii. 70.) He foretold the Greeks the duration of the Trojan war, even before they sailed from Aulis, and while they were engaged in the war he assisted them in the cause of the anger of Apollo. (H. i. 322; Od. Mot. xiii. 19, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 97; Paus. i. 43, § 1.) An oracle had declared that Calchas should die if he should meet with a soothsayer superior to himself; and this came to pass at Claros, for Calchas met the famous soothsayer Mopsus in the grove of the Clarian Apollo, and was defeated by him in not being able to state the number of figs on a wild fig-tree, or the number of pigs which a sow was going to give birth to—things which Mopsus told with perfect accuracy. Hereupon, Calchas is said to have died with grief. (Strab. xiv. p. 642, &c., 666; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 427, 980.) Another story about his death runs thus: a soothsayer saw Calchas planting some vines in the grove of Apollo near Claros, and foretold him that he would never drink any of the wine produced by them. When the grapes had grown ripe and wine was made of them, Calchas invited the soothsayer among his other guests. Even at the moment when Calchas held the cup of wine in his hand, the soothsayer repeated his prophecy. This excited Calchas to such a fit of laughter, that he dropped the cup and choked. (Serv. ad Verg. B. E. vi. 72.) A third tradition, lastly, states that, when Calchas disputed with Mopsus the administration of the oracle at Claros, he promised victory to Amphimachus, king of the Lydians, while Mopsus said that he would not be victorious. The latter prophecy was fulfilled; and Calchas, in his grief at this defeat, put an end to his life. (Conon, Narciss. 6.) Respecting the oracle of Calchas in Daunia, see Dict. of Ant. a. v. Oraculum.

[LS]

CALDUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Caesia gens. The word calds is a shortened form of caiides, and hence Cicero (de Invent. ii. 9) says, "aliquam Caldum vocavi, quod tumero occisso et repentino consilio sit."

1. C. CALLUS CALDUS, a contemporary of L. Crassus, the orator. No member of his family had yet obtained any of the great offices, but he succeeded in raising himself by his activity and eloquence, though his powers as an orator do not seem to have been very great. He was always endeavouring in vain to obtain the quaestorship (Cic. pro FLanc. 21), he was elected in b. c. 107, tribune of the plebs. His tribuneship is remarkable for a lex tabellaria, which was directed against the legate C. Popillius, and which ordained that in the courts of justice the votes should be given by means of tablets in cases of high treason. Cicer

[De Leg. iii. 16] states, that Caldus regretted, throughout his life, having proposed this law, as it did injury to the republic. In b. c. 94, he was made consul, together with L. Domitius Ahemobarba, in preference to a competitor of very high rank, though he himself was a novus homo; and after his consulship he obtained Spain for his province, as is usually inferred from coins of the gens Caesia which bear his name, the word His (paimis) and the figure of a boar, which Eckel refers to the town of Clunia. (One of these coins is figured in the Dict. of Ant. s. v. Equestris.) During the civil war between Marius and Sulla, b. c. 83, Caldus was a steady supporter of the Marian party, and in conjunction with Carrinas and Brutus, he endeavoured to prevent Pompey from leading his legions to Sulla. But as the three did not act in union, Pompey made an attack upon the army of Brutus and routed it, whereby the plan of Caldus was completely thwarted. (Cic. de Orat. i. 25, Brut. 45, in Verr. v. 70, de Petit. Cons. 3, pro Scauro. 8; J. Obscures. 111; Asem. Arsam. in Cornel. p. 57, ed. Orelli; Plut. Pompe. 7; Cic. ad Att. x. 12, 14—16, de Orat. ii. 64; ad Herenn. ii. 13, though it is uncertain whether the Caelian mentioned in the last two passages is the same as C. Caesius Caldus or not; comp. Eckel, v. p. 175.)

2. C. CALIUS CALDUS, a son of L. Caesius Caldus, and a grandson of No. 1, was appointed quaestor in b. c. 50, in Cilicia, which was then under the administration of Cicero. When Cicero departed from the province, he left the administration in the hands of Caldus, although he was not fit for such a post either by his age or his character. Among the letters of Cicero, there is one (ad Fam. ii. 19) addressed to Caldus at the time when he was quaestor designatus. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 15, ad Att. vi. 2, 4—6, v. 1.)

3. CALDUS, the last member of the family who occurs in history. He was one of the Romans who were taken prisoner by the Germans in the defeat of Varus, a. d. 9, and seeing the cruel tortures which the barbarians inflicted upon the prisoners, he grasped the chains in which he was fettered and dashed them against his own head with such force, that he died on the spot. (Vell. Pat. ii. 129.)

The name Caldus occurs on several coins of the Caesia gens. One of the most important is given, as is mentioned above, in the Dict. of Ant. [LS.]

CALECAS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης Καλέκας), was patriarch of Constantinople from a. d. 1333 to 1347. (Cantacuz. Hist. Byz. iii. 21.) He was CALenus.

a native of the town of Apri or Aprus in Thrace, and before he was made patriarch he held a high ecclesiastical office at the court of the emperor Andronicus. He delivered a great number of homilies at Constantinople, which created great sensation. In 1360 he was excommunicated by the Ecumenical Council of Trullo, which was to be still extant in MS. But only two of them have been published by Greuter (De Cruce, ii. p. 1363, &c., and 1477, &c.), and the latter under the erroneous name of Philotheos. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 497, &c., ed. Lond.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 501, &c.)

Calecas, Manuel (Μανουήλ Καλέκας), a relative of Jeanne Calecas, appears to have lived about A.D. 1360, as he combated the doctrines of Palamas. He is said to have been a monk of the Dominican order, and was the author of several works. Though he himself was a Greek, he wrote against the Greek church and in favour of that of Rome, for which he is, of course, highly praised by the adherents of the Roman church. The following list contains some of his works which are published: — 1. "Libri iv adversus errores Græcorum de Processione Spiritus Sancti." The Greek original has not yet been printed, but a Latin translation was made at the command of Pope Martin V. by Ambrosius Camaldulensis, and was edited with a commentary by P. Stenartius, Ingolstadt, 1616, 4to. A reprint of this translation is contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum. vol. xxvi. p. 382, &c., ed. Lugdun. 2. "De Essentia et Operatione Dei," (περὶ οὐσίας καὶ ἐργασιῶν), was edited with a Latin translation and notes by Combebusius, in vol. ii. of his Auctarium Novissimum Bibl. Patr. pp. 167, ed. Paris, 1672, 8vo. This work is directed against the heresies of Palamas, and was approved by the synod of Constantinople of 1531. 3. "De Fide depe Principiis Catholicae Fidei," (περὶ πίστεως καὶ περὶ τῶν ἀρχῶν τῆς καθολικῆς πίστεως). This work, consisting of ten chapters, was edited with a Latin translation and notes by Combebusius, in his Auctarium mentioned above, ii. pp. 174—285. The Latin translation is reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patr. vol. xxvi. p. 345, &c., ed. Lugdun. About ten more of his works are extant in MS., but have never yet been published. CALENUS. [OLFenus.]

CALenus, the name of a family of the Fufa gens, is probably derived from Caels, a município in Campania; but whether the name merely indicated the origin of the family, or whether the first who bore it, derived it from having conquered the town of Caes is uncertain, though the latter is the more probable supposition. The name occurs on a coin of the Fufa gens. (Eckhel, v. p. 220, &c.)

1. Q. Fufius Calenus is mentioned only by Cicero (Philip. viii. 4) as one who thought, that P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica was the greatest man in the republic, because he had delivered the state from the ominous Tib. Gracchus. From this sentiment it may be inferred, that Fufius Calenus occupied a considerable portion of the public land.

2. Q. Fufius Q. f. C. n. Calenus, son of No. 1, was dux, and sixty of his province, and commanded P. Clodius, whom he endeavoured to save from condemnation for his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. With this view he proposed a law, that Clodius should not be tried by special judges, but by the ordinary court. This bill was supported by Q. Hortensius, though he thought it impossible that Clodius should be acquitsted. However the law was passed, and Fufius Calenus gained his end. In b. c. 59, he was elected praetor by the influence of Caesar, in whom he continued and very active ever afterwards. In this year he carried a law, that each of the three classes of judges, senators, equites, and tribuni militum, should give their votes separately, so that it might always be seen in what way each of them voted. Being generally known as the tool of Caesar, he also shared in the hatred which the latter drew upon himself, and was accordingly treated, says Cicero (ad Att. ii. 18), with contempt and hisses by all the good citizens.

In b. c. 52, Calenus is stated to have supported the Clodian party after Clodius had been murdered by Milo, and in the year following we find him as legate of Caesar in Gaul. On the outbreak of the civil war in b. c. 49, Calenus hastened in the month of March to meet Caesar at Brundisium, and on his journey thither he called upon Cicero at his Roman Villa, on which occasion he called Pompey a criminal, and charged the senate with levity and folly. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 5.) When Caesar afterwards went to Spain, Calenus again followed him as legate; and after Caesar had gone to Epirus, Calenus was sent to fetch over the remainder of the troops from Italy. But while he was crossing over from Epirus to Italy with his empty ships, Bibulus captured most of them: Calenus himself escaped to the Italian coast and afterwards returned to Epirus with Antony. Before the battle of Pharsalia Caesar sent him to Achaea, and there he took Delphi, Thessaly, and Ochregomus, and afterwards Athens, Megara, and Patras. In b. c. 47, Caesar caused him to be raised to the consulship.

After the murder of Caesar, in b. c. 44, Calenus joined M. Antony, and during the transactions of the early part of b. c. 43, he defended Antony against Cicero. The speech which Dion Cassius (xlii. 1, &c.) puts into his mouth, does not, probably, contain much genuine matter, and is, perhaps, only an invention of the historian. After the war against Brutus and Cassius, Calenus served as the legate of M. Antony, and the legions of the latter were placed under his command in northern Italy. When the Perusinian war terminated, in b. c. 41, with the defeat of L. Antonius, Octavianus was anxious to get possession of the army of Calenus, which was stationed at the foot of the Alps; fortunately for Octavianus, Calenus just then died, and his son, who was a mere youth, surrendered the army to Octavianus without striking a blow. It is related by Appian (b. c. iv. 47), that during the proscription (b. c. 43) the life of the great M. Terentius Varro was saved by Calenus, and it is not improbable that the letter of Varro to Fufius, which is still extant (Frum. p. 199, ed. Bipont,) was addressed to our Q. Fufius Calenus. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 6, ad Att. i. 14, 15, xi. 15, 16; Schol. Bohemia. pp. 350, 353; Ascon. ad Milan. p. 48, ed. Orelli; Cic. Philip. viii. 4, &c.; Caes. B. G. vii. 50; B. C. H. 6, 26, 55; Dion Cass. xviii. 1, xii. 14, 55, 57, 40, 20; Appian. B. C. ii. 58, v. 3, 12, 24, 33, 51, 61; comp. Orelli, Onom. Tull. ii. p. 259.)

3. Calenus, L. (Futtius), is mentioned only by Cicerno (Cerr. vii. 8) as one of the witnesses against Verres. [L.S.]
CALIDIUS. CALDIUS, L. JULIUS (some MSS. have CALIDIUS, but this last is a gentle appellation and not a cognomen), is pronounced by Cornelius Nepos (Att 12) worthy of holding the first place among the Roman poets of his day, after the death of Catullus and Lucretius. This must, of course, be understood to refer to the period immediately anterior to the Augustan era. Calidius had great possessions in Africa, and was described in consequence by Vellutinus, one of the enemies of Antony, but his name was erased from the fatal list immediately after the assassination of Antioch. [W. R.] CALIGULA. CALIDUS, L. JULIUS, an Aeduan. After the battle of Cremona, in a. d. 69, in which the army of Vitellius was defeated by Antoninus Primus, Julius Calenus, who had himself belonged to the Vitellian party, was sent to Gaul as a living proof of their defeat. (Tuc. Hist. iii. 35.) [L. S.] CALIFNUS, M. VALERIUS CORVUS. [CORVUS.] CALIDOR (Kaliárop), a son of Clytus, slain at Troy by the Telamonic Ajax. (Hom. IL xv. 419; Paus. x. 14. § 2.) Another person of this name, the father of Aphareus, occurs in H. xiii. 341. [L. S.] CALAGACUS or GALLAGACUS, a Briton, chief who distinguished himself among his countrymen in the war with Agricola. Tacitus (Aggr. 29, &c.) gives a noble specimen of his liberality in the speech he put into his mouth. [L. S.] CALIDIA/NUS, C. COSCONIUS. [COSCO/NIUS.] CALIDIUS or CALIDITUS. 1. CN. CALIDIUS, a Roman knight in Sicily, of high rank and great influence, whose son was a Roman judge and senator, was robbed of some of his plate by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 20.) 2. Q. CALIDIUS, tribune of the plebs in a. d. 99, carried a law in this year for the recall of Q. Metellus Pomponius from banishment. In gratitude for this service, his son Q. Metellus Pius, who was then consul, supported Calidius in his canvass for the praetorship in a. d. 80. Calidius was accordingly praetor in B. C. 79, and obtained one of the Spanish provinces; but, on his return to Rome, he was accused of extortion in his province by Q. Lollius (not Gallius, as the Pseudo-Aconium states), and condemned by his judges, who had been bribed for the purpose. As, however, the bribes had not been large, Calidius made the remark, that a man of praetorian rank ought not to be condemned for a less sum than three million sesterces. (Val. Max. v. 2. § 7; Cic. pro Flacco. 26, 29; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 13; Pseudo-Acon. ad loc.; Cic. Verr. iii. 25.) This Calidius may have been one who was sent from Rome, about a. d. 82, to command Murens to desist from the devastation of the territories of Mithridates. (Appian, Mithr. 65.) 3. M. CALIDIUS, son of No. 2 (Pseudo-Acon. ad Cic. Verr. Act. i. 13), a celebrated orator, studied under Apollodorus of Pergamus, who was also the teacher of the emperor Augustus. (Euseb. Chron. Ol. 179. 2.) Cicero passes (Brut. 79, 80) a high panegyric upon Calidius' oratory, which he characterizes as considerable length, and particularly praises the clearness and elegance of his style. But while Calidius explained a thing most lucidly, and expressed his meaning with such force, his delivery was not so successful in carrying with him the feelings of his hearers and producing conviction. Velleius Patерculus (ii. 36) classes him with Cicero, Hortensius, and the other chief orators of his time, and Quintilian (xii. 10. § 10) also speaks of the "subtilitas" of Calidius. The first oration of Calidius of which we have mention was delivered in a. d. 64, when he accused Q. Gallius, a candidate for the praetorship, of bribery. Gallius was defended by Cicero, of whose oration a few fragments are extant. (Ascon. in Orat. in Tog. comm. p. 68, ed. Oppert; Cic. Brut. 80; Festus, p. 238. 13.) Calidius was praetor, and in that year spoke in favour of restoring the house of Cicero, having previously supported his recall from banishment. (Quintil. x. i. § 23; Cic. post. Red. in Sen. 9.) In a. d. 54, he defended, in conjunction with Cicero and others, M. Aemilius Scarrus, who was accused of extortion. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 26.) He also spoke in the same year on behalf of the freedom of the inhabitants of Tenedos, and in support of Gabinius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 11, iii. 2.) In a. d. 52, Calidius was one of the supporters of Milo, after the death of Clodius (Ascon. in Milon. p. 38); and in the following year (51) he was a candidate for the consulate, but lost his election, and was accused of bribery by the two Gallii, one of whom he had himself accused in a. d. 64. (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 4, 9.) In the debate on the senate at the beginning of January, a. d. 49, Calidius gave as his opinion that Pompey ought to depart to his provinces to prevent any occasion for war; and on the breaking out of the civil war immediately afterwards, he joined Caesar, by whom he was appointed to the government of the province of Gallia Cottata. He died at Placentia, in his province, in a. d. 48. (Cass. B. C. i. 2; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 160. 4.) (The fragments of the orations of Calidius are given in Meyer's Oratorum Roman. Fragm. p. 454, &c. 2nd ed.; comp. Eilenfelt's Progymnem. to his edition of Cicero's Brutus, p. vii. and Westermann's Gesch. der Röm. Beredtschaft, p. 6, 6-11.) The coin annexed refers to this M. Calidius. It bears on the obverse the head of Rome, and on the reverse Victory in a two-horse chariot, with the inscription M. CALID. Q. MEL. CN. FL., that is, M. Calidius, Q. Metellus, and Cn. Fulvius, being triumvirs of the mint.
CALIGULA.

that he was born at that town. His earliest years were spent in the camp of his father in Germany, and he grew up among the soldiers, with whom he became accordingly very popular. (Tac. Annal. i. 41, 69; Suet. Cal. 9; Dion Cass. vii. 5.) Caligula also accompanied his father on his Syrian expedition, and after his return first lived with his mother, and, when she was exiled, in the house of Livia Augusta. When the latter died, Caligula, then a youth in his sixteenth year, delivered the funeral oration upon her from the rostra. After this he lived some years with his grandmother, Antonia. Caligula, like his two elder brothers, Nero and Drusus, was hated by Sejanus, but his favour with Tiberius and his popularity as the son of Germanicus saved him. (Dion Cass. iviii. 8.)

After the fall of Sejanus in a. d. 32, when Caligula had just attained his twentieth year, Tiberius summoned him to Capreae. Here the young man concealed so well his feelings at the injuries inflicted upon his mother and brothers, as well as at the wrongs which he himself had suffered, that he did not utter a sound of complaint, and behaved in such a submissive manner, that those who witnessed his conduct declared, that there never was such a cringing slave to so hard a master. (Suet. Cal. 10; Tac. Annal. vi. 20.) But his savage and voluptuous character was nevertheless seen through by Tiberius. About the same time he married Junia Claudilla (Claudia), the daughter of M. Silanus, an event which Dion Cassius (iviii. 25) assigns to the year a. d. 35. Soon afterwards he obtained the quæstorship, and on the death of his brother Drusus was made augur in his stead, having been created pontifex two years before. (Dion Cass. iviii. 8; Suet. Cal. 12.)

After the death of his wife, in March a. d. 36, Caligula began seriously to think in what manner he might secure the succession to himself, of which Tiberius had held out hopes to him, without however declaring anything. (Dion Cass. iviii. 25; Tac. Annal. vi. 45, &c.) In order to ensure his success, he seduced Eunia Nerva, the wife of Macro, who had then the command of the praetorius cohorts. He promised to marry her if he should succeed to the throne, and contrived to gain the consent and co-operation of Macro also, who, according to some accounts introduced his wife to the embraces of the voluptuous youth. (Suet. Cal. 12; Tac. Annal. vi. 45; Dion Cass. iviii. 28; Philo, Legat. ad Cat. p. 998, ed. Paris, 1640.) Tiberius died in March a. d. 37, and there can be little doubt but that Caligula either caused or accelerated his death. In aftertimes he often boasted of having murdered Augustus; and one of the historians of his reign even says that he now avenge his own which his family had suffered from him. There were reports that Caligula had administered to Tiberius a slow poison, or that he had withheld from him the necessary food during his illness, or lastly, that he had suffocated him with a pillow. Some again said, that he had been assisted by Macro, while Tacitus (Annal. vi. 50) mentions Macro alone as the guilty person. (Suet. Tib. 73, Cal. 12; Dion Cass. iviii. 28.) When the body of Tiberius was carried from Misenum to Rome, Caligula accompanied it in the dress of a mourner, but he was saluted by the people at Rome with the greatest enthusiasm as the son of Germanicus. Tiberius in his will had appointed his grandson Tiberius as cohaer to Caligula, but the senate and the people gave the sovereign power to Caligula alone, in spite of the regulations of Tiberius. (Suet. Cal. 14; Dion Cass. lxix. 1; comp. Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 6 § 9.) In regard to all other points, however, Caligula carried the will of Tiberius into execution: he paid to the people and the soldiers the sums which the late emperor had bequeathed to them, and even increased these legacies by his own munificence. After having delivered the funeral oration upon Tiberius, he immediately fulfilled the duty of piety towards his mother and his brother: he had them conveyed from Pandataria and the Pontian islands to Rome, and deposited them in the Mausoleum with great solemnity. But notwithstanding the feeling which prompted him to this act, he pardoned all those who had allowed themselves to be used as instruments against the members of his family, and ordered the documents which contained the evidence of their guilt to be burnt in the Forum.

Those who had been condemned to imprisonment by Tiberius were released, and those who had been exiled were recalled to their country. He restored to the magistrates their full power of jurisdiction without appeal to his person, and he also endeavoured to revive the old character of the comitia by allowing the people to discuss and decide the matters brought before them, as in former times. Towards foreign princes who had been stripped of their power and their revenues by his predecessor, he behaved with great generosity. Thus Agrippa, the grandson of Herod, who had been put in chains by Tiberius, was released and restored to his kingdom, and Antiochus IV. of Commagene received back his kingdom, which was increased by the maritime district of Glicia.

On the first of July a. d. 37, Caligula entered upon his first consularship together with Claudius, his father's brother, and held the office for two months. Soon after this he was seized by a serious illness in consequence of his irregular mode of living. He was, indeed, restored to health, but from that moment appeared an altered man. Hitherto the joy of the people at his accession seemed to be perfectly justified by the justice and moderation he shewed during the first months of his reign, but from henceforward he appears more like a diabolical than a human being—he acts completely like a madman. A kind of savagery and gross voluptuousness had always been prominent features in his character, but still we are not justified in supposing, as many do, that he merely threw off the mask which had hitherto concealed his real disposition; it is much more probable that his illness destroyed his mental powers, and that his loose all his old love of power. In which case it is highly credible that he now yielded without exercising any control over them. Immediately after his recovery he ordered Tiberius, the grandson of his predecessor, whom he had raised before to the rank of princeps juvenilis, to be put to death on the pretext of his having wished the emperor not to recover from his illness; and those of his friends who had vowed their lives for his recovery, were now compelled to carry their vow into effect by putting an end to their existence. He also commanded several members of his own family, and among them his grandmother Antonia, Macro, and his wife Eunia Nerva, to make away with themselves. His thirst for blood seemed to increase with the number of his victims, and murdering soon ceased to be the consequence of his hatred; it became a matter of pleasure and amusement with him. Once during a public fight of wild beasts in the Circus, when there were no more criminals to enter the arena, he ordered persons to be taken at random from among the spectators, and to be thrown before the wild beasts, but that they might not be able to cry out or curse their destroyer, he ordered their tongues to be cut out. Often when he was taking his meals, he would order men to be tortured to death before his eyes, that he might have the pleasure of witnessing their agony. Once when, during a horse race, the people were most favourably disposed to one of his competitors than to himself, he is said to have exclaimed, "Would that the whole Roman people had only one head."

But his cruelty was not greater than his voluptuousness and obscenity. He carried on an incessant intercourse with his own sisters, and when Drusilla, the second of them, died, he raved like a madman with grief, and commanded her to be worshipped as a divinity. No Roman lady was safe from his attacks, and his marriages were as disgracefully contracted as they were ignominiously dissolved. The only woman that exercised a lasting influence over him was Caesonia. A point was touchingly illustrated in the disorder of his mind; his brain is, that in his self-repentance he went so far as to consider himself a god: he would appear in public sometimes in the attire of Bacchus, Apollo, or Jupiter, and even of Venus and Diana; he would frequently place himself in the temple of Castor and Pollux, between the statues of these divinities, and order the people who entered the temple to worship him. He even built a temple to himself as Jupiter Latialis, and appointed priests to attend to his worship and offer sacrifices to him. This temple contained his statue in gold, of the size of life, and his statue was dressed precisely as he was. The wealthiest Romans were appointed his priests, but they had to purchase the honour with immense sums of money. He sometimes officiated as his own priest, making his horse Incitatus, which he afterwards raised to the consulship, his colleague. No one but a complete madman would have been guilty of things like these.

The sums of money which he squandered almost surpass belief. During the first year of his reign he nearly drained the treasury, although Tiberius had left in it the sum of 720 millions of sesterces. One specimen may serve to shew in what senseless manner he spent the money. That he might be able to boast of having marched over the sea as over dry land, he ordered a bridge to be constructed across the channel between Baiae and Puteoli, a distance of three Roman miles and six hundred paces. After it was covered with earth and houses built upon it, he rode across it in triumph, and gave a splendid banquet on the middle of the bridge. In order to amuse himself on this occasion in his usual way, he ordered numbers of the spectators whom he had invited to be thrown into the sea. As the regular revenues of the state were insufficient to supply him with the means of such mad extravagance, he had recourse to robberies, public sales of his estates, unheard-of taxes, and every expedient of the most extreme that could be devised. In order that no means of getting money might remain untried, he established a public brothel in his own palace, and sent out his servants to invite men of all classes to avail themselves of it. On the birth of his daughter by Caesonia, he regularly acted the part of a beggar in order to obtain money to rear her. He also made known that he would receive presents on new year's day, and on the first of January he posted himself in the vestibule of his palace, to accept the presents that were brought him by crowds of people. Things like these gradually engendered in him a love of money itself without any view to the ends it is to serve, and he is said to have sometimes taken a delight in rolling himself in heaps of gold. After Tity and Rome were exhausted by his expenditures, his love of money and his avarice compelled him to seek other resources. He turned his eyes to Gaul, and under the pretence of a war against the Germans, he marched, in A.D. 40, with an army to Gaul to extort money from the wealthy inhabitants of that country. Executions were as frequent here as they had been before in Italy. Lentulus Gaetulicus and Aemilius Lepidus were accused of having formed a conspiracy and were put to death, and the two sisters of Caligula were sent into exile as guilty of adultery and accomplices of the conspiracy. Ptolemaeus, the son of king Juba, was exiled merely on account of his riches, and was afterwards put to death. It would be endless and disgusting to record here all the acts of cruelty, insanity, and avarice, of which his whole reign, with the exception of the first few months, forms one uninterrupted succession. He concluded his predatory campaign in Gaul by leading his army to the coast of the ocean, as if he would cross over to Britain; he drew them up in battle array, and then gave them the signal—to collect shells, which he called the spoils of conquered Ocean. After this he returned to Rome, where he acted with still greater cruelty than before, because he thought the honours which the senate conferred upon him too insignificant and too human for a god like him. Several conspiracies were formed against him, but were discovered, until at length Cassius Chaerea, tribune of a praetorian cohort, Cornelius Sabinus, and others, entered into one which was crowned with success. Four months after his return from Gaul, on the 24th of January A.D. 41, Caligula was murdered by Chaerea near the theatre, or according to others, in his own palace while he was hearing some boys rehearse the part they were to perform in the theatre. His wife and daughter were likewise put to death. His body was secretly conveyed by his friends to the Horti Lamiani, half burnt, and covered over with a light turf. Subsequently, however, his sisters, after they expected the exhumation of his body to be taken out, and had it completely burnt and buried. (Sueton. Caligula; Dion Cass. lib. lix.; Joseph. Ant. xix. 1; Aurel. Vict. De Caes. 3; Zonar. x. 6.)

In the coin annexed the obverse represents the head of Caligula, with the inscription C. CAESEAR AVG. GERMAN. P. M. TR. POT., and the reverse that of Augustus, with the inscription DIVVS AVG. PATER PATRIAE.

CALLIADÉS (Καλλιάδης), a comic poet, who about whom nothing further is known, than that a comedy entitled "Ἀγρακες was ascribed by some to Diphilus and by others to Calliades. (Athen. ix.

p. 401.) From the former passage of Athenaeus it must be inferred, that Calliades was a contemporary of the archon Euclides, b. c. 493, and that, accordingly he belonged to the contemporary Comedy, whereas the fact of the Agonae being disputed between him and Diphilus shews that he was a contemporary of the latter, and accordingly was a poet of the new Attic comedy. For this reason Meincke (Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. p. 450) is inclined to believe that the name Calliades in Atticana is a mistake for Callias. [L. S.]

of his answers have been preserved by Galen.
To one of his patients who said he was about to die,
he replied by the verse, Εἰ μὴ σε Αἴτω καλλάδιας

CALLIÁS and HIPPONÍCUS (Καλλίας, Ἠππωνίκος), a noble Athenian family, celebrated for their wealth, the heads of which, from the son of Phenippus downwards [No. 2], received these names alternately in successive generations. (Arist.
Av. 283; Schol. ad loc.; Perizon. ad Aet.
V. H. xiv. 16.) They enjoyed the hereditary dignity of torch-bearer at the Eleusinian mysteries, and claimed descent from Triptolemus. (Xen. Hell.
vi. 3, § 6.)

1. HIPPONÍCUS I., the first of the family on record, is mentioned by Plutarch (Sol. 13, comp. Pol.
Praxe. 15) as one of the three to whom Solon, shortly before the introduction of his σοστάρες, b. c. 594, imparted his intention of diminishing the amount of debt while he abstained from interference with landed property. Of this information they are said to have made a fraudulent use, and to have enriched themselves by the purchase of large estates with borrowed money. Böckh thinks, however (Pubb. Econ. of Athens, b. iv. ch. 3), that this story against Hipponius may have originated in the envy of his countrymen.

2. CALLIÁS I., son of Phanippus and probably nephew of the above, is mentioned by Herodotus
(b. c. 121) as a strong opponent of Peisistratus, and as the only man in Athens who ventured to buy the tyrant's property on each occasion of his expulsion. On the same authority, if indeed the chapter be not an interpolation (v. 122; see Larcher, ad loc.), we learn, that he spent much money in keeping horses, was a conqueror at the Olympic and Pythian games, at the former in b. c. 564 (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 283); and gave large dowries to his daughters, allowing them—a good and wise departure from the usual practice—to marry any of the Athenians they pleased.

3. HIPPONÍCUS II., surnamed Ammon, son of Callias I., is said to have increased his wealth considerably by the treasures of a Persian general, which had been entrusted to Diomnestus, a man of Eretria, on the first invasion of that place by the Persians. The invading army being all destroyed Diomnestus kept the money; but his heirs, who were the second Persian invasion, transmitted it to Hipponius at Athens, and with him it ultimately remained, as all the captive Eretrians (comp. Herod. vi. 118) were sent to Asia. This story is given by Athenaeus (xii. pp. 556, f. 557, n.) on the authority of Heracleides of Pontus; but it is open to much suspicion from its inconsistency with the account of Herodotus, who mentions only one invasion of Eretria, and that a successful one b. c.
490. (Herod. vi. 90—101.) Possibly the anecdote, like that of Callias λακκόδαλλους, was one of the modes in which the gossips of Athens accounted for the large fortune of the family.

4. CALLIÁS II., son of No. 3, was present in his priesty dress at the battle of Marathon; and the story runs that, on the rout of the enemy, a Persian, claiming his protection, pointed out to him a treasure buried in a pit, and that he took the money and appropriated the money. Hence the surname λακκόδαλλος (Plut. Aristid. 5; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 65; Hesych. and Suid. s. v. λακκόδαλλος), which, however, we may perhaps rather regard as having itself suggested the tale,
and as having been originally, like βαθύδαλλος,
expressive of the extent of the family's wealth.
(Böckh, Pubb. Econ. of Athens, b. iv. ch. 3.) His enemies certainly were sufficiently malignant, if not powerful; for Plutarch (Aristid. 28), on the authority of Aeschines the Socratic, speaks of a capital prosecution instituted against him on extremely weak grounds. Aristideus, who was his cousin, was a witness on the trial, which must therefore have taken place before b. c. 466, the probable date of Aristides' death. In Herodotus (vii. 15) Callias is mentioned as ambassador from Athens to Araxeses; and this statement we might identify with that of Diodorus, who ascribes to the victories of Cimon, through the negotiation of Callias, u. c. 449, a peace with Persia on terms most humiliating to the latter, were it not that extreme suspicion rests on the whole account of the treaty in question. (Paus. i. 8; Diod. xii. 4; Wesseling, ad loc.; Mitford's Greece, ch. xi. sec. 3, note 11; Thirlwall's History, vol. iii. pp. 37, 38, and the authorities there referred to; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. iii. ch. 12, b. iv. ch. 3.) Be this as it may, he did not escape impeachment after his return on the charge of having taken bribes, and was condemned to a fine of 50 talents, more than 12,000 drachmae, being a fourth of his whole property. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 429; Lys. pro Aristoph. Bon. § 50.)

5. HIPPONICUS III., was the son of Callias II., and with Eurydemus commanded the Athenians in their successful invasion into the territory of Tanagra, a. c. 426. (Thuc. iii. 91; Diod. xii. 65.) He was killed at the battle of Delium, a. c. 424, where he was one of the generals. (Andoc. Aelid. p. 30.) It must therefore have been his divorced wife, and not his widow, whom Pericles married. (Plut. Per. 24; comp. Plut. and Aristoph. Aeg. 203; Wesseling, ad Diod. xii. 65.) His daughter Hipparate became the wife of Alcibiades, with a dowry of ten talents, the largest, according to Andocides, that had ever before been given. (Andoc. Aelid. p. 50; Plut. Alcid. 6.) Another daughter of Hippococus was married to Theodorus, and became the mother of Isocrates the orator. (Isocr. de B. p. 533, a.) In Plato's "Cratylus," also (pp. 364, 391), Hermogenes is mentioned as a son of Hippococus and brother of Callias; but, as in p. 391 he is spoken of as not sharing his father's property, and his poverty is further alluded to by Xenophon (Mem. ii. 10), he must have been illegitimate. (See Dict. of Ant. pp. 472, a, 598, b.) For Hippococus, see also Ael. V. H. xiv. 16, who tells an anecdote of him with reference to Polycletus the sculptor.

6. CALLIAS III., son of Hippococus III. by the lady who married Pericles (Plut. Per. 24), was likewise made ambassador by Pericles. (Andoc. Aelid.) We have seen, that he must have succeeded to his fortune in a. c. 424, which is not perhaps irreconcilable with the mention of him in the "Flatterers" of Eupolis, the comic poet, n. c. 421, as having recently entered on the inheritance. (Athen. v. p. 218, c.) In n. c. 400, he was engaged in the attempt to crush Andocides by a charge of profanation, in having placed a suppliant bough on the altar of the temple of Eleusis during the celebration of the mysteries (Andoc. de Myst. § 110, &c.); and, if we may believe the statement of the accused, the bough was placed there by Callias himself, who was provoked at having been thwarted by Andocides in a very disgraceful and profligate attempt, and who may have observed the death of the Athenian heavy-armed troops at Corinth on the occasion of the famous defeat of the Spartan Mora by Iphicrates. (Xen. Hell. iv. 5, § 15.) He was hereditary proconsul of Sparta, and, as such, was chosen as one of the envoys empowered to negotiate peace with that state in n. c. 371, on which occasion Xenophon reports an extremely absurd and self-glorying speech of his (Hell. vi. 3, § 2, &c., comp. v. 4, § 22.) A vain and silly dilettante, an extravagant and reckless profligate, he disgusted all his ancestral wealth on ephemeral fritters, and women; and so early did these propensities appear in him, that he was commonly spoken of, before his father's death, as the "evil genius" (Hravutrus) of his family. (Andoc. de Myst. § 130, &c.; comp. Aristoph. Rnav. 429, Av. 284, &c.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 502; Athen. iv. p. 169, a; Ael. V. H. iv. 10.) The scene of Xenophon's "Banquet," and also that of Plato's "Protagoras," is laid at his house; and in the latter especially his character is drawn with some vivid sketches as a trifling dilettante, highly amused with the intellectual fencing of Protagoras and Socrates. (See Plat. Protag. pp. 335, 336; comp. Plat. Apol. p. 20, a, Thuc. p. 166, a, Cratyl. p. 351.) He is said to have ultimately reduced himself to absolute beggary, to which the sarcasm of Iphicrates (Arist. Rhet. iii. 2, § 10) in calling him ηπιρεγνυσ instead of θεωρεχεσ easily refers; and he died at last in actual want of the common necessities of life. (Athen. xii. p. 557, c.; Lys. pro Aristoph. Bon. § 50.) Aelian's erroneous account of his committing suicide is clearly nothing but gossip from Athenaeus by memory. (Ael. V.H. iv. 23; Periplus, ad loc.) He left a legitimate son named Hippococus. (Andoc. de Myst. § 126, which speech, from § 110 to § 131, has much reference to the prosperity of Callias.) [E. B.]

CALLIAS (Καλλίας). 1. A soothsayer of the sacred Elean family of the Iamidai. (Pind. (Omp. vi), who, according to the account of the Crotonians, came over to the ranks from those of Sybaris, when he saw that the sacrifices foreboded destruction to the latter, n. c. 510. His services to Crotona were rewarded by an allotment of land, of which his descendants were still in possession when Herodotus wrote. (Herod. v. 44, 45.)

2. A wealthy Athenian, who, on condition of marrying Cimon's sister, Elpinice, paid him for the fine of fifty talents which had been imposed on Miltiades. (Plut. Cim. 4; Nepos, Cim. 1.) He appears to have been unconcerned with the noble family of Callias and Hippococus, the δηοδικεία. It seems likely that his wealth arose from mining, and that it was a son or grandson of his who was transferred to Euboea, and made a citizen there. (Dößch, Dissert. on the Mines of Laurion, § 23.)

3. Son of Callias, was appointed with four colleagues to the command of the second body of Athenian forces sent against Perdiccas and the revolted Chalcidians, n. c. 432, and was slain in the battle against Aristeus near Potidaea. (Thuc. i. 61-63; Diod. xii. 37.) This is probably the same Callias who is mentioned as a pupil of Zeno the Eleatic, from whose instructions, purchased for 100 minae, he is said to have derived much real advantage, σοφία καί ἐλλάδος γέγονεν. (Pseud.-Plat. Aelid. i. p. 119; Buttmann, ad loc.)

4. The Chalcidian, son of Minosarchus, together with his brother Taurochus, succeeded his father Minosarchus, who was a able at Chalcis, and formed an alliance with Philip of Macedon in order to support himself against Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria, or rather with the view of extending his authority over the whole of Euboea—a design which, according to Aeschinus, he covered under the disguise of a plan for uniting in one league the states of the island, and establishing a general Euboean congress at Chalcis. Plutarchus accordingly applied to Athenes...
CALLIAS.

For aid, which was granted in opposition to the advice of Democthenes, and an army was sent into Euboea under the command of Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tymyus, b. c. 350. (Aesch. c. Cle. §§ 85–88, de Résa. Leg. § 180, Dem. de Pac. § 5; Plat. Phed. 12.) After that, Callias retired from the Macedonian court, where he was for some time high in the favour of the king; but, having in some way offended him, he withdrew to Thebes, in the hope of gaining her support in the furtherance of his views. Breaching, however, with the Thebans also, and fearing an attack both from them and from Philip, he applied to Athens, and through the influence of Democthenes not only obtained alliance, and an acknowledgment of the independence of Chalcis, but even induced the Athenians to transfer to that state the annual contributions (συρρήσεις) from Eores and Eretria, Callias holding out great promises (apparently never realized) of assistance in men and money from Achæa, Megara, and Euboea. This seems to have happened in b. c. 343, at the time of Philip's projected attempt on Aegaeostia. Accusations of course accruing his rival's support of Callias to corruption; but Democthenes may have thought that Euboea united under a strong government, might serve as an effective barrier to Philip's ambition (Aesch. c. Cle. §§ 89, &c.; Dem. Philipp. iii. § 85; Thirlwall's History of Greece, vol. vi. p. 19.) In b. c. 341, the defeat by Phocion of the Macedonian party in Eretria and Eretria under Clearchus and Philistides gave the supremacy in the island to Callias. (Dem. de Cor. §§ 86, 89, &c.; Philipp. iii. §§ 23, 75, 79; Diod. xvi. 74; Plut. Dem. 17.) Callias seems to have been still living in b. c. 339, the date of the orations of "the Crown." See Aesch. c. Cle. §§ 85, 87, who mentions a proposal of Democthenes to confer on him and his brother Taurochies the honour of Athenian citizenship.

5. One of the Thespian ambassadors, who appeared at Chalcis before the Roman commissioners, Marcus and Attilius, to make a surrender of their city, recognizing the alliance of Persia, b. c. 172. In common with the deputies from all the Boeotian towns, except Thebes, they were favourably received by the Romans, whose object was to dissolve the Boeotian confederacy,—an object accomplished in the same year. (Polyb. xxvii. 1, 2; Liv. xlii. 43, 44; Clinton, Fast. ii. p. 60, iii. p. 398.)

CALLIAS (καλλια), literary. 1. A comic poet, who according to Suidas (s. a.) a son of Lysistratus, and bore the name of Schoenien because his father was a rope or basket maker (σχοινοσακός). He belonged to the old Attic comedy, for Athenaeus (x. p. 453) states, that he lived shortly before Strattis, who appears to have commenced his career as a comic poet about b. c. 412. From the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Equit. 526) we further learn, that Callias was an imitator of Cratinus. It is, therefore, probable, that he began to come before the public prior to b. c. 424; and if it could be proved that he was the same person as Calliades (καλλιάδες), he would have lived at least till b. c. 492. We still possess a few fragments of his comedies, and the names of six are preserved in Suidas, viz. Αἴγυπτος, Αἰτωλία (Zenob. iv. 7), Κόλποις (perhaps alluded to by Athen. ii. p. 57, and Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 264), Παρθενία (Athen. viii. p. 344; Schol. ad Aristoph. Achar., 21, 151; Dion. Lyc. ii. 18), Αἰγιλανθής, and Σχαλιάκων. Whether he is the same as the Callias whom Athenaeus (vii. p. 675, x. p. 448, 453) calls the author of a γραμματική χορεία, is uncertain. (Comp. Athen. iv. pp. 140, 176, vii. p. 308, xii. pp. 324, 667; Pollux, viii. 113; Eust. Thesm. Matt. v. 6. 11; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Con. Gr. p. 213, &c.)

2. Of Argos, a Greek poet, the author of an epigram upon Polybius. (Anth. Graec. iii. 232; Brunck, Analect. ii. p. 3.)

3. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, a Greek grammarian who lived before the time of Strabo (xiiii. p. 618), who mentions him among the celebrated persons born in Lesbos, and states that he wrote commentaries on the poems of Sappho and Alcaeus. (Comp. Athen. iii. p. 85.)

4. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian who wrote a great work on the history of Sicily. He lived, as Josephus (c. Apion. i. 3) expresses it, long after Philistorus, but earlier than Timaeus. From the nature of his work it is clear that he was a contemporary of Agathocles, whom, however, the historian survived, as he mentioned the death of the tyrant. This work is sometimes called τὸ περὶ Ἀγαθόκλειαν, or περὶ Ἀγαθόκλεια λογοτεχίαν, and sometimes also by Roman writers "Historia de Robus Siculis." (Athen. xii. p. 542; Aelius, Hist. An. xvi. 28; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 41; Macrobr. Sat. v. 19; Dionys. i. 42; Fest. s. v. Roman.) It embraced the history of Sicily during the reign of Agathocles, from b. c. 317 to 289, and consisted of twenty-two books. (Diod. xxi. Exc. 12. p. 492.) The very few fragments which we possess do not enable us to form an opinion upon it, but Diodorus (xii. Exc. p. 581) states that Callias was corrupted by Agathocles with rich bribes; that he sacrificed the truth of history to base gain; and that he went even so far in distorting the truth as to convert the crimes and the violation of the laws human and divine, of which Agathocles was guilty, into praiseworthy actions. (Comp. Suid. s. v. Callias.)

There is another Callias of Syracuse, a contemporary of Democthenes, who occupied himself with oratory, but who is mentioned only by Plutarch. (Dem. 5, VII. X. Orat. p. 844, a.) [L. S.]

CALLIADES (καλλιάδες). 1. The Harpocrates who commanded the garrison with which the Spartans occupied Athens at the request of the Thirty tyrants, b. c. 404. The story told by Plutarch of his raising his staff to strike Autolycus the Athlete (whom the Thirty put to death for presuming to resent the insult), shows that he formed no exception to the course and overbearing demeanour so common with Spartan governors. The tyrants conciliated his favour by the most studied deference,—the above case is a strong instance of it,—and he allowed them accordingly to use his soldiers at their pleasure as the instruments of their oppression. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. §§ 13, 14; Diod. iv. 4; Plut. Lycurg. 15.)

2. One of the leaders of the democratic party at Tegae. B. c. 30, who, finding himself defeated in obtaining the sanction of the Tegae assembly for the project of uniting the Arcadian towns into one body, endeavoured to gain their point by an appeal to arms. They were, however, defeated by the oligarchical leader, Statippus, and Proxenus, the colleague of Callibus, was slain. Callibus on this retreated with his forces close to the walls of the city, and, while he attempted to open a negotiation with Stasippus, waited for the arrival of a reen-forcement for which he had sent from Mantinea.

On its appearance, Stasippus and his friends fled from the city and took refuge in the temple of Artemis; but the party of Callibus unroofed
the building and attacked them with missiles, and being thus obliged to surrender, they were taken to Tegea and put to death after the mockery of a trial (Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 8, 9.; comp. Paus. viii. 27.)

[Ε. Ε.]

CALLICLES (Καλλικλῆς), a physician, who was probably living in the third or second century n. c., and who is mentioned by Gulen (Do Med. Med.
ii. 7. vol. x. p. 142) as having belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici.

[W. A. G.]

CALLICLES (Καλλικλῆς). 1. A statuary of Megara, who lived about B. C. 400. (See Siebellis, ad Paus. iii. p. 29.) His principal works seem to have been Olympic victors (Paus. vi. 7. §§ 1, 3), and philosophers. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.)

2. A painter of uncertain age and country (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10. s. 37), is perhaps the same as the painter, Callicles, mentioned by Varro.
(Evagrius, p. 256, H. P.)

CALLICRATES (Καλλικράτης), historical. 1.
A Spartan, is mentioned by Herodotus as the finest and handsomest man of all the Greeks of his time.
He was slain by an arrow just before the armies engaged at Platea (p. c. 479), and while the Greeks were waiting till the signs from the sacrifices should be favourable. (Herod. ix. 72.) In Herod.
ix. 85, his name occurs among the ιπέβες who were buried separately from the rest of the Spartans and from the Hoplites. The word ιπέβω, however, can hardly be used here in its ordinary meaning of "youths," but has probably its original signification of "commanders." (See Müller, Dor.

2. Callicles is the true name given to the murderer of Dion by Nicesthenes (Dion. Hal. 8.); he is called Calli-phus by Diodorus and Plutarch. [CALLIPHUS.]

An accomplished flatterer at the court of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes), who, apparently mistaking servility for knowledge of the world, affected to adopt Ulysses as his model. He is said to have worn a scarlet tunic with a head of Ulysses engraved on it, and to have given his children the names of Telephus and Anticlea.
(Athen. vi. p. 251, d.)

4. A man of Leontium in Achaia, who plays a somewhat discrepant part in the history of the Achaean league. By a decree of the Achaean, solemnly recorded in B. C. 161, Lacedaemonian had been received into their confederacy and the restoration of all Lacedaemonian exiles had been provided for, with the exception of those who had reigned with ingratitude their previous restoration by the Achaean. The Romans, however, had sent to urge the recall of these men, and in the debate in the assembly on this question, B. C. 179, Callicles contended, in opposition to Lycortas, that the requisition should be complied with,
openly maintaining, that neither law, nor solemn record, nor anything else, should be more regarded than the will of Rome. The assembly, however, favoured the view of Lycortas, and appointed ambassadors, of whom Callicles was one, to lay it before the Roman senate. But he grievously abused his trust, and instigated the Romans to suspend the independence of his country by giving their support in every city to the Roman or anti-national party. Returning home with letters from the senate, pressing the recall of the exiles, and highly commendatory of himself, he was made general of the league, and used all his influence thenceforth for the furtherance of the Roman cause. (Polyb. xii. 23, 34.) Early in B. C.
168 he opposed the motion of Lycurtus and his party for sending aid to the two Ptolemies (Philometeor and Physis) against Antiochus Epiphanes, recommending instead, that they should endeavour to mediate between the contending parties; and he carried his point by introducing a letter from Q. Marcus, the Roman consul, in which the same course was urged. (Polyb. xxx. 8—10.) On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, B. C.
168, more than 1000 of the chief Achaeans, point-d out by Callicles as having favoured the cause of Ptolemais, were apprehended and sent to Rome, to be tried, as it was pretended, before the senate.
Again these were Polybius, the historian; and he was also one of the survivors who, after a detention of 17 years, were permitted to return to their country. (Polyb. xxx. 10, xxxi. 8, xxxii. 7, 8, xxxiii. 1; Liv. xiv. 31; Paus. vii. 10.) The base-ness of Callictures was visited on his head,—if, indeed, such a man could feel such a punishment,—
in the intense hatred of his countrymen.
Men deemed it pollution to use the same bath with him, and the very boys in the streets threw in his teeth the name of traitor. (Polyb. xxx. 20.)
In B. C. 153 he dissuaded the league from taking any part in the war of the Romans against Cretan, on the ground that it did not benefit them to go to war at all without the sanction of the Romans.
(Polyb. xxxiii. 15.) Three years after this, B. C.
150 Callocrates, then general of the league, having been bribed by the Romans with 160 talents to aid them against the Athenians, from whose garrison in their town they had received injury, engaged Callictures in the same cause by the promise of half the sum. The payment, however, he evaded, and Callictures retaliated on Menalidias by a capital charge; but Menalides escaped the danger through the favour of Dineus, his successor in the office of general, whom he bribed with three talents. In B. C. 149, Callictures was sent as ambassador to Rome with Dineus, to oppose the Spartan exiles, whose banishment Dineus had procurred, and who hoped to be restored by the senate.
Callictures, however, died at Rhodes, where they had touched on their way; "his death," says Pausanias, "being, for ought I know, a clear gain to his country." (Paus. vii. 11, 12.)

CALLICRATES (Καλλικράτης), literary. I. It is mentioned only once by Athenaeus (xii. p. 386) as the author of a comedy called Μεχριειά, and from the connexion in which his name appears there with those of Antiphanes and Alexis, it may be inferred that he was a poet of the middle Attic comedy.

2. A Greek orator who seems to have lived about the time of Demosthenes, and to whom the tables of Pegasus ascribed the oration Εκλησία Δημοκράτους πορευόμενως, which was usually considered the work of Demarchus. (Dionys. Deiarcb.
CALLICRATES.

11.) But no work of Callicrates was known even as early as the time of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. A Greek historian who lived in and after the time of the emperor Aurelian. He was a native of Tyre, and wrote the history of Aurelian. Vo- pius (A. D. 4), who cannot possibly fragment of the work, describes Callicrates as the most learned writer among the Greeks of his time.

2. A Lacian, a sculptor, celebrated for the smallness of his works. (Aelian, V. H. i. 17.) He made and other animals out of ivory, which were so small that one could not distinguish the different limbs. (Plin. H. N. v. 21, xxxvi. 4, 5, 8, 1.) According to Athenaeus (ix. p. 762, ν.), he also executed embossed work on vases. [W. I.] CALLICRATES (Καλλικράτης) was sent out by Lycurgus, as general, to the Lacian, and saved the Lacian from death, and soon found that the jealousy of his predecessor, as well as the strong contrast of their characters, had left for him a harvest of difficulties. Yet he was not unsuccessful in surmounting these, and showed that plain, straightforward honesty may sometimes be no bad substitute for the arts of the supple diplomatist. The cabals of Lysander's partizans against him he quelled by asking them, whether he should remain where he was, or sail home to report how matters stood; and even those who looked back with most regret to the winning and agreeable manners of his courtly predecessor, admired his virtue, says Plutarch, even as the beauty of a heroic statue. His great desire, however, was the want of funds, and for these he reluctantly went and applied to Cyprus, to whom it is said that Lysander, in order to thwart his successor, had returned the sums he held; but the proud Spartan spirit of Callicrates could not brook to dance attendance at the prince's doors, and he withdrew from Syracuse in disgust, declaring that the Greeks were most wretched in truckling to barbarians for money, and that, if he returned home in safety, he would do his best to reconcile Lacedaemon to Athens. He succeeded, however, in obtaining a supply from the Milesians, and he then commenced against the enemy a series of successful operations. The capture of the fortress of Delphinion in Chios and the plunder of Tyre were closely followed by the conquest of Methymna. This last place Conon attempted to save, in spite of his inferiority in numbers, but, arriving too late, anchored for the night at Εκατοντικεους. The next morning he was chased by Callicrates, who declared that he would put a stop to his adultery with the sea, and was obliged to take refuge in Mytilene, where his opponent blockaded him by sea and land. Conon, however, contrived to send news to the Athenians of the strait in which he was, and a fleet of more than 150 sail was despatched to relieve him. Callicrates then, leaving Eioneus with 50 ships to conduct the blockade, proceeded with 120 to meet the enemy. A battle ensued at Argimmus, remarkable for the great number of vessels engaged, and in this Callicrates was the first to show that Athenians were victorious. According to Xenophon, his steersman, Hermon, endeavoured to dissuade him from engaging with such superior numbers: as Diotreus and Plistarch tell it, the south-sayer foretold the admiral's death. His answer at any rate, μὴ παρ' ἐμαν οἶνον τον Σάντων, became famous, but is mentioned with censure by Plutarch and Cicerari. On the whole, Callicrates is a somewhat refreshing specimen of a plain, blunt Spartan of the old school, with all the guilelessness and simple honesty, but (it may be added) not without the bigotry of that character. Witness his answer, when asked what sort of men the Ionians were: "Bad freemen, but excellent slaves." (Xen. Hell. i. 6, §§ 1—33; Diod. xiii. 76—79, 37—39; Plut. Lysand. 5—7, Pelop. 2, Apophthegm. Loxon; G. O. C. i. 24, 30.) Aelian tells us (V. H. xii. 43), that he rose to the privileges of citizenship from the condition of a slave (μετέχων); but see Mitford's 'Greece,' cc. xx. sec. 2, note 4. [F. E.]

CALLICRATES (Καλλικράτης), a disciple of Pythagoras. Four extracts from his writings on the subject of marriage and domestic happiness are preserved in Stobaeus. (Porph. lxxii. 11, lxix. 16—18.) [A. G.]

CALLICRITUS (Καλλικρίτος), a Thesban, was sent as ambassador from the Boeotians to the Roman senate, s. c. 187, to remonstrate against the requisition of the latter for the recall of Zeuxippus from exile. The sentence of banishment had been passed against him both for sacrilege and for the murder of Brachyllus (see p. 582, a.); and Callixtus represented to the Romans on behalf of his countrymen, that they could not annul a sentence which had been legally pronounced. The remonstrance was at first unsuaviling, though ultimately the demand of the senate was not pressed. (Polyb. xxii. 2.) It was probably the same Callixtus who strongly opposed in the Boeotian assembly the views of Perseus. He appears even to have gone to Rome to warn the senate of the king's schemes, and was murdered, by order of the latter, on his way back. (Liv. xiii. 13, 40.) [E. F.]

CALLICTER (Κάλλικτερ), surnamed Μαρτυρος, a Greek poet, the author of four epigrams of little merit in the Greek Anthology. (Anthol. Graece x. 5, 6, 118, 333; Brucke, Anat. ii. pp. 394, 329.) [L. S.]

CALLIDEMUS (Καλλίδημος), a Greek author about whom nothing is known, except that Pliny (H. N. iv. 12) and Solinus (17) refer to him as their authority for the statement, that the island of Baboea was originally called Chalcis from the fact of brass (χάλας) being discovered there first. [L. S.]

CALLIDUS. [C. D.]

CALLIGEITUS (Καλλίγειτος), a Megarian, and TIMAGORAS (Τιμαγόρας), a Cyzican, were sent to Sparta in B. C. 412 by Pharmaces, the satrap of Bithynia, to induce the Lacedaemonians to send a fleet to the Hellespont, in order to assist the Hellespontine cities in revolting from Athens. The Lacedaemonians, however, through the influence of Alcibiades, preferred sending a fleet to Chios; but Calligieitus and Timagoras would not take part in this expedition, and applied the money which they brought from Pharmaces to the equipment of a separate fleet, which left Peloponnesus towards the close of the year. (Thuc. viii. 6, 8, 31.)

CALLIGENEIA (Καλλιγενεία), a surname of Demeter or of her nurse and companion, or of Gaia. ( Aristoph. Thesm. 300, with the Schol.; Hesych. s. v.; Phot. Lex. s. v.) [A. E.]
CALLIMACHUS.

CALLIGENES (Καλλιγένης), the name of the physician of Philip, king of Macedon, who attended him in his last illness at Amphipolis, b.c. 179, and concealed his death from the people till the arrival of Perseus, to whom he had sent intelligence of the great danger of the king. (Liv. xl. 56.) [W. A. G.]

CALLIMACHUS (Καλλιμάχος). 1. Of the tribe of Aetolians and the δῆμος of Aphiada, held the office of Polemarch, b.c. 490, and in that capacity commanded the right wing of the Athenian army at Marathon, where he was slain, after behaving with much gallantry. In the battle he is said to have vouched for Artemis a helper for every enemy he should shun. By the permission of Miltiades he had given his casting vote for fighting, when the voices of the ten generals were equally divided on the question. This is the last recorded instance of the Polemarch performing the military duties which his name implies. Callimachus was conspicuously figured in the fresco painting of the battle of Marathon, by Polygnotus, in the στάδιον. (Herod. vi. 109—114; Plut. Aristeid. et Cat. Maj. 2, Symposium. l. 6, § 3; Schol. ad Aristoph. Eq. 658; Paus. I. 15.)

2. One of the genealogists of Mithridates, who, by his skill in engineering, defended the town of Amisus, in Pontus, for a considerable time against the Romans, in b.c. 71; and when Lucullus had succeeded in taking a portion of the wall, Callimachus set fire to the place and made his escape by sea. He afterwards fell into the hands of Lucullus at the capture of Nisibis (called by the Greeks Antioch) in Mygdonia, b.c. 68, and was put to death in revenge for the burning of Amisus. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 32; comp. Appian, Bell. Mithr. 78, 83; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 7.) [E. E.]

CALLIMACHUS (Καλλιμάχος), one of the most celebrated Alexandrine grammarians and poets, was, according to Suidas, a son of Battus and Mesme, and belonged to the celebrated family of the Battidae at Alexandria, who were the Ovid (Jb. 58) and others call him simply Battides. (Comp. Strab. xvii. p. 837.) He was a disciple of the grammarians Hermocrates, and afterwards taught at Eleusis, a suburb of Alexandria. He was highly esteemed by Ptolemy Philadelphia, who invited him to a place in the Museum. (Suid.; Strab. xvii. p. 838.) Callimachus was still alive in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, the successor of Philadelphus. (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. ii. 26.) It was formerly believed, and is now established as an historical fact, that Callimachus was chief librarian of the famous library of Alexandria. This fact leads us to the conclusion, that he was the successor of Eratosthenes and that he died about a. d. 260 until his death about a. d. 240. (Ritschl, Die Alexandrin. Biblioth. &c. pp. 19, 84, &c.) This calculation agrees with the statement of A. Gelius (xvii. 21), that Callimachus lived shortly before the first Punic war. He was married to a daughter of Euphrates of Syracuse, and had a sister Megatime, who was married to Stasenurus, and a son Callimachus, who is distinguished from his uncle by being called the younger, and is called by Suidas the author of an epic poem Πειτώρων.

Callimachus was one of the most distinguished grammarians, critics, and poets of the Alexandrine period, and his celebrity surpassed that of nearly all the other Alexandrine scholars and poets, several of the most distinguished men of that period, such as his successor Eratosthenes, Philo- sthenus, Aristophanes of Byzantium, Apollonius Rhodius, Ister, and Hermippus, were among his pupils. Callimachus was one of the most fertile writers of antiquity, and if the number in Suidas be correct, he wrote 800 works, though we may take it for granted that most of them were not of great extent, if he followed his own maxim, that a great book was equal to a great evil. (Athen. iii. p. 72.) The number of his works of which the titles or fragments are known to us, amounts to upwards of forty. But what we possess is very little, and consists principally of poetical productions, apparently the least valuable of all his works, since Callimachus, notwithstanding the reputation he enjoyed for his poems, was not a man of real poetical talent: labour and learning are with him the substitutes for poetical genius and talent. His prose works, on the other hand, which would have furnished us with some highly important information concerning ancient mythology, history, literature, &c., are completely lost.

The poetical productions of Callimachus still exist, and are as follows: 1. Hymns, six in number, of which five are written in hexameter verse and in the Ionic dialect, and one, on the bath of Pallas, in distichs and in the Doric dialect. These hymns, which bear greater resemblance to epic than to lyric poetry, are the productions of labour and learning, like most of the poems of that period. Almost every line furnishes some curious mythical information, and it is perhaps not saying too much to assert, that these hymns are more overloaded with learning than any other poetical production of that time. Their style has nothing of the easy flow of genuine poetry, and is evidently studied and laboured. There are some ancient Greek scholia on these hymns, which however have no great merit. 2. Seventy-three epigrams, which belong to the best specimens of this kind of poetry. The high estimation they enjoyed in antiquity is attested by the fact, that Archibius, the grammarian, who lived, at the latest, one generation after Callimachus, wrote a commentary upon them, and that Marianus, in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, wrote a paraphrase of them in iambics. They were incorporated in the Greek Anthology at an early time, and have thus been preserved.

3. Eligeas. These are lost with the exception of some fragments, but there are imitations of them by the Roman poets, the most celebrated of which is the De Cona Berenices of Catullus. If we may believe the Roman critics, Callimachus was the author of elegiac poems (Quintil. x. § 58), and Ovid, Proserpina, and Callimachus for their model in this species of poetry. We have mention of several more poetical productions, but all of them have perished except a few fragments, and however much we may lament their loss on account of the information we might have derived from them, we have very little reason to regret their loss as specimens of poetry. Among them we may mention, 1. The Africa, an epic poem in four books on the causes of the various mythical stories, religious ceremonies, and other customs. The work is often referred to, and was paraphrased by Marianus; but the paraphrase is lost, and of the original we have only a few fragments. 2. An epic poem entitled Εἰκάσων, which was the name of an old woman who had received
CALLIMACHUS.

These is the basis of the one edited by J. A. Ernesti at Leiden, 1761, 2 vols. 8vo., which contains the whole of the commentary of Grævius' edition, a much improved text, a more complete collection of the fragments, and additional notes by Heinsius and Ruhnken. Among the subsequent editions we need only mention those of Ch. F. Loesser (Leipzig, 1774, 4to.), H. F. M. Vokler (Leipzig, 1815, 8vo.), and C. F. Blomfield (London, 1823, 8vo.). [L. S.]

CALLIMACHUS, a physician, who was one of the followers of Herophilus, and who must have lived about the second century B. C., as he is mentioned by Zeuxis. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." i. 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 827.)

He wrote a work in explanation of the obsolete words used by Hippocrates, which is not now extant, but which is quoted by Erofains. (Gloss. Hippocr. praef.) He may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Pliny as having written a work De Coronis. (H. N. xxi. 3.)

[Pliny, A. G. 6.]

CALLIMACHUS, an artist of uncertain country, who is said to have invented the Corinthian column. (Vitr. iv. i. 10.) As Scopos built a temple of Athene at Tegae with Corinthian columns in b.c. 396, Callimachus must have lived before that time. Pausanias (i. 26. § 7) calls him the inventor of the art of boring marble (τοὺς λίθους πρῶτος ἐπιτραπείς), which Thiersch (Epock. Ann. p. 60) thinks is to be understood of a mere perfection of that art, which could not have been entirely unknown so late a period. By these inventions as well as by his other productions, Callimachus stood in good reputation with his contemporaries, although he did not belong to the first rank. The last of his works, the last touch of perfection, by elaborating the details with too much care, that he lost the grand and sublime. Dionysius therefore compares him and Calamis to the oratores Lydiani (τῶν λαπτότος ήκενα καὶ τῆς χριβίας) whilst he draws a parallel between Polydeuces and Phidias and Isocrates, on account of the σειμα καὶ μεγαλοτέχνους καὶ διομαρμαῖας. (Judie. Isocr. c. 3.) Callimachus was never satisfied with himself, and therefore received the epithet κακοτέχνους. (Paus. i. 26. § 7.) Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19) says the same, and gives an exact interpretation of the surname: "Semper calumniator sibi nec fimen habens diligentius, ob id, κακοτέχνους appellavit."

Vitruvius says, that Callimachus "proprius elegantiam et subtillitatem artis marmoreae ab Atheniensibus καρδάτευξιν fuerat nominatus." Sillig (Cat. Art. p. 125) conjectures, after some MSS., that καρδάτευξις must be read instead of κακοτέχνους; but this is quite improbable on account of Pliny's translation, "calumniator sibi." Whether the καρδάτευξις of Vitruvius is corrupt or a second surname (as Siebel supposes, ad Paus. i. 26. § 7), cannot be decided. So much is certain, that Callimachus' style was too artificial. Pliny (l. c.), speaking of a work representing some dancing Laesdemonian women, says, that his excessive elaborations of the work had destroyed all its beauty. Pausanias (i. 26. § 7) describes a golden lamp, a work of Callimachus dedicated to Athene, which if filled with oil, burnt precisely one whole year without ever going out. It is scarcely probable that the painter Callimachus, mentioned by Pliny (l. c.), should be our statuary, although he is generally identified with him. [W. I.]

Of his numerous prose works not one is extant entire, though there were among them some of the highest importance. The one of which the loss is most to be lamented was entitled Πίναξ ποτονοθατών συγγραμμάτων, ou πίνακες τῶν ἐν πάγω παντεύμ, διαλαμψάνων καὶ ὑπὸ συνεγραφάς, in 120 books. This work was the first comprehensive history of Greek literature. It contained, systematically arranged, lists of the authors and their works. The various departments of literature appear to have been classified, so that Callimachus spoke of the comic and tragic poets, of the orators, law-givers, philosophers, &c., in separate books, in which the authors were enumerated in their chronological succession. (Athen. ii. p. 270, vi. p. 252, xii. p. 585, xv. p. 669; Diog. Laërt. iv. 23, viii. 86.) It is natural to suppose that this work was the fruit of his studies in the libraries of Alexandria, and that it mainly recorded such authors as were contained in those libraries. His pupil Aristophanes of Byzantium wrote a commentary upon it. (Athen. ix. p. 408, viii. 386; Eust. Mag. a. P. Πίναξ.) Among his other prose works we find mentioned the following:—I. Μοσσορία, which is usually supposed to have been treated of the Museum of Alexandria and the scholars connected with it. 2. Περὶ διαφωνίας. 3. Ἐκάλωμα δικαστικαὶ. 4. Ἀναγίνωσκα τῶν ἔσω ἄκουσιν τῶν ἕρωτος δυτῶν εὐχαριστεῖ. 5. Νόμιμα βαρβαρικά. 6. Κτείσες ρήματα καὶ τόλμων. 7. Ἀργοῦς ὀικήματι. 8. Περὶ ἀνάγων. 9. Περὶ ἔρωμας. 10. Συναγωγας ποταμίων, ou περὶ τῶν ἐν οἰκισμοὶ ποταμίων, &c., &c. A list of his works is given by Suidas, and a more complete one by Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 615, &c.)

The first edition of the six hymns of Callimachus appeared at Florence in 4to., probably between 1524 and 1560. It was followed by the Aldine, Venice, 1513, 8vo., but a better edition, in which some gaps are filled up and the Greek scholia are added, is that of S. Geminus, Basel, 1532, 4to., reprinted at Paris, 1549, 4to. A more complete edition than any of the preceding ones is that of H. Stephanus, Paris, 1566, fol. in the collection of "Poetarum principes Herodii Carmimia." This edition is the basis of the text which from that time has been regarded as the vulgar. A second edition by H. Stephanus (Geneva, 1577, 4to.) is greatly improved: it contains the Greek scholia, a Latin translation, thirty-three epigrams of Plinius, and a new collection of his other works. Henceforth scarcely anything was done for the text, until Th. Grævius undertook a new and comprehensive edition, which was completed by his father J. G. Grævius. It appeared at Utrecht, 1597, 2 vols. 8vo. It contains the notes of the previous editors, of B. Bentley, and the famous commentary of Ez. Spanheim. This edition

CALLIMACHUS (Καλλίμαχος), a veteran officer in the royal companion-cavalry (της ἑταῖρας τῆς ἐταιρίας) of Alexander the Great, took an active part in the reconciliation between him and his army in B.C. 324. (Arr. Anab. vi. 11.)

Callinus, a Greek sophist and rhetorician, was a native of Syria, or, according to others, of Arabia Petraea. He taught rhetoric at Athens in the reign of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 259-268), and was an opponent of the rhetorician Genethlius. (Suid. s.v. Καλλινός, Περιθάλος, and Ἰολίανδος Δρυόρος.)

Suidas and Eudokia (p. 268) mention several works of Callinicus, all of which are lost, with the exception of a fragment of an eulogy on Rome, which is very inferior both in form and thought. It is printed in L. Allatius' "Excerpt. Rhet. et Sophist." pp. 256-268, and in Orelli's edition of Philo, "De VII Spect. Orb." Lipsiae, 1816, vol. Among the other works of Callinicus there was one on the history of Alexandria, in ten books, mentioned by Suidas and Eudokia, and referred to by Jerome in the preface to his commentary on Daniel. (Fabri. De Orac. III. p. 38, vi. 84.) [L. S.]

Callinicus Seleucus. [Seleucus.]

Callinus (Καλλινός). 1. Of Ephesus, the earliest Greek elegiac poet, whence either he or Archilochus is usually regarded by the ancients as the inventor of elegiac poetry. As regards the time at which he lived, we have no definite statement, and the ancients themselves endeavoured to determine it from the historical allusions which they found in his elegies. It has been fixed by some at about B.C. 634, and by others at about B.C. 680, whereas some are inclined to place Callinus as far back as the ninth century before the Christian era, and to make him more ancient even than Homer and Hesiod. These authorities for determining his age are Strabo (xiv. p. 647), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 335), and Athenaeus (xii. p. 525). But the interpretation of these passages is involved in considerable difficulty, since the Cimmerian invasion of Asia Minor, to which they allude, is itself very uncertain; for history records three different invasions of the Cimmerians into Asia Minor. We cannot enter here into a refutation of the opinions of others, but confine ourselves to our own views of the case. From Strabo it is evident that Callinus, in one of his poems, mentions Magnesia on the Maeander as still existing, and at war with the Ephesians. Now, we know that Magnesia was destroyed by the Tares, a Cimmerian tribe, in B.C. 727, and consequently the poem referred to by Strabo must have been written previous to that year, perhaps about B.C. 730, or shortly before Archilochus, who in one of his earliest poems mentioned the destruction of Magnesia. Callinus himself, however, appears to have long survived that event; for there is a line of his (Frugam. 2, comp. Frugam. 8, ed. Bergk) which is usually referred to the destruction of Sardis by the Cimmerians, about B.C. 678. If this calculation is correct, Callinus must have been in the bloom of life at the time of the destruction of Magnesia, and we may reasonably conclude that he himself perhaps took a part. We possess only a very few fragments of the elegies of Callinus, but among them there is one of twenty-one lines, which forms part of a war-elegy, and is consequently the most ancient specimen of this species of poetry extant. (Stobaeus, Florid. i. 19.) In this fragment the poet exults his countrymen to courage and perseverance against their enemies, who are usually supposed to be the Magnesians, but the fourth line of the poem seems to render it more probable that Callinus was speaking of the Cimmerians. This elegy is one of great beauty, and gives us the highest notion of the talent of Callinus. It is printed in the various collections of the "Poetae Graeci Minores." All the fragments of Callinicus are collected in N. Buch's Callius, Tyrtasen et Aule Fragments (Leipzig, 1831, 8vo.) and Bergk's Poetas Lyrici Graeci, p. 303, &c. (Comp. Francke, Calli, sive Questiones de Origine Carminis Elegiaca, Altona, 1816, 8vo.; Thiersch, in the Acta Philol. Monacens. iii. p. 571; Bode, Gesch. der Lyrisch. Dichter, i. pp. 143-161.)

2. A disciple and friend of Theophrastus, who left him in his will a piece of land at Stagira and 3000 drachmae. Callinus was also appointed by the testator one of the executors of the will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 52, 55, 56.)

3. Of Hermione, lived at a later period than the preceding one, and was a friend of the philosopher Lycon, who bequeathed to him in his will the works which he had not yet published. (Diog. Laërt. v. 70-74.) [L. S.]

Calliope. [Musa.]

Calliope (Καλλιόπη). In all, or almost all, the MSS. of the Terence, known not to be older than the ninth century, we find at the end of each play the words "Calliopin recensuit," from whence it has very naturally been inferred, that Calliope was some grammarian of reputation, who had revised and corrected the text of the dramatist. Euquphrius, indeed, who wrote a commentary upon the same comedy about the year A.D. 1000, has the following note to the word plaudite at the end of the Andria: "Vos sunt Calliopii opus recitatoria, ut calliopianum fabulum terminasse intellexerint, et alaquebatur populum. Voc vate, Voc plaudite sive finivit?" but this notion is altogether inconsistent with the established meaning of recen-CALIPPIUS.

Barth, on the other hand, maintained, that Calippius was a complimentary epithet, indicating the celebrated Placius Albinius or Alcineius, whom in a MS. of Willebrod he found designated as "Alcineius Albinius Augustus optimus Calippius." Or, in such a context, was a Calippus at Musis formatus; but the probability of this conjecture has been much weakened by Fabricius, who has shown that Calippius was a proper name not uncommon among writers of the middle ages. (Funciscus, de Inertii ac Decrepitiae Latinae Sensibus, c. iv. § 36; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. lib. i. c. iii. §§ 3 and 4; Bostewartii Abaela, iii. 11, p. 182; Barth. Advers. vii. 20; Ritschl, De camundat. Publ. Tenqviis, disputat. Wratlesi. 4to. 1833.)

CALIPPHA, a priestess of Vesta. In B.C. 86, the praetor urbanus C. Valerius Placius, in pursuance of a decree of the senate, brought a bill before the people, that Calippaha should be made a Roman citizen. This was done before the Velites obtained the Roman franchise, and for the purpose of enabling the priestess of a foreign divinity at Rome to perform sacrifices on behalf of Romans also. (Cass. pro Balb. 24.)

[LS.]

CALLIPHON (Kaliphoi), a philosopher, and most probably a disciple of Epicurus, who is mentioned several times and condemned by Cicero as making the chief god of man to consist in an union of virtue (honestia) and bodily pleasure (benevolus, voluptas), or, as Cicero says, in the union of the man with the beast. (Cass. de Div. i. 16, v. 9, 32; De belli i. 33; Tacit. ann. 20. 51; Dion. Alex. Serm. 2. § 127.)

[LS.]

CALLIPHEN (Kaliphef), a Samian painter, employed to decorate the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. (Paus. v. 10. § 1, x. 25. § 2.)

[LL.]

CALLIPPIDES (Kalippidwv), of Athens, a celebrated tragic actor of the time of Alcibiades and Agesilaus. (Plut. Aetcb. 32, Ages. 21; Athen. xii. p. 353.) He was particularly famous for his imitative art of the actions of real life, which he carried so far as to become ridiculous, and to be stigmatized by the nickname of the ape (eipos). See the Greek life of Sophocles; Apostolius, Proser. xv. 83). A comedy of Strattis entitled Callippides seems to have been composed to ridicule this actor. (Meineke, Einz. Cor. Gr. ii. p. 226; and it is not improbable that Cicero (adv. Att. xii. 12) may be alluding to Callippides the actor. (Orelli, Oeconom. T. 2. ii. p. 119.)

[LS.]

CALLIPPOS (Kalippos), historical. 1. Of Athens, was a disciple of Plato, and thus became acquainted with Dion of Syracuse, who was likewise among the pupils of Plato. When Dion afterwards returned to Syracuse, Callippos accompanied him, and was ever after treated by him with distinction and confidence. Notwithstanding this, Calippo assumed the title of Dion against the life of Dion. The plot was discovered by Dion, and Callippos was apprehended, and then by swelling, that he had no evil intentions towards Dion. But in spite of this oath, he assassinated Dion during a festival of Persephone, the very divinity by whom he had sworn, B.C. 353. Callippos now usurped the government of Syracuse, but maintained himself only for thirteen months. The first attempt of Dion's friends to cause an insurrection of the people against the usurper was unsuccessful; but, a short time after, Hipparchus, a brother of the younger Dionysius, landed with a fleet at Syracuse, and Callippos, who was defeated in the ensuing battle, took to flight. He now wandered about in Sicily from town to town, at the head of a band of licentious mercenaries, but could not maintain himself anywhere. At last he and Leptines, with their mercenaries, crossed over into Italy, and laid siege to Rhegium, which was occupied by a garrison of Dionysius the Younger. The garrison was expelled, and the citizens of Rhegium were restored to autocracy, and Callippos himself remained at Rhegium. He treated his mercenaries badly, and being unable to satisfy their demands, he was murdered by his own friends, Leptines and Polyperchon, with the same sword, it is said, with which he had assassinated Dion. (Plut. Dion. 26—38, de Sera Num. Vict. p. 533, d.; Dio. xvi. 31, 30, 3; Athen. xi. p. 506.)

2. Of Athens, took part in the Olympic games in B.C. 532. He bribed his competitors in the pentathlon to allow him to conquer and win the prize. But the fraud became known, and the Eleves condemned both Calippus and his competitors to pay a heavy fine. The Athenians, who considered the affair as a national one, sent Hype- rides to petition the Eleves to desist from their demand. When the request was refused, the Athenians neither paid the fine nor did they frequent the Olympic games any longer, until at last the Delphic god declared that he would not give any oracle to the Athenians, unless they satisfied the demand of the Eleves. The fine was now paid, and the money was spent in erecting six statues to Zeus, with inscriptions by no means flattering to the Athenians. (Paus. v. 21. § 3, &c.)

3. Of Athens, a son of Moerocles, a brave commander of the Athenians in the war against the Gauls, B.C. 279. He was stationed with his Athenians at Thermopylae to guard the pass. (Paus. i. 3. § 4, x. 20. § 3.)

4. An admiral of king Perseus of Macedonia. He and Antenor were sent by the king, in B.C. 168, with a fleet to Tenedos, to protect the transports that came with provisions for the Macedonians from the islands of the Aegean. (Liv. xiv. 28.)

[LS.]

CALLIPPOS (Kalippos), literary. 1. A composer, who is mentioned only by Athenaeus (xxv. p. 693) as the author of a comedy entitled Pannyxhis. Person proposed to read in this passage Hipparchus instead of Callippos, because it is known that Hipparchus composed a comedy Pannyxhis. (Athen. xv. p. 691.) But this is not a sufficient reason for striking the name of Callippos from the list of comic writers. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Corp. Gr. p. 490.)

2. Of Athens, is mentioned by Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 23) as the author of a τραγικός ποιητής, but nothing further is known about him.

3. A Stoic philosopher of Corinth, who was a pupil of Stobaeus, the founder of the school. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 38.) He seems to be the same person as the Callippos mentioned by Pausanias (ix. 29. § 28. § 10) as the author of a work entitled ἀρχαία ἐκ Ὀρχευμάκης, of which a few fragments are preserved there.

4. Surnamed Petanaeus, is mentioned by Dio- genes Laërtius (v. 57) as one of the witnesses to the will of Theophrastus. (LS.]

CALLIPPOS or CALIPPOS (Kalippos or Kalippos), an astronomer of Cyzicus. He was a disciple of one of Endoxus' friends, and followed him to Athens, where he became acquainted with Aristotle (who mentions him Metaph. xi. 8), and assisted that philosopher in rectifying and completing the discoveries of Eudoxus. (Simplic. in loc. II. de Coel. p. 120, a.) His observations are frequently referred to by Aratus, and by Genelles and Ptolemy in their meteorological calendars (see Gemellus, Elem. Astron. cap. 16, in Petavius Astronomia, p. 64, &c., and Petavius de aequinoctiis et solsticiis, cap. 15). They were probably made at Cyzicus, since Ptolemy (ad fin.) says, that Callippus observed there the Hellespont. Such calendars were fixed in public places, for common use, and hence called παραγράμματα: they recorded the times of the different risings and settings of the fixed stars, with the θεωρία, or principal changes in the weather supposed to be connected with them, as deduced from the observations of various astronomers. Callippus invented the period or cycle of 76 years, called after him the Callippic. Several attempts had been previously made to discover intervals of time of moderate length, which should be expressible in whole numbers by means of each of the three natural units of time—the solar year, the lunar month, and the solar day: and, in particular, Meton, about a century before, had observed the remarkable approximation to equality between 19 years and 235 months, and had introduced the celebrated cycle of 19 years, which he also assumed to contain 6940 days. This would make the year = 365 4/19 days; and, therefore, Callippus, observing that the difference between this and the more correct value 365 1/4 = 365 5/4 = 365 14/15, proposed to quadruple the Metonic period, and then subtract one day. He supposed, that the year = 277539 days; both of which suppositions are considerably nearer the truth than Meton's. (Gemellus, Ed. Ast. cap. 6, Uranologia, p. 37.) If we take the mean values of the year and month, in days, to be 365 242/344 and 29 530 587 215 respectively, then 76 years = 2775398 45 50 54, and 940 months = 2775398 18 4 54 nearly; but these numbers would not be strictly accurate in the time of Callippus.

The Callippic period seems to have been generally adopted by astronomers in assigning the dates of their observations; and the frequent use which Ptolemy makes of it enables us to fix the epoch of the beginning of the first period with considerable certainty. It must have begun near the time of the summer solstice, since Ptolemy refers to an observatory of that solstice made at the end of the 75th year (τα' ο' ημισετάριον) of the first period (see, e.g. in Coel. ii. 2, vol. i. p. 163, ed. Halma); and out of a number of other observations recorded by the same writer, all but two, according to Ideler, indicate the year B.C. 330, whilst four of them require the evening of June 28 for the epoch in question. It is not certain at what time the period came into civil use; it would naturally be employed not to supersede, but to correct from time to time, the Metonic reckoning: The inaccuracy of the latter must have become quite sensible in B.C. 359; and it is evident, from the praise which Diodorus (xii. 36) bestows upon it, that it could not have remained unquestioned down to his time. (Ideler, Hist. Untersuch. über die Astron. Beobachtungen der Alten, Berlin, 1836, p. 214, &c., Handbuch der Technischen Chronologie, Berlin, 1825, vol. i. p. 344, &c.; Petavius, Doctrin. Temp. ii. 16; Schiller, De Euenodi. Temp. Lib. ii. 16; Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Ancienne, vol. i. p. 200.) [W. F. D.]

Some manuscripts are still extant, professing to contain writings of Callisthenes; but they are spurious, and none of his works have come down to us. Besides an account of Alexander's expedition (which he arrogantly said would be the main support of the conqueror's glory, and which is referred to in several places by Plutarch and Strabo), he also wrote a history of Greece, in ten books, from the peace of Antalcidas to the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philemous. (a. c. 367—357.) Cicero mentions too a work of his on the Trojan war. This, however, of his writings has not much reason to regret, if we may trust the criticisms passed on them by those to whom they were known. Thus Polybius censures him for his unskilfulness in his relation of military affairs; Cicero finds fault with his style as fitted rather for rhetorical declamation than for history, and contrasts it with that of Xenophon; and Strabo speaks disparagingly of his accuracy and veracity. He seems indeed to have been far more a rhetorician than either a philosopher or a historian, and, even as a rhetorician, to have had more of the spirit of Orators than of his own great master. His readiness and fluency, no less than his extreme indistinctness, are illustrated by the anecdote given by Plutarch (Alex. 53) of his speaking with great applause in praise of the Macedonians at a banquet, and then, on Alexander's challenging him to take the other side, launching forth into the bitterest invective against them. In philosophy he probably followed Aristotle, so far indeed as he threw himself into any system at all. The recension of Homer (τι παραφημος), kept by Alexander in a precious casket, and usually ascribed to Aristotle, was made, according to Strabo (xii. p. 594), by Callisthenes and Anaxarchus. (Diod. iv. 1. xiv. 117. xvi. 14; Cic. ad Fam. v. 15. ad Q. Frat. ii. 12. de Orat. i. 54. de Div. i. 34. ii. 35; Strab. xii. p. 521, xii. p. 543, xiv. p. 680, xvii. p. 681; Plut. Alex. 27, 59; Polyb. xii. 17—21; Suid., l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 486; Clint. Fast. xii. p. 376, note k.)
2. An Athenian censor, and, according to Plu- tarch, one of the eight whom Alexander, after the destruction of Thebes (v. c. 335), required to be delivered up to him,—on which occasion Demostenes is said to have quoted the fable of the wolf, who demanded from the sheep the surrender of their dogs. Demades, however, who, it seems, received a fee of five talents for the service, succeeded in propitiating Alexander, and in saving all whose lives were threatened, except the general Charidemus. Arrian gives the number and list somewhat differently, and neither he nor Diodorus mentions Callis- thenes. (Plut. Dem. 20, Alex. 18; Diod. xvii. 15; Arr. Anab. i. 10.)
3. A freedman of Lucullus, who, according to Cornelius Nepos (ap. Plut. Lucull. 42), adminis- tered to his master a certain drug (intended as a charm to increase his affection for him), which caused the failure of intellect that he laboured under in his latter years. [E. E.] CALLISTHENES (Καλλισθηνης), of Sybaris, is mentioned as the author of a history of the Galatians (Γαλατινων), of which Plutarch (De Pute. 6) quotes the thirteenth book. But the work must have been of much greater extent, since CALLISTHENES.

CALLISTRATUS.

Stobæus (Flori. c. 14) has preserved a fragment of it which belonged to the twenty-third book. [L. S.]

CALLISTO (Kalλιστος), is sometimes called a daughter of Lycean in Arcadia and sometimes of Nycteus or Celenus, and sometimes also she is described as a nymph. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1042; Apollo. Ill. 8. § 2; comp. Higgin. Fest. Aed. ii. 19.) She was a hundred years old and spent twenty years in the house of Zeus, however, enjoyed her charms; and, in order that she might not become known to Hera, he metamorphosed her into a she-bear. But, notwithstanding this precaution, Callisto was slain by Artemis during the chase, through the contrivance of Hera. Arcas, the son of Callisto, was given by Zeus to Maia to be brought up, and Callisto was placed among the stars under the name of Arcos. (Apollod. i. c.) According to Hyginus, Artemis herself metamorphosed Callisto, as she discovered her pregnancy in the bath. Ovid (Met. ii. 110, &c.) makes Juno (Hera) metamorphose Callisto; and when Arcas during the chase was on the point of killing his mother, Jupiter (Zeus) placed both among the stars. At Arcadia, they received the tomb of Callisto thirty stadia from the well Curni: it was on a hill planted with trees, and on the top of the hill there was a temple of Artemis Calliste or Callisto. (Paus. viii. 35. § 7.) A statue of Callisto was dedicated at Delphi by the citizens of Tegae (x. 9. § 3), and in the Lesche of Delphi Callisto was painted by Polygnotus, wearing the skin of a bear instead of a dress. (xiii. 3. § 3.) While tradition throughout describes Callisto as a companion of Artemis, Müller (Dor. ii. 9. § 3) endeavours to shew that Callisto is only another form of the name of Artemis Calliste, as he infers from the fact, that the tomb of the heroine was connected with the temple of the goddess, and from Callisto being changed into a she-bear, which was the symbol of the Arcadian Artemis. This view has indeed nothing surprising, if we recollect that in many other instances also an attribute of a god was transformed by popular belief into a distinct divinity. Her being mixed up with the Arcadian genealogies is thus explained by Müller: the daughter of Lycean means the daughter of the Lycean Zeus; the mother of Arcas is equivalent to the mother of the Arcadian people. [L. S.]

CALLISTO, a female Pythagorean, to whom Thracus, the wife of Pythagoras, addressed a letter on the proper way of governing a family. The letter is extant, and printed in the Aldine collection published at Rome in 1499, and at Geneva, with the Latin translation, in 1606. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 10.) [A. G.]

CALLISTONICUS (Kalλιστονικος), a Thracian (romanized by Pausanias (ix. 16. § 1)), made a statue of Tyche carrying the god Pluto. The face and the hands of the statue were executed by the Athenian Xenophon. [W. I.]

CALLISTRATUS (Kalλιστρατος), historical.

1. Son of Empedus, is mentioned by Pausanias as the commander of a body of Athenian cavalry in Sicily during the expedition of Nicias. When his countrymen were nearly cut to pieces at the river Aissinara, b. c. 413, Callistratus forced his way through the enemy and led his men safe to Catania. Thence returning to Syracuse, he attacked those who were plundering the Athenian camp, and fell, selling his life dearly. (Paus. vii. 16; comp. Thuc. vii. 84, 85.)

2. One of the body of knights under the command of Lysimachus, who were employed by the government of the Ten to keep in check the exiles under Thrasybulus in the Pelopœa. Lysimachus having massacred some countrymen, with whom he fell in as they were going from the Pelopœa to their farms to proverb, proved his guilt in the barbarous manner, having got Callistratus into their hands, retaliated by putting him to death, b. c. 403. (Xen. Hell. ii. 4. § 27.) In b. c. 410, this Callistratus had been treasurer of the goddesses. Perhaps also he was the originator of the practice of paying the poorer citizens for their attendance at the assembly (μεθοδίκ[ας] χαρ[ρωπος]), but Böckh thinks that the introduction of this salary is more probably to be referred to the son of Empedus. (Pind. Eorn. of Athens, bk. ii. ch. 14.)

3. An Athenian orator, son of Callistrates of Aphidna, and nephew of the notorious Agaribyas. (Dem. c. Timocr. p. 742.) We first hear of him in b. c. 375, as connected with the oligarchical party, and as sending to Thebes to warn Leonidas of the intended attack on the Cadmea by the exiles under Pelopidas; and yet in the following year, 376, he was joined with Chabrias and Timotheus in the command of the forces which were despatched to the assistance of Thebes against Agesilus. (Plut. de Gen. Socrat. 31; Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 34; Diod. xiv. 29.) Still, however, he appears as the supporter at Athens of Spartan interests. Thus, in 373, he joined Iphicrates in the prosecution of Timotheus, who had been most active against Sparta in the western seas, and had, in fact, by his restoration of the Zacynthian exiles, caused the renewal of war after the short peace of 374. (Dem. c. Timoth. pp. 1197, 1198; Xen. Hell. vi. 8. §§ 11—13; comp. v. 4. 64, etc. vi. 9. §§ 2, 3.) In 373 also, but before the trial of Timotheus, Callistratus had been appointed commander, together with Iphicrates and Chabrias, of the forces destined for Corcyra,—and this at the request of Iphicrates himself, to whom (according to one mode of interpreting the words of Xenophon, εύ μα [τις] ἑρκασθείς δύνατα he had hitherto been opposed. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 39; compare Schneid. Epinetr. ad loc.; Thrilliga's Greece, vol. v. p. 63, note 2; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, p. 410, note 407, 2nd edit.; Dem. c. Timoth. p. 1187.) Soon, however, he induced Iphicrates to consent to his returning to Athens, promising either to obtain for him a supply of money, or to bring about a peace; and in 371 accordingly we find him at Sparta with the ambassadors,—himself apparently without that title,—who were empowered to negotiate peace for Athens. On this occasion Xenophon records a speech delivered by him after those of Callias and Autocles, and the only pertinent and sensible one of the three. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. §§ 3, 10, &c.; see Diod. xiv. 38, 51, who in the former passage assigns the mission of Callistratus to b. c. 375, confounding the peace of 371 with that of 374, and placing the latter a year too soon.) Again, in 369, the year of the invasion of Iacchia by Epaminondas, Callistratus induced the Athenians to grant the aid which the Spartans had sent to him; and note (Nestor. p. 1330, comp. Xen. Hell. v. 5. §§ 33, &c.) To c. 366 we may with most probability refer his famous speech on the affair of Oropus,—a speech which is said to have excited the emulation of Demosthenes, and caused him to devote himself to the study of oratory. It would seem that, after the seizure of 2 r
CALLISTRATUS.

Oropus by a body of Oropian exiles and the consequent loss of it to Athens, the Athenians, having sent an army against it under Xerxes, were induced by Chabrias and Callistratus to compromise the matter by delivering the place as a deposit to the Thebans pending the adjustment of their claims. The Thebans refused afterwards to surrender it, and the consequence was the prosecution of the advisers of the compromise. At first the eloquence of Callistratus was successful, and they were acquitted; but the loss of so important a frontier town rankled in the minds of the people, and Callistratus, afterwards Philip II, was condemned to death in 361, and to have gone into banishment to Methone in Macedonia. In 356 (see Clinton on the year) he seems to have been still alive, but he ultimately returned to Athens,—a step which the orator Lycurgus refers to as a striking instance of judicial infatuation,—and was put to death, though he had fled for refuge to the altar of the twelve gods. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 1, &c.; Dio. xvi. 76; Plut. Dem. 5; Hermipp. op. Geôl. iii. 13; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Oraî. p. 156; ed. Taulium; Dem. c. Polyb. pp. 1221, 1223; Lycurgus, L. Leocr. p. 139; Aristot. Rhêt. i. 7, § 13.) During his exile he is said to have founded the city of Callinicus, afterwards Callinicum, and to have been the deviser of the plan for increasing the rent of the Macedonian harbour dues from 20 to 40 talents. (Isern. de Pace p. 164, a; Pseudo-Aristot. Onon. ii. 22; comp. Schneid. Epin. ad Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 39; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. iii. ch. 4.) Demosthenes appears to have admired him greatly as an orator, and Theopompus praises him for his public conduct, while he censures the profligacy of his private life. (Dem. de Cor. p. 301, de Polos Leg. p. 436; comp. Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Oraî. Graec. op. Reiske, vol. viii. p. 140; Aristot. Rhêt. 1. 14. § 1, iii. 17. § 13; Theopompus ap. Athen. iv. p. 166, c.) The author of the lives of the X Orators (lo. c.) strangely confounds the present Callistratus with the son of Zephyrus, in which mistake he has been followed by some modern writers: others again have erroneously identified him with the Callistratus who was Archon Ephoros in 355. (See Ruhnken, L. c.; Comp. Fast. ii. pp. 136, 378; Böckh, Publ. Econ. bk. ii. ch. 14.)

4. An Elean, who came as an ambassador to Antiochus III. (the Great) at Chalcis, b. c. 192, to ask for aid to Elis against the Achaenians. The latter had declared for Rome, and decided on war with Antiochus, and the Eleans, friends to Antiochus, feared in consequence the invasion of their territory. The king sent them, for their defence, a thousand men under the command of Ephanes the Creton. (Polyb. xx. 3; Livy. xxxvi. 48-50, xxxvi. 5.)

5. Private secretary to Mithridates. He fell into the hands of the Romans when his master decamped so hastily from his position on the plains of Cabeiro, b. c. 72; and the soldiers, who were bringing him before Lucullus, murdered him when they discovered that he had a large sum of money about his person. (Plut. Lucull. 17; comp. App. Bell. Mithr. p. 227.)

CALLISTRATUS, literary. 1. A Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Aristophanes of Byzantium. (Apollod. p. 159, xxvi. &f. Aristoph. neokr. Apoag. fr. 10.) He must have lived about the middle of the second century before Christ, and have been a contempor-
CALLISTRATUS.

Quæstionum." The titles of the first three of these works require some explanation.

1. The treatise "de Cognitionibus" relates to those causes which were heard, investigated, and decided by the emperor, the governor of a province, or other magistrate, without the intervention of judges. This departure from the ordinary course of the civil law took place, even before Diocletian's general abolition of the ordo juridicorum, sometimes by virtue of the imperial prerogative, and in some cases was regularly practiced for the purpose of affording equitable relief where the strict civil law gave no remedy, instead of resorting to the more tortuous system of legal fictions and equitable actions. (Herm. Canegister, Observ. Juv. Rom. lib. i. c. 9.)

2. What is meant by "Editum Montiorium" is by no means clear. Hauldout (les Edictis Montiorum ou Brownus, Lips. 1804), thinks, that monitory edicts are not special writs of notice or summons directed to the parties in the course of a cause, but those general clauses of the editum perpetuum which relate to the law of procedure, giving actions and other remedies on certain conditions, and therefore, strictly at least, containing warnings as to the consequences of irregularity or nonfulfillment of the prescribed conditions. The fragments of Callistratus certainly afford much support to this view. Hauldout distinguishes the editum monitory from the editum breve, upon which Paulus wrote a treatise. The latter he supposes to consist of those new clauses, which, in process of time, were added as an appendage to the editum perpetuum, after the main body of it had acquired a constant form.

3. The phrase "de Jure Eisci et Populi" appears anomalous, but it occurs elsewhere. (See Paulus, Recept. Sent. v. 12.) Lampadius also (Alcan. Soc. 15) writes, that Alexander Severus "leges de jure populi et fisci modicatas et infinitas (?) sanit." Probably under the phrase "ius populi" here meant be understood the law relating to the aeraurum, or to the area publica (which latter, practically as well as theoretically, was at the disposal of the senate) as distinguished from the fiscus, which was the emperor's own, not as res privata, but as property attached to the imperial dignity. (Vopisc. Aurelian. 28.)

Cujas (in his preface to his Latin translation of the 60th book of the Basilica, reprinted at the beginning of the 7th volume of Fabrot's edition) mentions among the commentators on the Basilica a jurist named Callistratus. Fabriasius also supposes the Callistratus of the Basilica to have been different from the Callistratus of the Digest. Sunerz naturally expresses strong doubts as to the existence of a later Callistratus; for there are many other asserted duplicate names, as Modestius, Theophilus, Thaleaenus, Stephanus, Dorotheus, Cyrilus, Theodorus, Isidorus; but Reis has shown, in several instances, that the asserted later commentator, bearing the name of a prior jurist, is a fictitious entity. The name of the prior jurist has perhaps been sometimes attributed to the scholiast who cites him; but we believe it would appear, upon examination, that the existence of two sets of jurists of the same names but different dates has gained credit partly from the mendacious inventions and supposititious citations of Nic. Comnenus Papadoph, and partly from a very general misunderstanding of the mode in which the scholia on the Basilica were formed. These scholia were really formed thus: extracts from ancient jurists and antecedent commentators on the collections of Justinian were appended to certain passages of the text of the Basilica which they served to elucidate. These extracts were sometimes interpolated or otherwise altered, and were mingled with glosses posterior to the Basilica. Thus, they were confounded with the latter, and were not unnaturally supposed to be posterior in date to the work which they explained. The determination of the question as to the existence of a duplicate Callistratus may be helped by the following list of the passages in the Basilica (ed. Fabrot), where the name is mentioned. It is taken from Fabr. Bibli. Græc. xii. p. 440, and the parentheses ( ) denote a reference not to the text, but to a Greek scholiast.

"Callistratus JCTim., i. 257, ii. 30, 318, 812, iii. 206, iv. (268), 292, 358, 507, (568), 810, 813, v. 10, 734, 778, 788, vi. (158), 436, 468, 490, 677, 680, 702, 703, vii. 439, 515, 537, 564, 595, 626, 647, 716, 718, 738, 803, 807, 827, 832, 886, 887, 893, 897, 888." On reference to these passages, we find nothing to indicate a Graeco-Roman jurist Callistratus.

CALLISTRATUS, a statuary, of uncertain country, who lived about b.c. 160, at which time the arts revived after a period of decay. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.)

CALLISTRATUS, DOMITIUS (Δομιτίος Καλλιστράτος), is mentioned seven times by Stephanus of Byzantium, as the author of a work on Hermelæa (ἐρμελαια), which consisted of at least seven books. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ωρόμης.) If, as it appears, he is the same as the one mentioned by Athenaeus (vi. p. 263), he was a disciple of Aristophanes of Byzantium. (Comp. Schol. ad Achæl. Pers. 941, ad Apollon. Rhod. 1. 1125, Il. 7. 202, etc.)

CALLISTUS (Καλλιστός). 1. A contemporary of the emperor Julian, who accompanied his sovereign on his expeditions, and afterwards celebrated his exploits in an epic poem, from which a statement is quoted by Nicephorus. (Hist. Eccles. vi. 34.)

2. Surnamed Syropus, a Christian author who wrote a learned dissertation against the Palamites, which was dedicated to the patriarch Euthymius. (Nic. Comnenus, Præmol. Mystag., p. 158.)

3. A monk of mount Athos. During the war between Palaeologus and Constantzneas he was sent by the monks to Constantinople to endeavour to restore peace; but he was ill-treated there by the empress Anna and the patriarch Joannes. About the year a. d. 1354, the emperor Constantzneas made Callistus patriarch of Constantinople. The year after, when he was requested by the same emperor to crown his son Mattheus, Callistus refused to comply with the request and withdrew to a monastery. As he refused to perform his duties as patriarch, Philotheus was appointed in his place. But when afterwards Joannes Palaeologus had gained possession of the imperial throne, Callistus was restored to the patriarchal see. The year after his restoration he was sent as ambassador to the Servian princess Elizabeth to conclude a peace, and during their conference he was captured by the Genoese, and conducted, however, to effect their escape, and took refuge with the Macedonians at Docoelai. On the restoration of democracy at Athens, c. 403, Callixtus took advantage of the general amnesty to return: but the ban of his countrymen's hatred was upon him,—no man, it is said, would give him either water or light for his fire,—and he perished miserably of hunger. (Diod. xiii. 103; Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 55; Suid. s. r. Ερυθρων; comp. Herod. vii. 231.) [E.E.]

CALLIXTUS (Καλλιξτος), of Rhodes, a contemporary of Polycles Philadelphia, was the author of two works, which are lost. The one which bore the title of αγ' Αλεξανδρια, consisted of at least four books, and was much used by Athenaeus. (Ath. v. p. 106, &c., ix. p. 387, xi. pp. 472, 474, 483; Χαριτων, a. n. άγ' Αλεξανδριας) The second work appears to have been a catalogue of painters and sculptors (Χαριτων του και καθ' οικονομοι τοιαυτοις απογραφας), of which Sophater, in the twelfth book of his Hesogon had made an abridgment. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 161; comp. Peller, Poetae, fragm. p. 178, &c.) [L.S.]

CALLO (Καλλος), an orphan who lived at Ephesus about thirty years after the death of Alexander the Great, and was commonly considered to be a girl. She accordingly married, and lived with her husband for two years. After that time, she was taken seriously ill, and had to undergo an operation, the effect of which was that she became a man, and was named Callon. (Epic. An. p. 40) [L.S.]

CALLON (Καλλον). 1. An artist of the island of Aegina, the pupil of Angelio and Tectenus, who were themselves pupils of Dipeonius and Sevillius. (Paus. ii. 52. § 4.) As the latter two flourished b. c. 500, the age of Callon must be fixed at b. c. 516. This is confirmed by the statement of Pausanias (vii. 68. § 6), that Callon was a contemporary of Camæus, who we know flourished from b. c. 540 to 508. [CANAUCUS.] There are two passages in Pausanias which seem to contradict this conclusion; but K. O. Müller (Aegaeum. p. 100) and Tischner (Eph. An. p. 40) have clearly shown that one of them is interpolated, and that the other, if explained properly, does not place Callon either in the time of the Messenian wars, or as late as the battle of Aegospotami, as some interpreters had believed. (Comp. Silling, Cat. Art. v. s.) We are acquainted with two works of Callon: the tripod ornamented by a statue of Cora and a xamnion of Athene. Quintilian (xii. 10) calls his works "diuorum atque Tuscaniae proxima." [L.S.]

2. A native of Elia, who sculptured a Herms at Olympia (Paus. v. 27. § 5) and a chorus of thirty-five Messenian boys, together with their leader and the flute-player, who had all perished on the passage from Messana to Rhegium. The whole group was dedicated by the Messenians at Olympia. (Paus. v. 25. § 1.) Callon must have lived before b. c. 436. (Thiersch, Eph. An. p. 62.) [W.L.]

CALOYRUS, proconsul (ἐπίστατος) or dux (Σιδων, Basilin, v. 487), a Graeco-Roman jurist. In Basil, vol. iv. p. 403 (Fubrot), he is called...
CALO-JOANES.

Caloecyus Sextus. By Joes Sim. Assenmani, in his extremely rare but very valuable work, Bibliotheca Juris Orientalis Canonicorum et Civile, 5 vols. 4to. Rome, 1782—6 (ii. c. 30, p. 403). Caloecyus is supposed to have been posterior to Cyrrillus (whom he cites, Basil. vol. p. 44), and to have lived after the time of Alexis Commensus. The passages in Fabrot's edition of the Basilica, where Caloecyus is mentioned, are given as follows in Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vol. xii. p. 440: "Caloecyus JCtus, II. 548; Caloecyus Sextus, iv. 403, v. 26, 59, 77, 189, 269, 262, 524, 523, 410, 429, 458, 527; Procoeni (fami. Procoenii) Du. 17. 57, 74, 82, 191, 144, 179, 237, 238, 253, 263, 341, 414, 420, 422, 436, 457, 527; Cyrillo Junior. v. 44." Reitz (Exzer. xx. ad Theoph. p. 1234) selects the following passages under the head "Memorabilia ex Scholis Basilicorum, quae faciunt ad indagandam aetatem Jeorum, maxime corno qui sub Imperatore Justiniano Magno floruerunt," Caloecyus ad Basilicam Comment. iv. 403, v. 39, v. 292. Nic. Commensus Papadopoli (Proem. Mystag. p. 345) cites an interpretation (Synopsis Septima) by Caloecyus, of the Novellas of Leo, and (p. 571 of the same work) cites the notes of Sextus or Seutus, JCtus and Nomophylax, on the Novellas. In both these passages, Papadopoli (or, as he is usually styled, Nic. Commensus) probably refers to the same person; but his gross inidelity (which is exposed by Heimbach, Anecdota, i. pp. 219—222) renders his testimony, when unsupported, nearly worthless.

CALO-JOANES or JOANES II. COMNENUS (Kalioiadev ou Koygynow), one of the greatest and best emperors of the East, the eldest son and successor of Alexis I. Commensus, was born in 1086. His real name was John. His diminutive statute and complex and dark features, distinguished him, not to his advantage, from among the other princes of the handsomest Constantinian race; and it would seem that his name Calo-Joannes, or John the Handsome, was a nickname, were we not justified in believing that that name was given him for the beauty of his mind. His virtues were acknowledged by his father, who, when urged on his death-bed to leave the empire to Bryennius, his excellent son-in-law, resisted the persuasion of his wife and his daughter Anna, and appointed Calo-Joannes his successor. The new emperor ascended the throne on the 15th of August, 1118. It is related under Anna Comnena, and Nicoclaeus Bryennius, that their conspiracy to depose Calo-Joannes and to make Bryennius emperor, proved abortive, and that the property of both was confiscated. The emperor was especially protected by his younger brother, Isae Selastorcortor, and by his minister, Axiou, a Turk who had been made prisoner during the reign of Alexis I., and who, joining great talents and knowledge with honest and affable manners, advanced from one eminent post to another, till he became magna domesticus, or prime minister, an office which he held during the whole reign of Calo-Joannes. The conspiracy of Anna and Bryennius was the only event that troubled the reign of Calo-Joannes, who won the hearts of his subjects to such a degree, that he ventured to abolish the punishment of death, and deserved to be called the Byzantine Marcus Aurelius. His relations with his brother Isaac were a model of brotherly affection, and though their friendship was on one occasion disturbed by the slander of some courtiers, it was but for a short time. The reign of Calo-Joannes is a series of wars, and each war was a triumph for the Greek arms. But while Nicetas and Comnensus, the chief sources, dwell with prolixity on the description of so many glorious deeds, they have neglected to give us a satisfactory exposition of the ignorance of their administration, and their chronology is very confused. This circumstance has probably induced Gibbon to relate the reign of Calo-Joannes without any chronology except the dates of his accession and his death. Le Beau, in his Histoire du Bas Empire (vol. xix. p. 86), gives a careful chronology which he has established by comparing the Latin historians, especially Gui- liehmus Tyremsis and Othro Prisingensis, and Du Cange (Familiae Byzantinae, pp. 178, 179) gives an account of the different statements respecting the year in which Calo-Joannes died. We follow Le Beau and Du Cange.

The wars of Calo-Joannes with the different princes of the Turks lasted during his whole reign with scarcely any interruption. In the first campaign, in 1119, he took Laodicæa, and spared the lives of the garrison, and in 1120 he took Szeopolis. An invasion of the Petchenegues or Patzinacites, who had crossed the Danube, called him to Thrace, and in 1123 he obtained a complete victory over them in Macedonia, giving the example at once of a general and a soldier. This war was finished to the advantage of the Greeks: the Petchenegues returned into their Scythian steppes, and great numbers of them who had been made prisoners received lands from the emperor in the very districts which their brethren had held waste. In 1125 he took the field against the revolted Servians, who were supported by Stephen, the son of Henry, who took Belgrade and Branițevo. But in the following year, 1124, Calo-Joannes advanced with a strong army, took Francceciour near Siumian, conquered the country between the Save and the Danube, and forced the king to desist from further attempts on the Greek empire. According to the Greek historians, the advantages of this war were rather on the side of king Stephen; while, strange enough, the Hungarian annalists attribute both victories and advantages to the Greeks. Thence Calo-Joannes turned once more against the Turks of Iconium, and took Castamania and Gangar, which his gardens were, however, obliged to surrender to the Turks a short time afterwards. The emperor was more fortunate, in 1131, against the Armenians of Cilicia, or Armenia Minor, under their prince Livo or Leo, who was vanquished in several engagements; and in 1137, all his dominions were annexed to the Greek empire, and received the name of the fourth Armenia. This conquest brought him in contact with Raymond, prince of Antioch, who, according to the treaties made between Alexis I. and prince Boemond I. of Antioch, was obliged to recognize the Greek emperor as his liege lord, but refused doing so, till Calo-Joannes compelled him, partly by negotiations, partly by threats. The emperor entered Antioch in 1135, and prince Raymond and the count of Edessa held the bridle of his horse, as a token of their vasalship. During his stay in that town, the emperor was exposed to great danger by a sudden uproar of the people, who fancied that the town was about to be given over to the Greeks. The emperor saved himself by a sudden flight, and was going to storm Antioch, when prince Raymond, commander of his camp, made an apology for the reckless conduct of his subjects, and mollified the emperor's anger by a new protestation of his faith. Calo-Joannes and Raymond now joined their troops, and made a successful campaign against the Turks-Atebekes in Syria, whose emir Emad-ed-din had conquered Haleb. Calo-Joannes returned to Constantinople in 1141, defeating on his march the sultan of Ikonium, from whom he took the fortified islands in the lake near Ikonium, and exterminated the pirates and robbers who had infested the coasts from Cilicia to Lydica. Encouraged by so many victories, and supported by eminent generals and well-disciplined troops, who were in every respect equal to those of the Latin princes of the East, Calo-Joannes conceived the plan of conquering the Levant, as far as Egypt, and setting foot in Antioch, &c., and of driving out the Attebekes from Syria, all of which were provinces that had once belonged to the Eastern empire. In 1142 he set out for Cilicia at the head of a strong army, pretending that he was going to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In the spring of 1143, he was at Anazarba. While hunting one day in the forests on the banks of the Pyramus, he attacked a wild boar; he succeeded in piercing the beast with his spear, but in the struggle his quiver was upset, and he received a slight wound in his hand from one of the arrows. The weapon was poisoned, and as the emperor would not allow his hand to be amputated, he died from the effects of the wound, on the 8th of April, 1143. His successor was his fourth son, Manuel, whom the emperor appointed in preference to his third son, Isaac; his eldest sons, Alexis and Andronicus, had both died a short time before their father. The wife of Calo-Joannes was Irene the daughter of Windislaw I. the Saint, king of Hungary, the sister of king Calouman, and the aunt of king Stephen L, with whom Calo-Joannes made war: he married her before 1105, and she died in 1124. (Nicetas, Joannes Cornutus; Cinnamus, ii. 1-8.)

CALPEANUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and who is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxi. 5) as having gained by his practice the annual income of two hundred and fifty thousand sesterces (about 1953.), 2. ed.). This is considered by Pliny to be a very large sum, and may therefore give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire. (W. A. G.)

CALPURNIA. 1. The daughter of L. Calpurnius Bestia, consul in B.C. 111, the wife of P. Antistius and the mother of Antistia, the first wife of Pompeius Magnus. On the murder of her husband in B.C. 52, by order of the younger Marius, Calpurnia put an end to her own life. (Vell. Pat. ii. 26; comp. Antistius, No. 6.)

2. The daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsoninus, consul in B.C. 58, and the last wife of the dictator Cæsarius he married him in B.C. 59. (Suet. Cæs. 21; Plut. Cæs. 14, Pomp. 47, Cat. Min. 33, Appian, B.C. ii. 14; Caes. B. G. i. 12.) Calpurnia seems not to have intermeddled in political affairs, and to have borne quietly the favours which her husband bestowed upon Cleopatra, when she came to Rome in B.C. 40. The reports that had got abroad respecting the conspiracy against Caesar's life filled Calpurnia with the liveliest apprehensions; she was haunted by dreams in the night, and entreated her husband, but in vain, not to leave home on the fatal Ides of March, ex. c. 44. (Appian, B. C. ii. 115; Dion Cass. xiv. 17; Vell. Pat. ii. 57; Suet. Cæs. 81; Plut. Cæs. 63.)

CALPURNIA. 1. One of the favorize concubines of the emperor Claudius. She was prevailed upon by Narcissus to go to Ostia, where the emperor was tarrying, to inform him of the marriage of Messalina and C. Silus. (Tac. Ann. xxi. 30.)

2. A woman of high rank, who was sent into exile by the jealousy of Agrippina, the wife of the emperor Claudius, who had accidentally spoken of her figure in terms of praise. She was recalled by Nero, in A.D. 06, for the purpose of making an exhibition of her elegance, after having just before been accused of having her own brother to be murdered. (Tac. Ann. xxi. 22, xxiv. 72.)

CALPURNIA GENS, plebeian, pretended to be descended from Calus, the third of the four sons of Numa; and accordingly we find the head of Numa on some of the coins of this gens. (Plut. Num. 21; Hor. Ars poet. 292; Festus, s. v. Calpurn.) Echell, v. p. 160.) The Calpurnii are not mentioned till the time of the first Punic war, and the first of them who obtained the consulship was C. Calpurnius Piso in B.C. 180; but from this time their consulships are very frequent, and the family of the Pisones becomes one of the most illustrious in the Roman state. The family-names under the republic are Basta, Bibulus, Flaminia, and Piso, and some of the Pisones are distinguished by the surnames of Caesonianus and Fruil.

CALPURNIANUS, DECIUS, prefect of the body-guard of the emperor Claudius, seems to have been compromised in the adulterous conduct of Messalina, and was put to death in consequence, A.D. 48. (Tac. Ann. xxi. 30.)

CALPURNIANUS, M. PUPPIUS PISO, consul in B.C. 61. (Plut.)

CALPURNIUS, standard-bearer of the first legion in Germany at the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14. When Marullus Plancus arrived in the camp of Germanicus in Germany, as the ambassador of the senate, the rebellious soldiers would have murdered him while he was embracing as a suppliant the sacred standards, had not Calpurnius checked the violence of the soldiers. (Tac. Ann. i. 39.)

CALPURNIUS, surnamed SICULUS. Among the works of the Latin poets we find eleven pastorals which usually bear the title T. Calpurnius Siculus Bucolicon Eclogas, to which is sometimes added Ad Nemesianum Carthaginense. The author is generally believed to have lived towards the end of the third century, and the person to whom the work is addressed is supposed to be the Aurelius Olympius Nemesianus whose poem on hunting is still extant. It will be found, however, upon a careful examination of authorities, that we not only know nothing whatsoever with regard to the personal history of Calpurnius, but also nothing whatever connected with his name, his age, his works, and his friends, is involved in obscurity and doubt. In several MSS. he is designated as Matius’s friendship with Caesar is mentioned by Suetonius (Caes. 52), and his intimacy with Augustus by Pliny (H. N. xii. 2, s. 6), who erroneously calls him Cn. Matius, and who speaks of him as alive about 80 years before his time. Tacitus (Ann. xii. 60) also alludes to the power and influence which Matius possessed.

This C. Matius is in all probability the same as the C. Matius (not Cn. as Suetonius calls him), who translated the Iliad into Latin verse, and was the author of several other works. His version of the Iliad is first quoted by his contemporary Varro (L. L. viii. 93, 96, ed. Müller), and is referred to by A. Gellius (vi. 6, ix. 14) and the Latin grammarians. Matius also wrote “Miminambi,” which were as celebrated as his translation of the Iliad, and were particularly admired for the elegance of the new words which he introduced in them. (Gell. xv. 23, xx. 8.) Matius also paid great attention to economics and agriculture, and wrote a work on the whole art and science of cookery, in three books, which were entitled respectively Coena, Catarius, Salamarsins. (Colomella, xii. 4, 44.) It was probably from this Matius that the modern Matina in the Greek Matinas derived its name (Plin. H. N. xiv. 14, 15; Colomella, v. 10, 19; Suet. Dom. 21; Macrobi. Saturn. ii. 10; Athen. iii. 82 p., e.c.); and the Ospowia Matina, praised by Apicius (iv. 3).

CALVETIUS, an Insulan Gaul, of the town of Placentia, and a merchant, whose daughter married L. Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus, the father of L. Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus, consul in B.C. 53. In his speech against the latter, Cicero upbraids him with the low origin of his mother, and calls him Caesoninus Semiplacentinus Calventiūs (in Pison. 6, 23; in Pison. 5, p. 5, ed. Orelli; comp. Cic. de pro. distr. 4, pro escort. 9) and in a letter to his brother Quintus (iii. 1 § 4), Piso is also meant by the name of Calvintius Matius.

CALVIA CRISPINILLA. [CRISPINILLA.]

CALVINA, JULIA, the sister of L. Silius, was at first married to a son of Vitellius, but afterwards, for the sake of doing a favour to Agrippina, Vitellius accused her of incestuous intercourse with her brother, L. Silius. There was, however, according to the concurrent testimony of the ancients, no ground whatever for that charge, except that Silius was attached to his sister, and perhaps expressed his love for her in too unguarded a manner, surrounded as he was by spies and enemies. When Silius had put an end to his own life, Calvina was expelled from Italy. (Tac. Ann. xii. 4, 48; L. Silius.) It is highly probable that this Calvina is the same as the Junia (Julia?) Calvina mentioned by Suetonius (Vesp. 23) as still alive towards the end of the reign of Vespasian, for it is stated there, that she belonged to the family of Augustus, and it is well known that the Silans were great-great-grandsons of Augustus. [La S.]

CALVINUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Dumita gens.

1. Cn. DOMITIUS CALVINUS, consul in B.C. 332. (Liv. viii. 17.)

2. CN. DOMITIUS CN. P. CALVINUS, surnamed Maximus, offered himself as a candidate for the curule aedilship in B.C. 304; but, although his father had been consul, Cn. Flavius, the famous scribe of Appius Claudius, was preferred to him.

Five years later, however, in B.C. 299, he was elected curule aedile. (Liv. x. 9, where instead of the praenomen Cn. we ought to read Cn.) He was raised to the consulate in B.C. 283, together with P. Cornelius Dolabella. The name of Calvinus scarcely appears during the year of his consulate, though he must have been very actively engaged, for Rome was just then threatened by a coalition of all her enemies in Italy. Stimulated by the Macedonians and Bruttians, and more especially by the Tarentines, the Etruscans, Gauls, Umbrians, and Samnites took up arms against her. The Senones, allied with the Etruscans, attacked the town of Arretium; and as the consuls were probably engaged in other parts of Italy, the praetor L. Caecilius was sent out to the relief of the place; but he lost a battle and his life near Arretium.

His successor, M. Curio, sent ambassadors to the Senones to effect an exchange of prisoners, but the ambassadors were murdered by the Senones. In order to avenge this breach of the law of nations, the consul P. Cornelius Dolabella marched through the country of the Sabins and Picentins into that of the Senones, who expelled their master and ravaged their country, to avenge which a Roman colony was established in it. The events which we have just described are not mentioned by all authorities in the same succession. According to Orosius (iii. 22; comp. Liv. Epit. 12), the murder of the Roman ambassadors preceded the campaign of L. Caecilius; whereas, according to Appian, the campaign of Dolabella followed immediately after the murder, and the object of the embassy was to remonstrate with the Senones for serving against the Romans, their allies. (Comp. Niebuhr, Rost. de Rome, iii. p. 427, &c.) In what manner Calvinus was engaged during this time, is not known.

When the Boians saw that the Senones were expelled from their country, they began to dread the same fate, joined the remaining Senones and the Etruscans, and marched against Rome. But in crossing the Tiber they met a Roman army, and in the ensuing battle most of the Etruscans were slain, and only a few of the Gauls escaped. Our accounts differ as to the Roman commanders in this battle; for some represent Dolabella and others Calvinus as the victorious general, whereas it is most probable that both consuls gained laurels on that day. It was undoubtedly to this victory that Calvinus owed the surname of Maximus, and in B.C. 200 he was further honoured by being made dictator. On laying down this office in the same year, he was elected consul—the first instance of a plebeian being raised to that office. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. I; Polyb. iv. 19, 20; Liv. Epit. 13; Appian, Summ. 6, Gall. 11; Flor. i. 13; Eutrop. ii. 10; Dion Cass. Rer. scrip. vii. 163, ed. Stru.; Fast. Cap.)

3. DOMITIUS CALVINUS, probably a son of No. 2, conquered the Etruscan town of Luna, which was occupied by the Illyrians. He seems to have been praetor when he made the conquest. The year to which it belongs is unknown, though it is clear that the event must have occurred after the first Punic war, that is, after B.C. 240. (Frontin. Strateg. iii. 2 § 1; Liv. Epit. 20; Zonar. viii. 19, &c.)

4. CN. DOMITIUS, M. M. M. CALVINUS, appears, in B.C. 62, as legate of L. Vexistus Ercules in Asia, and in B.C. 59 as tribune of the people, in which capacity he supported the consul M. Ebulbas against the other consul, C. Julius Caesar, and the tribune Vatinus, who allowed himself to be used by Caesar as a tool. Three years later, Calvins was praetor, and presided at the trials of L. Calpurnius Bœtis, who was accused of ambitus, and of M. Calvis, who was charged with having attempted to poison Cicilia. In n. c. 54 he offered himself as a candidate for the consulate, on which occasion he, as well as his competitors, was guilty of enormous bribery; and, in conjunction with C. Memmius, he entered into a most disgraceful compact with the consuls of the year, who were to preside at the elections. The two candidates promised to procure for the consuls in office certain lucrative provinces by perjury, if they would lend their assistance in the elections; and in case the plan with the provinces should fail, the candidates promised to give to the consuls a compensation in money of forty millions of sestercies. C. Memmius himself afterwards denounced the whole plan to the senate; but the appointment of a court to investigate the conduct of Calvinus was prevented by intrigues. The election of the consuls was also delayed on account of unfavourable auspices. In the beginning of October, however, all the candidates were to be tried for ambitus; but they escaped judgment by the interregnum which the porty of Pompey tried to use as a means for getting him appointed dictator. The interregnum lasted for nearly nine months, and Calvinus, who had in the meantime gained the favour of Pompey by voting for the acquittal of A. Calvisus, was at length made consul through the influence of Pompey. His colleague was M. Valerius Messalla. During the year of their consulship the disturbances at Rome continued: the candidates for the consulship for the year following, Milo, Hypaeus, and Metellus Scipio, as well as P. Claudius, who stood for the pretorship, carried on their contests with bribes, and had recourse even to force and violence. The consuls were unable to get their successors elected; a decree of the senate which they effected, that no one should obtain a foreign province till five years after he had held the consulship or pretorship, did not produce the desired results. During an attempt of the consuls to get their successors elected in an assembly of the people, stones were thrown at the consuls, and Calvinus was wounded. After some years we no longer hear of Calvinus; but after the outbreak of the civil war in n. c. 49, we find him actively engaged in the service of Caesar’s party, and commanding the cavalry under Curio in Africa. After the unfortunate battle on the Bagradas, he advised Curio to take to flight, and promised not to forsake him. In the year following, Caesar sent Calvinus with two legions from Illyricum to Macedonia, where he met Metellus Scipio, without however any decisive engagement taking place between them. But, according to Dion Cassius (xii. 51), he was driven by Faustus from Macedonia, and penetrated into Thrasyllus, where he gained a victory over Metellus Scipio, and took the general’s towns. When Caesar broke up from Dyrrhachium to unite his forces, Calvinus, the latter was in the north of Macedonia, and had nearly fallen into the hands of Pompey, but succeeded in effecting his union with Caesar on the frontier of Thrasyllus. In the battle of Pharsala Calvinus commanded the centre, and was faced by Metellus Scipio.

After the close of the war in Thessaly, when Caesar went to Egypt, he entrusted to Calvinus the administration of the province of Asia and the neighbouring countries. While Caesar was engaged in the Alexandrine war, for which Calvinus sent him two legions from Asia, the latter became involved in a war with Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates; he was defeated in the neighbourhood of Nicopolis, and escaped with only a few remnants of his small army. After his return from Egypt, Caesar defeated Pharnaces near Zela, and Calvinus was sent to pursue the enemy, who was compelled to surrender Sinope. But soon after, a peace was concluded with him. As Caesar wanted to hasten to Italy, he left Calvinus behind to complete the settlement of the affairs in Asia. This does not appear to have occupied much time, for in the year following, in n. c. 48, we find him engaged in Africa in besieging Considius at Thysdrus, and in n. c. 45, he was present at Rome at the time when Cicero defended king Deiotarus. Caesar appointed Calvinus his magister equitum for the year following, but the murder of the dictator prevented his entering upon the office.

During the war of Octavianus and Antony against the republicans, Calvinus was ordered by the former to bring over reinforcements from Brundusium to Illyricum; but while crossing the Ionian sea, he was attacked by L. Statius Marcus and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. His ships were destroyed, and he himself succeeded with great difficulty in escaping back to Brundusium. In n. c. 40 he was elected consul a second time; but before the end of the year, he and his colleague were obliged to resign, in order to make room for others. In the year following, he fought as proconsul against the revolting Cretaei in Spain. Here he acted with the greatest vigour towards his own soldiers, and afterwards defeated the enemy without difficulty. His occupations in Spain, however, appear to have lasted for several years, for the triumph which he celebrated for his exploits in Spain is assigned in the triumphal Fasti to the year n. c. 36. The sums of money which he had raised in the towns of Spain were spent partly on the celebration of his triumph, and partly upon the restoration of the regia on the via sacra, which had been burnt down. (Orrelli, "Oeum. Tull. ii. p. 226; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 6, xli. 43, 46, 56, xliii. 46, 48, xlvii. 47, xlviii. 42, 44, 46, 124; Plut. Caesar 67, 70, Sen. cont. 47; Appian, Mith. 120; B. C. ii. 76, 91, 97, 110, 115, 116, Mithrid. 120; Caes. B. C. ii. 42, iii. 36, 78, 79, 80, 86; Bell. Alex. 34, 36, 93; Liv. Epit. 112; Vell. Pat. ii. 78; Suet. Caes. 35, 37, fast. Cap.; Echel. v. p. 183.) [L. S.]

CALVINUS, L. SEXTIUS. 1. Consul in n. c. 124. In the year following, he had the administration of Gaul, and carried on a war against the Salluvii. After having conquered them, he founded the colony of Aquae Sextiae. (Liv. Epit. 61; Strab. iv. p. 100; Vell. Pat. i. 15.)

2. Is mentioned only by Cicero as an elegant orator, but of a sickly constitution, so that persons might have his advice whenever they pleased, but could not be sure of ever getting it; this was only when his health permitted it. (Cic. De Orat. ii. 60, 61.) Pigtius thinks him to be also the same as the C. Sextius who was praetor in n. c. 59, and afterwards obtained Macedonia as his province. But in the passage of Cicero in which he is mentioned (c. Pisone, CALVUS.

34) the better MSS. read Sentius instead of Sex- tius. [L. S.]

CALVYNUS, T. VETURIUS, was twice consolus in B. C. 354 and 321. In his second consulship he and his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus commanded the Roman army at Caudium against the Samnites, where the Romans suffered the well-known defeat, and passed under the yoke. The consuls concluded a treaty with the Samnites; but as this treaty was not approved of by the Romans, the consuls who had concluded it, and several other officers, were delivered up to the Samnites. (Liv. viii. 16, lxx. 6, 10; Appian, Samn. 6; Cic. De Secern. 12, De Off. iii. 30; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 211, &c.) [L. S.]

CALVYSIUS, a client of Junia Silana. This lady had been grievously injured by Agrippina, and now resolved to take vengeance. She therefore sent Calvisius and a fellow-client to bring against Agrippina the charge of endeavouring to place Rabellius Plautus on the throne instead of Nero. It was so contrived that the charge came to the emperor's ears in a round-about way, and did not appear an intentional denunciation. Hereupon he banished Agrippina to death; but the monstrous deed was yet deferred for a few years, and Junia Silana and her two clients were sent into exile; but after the murder of Agrippina they were all recalled. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, 21, 22, xiv. 12.) [L. S.]

CALVISIUS. A person of this name was entrusted by Pliny the Younger with the task of informing the decuriones of Comum that Pliny was willing, as a matter of bounty, not of right, to effectuate the intention of one Saturninus, who, after leaving 400,000 sesterces to the republic Comensis (a legacy which was legally void), gave the residue of his property to Pliny. (Ep. v. 7.) Hence Guili. Grosius (Vita J. Ciceron. ii. 5, § 16) has classed Calvisius among the jurists, although his duties might have been undertaken by any one of moderate discretion and deficiency of feeling. Upon the same slight ground, Guili. Grosius builds the supposition, that the Calvisius mentioned by Pliny was the author of the Actio Calvisiana. This action was introduced, probably in the time of the republic, by some praetor of the name Calvisius (Hugo, R. R. G. p. 335), to protect the patron's rights of succession to a portion of his freedman's property against fraudulent alienations made in the lifetime of the freedman. (Dig. 38, cit. 5, 3, § 3; Heinicetus, Hist. Jur. Rom. § 204.) [J. T. G.]

CALVISIUS, FLAVIUS, the governor of Egypt under M. Aurelius, took part in the revolt of Avidius Cassius, but was treated by the emperor with great leniency, and only banished to an island. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 28.)

CALVISIUS NEPOS. [NEPOS.]

CALVISIUS SABINUS. [SABINUS.]

CALVISIUS, a soldier who distinguished himself by his insolence to Germanicus, when the legions in Germany revolted on the death of Augustus in A. D. 14. (Tac. Ann. i. 35, 43.)

CALVUS, the "bald-headed," the name of a family of the Licinia gens. L. P. LICINIUS CALVUS, consular tribune in B. C. 400, and the first plebeian who was elected to that magistracy. (Liv. v. 12.)

3. L. LICINIIUS CALVUS, a son of No. 1, was made consular tribune in B. C. 396, in the place and on the proposal of his father, who had been elected to this office, but declined it on account of his advanced age. (Liv. v. 18.)

3. L. LICINIIUS CALVUS, a son of No. 2, was consular tribune in B. C. 377, and magister equitum to the dictator P. Manilius in B. C. 368,—an office which was then conferred upon a plebeian for the first time. (Liv. vi. 31, 39; Diod. xv. 57.) Plutarch (Camil. 89) considers this magister equitum to be the same as the famous law-giver C. Licinius Calvisus Stolo, who was then tribune of the people; but it is inconceivable that a tribune should have held the office of magister equitum. Dion Cassius (Fragm. 33) likewise calls the magister equitum erroneously Licinius Stolo. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 27, n. 35.)

4. L. LICINIIUS CALVUS, surnamed Stolo, which he derived, is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprang up from the roots of his vines. He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a crisis and a happy termination, and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from B. C. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleague L. Sexilius. The negotiatores, to whose action future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected as in former times, one of whom should always be a plebeian. 2. That no one should possess more than 500 jugers of the public land, or keep upon it more than 100 head of large and 500 of small cattle. 3. A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor, which ordained that the interest already paid for borrowed money should be deducted from the capital, and that the remainder of the latter should be paid back in three yearly installments. 4. That the Sibylline books should be entrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians, that no falsifications might be introduced in favour of the patricians. These regulations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sexilius was the first plebeian who, in accordance with the first of them, obtained the consularship for the year B. C. 366. Licinius himself too received marks of the people's gratitude and confidence, by being elected twice to the consularship, in B. C. 364 and 361; but some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Laenas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. Avecrie had tempted him to violate his own salutary regulations, and in B. C. 357 he was sentenced to pay a heavy fine. (Plin. H. N. xvii. i, xviii. 4; Varro, De Re Rust. i. 2; Liv. viii. 45, 49, vii. 1, 2, 5, 9, 16; Florus, i. 26; Ann. Vict. De Vitr. Illustr. 20; Plut. Camil. 39; Diod. xvi. 82, 95; Zonar. vii. 24; Val. Max. viii. 6, 3; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 1, &c.)

CALVUS, C. LICINIUS MACER, who, as a forensic speaker, was considered by his countrymen generally as not unworthy of being ranked with Caesar, Brutus, Pollio, and Messalla, while some he was thought to rival even Cicero himself, and who as a poet is commonly placed side by side with Catullus, was born on the 28th of May, B. C. 82, on the same day with M. Cecilius Rutilus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 50.) He was the son of O.Licinius Macer, a man of praetorian dignity, who, when in the service of G. Cos. of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial.

to have been entirely up on his family by a public condemnation and by the confiscation of property which it involved. (Val. Max. i. 12. § 7; Plut. Cis. 9; Cis. ad Att. i. 4.) This Licinius Macer was very probably the same person with the annalist of that name so frequently quoted by Livy and others, and with the orator mentioned in the Brutus (ca. 64, 67, comp. de Leg. i. 2. § 3), although there is not sufficient evidence to justify us in pronouncing with confidence on their identity. Young Calvis being thus at the age of sixteen beth of his father, devoted himself to study with singular zeal, and submitted to extraordinary discipline, in order that the whole of his bodily strength might be devoted to intellectual pursuits, (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 50.) But this excessive application seems to have enfeebled and exhausted his constitution, for he died in his early prime, certainly not later than in his 35th or 36th year (Cis. Brut. 82, ad Fam. xv. 21), leaving behind him twenty-one orations. The names of five only of these have been preserved: against Asicius; against Drusus; for Messius; for C. Cato, the prosecution against whom was conducted by Asinius Pollio; and against Vatinius, who was defended by Cicero. This last, which was divided into several parts, was his first effort at the bar, and was delivered in the month of March, 37. It is very frequently referred to by ancient writers in terms of strong commendation (e.g. Dial. de Orat. 34); and from Seneca (Contraf. iii. 19) we learn, that so skilfully were the charges developed, so energetically were they urged upon the jury, and so powerful was the effect evidently produced, that the accused, unable to restrain his feelings, started up in the midst of the pleading, and passionately exclaimed, "Rogo vos, judices nume, si etis discreeti esto, ideo me damniari optare?" The insignificant charges which have been preserved of the above speeches are not of such a description as to enable us to form any estimate of the powers of Calvis; but we gather from the testimony of Cicero, Quintilian, and the author of the dialogue on the decline of eloquence, that his compositions were carefully revised after the models of the Attic school, and were remarkable for the accuracy, tact, and deep research which they displayed, but were so elaborately polished as to appear deficient in ease, vigour, and freshness; and thus, while they were listened to with delight and admiration by men of education, they fell comparatively dead and cold upon an uncultivated audience. (Cis. ad Fam. xv. 21; Quintil. x. 1. § 111. x. 2. § 25, xii. 10. § 111; Dial. de Orat. 17, 21, 25; Senec. Contraf. l. c.)

As a poet, he was the author of many short fugitive pieces, which, although of a light and sportive character (i.e.) and somewhat loose in tone, still bore the stamp of high genius—of elegies whose beauty and tenderness, especially of that on the untimely death of his mistress Quintilia, have been warmly extolled by Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid—and of fierce lampoons (famosa epigrammatam) upon Pompey, Caesar, and their satellites, the bitterness of which has been commemorated by Suetonius. We have reason to believe, from the criticisms of Pliny (Ep. i. 16) and Annius Gallus (xix. 9), that the poems of Calvis, like the lighter effusions of Catullus with which they are so often clasped, were full of wit and grace, but were nevertheless marked by a certain harshness of expression and verification which offended the fastidious ears of those habituated to the unborrowed smoothness of the poets of the Augustan court. They were undoubtedly much read, so that even Horace, whose contemptuous ane (Sat. i. 10. 16) was probably in some degree prompted by jealousy, cannot avoid indirectly acknowledging and paying tribute to their popularity. As to their real merits, we must depend entirely upon the judgment of others, for the scraps transmitted to us are so few and trifling, none extending beyond two lines, that they do not enable us to form any opinion for ourselves. We hear of an Epithalamium (Priscian, v. 8, p. 136, ed. Krchi); of an Io, in hexameter verse (Serv. ad Verg. ii. 147, v. 4) and of a Nonaecatae praecis, leveled against the notorious Hermogenes Tigellius (Scol. Coro. ad Hor. Sat. i. 3. 3; Cis. ad Fam. vii. 24); but with these exceptions, the very names of his pieces are lost. (Plin. Ep. iv. 14. § 8, iv. 27. § 3, v. 3; Catull. xvii.; Propert. ii. 19, 40, ii. 25, 89; Ov. Am. iii. 9. 61; Senec. Contraf. l. c.; Sueton. Jul. Caes. 40, 73.)

Calvis was remarkable for the shortness of his stature, and hence the vehemence in action which he indulged while at the bar, leaping over the benches, and rushing violently towards the seats of his opponents, was in such ludicrous contrast with his stillness while seated at the table, that even his friend Catullus has not been able to resist a joke, and has presented him to us as the "Salustinum disertum," "the eloquent Tom Thumb," (Catull. liv.; Senec. Contraf. l. c.)

With regard to his name, he is usually styled C. Licinius Calvis; but we find him called by Cicero (ad Q. Fr. ii. 4) Macer Licinius, probably after his father; and hence his full designation would be that which we have placed at the head of this article.

The most complete account of Licinius Calvis is given in the essay of Weichert "De C. Licinio Calvo poeta" (Fragm. Poet. Lat. Lips. 1830); but it is so full of digressions that it is not very readable. See also Levosvate de Burignon in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, vol. xxxi. [W. R.]

CALVIS, ATHENODORUS. [ATHENODORUS, No. 3.]

CALVIS, L. CAECILIUS METELLUS, consul b. c. 142. [METELLUS.]

CALVIS, CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, consul, b. c. 222. [SCIPIO.]

Calybe (Kalybē), two mythical personages, one of whom was a nymph by whom Laomedon became the father of Bucolion (Hom. il. vi. 28; Apollod. iii. 12. § 3), and the other a priestess of Juno. (Verg. Aen. vi. 419.)

Calyce (Kalyx), three mythical beings, the one a daughter of Asopus and Emaret, and mother of Endymion (Apollod. i. 7. §§ 3, 5); the second a daughter of Hecaton and mother of Cygnus by Poseidon (Hygin. Fab. 157); and the third is mentioned by Apollodorus (iii. 1. § 5) among the daughters of Danaus; but the whole passage is probably corrupt. [L. S.]

Calydon (Kalydon), a son of Aeolus and Pronoe, married to Aeolia, by whom he became the father of Epicaste and Protegoneia. He was regarded as the founder of the Aetolian town of Calydon. (Apollod. i. 7. §§ 7; Steph. Byz. s. c.) [L. S.]

Calydonius (Kalydonius), a surname of CAMBYLES.

CAMPYLYSUS (Καμπύλυς), commander of the Cretans engaged in the service of Antiochus III. in n. c. 214. He and his men were entrusted with the protection of a fort near the acropolis of Sardis during the war against Aeæues, the son of Andromachus. He allowed himself to be drawn into a treacherous plan for delivering up Aeæues to Antiochus, by Bolis, who received a large sum of money from Scæbius, the agent of Ptolemy, for the purpose of assisting Aeæues to escape. But the money was divided between Bolis and Camblyus, and instead of setting Aeæues free, they communicated the plan to Antiochus, who again rewarded them richly for delivering Aeæues up to him. (Pol. i. 17—19, comp. Suid. s. v. "Cambylus." [L. S.])

CAMBYSES (Καμβύσης). 1. The father of Cyrus the Great, according to Herodotus and Xenophon, the former of whom tells us (i. 107), that Astyages, being terrified by a dream, refrained from marrying his daughter Mandane to a Mede, and gave her to Cambyses, a Persian of noble blood, but of an unsubstantial temper. (Comp. Just. 1. 4.) The father of Cambyses is also called "Cyrus" by Herodotus (i. 111). In so rhetorical a passage as the speech of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 11) we must not look for exact accuracy in the genealogy. Xenophon (Cyrop. i. 2) calls Cambyses the king of Persia, and he afterwards speaks of him (Cyrop. viii. 5) as still reigning after the capture of Babylon, n. c. 538. But we cannot of course rest much on the statements in a romance. The account of Ctesias differs from the above. [ASTYAGES.]

2. A son of Cyrus the Great, by Amytis according to Ctesias, by Cassandane according to Herodotus, who sets aside as a fiction the Egyptian story of his having had Nitetis, the daughter of Apries, for his mother. This same Nitetis appears in another version of the tale, which is not very consistent with chronology, as the concubine of Cambyses; and it is said that the detection of the fraud of Anamis in substituting her for his own daughter, whom Cambyses had demanded for his singing, was the cause of the invasion of Egypt by the latter in the fifth year of his reign. (Herod. i. 170.) There is, however, no occasion to look for any other motive than the same ambition which would have led Cyrus to the enterprise, had his life been spared, besides that Egypt, having been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, seems to have formed a portion of the Babylonian empire. (See Jerem. xliii. xlvii.; Ezek. xxix.—xxxii.; Newton, On the Proph. vol. i. p. 357, &c.; comp. Herod. i. 77.) In his invasion of the country, Cambyses is said by Herodotus to have been aided by Phanes, a Greek of Halicarnassus, who had fled from the service of Anamis; and, by his advice, the Persian king obtained the assistance of an Arabian chiefman, and thus secured a safe passage through the desert, and a supply of water for his army. Before the invading force reached Egypt, Anamis died and was succeeded by his son, who is called Psammethus by Herodotus, and Amyntarkos by Ctesias. According to Ctesias, the conquest of Egypt was mainly effected through the treachery of Comba- phes, one of the favourite eunuchs of the Egyptian king, who put Cambyses in possession of the passes on condition of being made viceroy of the country. But Herodotus makes no mention either of this intrigue, or of the singular stratagem by which Polyneus says (vii. 9), that Pelusium was taken almost without resistance. He tells us, dates continued to support the character of Tany-ɒzaces, and maintained himself for some time on the town. (Herod. iii. 27-38, 61-68; Ctes. Pers.

i. 9.) Herodotus says (iii. 89), that the Persians always spoke of Cambyses by the name of Ἀραχνίας, in remembrance of his tyranny.

[C. E.]

CAMERUS (Κατερίς), a son of Cerephus and Cydippe, and a grandson of Helios. The town of Cameiros, in Rhodes, is said to have derived its name from him. (Diod. v. 57; Pind. Ol. viii. 135, with the Schol.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 315.) [L. S.]

CAMELIUS, one of the physicians of Augustus, who appears to have lived after Atrius, and to have succeeded to Antonius Musa. Pliny in another obscure passage (H. N. xii. 39), tells us, that he would not allow the emperor to eat lettuce in one of his illnesses, from the use of which plant afterwards, at the recommendation of Antonius Musa, he derived much benefit. [W. A. G.]

CAMENA, not Camaena, were Roman divinities whose name is connected with carnem (an oracle or prophecy), whence we also find the forms Casaena, Casaenae, and Carmentia. The Camo-nae were accordingly prophetic nymphs, and they belonged to the religion of ancient Italy, although later traditions represent them as having been introduced into Italy from Arcadia. Two of the Camennae were Antevorta and Postvorta. [Ante-orta.] The third was Carmenta or Carmentia, a prophetic and healing divinity, who had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline hill, and altars near the porta Carmentalis. Repeopling the festival celebrated in her honour was celebrated in Dio. 58. 5; 61. 5; Carmentalia. The traditions which assigned a Greek origin to her worship at Rome, state that her original name was Nicostrata, and that she was called Carmentia from her prophetic powers.
(Serv. ad Aen. viii. 51, 536; Dionys. i. 15, 82.)
According to these traditions she was the mother of Evander, the Arcadian, by Hermes, and after having endeavoured to persuade her son to kill Hermes, she fled with him to Italy, where she gave oracles to the people and to Hercule. She was put to death by her son at the age of 110 years, and then obtained divine honours. (Dionys.
i. 51, 65; Hyginus, Fab. 377) further relates, that she changed the fifteen characters of the alphabet, which Evander introduced into Latin, into Roman ones. The fourth and most celebrated Camena was Ageria or Egeria. [Aegeria.]
It must be remarked here, that the Roman poets, even as early as the time of Livius Andronicus, apply the name of Camena to the Muses. (Hartung, CAMENIATA, JOANNEIS (Ἰωάννης Καμniáta), cabuculés, or bearer of the crozier, to the archbishop of Thessalonica, was an eye-witness of the capture of that town by the Arabs in A.D. 904

a. H. 169. Leo, a Syrian renegade, who held a command under the Arabs, made a descent in that year near Thessalonica, with a fleet of eighty-four ships, containing twelve thousand armed slaves, surprised, took, and plundered the town, then the second in the Greek empire, and sailed off with a great number of captives. Among these were Cameniana and several of his family, who would have been put to death by the Arabs, had not Cameniana saved his and their lives by shewing the victors a spot where the inhabitants had buried part of their riches.

CAMBYES. however, that a single battle, in which the Persians were victorious, decided the fate of Egypt; and,
though some of the conquered held out for a while in Egypt, they were finally obliged to capitulatate, and the whole nation submitted to Cambyses.
He received also the voluntary submission of the Greek cities, Cyrene and Barca [see p. 477, b.], and of the neighbouring Libyan tribes, and projected fresh expeditions against the Aethiopians, who were called the "long-lived," and also against Carthage and the Ammonians. Having set out on his march to Aethiopia, he was compelled by want of provisions to return; the army which he sent against the Ammonians perished in the sands; and the attack on Carthage fell to the ground in consequence of the refusal of the Phoenicians to act against their colony. Yet their very refusal serves to show what is indeed of itself sufficiently obvious, how important the expedition would have been in a commercial point of view, while that against the Ammonians, had it succeeded, would probably have opened to the Persians the caravan-trade of the desert. (Herod. i. i., iii. 1-26; Ctes. Pers. 9; Just. i. 9; comp. Heeren's African Nations, vol. i.
ch. 6.)

Cambyses appears to have ruled Egypt with a stem and strong hand; and to him perhaps we may best refer the prediction of Isaiah: "The Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord" (Is. xix. 4; see Vitringa, ad loc.); and it is possible that his tyranny to the conquered, together with the insults offered by him to their national religion, may have caused some exaggeration in the accounts of his madness, which, in fact, the Egyptians ascribed to his impotency. But, allowing for some over-statement, it does appear that he had been subject from his birth to epileptic fits (Herod.
iii. 53); and, in addition to the physical tendency to insanity thus created, the habits of despotism would seem to have fostered in him a capricious self-will and a violence of temper bordering upon frenzy. He had long set the laws of Persia at defiance by marrying his sisters, one of whom he is said to have murdered in a fit of passion because she lamented her brother Smerdis, whom he had caused to be slain. Of the death of this prince, and of the events that followed upon it, different accounts are given by Herodotus and Ctesias. The former relates that Cambyses, alarmed by a dream which seemed to portend his brother's greatness, sent a confidential minister named Pervaces to Susa with orders to put him to death. Afterwards, a Magian, who bore the same name as the deposed prince and greatly resembled him in appearance, took advantage of these circumstances to pervert
him and set up a claim to the throne [Smerdis, and Cambyses, while marching through Syria against this pretender, died at a place named Echatan of an accidental wound in the thigh, p. 521.
According to Ctesias, the name of the king's murderous brother was Tanyzaxes, and a Magian named Saphadates accused him to the king of an intention to revolt. After his death by poison, Cambyses was accused to him from his mother Amytis, made Saphadates accuse him, and the fraud succeeded at first, from the wonderful likeness between the Magian and the murdered prince; at length, however, Amytis discovered it, and died of poison, which she had voluntarily taken, imprecating curses on Cambyses. The king died at Babylon of an accidental wound in the thigh, and Sphend-
The Arabs, however, did not restore him to liberty, but carried him to Tarsus in Cilicia for the purpose of exchanging him for Arab prisoners who had been taken by the Greeks. At Tarsus, Camerini wrote a description of the capture of Thessalonica, entitled "Ispanos plegis με καυσίουλετον του Καμερινού ἐν τιν Ἀπασία λαβα Θεσσαλονίκης," which is commonly called by its Latin title "De expeditione Camerini." It is divided into seventy-nine chapters, and is important for the plunder of Thessalonica by the Arabs as the work of Joannes Anagnostus for the sake of the same town by the Turks in 1430. The Greek text of this elegant work was first published, with a Latin translation, by Leo Allatius in his Σύνθεσις, 1653-1658, where it is divided into forty-five sections. The second edition is by Combebisius, who published it with an improved Latin translation in his "Historie Byzantine Scriptores post Theophanem," Paris, 1653, fol., which forms part of the Parisian "Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant." Combebisius divided it into seventy-nine chapters. The text of the edition of the Collection, was published by Em. Becker together with Thaepheanas (continuatus), Symeon Magister, and Georgius Monachus, Born. 1836, 8vo. (Fabulae Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 683; Handwks, De Script. Hist. Byzant. p. 403; &c.; The Alcestes of Ioannes Camerini. [W.P.]

CAMERINUS, the name of an old patrician family of the Sulphici gens, which probably derived its name from the ancient town of Camerii or Camerium, in Latium. The Camerini frequently held the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic; but after B.C. 345, when Ser. Sulcius Camerinus Rufus was consul, we do not hear of them again, for upwards of 400 years, till Q. Sulpius Camerinus obtained the censorship in A.D. 9. The family was reckoned one of the most ancient in Rome in the early times of the empire. (Juv. vii. 90, viii. 38.)

1. SER. SULPICIUS P. P. CAMERINUS CORNUTIUS, consul b.c. 500 with M. Tullius Longus in the tenth year of the republic. Livy says, that nothing memorable took place in that year, but Dionysius speaks of a formidable conspiracy to restore the Tarquins, which was detected and crushed by Camerinus. After the death of his colleague, Camerinus held the censorship alone. Dionysius puts a speech into the mouth of Camerinus respecting a renewal of the league with the league in B.C. 493. (Livy. ii. 19; Dionys. v. 52, 55, 57, vi. 20; Cic. Brut. 161; Zonar. viii. 13.)

2. Q. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS CORNUTIUS, consul b.c. 490 with Sp. Luscinius Flavus. He was afterwards one of the embassy sent to intercede with Coriolanus when the latter was advancing against Rome. (Dionys. vii. 68, viii. 22.)

3. SER. SULPICIUS SER. F. SER. N. CAMERINUS CORNUTIUS, consul b.c. 461, when the lex Terentilia was brought forward a second time for a reform in the laws. (Livy. iii. 10; Dionys. x. 1; Dodd. xi. 84; Plin. H. N. ii. 57.) This law, however, was successfully resisted by the patriarchs; but when in B.C. 461 it was resolved to send three ambassadors to Greece to collect information respecting the laws of the Greek states, Ser. Camerinus was one of their number, according to Dionysius (x. 52), though Livy calls him (iii. 31) Publius. The ambassadors remained three years in Greece, and on their return Ser. Camerinus was appointed a member of the decemvirs in B.C. 451. (Livy. iii. 33; Dionys. x. 56.) In B.C. 448 he commanded the cavalry under the consuls T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Agrippa Furius Modullinus in the great battle against the Volsci and Aqui fought in that year. (Livy. iii. 70.)

4. P. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS. (Livy. iii. 31.) See No. 3.

5. SULPICIUS SER. F. SER. N. CAMERINUS CORNUTIUS, son or grandson of No. 3, consul in B.C. 492 and again in 398. (Livy. vi. 14; Diod. xiv. 38, 82.)

6. SER. SULPICIUS Q. P. SER. N. CAMERINUS, son of No. 5, consul b.c. 393, and military tribune in B.C. 391, in the latter of which years he conducted the war against the Salpinites, and carried off a great quantity of booty from their territory. (Livy. v. 29, 32; Diod. xiv. 99, 107.) He was one of the three interreges in B.C. 387. (Livy. v. 5.)

7. C. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS, consul tribune in B.C. 392, and censor in 330 with Sp. Postumus Regillensis Albinus. But no census was taken in this year, as Camerinus resigned his office on the death of his colleague. (Livy. vi. 22; Diod. xiv. 41; Livy. vi. 27.)

8. SER. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS RUFUS, consul b.c. 345. (Livy. vii. 28; Diod. xvi. 68.)

9. Q. SULPICIUS Q. P. Q. N. CAMERINUS, was consul in A.D. 9, the birth-year of the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 3; Plin. H. N. vii. 46, a. 49.)

10. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS, was proconsul of Africa together with Pomponius Silvanus, and on their return to Rome in A.D. 59, they were both accused on account of their extortion in their province, but were acquitted by the emperor Nero. (Tac. Ann. viii. 52.) Soon afterwards, however, Nero put Camerinus and his son to death, according to Dion Cassius (lxii. 18), for no other reason but because they ventured to make use of the surname Pythicus, which was hereditary in their family, and which Nero claimed as an exclusive prerogative for himself. It appears from Pliny (Ep. v. 3), that they were accused by M. Regulus.

CAMERINUS, a Roman poet, contemporary with Ovid, who sang the capture of Troy by Hercules. No portion of this lay has been preserved, nor do we find any allusion to the work or its author except in a single line of the Epistles from Pontus. The supposed, that the Excidium Trojanum mentioned by Apuleius (de Orph. vi. 18) is the production in question, seems to rest on no evidence whatever. (Ov. Ep. ex. Pont. iv. 16, 20.)

CAMERINUS, SCRIBONIUS NUS, the assumed name of a runaway slave, whose real name was afterwards found out to be Geta. He made his appearance in the reign of Vitellius, and his object seems to have been to upset the government of Vitellius. He pretended to have been obliged to quit Rome in the time of Nero, and to have ever since lived concealed in Histria, because he belonged to the family of the Cossii, who had large possessions there. He succeeded in assembling around him the populace, and even some soldiers, who were misled by him or wished for a revolution. The pretender, however, was seized and brought before Vitellius; and when his real origin was discovered, he was executed as a common slave. (Tac. Hist. ii. 72.)

CAMERS, the name of two mythical personages in Virgil. (Aen. x. 562, xii. 224, &c.)
CAMILLA, a daughter of king Metabus of the Volscian town of Privenorum. When her father, expelled by his subjects, came in his flight to the river Amasenum, he tied his infant daughter, whom he had previously devoted to the service of Diana, to a spear, and hurled it across the river. He himself then swam after it, and on reaching the opposite bank he found his child uninjured. He took her with him, and had her suckled by a mare. He brought her up in pure maidenhood, and she became one of the swift-footed servants of Diana, accustomed to the chase and to war. In the war between Ascanus and Turnus she assisted the latter, and was slain by Aruns. Diana avenged her death by sending Opis to kill Aruns, and to rescue the body of Camilla. (Virg. Aen. vii. 803, &c.; xi. 432, &c, 648, &c.; Hyggin. Fab. 252.) Servius (ad Aen. xi. 643 and 558) remarks, that she was called Camilla because she was engaged in the service of Diana, since all youthful priestesses were called Camile by the Etruscans. That there were such Camille as well as Camillae at Rome is expressly stated by Dionysius. (ii. 21, &c.; Fest. a. c. Camilla.) [L. S.] CAMILLUS, a Gallic chief. [BRITUS, No. 17.] Camullus, the name of a patrician family of the Furia gens.

1. M. Furius Camillus, was, according to Livy (v. 1), elected consular tribune for the first time in b. c. 408. In this year Livy mentions eight consular tribunes, a number which does not occur any where else; and we know from Plutarch (Cam. 2), that Camillus was invested with the censorship before he had held any other office. From these circumstances it has justly been inferred, that the censorship of Camillus and his colleague Postumius must be assigned to the year b. c. 408, and that Livy, in his list of the consular tribunes of that year, includes the two censors. (Comp. Val. Max. i. 9. § 1.) Therefore, what is commonly called the second, third, &c., consular tribunate of Camillus, must be regarded as the first, second, &c. The first belongs to b. c. 401; and the only thing that is mentioned of him during this year is, that he marched into the country of the Faliscans, and, not meeting any enemy in the open field, ravaged the country. His second consular tribunate falls in the year b. c. 398, in the course of which he acquired great booty at Capena; and as the consular tribunes were obliged by a decree of the senate to lay down their office before the end of the year, Q. Servilius Fidenas and Camillus were successively appointed interreges.

In b. c. 396, when the Veientes, Faliscans, and Fidenates again revolted, Camillus was made dictator for the purpose of carrying on the war against them, and he appointed P. Cornelius Scipio his magister equitum. After defeating the Faliscans and Fidenates, and taking their camp, he marched against Veii, and succeeded in reducing the town, in the tenth year of the war. Here he acquired immense booty, and had the statue of Juno Regina removed to Rome, where it was set up in a special temple on the Aventine, which was consecrated in b. c. 391, the year in which he celebrated the great games he had vowed. On his return from Veii, he entered Rome in triumph, riding in a chariot drawn by white horses. In b. c. 394 he was elected consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. The story of the schoolmaster who attempted to betray the town of Falerii to Camillus, belongs to this campaign. Camillus had him chained and sent back to his fellow-citizens, who were so much affected by the justice of the Roman general, that they surrendered to the Romans. (Liv. v. 27; comp. Val. Max. vi. 5. § 1, who calls Camillus consul on this occasion, although, according to the express testimony of Plutarch, he was never invested with the consularship.

In b. c. 391, Camillus was chosen interrex to take the auspices, as the other magistrates were attacked by an epidemic then raging at Rome, by which he also lost a son. In this year he was accused by the tribune of the plebs, L. Appuleius, with having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii; and, seeing that his condemnation was unavoidable, he went into exile, praying to the gods that, if he was wronged, his unworthy country might soon be in a condition to stand in need of him. During his absence he was condemned to pay a fine of 15,000 heavy asses. The time for which he had prayed soon came; for the Gauls advanced through Etruria towards Rome, and the city, with the exception of the capitol, was taken by the barbarians and reduced to ashes. In this distress, Camillus, who was living in exile at Ardea, was recalled by a lex curiata, and while yet absent was appointed dictator a second time, b. c. 390. He made L. Valerius Potitus his magister equitum, assembled the scattered Roman forces, consisting partly of fugitives and partly of those who had survived the day on the Aulae, and marched towards Rome. Here he took the Gauls by surprise, and defeated them completely. He then entered the city in triumph, saluted by his fellow-citizens as ater Romulus, pater patriae, and conditor urbis. His first care was to have the temples restored, and then to rebuild the city. The people, who were at first inclined to quit their destroyed homes and emigrate to Veii, were prevailed upon to give up this plan, and then Camillus laid down his dictatorship.

In b. c. 389 Camillus was made interrex for the second time for the purpose of electing the consular tribunes; and, as in the same year the neighboring tribes rose against Rome, hoping to conquer the weakened city without any difficulty, Camillus was again appointed dictator, and he made C. Servilius Ahala his magister equitum. He first defeated the Volscans, and took their camp; and they were now compelled to submit to Rome after a contest of seventy years. The Aequans were also conquered near Bolsena, and their capital was taken in the first attack. Sextium, which had been occupied by Etruscans, fell in like manner. After the conquest of these three nations, Camillus returned to Rome in triumph.

In b. c. 386 Camillus was elected consular tribune for the fourth time, and, after having declined the dictatorship which was offered him, he defeated the Antiates and Etruscans. In b. c. 384 he was consular tribune for the fifth, and in 381 for the sixth time. In the latter year he conquered the revolted Volscans and the Praenestines. During the war against the Volscans L. Furius Medullinus was appointed as his colleague. The latter disapproved of the cautious slowness of Camillus, and, without his consent, he led his troops against the enemy, who, by a feigned flight drew him into a perilous situation and put him to flight. But Camillus now appeared, compelled the fugitives to stand, led them back to battle, and gained a complete victory. Hereupon Camillus received orders to make war upon the Tusculans for having assisted the Volscians; and, notwithstanding the former conduct of Medullians, Camillus again chose him as his colleague, to afford him an opportunity of wiping off his disgrace. This generosity and moderation deserved and excited general admiration.

In B.C. 368, when the patricians were resolved to make a last effort against the rogations of C. Licinius Stole, the senate appointed Camillus, a faithful supporter of the patricians, dictator for the fourth time. His magister equitum was L. Acemilus Mamercinus. But Camillus, who probably saw that it was hopeless to resist any further the demands of the plebeians, resigned the office soon after, and P. Manilius was appointed in his stead. In the following year, B.C. 367, when a fresh war with the Gauls broke out, Camillus, who was now nearly eighty years old, was called to the dictatorship for the fifth time. His magister equitum was T. Quintinius Peumus. He gained a great victory, for which he was rewarded with a triumph. Two years later, B.C. 365, he died of the plague. Camillus is the great hero of his time, and stands forth as a resolute champion of his own order until he became convinced that further opposition was of no avail. His history, as related in Plutarch and Livy, is not without a considerable admixture of legendary and traditional fable, and requires a careful critical sifting. (Plut. Life of Camillus; Liv. v. 10, 12, 14, 17, 19, &c., 31, 32, 46, 49-55, vi. 1-4, 6, &c., 38, &c., 31, 42, vii. 1; Dion. xii. 29; Estroc. i. 20; Val. Max. iv. 1. 2; Seel. xvi. 31; Cursus pro D. 3. de Re Public. i. 3, Tusc. i. 37; Fragm. p. 462; Asseon. pro Scaur. p. 50, ed. Orelli.)

2. S. Furius Camillus, a son of No. 1. When the pretorship was instituted in B.C. 367, Camillus was one of the two who were first invested with it. (Liv. vii. 1; Suid. s. v. "Pretorium.")

3. L. Furius M. P. Camillus, a son of No. 1. In B.C. 350, when one of the consuls was ill, and the other, Popilius Laenas, returned from the Gallic war with a severe wound, L. Furius Camillus was appointed dictator to hold the comitia, and P. Cornelius Scipio became his magister equitum. Camillus, who was as much a patriot in his feelings and sentiments as his father, did not accept the names of any plebeians who offered themselves as candidates for the consulship, and thus caused the consulsip to be given to patricians only. The senate, delighted with this, exerted all its influence in raising him to the consulship in B.C. 349. He then nominated Aprius Claudius Crassus as his colleague, who however died during the preparations for the Gallic war. Camillus, who now remained sole consul, caused the command against the Gauls to be given to himself extra sortem. Two legions were left behind for the protection of the city, and eight others were divided between him and the praetor L. Pinius, whom he sent to protect the coast against some Greek pirates, who were about that year infesting the coast of Latium. Camillus routed the Gauls in the Pomptine district, and compelled them to seek refuge in Apulia. This battle against the Gauls is famous in Roman story for the single combat of M. Valerius Corvus with a bold and presumptuous Gaul. After the battle, Camillus honoured the gallantry of Valerius with a present of ten oxen and a golden crown. Camillus then joined the praetor Pinius on the coast; but nothing of any importance was accomplished against the Greeks, who soon after disappeared. (Liv. vii. 24-25; Cic. De Senect. 12; Gell. ix. 13.)

4. L. Furius Sp. F. M. N. Camillus, son of No. 2, consul in B.C. 333, together with C. Maenius. He fought in this year successfully against the Tibrutines, and took their town Tibur. The two consuls united completed the subjugation of Latium; they were rewarded with a triumph, and equestrian status, then a rare distinction, were conferred upon them in the forum. Camillus further distinguished himself by advising his countrymen to trent the Latins with mildness. In B.C. 335 he was elected consul a second time, together with D. Junius Brutus Suavus. In this year war was declared against the Vestinians, and Camillus obtained Saccovi for his province; but while he was engaged in the war, he was attacked by a severe illness, and was ordered to nominate L. Papirius Cursor dictator to continue the war. (Liv. viii. 18, 16, &c., 29; Plin. H. N. xxxii. 5.)

5. M. Furius Camillus, consul in A.D. 8 (Fast. Cap.), and procensor of Africa in the reign of Tibereius, defeated in A.D. 17, the Numidian Tafranina, together with a great number of Numidians and Mauretaniens. It is expressly stated, that after the lapse of several centuries, he was the first who revived the military fame of the Furi Camilli. The senate, with the consent of Tiberius, honoured him with the insignia of a triumph, a distinction which he was allowed to enjoy with impunity on account of his unassuming character. (Tac. Ann. ii. 82, iii. 20.)

6. M. Furius Camillus, surnamed Scribonianus, was consul in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 32, together with Cn. Domitius. At the beginning of the reign of Claudius he waslegate of Dalmatia, and revolted with his legions, probably in the hope of raising himself to the throne. But he was conquered on the fifth day after the beginning of the insurrection, A.D. 42, sent into exile and died in A.D. 53, either of an illness, or, as is commonly reported, by poison. (Tac. Ann. vi. 1, xii. 52, Hist. i. 89, ii. 75; Suet. Claud. 13.)

7. Furius Camillus, likewise surnamed Scribonianus, was sent into exile by the emperor Claudius, together with his brother Junius, A.D. 59, for having consulted the Caballians about the time when Claudius was to die. (Tac. Ann. xii. 52, Hist. ii. 75.)

C. CAMILLUS, a Roman jurist, and a particular friend of Cicero, who had a high opinion of his worldly prudence and judgment, and often consulted him on matters of business and law. At Cicero's table he was a frequent guest, and was remarkable for his love of news, and extreme personal neatness. His name often occurs in the letters of Cicero (ad Att. v. 8, vi. 1, 5, xi. 16, 23, xii. 6, 33, ad Fam. ix. 20, xiv. 5, 14), from one of which (ad Fam. v. 20) it appears, that Camillus was consulted by Cicero upon a matter connected with the juris crassulatorio, which was a branch of the recent law of Rome, and was so difficult and intricate that some jurists specially devoted themselves to its study. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. "Press." [J.T.G.] CAMISSARES, a Carian, father of Datames, was high in favour with Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), by whom he was made satrap of a part of Cilicia bordering on Cappodocia. He fell in the war of

CAMOENA. [CAMOENA.]

CAMPA'NUS, one of the leaders of the Tumri
in the war of Civilians against the Romans, in a. d.
71. (Tac. Hist. iv. 66.) [L. S.]

CAMPA'NUS, a Roman jurist, quoted in the Digest, once by Valens (Dig. 38, tit. i, s. 47), and once by Pompianus. (Dig. 40, tit. 5, s. 34. § 1.)
As both Valens and Pompianus lived about the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, Campanus probably flourished about the commencement of the second century. Both the passages quoted from him relate to fidecommissa.

A Cicianus, Campanus, to whom was addressed a rescript of the emperors Severus and Antoninus (Fig. 36, tit. 1, s. 29), must have been of later date, though he is confounded with the jurist by Bertrandus. (Menag. Amoen. Jur. c. 38; Manian, as 30 Jco's, ii p. 197.) [J. T. G.]

CAMPASPE, called Pancaste (Πανκαστή) by Asian, and Paseia (Πασεία) by Lucian, of Larissa, the favourite concubine of Alexander, and the first with whom he is said to have had intercourse.
Apelles being commissioned by Alexander to paint
Campaspe naked, fell in love with her, whereupon Alexander gave her to him as a present. According to some she was the model of Apelles' celebrated picture of the Venus Anadyomene, but according to others Phryne was the original of this painting. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 34; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 96. § 12; Lucian, Imag. 7; Albin.
iii. p. 591; comp. ANADYOMENE.)

CAMPE (Καμπή), a monster which was appointed in Tartarus to guard the Cyclopes. It was killed by Zeus when he wanted the assistance of the Cyclopes against the Titans. (Apollod. i. 2. § 1.2) Diodorus (iii. 72) mentions a monster of the same name, which was slain by Dionysus, and which Nonnus (Dionys. xvii. 327, &c.) identifies with the former. [L. S.]

CAMURIS, a common soldier of the tenth legion, who was the murderer of the emperor Galba
according to most authorities consulted by Tacitus.
(Inst. i. 41.) [L. S.]

CANAD (Canus, Q. GELLUS.]

CANACE (Κανάς), a daughter of Aeolus and E tolerant, whence she is called Aeolis (Callim. Hyg-ion in Cer. 100), who had several children by Poseidon.
(Ap. id. i. 7. § 3, &c.) She entertained an unnatural love for her brother Mceanros, and on this account was killed by her own father; but according to others, she herself, as well as Mceaneus, put an end to her life. (Hygin. Fab. 226, 242; Or.
Her. 11.) [L. S.]

CANA'CHUS (Κανάχος). 1. A Sicilian artist, about whose age the greatest uncertainty long prevailed, as one work of his is mentioned which must have been executed before ol. 75, and another 60 years later, which seems to be, and indeed is, impossible. The fact is, that there were two works of the name of Canachus, both of Sicily, and probably grandfather and grandson. This was Künstler, p. 189) and adopted by Thiersch (Epoch.
Anm. pp. 38-44), K. O. Muller, and Boeckh. The work which must have been finished n. c. 480, was a colossal statue of Apollo Phileius at Mileuth, this statue having been carried to Ecbatana by Xerxes after his defeat in Greece, n. c. 479. Muller (Kanathlatt, 1821, N. 16) thinks, that this statue cannot have been executed before n. c. 494, at which time Milethus was destroyed and burnt by Darius; but Thiersch (i. c.) shows that the colos-sus might very well have escaped the general min, and therefore need not have been placed there after the destruction of the city. Finding that all indications point to the interval between ol. 60 and 68 (B. c. 540-508), he has given these 32 years as the time during which Canachus flourished. Thus the age of our artist coincides with that of Callon, whose contemporary he is called by Panoumites (vii.
18. § 6). He was likewise contemporary with Aegaladas, who flourished about ol. 66 [Agriladas]; for, together with this artist and with his own brother, Aristocles, he executed the Phoebus, who symbolically represented the diurnal, chromatic, and unharmonic styles of Greek music. Besides these works, we find the following mentioned: Riding (λειστόφοτος) boys (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8.
19); a statue of Aphrodite, wrought in gold and ivory (Paus. ii. 10. § 4); one of Apollo Temenius at Thebes, made of cedar, and so very like the Apollo Phoebus of Milethos, which was of metal, that one could instantly recognize the artist. (Paus. i. c., ix. 10. § 9.) For Cicerone's judgment of Canachus's performances, see Callum.

2. A Sicilian artist, probably the grandson of the former, from whom he is not distinguished by these men. He and Patrocles ease the statues of two Spartans, who had fought in the battle of Aegospotamos, in b. c. 405. (Paus. x. 6. § 4.) [W. L.]

CANANUS, IOANNEs (Ιωάννης Κανάτιος), lived in the first part of the fifteenth century, and wrote a description of the siege of Constantinople, by Sultan Murad II. in a. d. 1422 (A. M. 826).
The title of it is Διήγημα περί τού τεταρτα-νυντάτου μεγάλου πολέμου κατά το σκότω
(Α. M. 6930), ήτοι 'Αμυνόμενος Πέλες (Βαι) παρέσκευε ταύτη μετά δυνάμεως βαρείας, &c. It was first published with a Latin translation, by Leo Allitus, together with Georgius Acropolita and Joel, and accompanied with the notes by the editor and by Theodore Douza, Paris, 1651, fol. The best edition is that of Immanuele Beiker, appended to the edition of Phanossus, Bom, 1688, with a new 773-774.) [W. P.]

CANDACE (Κανάδις), a queen of that portion of Aethiopia which had Morois for its metropolis.
In n. c. 52, she invaded Egypt, being encouraged by supposing that the unsuccessful expedition of Aelius Gallus against Ambia, in n. c. 24, had weakened the Romans. She advanced into the Thebaid, ravaging the country, and attacked and captured the Roman garrisons at Elephantine, Syene, and Philae; but Petronius, who had succeded Gallus in the government of the province, compelled her to retreat, and defeated her with great loss in her own territory near the town of Psetcha. This place he took, and also Preminis and Nebinata, in the latter of which, the son of the queen was slain. Petronius, after defeating Candecace attacked the garrison he had left in Preminis; but Petronius hastily returned, and again defeated her. On this she sent ambassadors to Augustus, who was then at Samos, and who received them favourably, and even remitted the tribute which had been imposed on their country. Strabo, who tells us that Candace was a woman of a manly spirit, also favours us with the information 2 q
that she was blind of one eye. (Strab. xvii. pp. 819–821; Dion Cass. liii. 29, liv. 5.) Her name seems to have been common to all the queens of Aethiopia (Plin. H. N. vi. 29; Joseph. Ant. viii. 6, § 5; Acts, viii. 27); and it appears from Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 1, § 10), that it was customary for the Aethiopians to be governed by women, though Oecumenius thinks (Comm. in Acts, l. c.), that Candace was only the common name of the queen-mothers, the nation regarding the sun alone as their father and king, and their princes as the sun’s children. [E. E.]

CANDAULES (Κανδαύλης), known also among the Greeks by the name of Myrnus, was the last Heracleid king of Lydia. According to the Bactrian legend, when her father Heracles beheld the extremely proud of his wife’s beauty, and insisted on exhibiting her unveiled charms, but without her knowledge, to Gyges, his favourite officer. Gyges was seen by the queen as he was stealing from her chamber, and the next day she summoned him before her, intent on vengeance, and bade him choose whether he would undergo the punishment of death himself, or would consent to murder Candales and receive the kingdom together with her hand. He chose the latter alternative, and because the founder of the dynasty of the meerma-dae, about n. c. 715. In Plato the story, in the form of the well-known fable of the ring of Gyges, serves the purpose of moral allegory. Plutarch, following in one place the story of Herodotus, speaks in another of Gyges as making war against Candaules with the help of some Carian auxiliaries. (Herod. i. 7–13; Just. i. 7; Plat. de Repub. ii. pp. 359, 360; Cic. de Off. iii. 9; Plut. Quaest. Græc. 45, Sympos. i. 5, § 11; comp. Thir-wall’s Greece, vol. ii. p. 156.) Candaules is mentioned by Piny in two passages as having given Balarus, the painter, a larger sum of money ("a pari recondite auro") for a picture representing a battle of the Magnesians. (Plin. H. N. vii. 38, xxxv. 8; comp. Dict. of Ant. p. 682.) [E. E.]

CA’NIDIUS (Κάνιδιος), a Greek author, who lived about the time of the emperors Commodus and Severus, about a. d. 200, and wrote a work on the Hexameron, which is referred to by Eusebius. (Hist. Eccl. iv. 27; comp. Hieronym. De Scriptor. Eccl. 43.) [L. S.]

CA’NIDIUS, an Arian who flourished about the middle of the fourth century, the author of a tract "De Generatione Divina," addressed to his friend Marius Victorinus, who wrote in reply "De Generatione Verbi Divini sive Confitutorum Caesar didi Ariani ad eundem." Mabillon published in his Anecdot (Paris, 1685, fol.) a "Fragmentum Epistolae Candidi Ariani ad Marium Victorinum," which Oudin first pointed out to be in reality a portion of the "De Generatione Divina." Both are printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. [Victorinus.] (Oudin, De Script. Eccl. vol. i. 529; Schubmann, Bibl. Patrum Latinitatum, c. iv. 13 and 14, Lips. 1732.) [W. B.]

CA’NIDIUS ISARISUS (Κανιδίου Ἰσαύρος), a Byzantine historian, a native of Isauria, whence his surname Isaurus. He lived in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, and held a high public office in his native country. He is called a man of great influence and an orthodox Christian, which is inferred from his advocating the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. His history of the Byzantine empire, in three books, which is now lost, began with the election of the emperor Leo the Thracic, and came down to the death of Zeno the Isaurian. It therefore embraced the period from a. d. 457 to 491. A summary of its contents is preserved in Photius (cod. 79), to whom we are also indebted for the few facts concerning the life of Candidus which we have mentioned, and who censes the style of the historian for its affection of poetical beauties. A small fragment of the work is preserved by Suidus (s. v. ἕρωτας). The extant frag-

CA’INDIUS VESPRONIUS, one of the consular envoys despatched by Didius Julianus and the senate in a. d. 192, for the purpose of inccluding the troops of Septimius Severus to abandon their leader, who had been declared a public enemy. Not only did Candidus fail in accomplishing the object of his mission, but he very narrowly escaped being put to death by the soldiers, who recollected theanness he had formerly displayed towards those under his command. We find him, nevertheless, at a subsequent period (193) employed as a legate by Severus, first in Asia Minor, against Pescennius Niger, and afterwards (194) against the Arabic and other barbarous tribes on the confines of Syria and Mesopotamia. On both occasions he did good service; for, by his exhortations and example, the fortune of the day was turned at the great battle of Nicaea; and, acting in conjunction with Lateranus, he reduced to submission the turbulent chiefs of Adiabene and Os-roene. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 16, lxxiv. 6, lxxxv. 2; Spartian. Julian. 5.) [W. R.]

CA’INDYBUS (Κανιδίους), a son of Deucalion, from whom Cadinyb, a town in Lycaea, was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. c.) [L. S.]

CA’INDYTHUS (Κανιδίθος), two mythical personages, one a son of Lycaon, and the second the son of Atlas and father of Cadmus in Euboea, from whom a mountain in Ruboea near Chaleis derived its name. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1; Apollon. Rhod. i. 78; Strab. x. p. 447.) [L. S.]

CA’INDYIA, whose real name was Gratidia, as we learn from the scholiasts, was a Neapolitan hetaira beloved by Honorius; but when she deserted him, he revenged himself upon her by holding her up to contempt as an old wench. This was the object of the 5th and 17th Epodes, and of the 8th Satire of the first book. The Palinode in the 10th ode of the 1st book is supposed to refer to these poems. Homer attacks her by the name of Candidia because her real name Gratidia conveyed the idea of what was pleasant and agreeable, while the assumed one was associated with gray hairs and old age. (Comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 48; Schol. Aur. and Croziu, ad loc. and ad Sent. i. 8, 24.)

CA’INDYNA, C. CLAUDIUS, consul in b. c.
285 and 278. [Claudius.]

CA’INDYNA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned in early Roman history. It came into notice at the beginning of the second century before Christ. C. Canidius Robilius, praetor in b. c. 171, was the CANOBUS.
first member of the gens who obtained any of the curule offices; but the first Caninus who was consul was C. Caninus Rebilus in B.C. 45. The chief families are those of Gallus and Rebilus: we also meet with the surname of Skeptus, and a Caninus Sallustius is mentioned who was known by some member of this gens. [SALLUSTIUS.]
C. CANIUS, a Roman knight, who defended P. Rutilius Rufus, when he was accused by M. Aemilius Scaurus in B.C. 107. Cecero relates an amusing tale of how this Canius was taken in by a banker at Syracuse, of the name of Pythius, in the purchase of some property. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 69, de Off. iii. 14.)
CANIUS RUFUS. [RUFFUS.]
CANNUTIUS. [CANTITIUS.]
CANOBUS or CANOPUS (Κανούβος or Κανούσος), according to Greek story, the helmsman of Meleagrus, who on his return from Troy died in Egypt, in consequence of the bite of a snake, and was buried by Menelaus on the site of the town of Canopus, which derived its name from him. (Strab. xvii. p. 801; Censor. Narrat. 8; Nicola. Ther. 509, &c.; Schol. ad Aelian. V. H. xxv. 13; Steph. Byz. s. ε. Tac. Annal. ii. 60; Dionysius. Perig. 13; Amm. Marcell. xxii. 16; Serv. ad Ver. Georg. iv. 267.) According to some accounts, Canopus was worshiped in Egypt as a divine being, and was represented in the shape of a jar with small feet, a thin neck, a swollen body, and a round back. (Epiph. Arcvrat. § 103; Rufin. Hist. Eccl. ii. 26; Suid. s. ε. Κανούσος.) The identification of an Egyptian divinity with the Greek hero Canopus is of course a mere fiction, and was looked upon in this light even by some of the ancients themselves. (Aristot. Orat. Aegypt. vol. ii. p. 359, &c. ed. Jebb.) On the Egyptian monuments we find a number of jars with the head either of some animal or of a human body at the top, and adorned with images of gods and hieroglyphics. (Description de l’Egypte, i. pl. 10, ii. pl. 96, 97; Montfaucon, L’Antiquité expliquée, vol. ii. p. 2, pl. 152-154.) Such jars are also seen on Egyptian, especially Coptician, coins. (Vaillant, Hist. Ptolémaïs, p. 203.) They appear to have been frequently used by the Egyptians in performing religious rites and sacrifices, and it may be that some deities were symbolically represented in this manner; but a particular jar-god, as worshipped at Canopus, is not mentioned by any writer except Rufinus, and is therefore exceedingly doubtful. Modern critics accordingly believe, that the god called Canopus may be some other divinity worshipped in that place, or the god Serapis, who was the chief deity of Canopus. But the whole subject is involved in utter obscurity. (See Jahnsky, Panath. Aegypt. iii. p. 151; Hug, Untersuchungen über den Mythos, &c.; Creuzer, Dionysius, p. 108, &c., Symbol. l. p. 255, &c.) [CANTACUZENUS, the name of one of the most illustrious of the Byzantine families. It is probable that the Cantacuzeni belonged to the nobility at Constantinople long before the time of its supposed founder, who lived in the latter part of the eleventh and the early part of the twelfth century. There are at present several Greek nobles who style themselves princes Cantacuzeni, but it is very doubtful whether they are descended from the imperial Cantacuzeni, of whom, however, there are probably descendants living in Italy, although they have dropped the name of their ancestors.
1. The first Cantacuzenus who became distinguished in history was the commander of the Greek fleet in the reign of Alexius I. Comnenus. He besieged Lodiceia, and was victorious in Dalmatia in the war with Bohemond in 1107.
2. JOANNES CANTACUZENUS, the son of No. 1, married Maria Comnenus, the daughter of Andronicus Comnenus Schatzoster, and the niece of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, and was killed in a war with the Turks-Seljuks about 1174.
3. MANUEL CANTACUZENUS, son of No. 2, blinded by the emperor Manuel.
4. JOANNES CANTACUZENUS, perhaps the son of No. 3, blinded by the emperor Andronicus Comnenus, but nevertheless made Caesar by the emperor Isaac Angelus, whose sister Irene he had married. He was killed in a war with the Bulgarians after 1196.
5. THEODORUS, perhaps the brother of the preceding, was one of the most courageous opponents of Andronicus I. Comnenus; he was killed in 1183.
6. MANUEL CANTACUZENUS, duke under John Vatatzes, emperor of Nicea; died subsequently to the year 1261; his children probably were,
1. Cantacuzenus, prefect of the Peloponnesus; died at thirty years of age, during the reign of Andronicus II, the elder (1285-1288); married Theodora Palaeologina (Tarchaniota), who died in 1342.
2. Cantacuzenus.
3. A daughter, Nicephorius.
1. IOANNES VI. Cantacuzenus, emperor in 1347. [JOANNES VI.] He married Irene, daughter of Andronicus Asan Protostevari, and granddaughter of Joannes Asan, king of Bulgaria.
2. Nicephorus.
3. A daughter, married Con- stantius Acropolita.
2. Thomas.
3. Manuel, duke of Sparta, died 1380.
4. Andronicus, married Irene Palaeologina, died 1348.
5. Maria, married Nicephorus Duces.
6. Theodora, married Urhian, sultan of the Turks-Osmanli.
There are several other Canteenzi conpious in Byzantine history, whose parentage cannot be correctly established. (Du Cange, Familles Byzantines, p. 258, &c.)

CAINTHARUS (Καϊνθαρος), a comic poet of Athens. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 209.) The only thing we have to guide us in determining his age is, that the comedy entitled Symmachia, which commonly went by the name of Plato, was ascribed by some to Cantharus, whence we may infer, that he was a contemporary of Plato, the comic poet. Besides some fragments of the Symmachia, we possess a few of two other comedies, the Medea (Suid. and Mich. Apostol. s. v. Ἀμφίδα οἰκονομία; Pollux, iv. 61), and Tereus. (Athen. iii. p. 81; Mich. Apostol. s. v. Ἀμφίδα). Of two other comedies mentioned by Suidas, the Μικρομακες and the Ἀλκηνικες, no fragments are extant. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 251.)

CAINTHARUS (Καϊνθαρος), a satyrn and embroiderer of Sicyon, the son of Alexis and pupil of Cephisodotus. (Paus. vi. 3. § 8.) According to Pliny, (Hist. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), there flourished an artist Euthymides about b. c. 800. If this was the teacher of Cantharus, as is probable, his father Alexis cannot have been the artist of that name who is reckoned by Pliny (i. e.) amongst the pupils of the older Polyceutes, for this Polyceutes was already an old man at b. c. 420. Cantharus, therefore, flourished about b. c. 268. He seems to have excelled in athletes. (Paus. iii. 3. § 3, vi. 17. § 5.) [W. L.]

CANTHUS (Κανθος), an Argonaut, is called a son of Canthus and grandson of Abbas, or a son of Ahas of Euboea. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 78; Orph. Argon. 159; Val. Flacc. i. 453.) He is said to have been killed in Libya by Cephalus or Caphaurus. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1495; Val. Flacc. vi. 317, vii. 422.)

L. CANTILUS, a scribe or secretary of one of the pontiffs, committed incest with a Vestal virgin in the second Punic war, b. c. 216, and was flung to death in the comitium by the pontifex maximus. (Liv. xxi. 57.)

M. CANTIIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 203, accused L. Postumius Megellus, who avoided a trial by becoming the legatus of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, the conqueror of the Samnites in this year. (Liv. x. 48.)

CANULEIA GENS, plebeian. Persons of this name occur occasionally in the early as well as the latter times of the republic; but none of them ever obtained the consulship. The only surname in the gens is DIVIS: all the other Canuleii are mentioned without any cognomen. [Canuleius.]

CANULEIUS. 1. C. CANULEIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 445, was the proposer of the law establishing connubium between the patricians and plebs, which had been taken away by the laws of the two tables. He also proposed a law giving the people the option of choosing the consuls from either the patricians or the plebs; but to preserve the consulship in their order, and at the same time make some concessions to the plebs, the patricians resolved, that three military tribunes, with consular power, should be elected indifferently from either order in place of the consuls. (Liv. iv. 1—6; Cic. de Rep. ii. 37; Florus, i. 25; Dionys. xii. 57, 58.)

2. M. CANULEIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 420, accused C. Sempronius Atellius, who had been consul in b. c. 423, on account of his misconduct in the Volsinian war. (Agratitius, No. 5.) Canuleius and his colleagues introduced in the senate this year the subject of an assignment of the public land. (Liv. iv. 44.)

3. L. CANULEIUS, one of the five Roman legates sent by the senate to the Aetolians, b. c. 174. (Liv. xili. 25.)

4. L. CANULEIUS, a Roman senator, who had been one of the ambassadors sent into Egypt previously to b. c. 160. (Polyb. xxxi. 18.)

5. C. CANULEIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 100, accused P. Furius, who was so much detested by the people, that they tore him to pieces before he commenced his defence. (Appian, B. C. i. 33; comp. Cic. pro Rosc. 9; Dion Cass. Prop. 105, p. 43, ed. Reimar.)

6. L. CANULEIUS, one of the publicani, engaged in farming the duties paid on imported and exported goods at the harbour of Syracuse, when Verres was governor of Sicily, b. c. 79—71. (Cic. Verr. ii. 70—74.)

7. M. CANULEIUS, defended by Hortensius and Cotta, but on what occasion is unknown. (Cic. Brut. 92.)

8. CANULEIUS, mentioned in one of Cicero's letters in b. c. 49 (ad Att. x. 5), is otherwise unknown.

9. L. CANULEIUS, one of Caesar's legates in the war with Pompey, b. c. 40, was sent by Caesar into Epirus in order to collect corn. (Caes. B. C. iii. 42.)

CANUS, Q. GELLIUS, a friend of T. Pompeius Atticus, was struck out of the prescription in b. c. 43 by Antony on account of the friendship of the latter with Atticus. (Nepos, Att. 10; comp. Cic. ad Att. xiii. 31, xv. 21.) The Cana to whom there was some talk of marrying young Q. Cicero, was probably the daughter of this Gellius Canus. (Ad Att. xiii. 41, 42.)

CANUS, JULIUS, a Stoic philosopher, who promised his friends, when he was condemned to death by Caligula, to appear to them after his death, and inform them of the state of the soul after quitting the body. He is said to have fulfilled this promise by appearing in a vision to one of his friends named Antiochus. (Senece de Anima Transp. 14; Plut. ap. Sueton. p. 380, d.)

CANUSIUS OR GANUSIUS (Ταυρωνας), ap-

penguinly a Greek historian, who seems to have been a contemporary of Julius Caesar. It is on the authority of Contensus that Plutarch (Cas. 22) relates, that when the senate decreed a supplication on account of the successful proceedings of Caesar in Gaul, b. c. 55, Cato declared that Caesar ought to be delivered up to the barbarians, to atone for his violation of the laws of nations. [L. S.]

P. CANUTIUS, or CANNUTIUS, was born in the same year as Cicero, b. c. 106, and is described by the latter as the most eloquent orator out of the senatorial order. After the death of P. Sulpicius Rufus, who was one of the most celebrated orators of his time, and who left no orations behind him, P. Canutius composed some and published them under the name of Sulpicius. Canutius is frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius as having been engaged in the prosecution of several of the parties connected with that disgraceful affair. (Cic. Brut. 56, pro Cluent. 10, 16, 21, 27.)

TI. CANUTIUS or CANNUTIUS, tribune of the plebs in the year that Caesar was assassinated, b. c. 44, was a violent opponent of Antony. When Octavianus drew near to Rome towards the end of October, Canutius went out of the city to meet him, in order to learn his intentions; and upon Octavianus declaring against Antony, Canutius conducted him into the city, and spoke to the people on his behalf. Shortly afterwards, Octavianus went into Etruria and Antony returned to Rome; and when the latter summoned the senate on the Capitol on the 28th of November, in order to declare Octavianus an enemy of the state, he would not allow Canutius and two of his other colleagues to approach the Capitol, lest they should put their veto upon the decree of the senate. After the departure of Antony from Rome to prosecute the war against Dec. Brutus in Cisalpine Gaul, Canutius had full scope for indulging his hostility to Antony, and constantly attacked him in the most furious manner (continua rabiis laco- rabata, Vell. Pat. ii. 64). Upon the establishment of the triumvirate in the following year, b. c. 43, Canutius is said by Velleius Paterculus (l. c.) to have been included in the proscription and put to death; but this is a mistake, for he was engaged in the Persianian war, b. c. 40. As Octavianus had deserted the senatoral party, Canutius became one of his enemies, and accordingly joined Fulvia and L. Antonius in their attempt to crush him in b. c. 40; but falling into his hands on the capture of Perusia, Canutius was put to death by his orders. (Appian, B. C. iii. 41; Dion Cass. xiv. 6, 12; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 3, 23, Philipp. iii. 9; Appian, B. C. v. 49; Dion Cass. xlvii. 14.)

The C. Canutius, whom Sustonius (de Clar. Rhet. 4) mentions, is in all probability the same as this TI. Canutius. Whether the Canutius spoken of in the Dialogue de Oratoribus (c. 21) is the same as either P. or TI. Canutius, or a different person altogether, is quite uncertain.

CAPPELLA, or KAPHALA, daughter of Hipponous and Astrome or Laodice, the daughter of Iphis. (Hygin. Fab. 70; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 181; ad Pind. Nem. i. 30.) He was married to Eunade or Ianeia, who is also called a daughter of Iphis, and by whom he became the father of Sthenesius. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. vi. 46; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) He was one of the seven heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes, where he had his station at the Ogrynnian or Elektran gate. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 6; Aeschyl. Sept. a. Thes. 425; Paus. ix. 8. § 3.) During the siege of Thebes, he was presumptuous enough to say, that even the fire of Zeus should not prevent his scaling the walls of the city; but when he was ascending the ladder, Zeus struck him with a flash of lightning. (Comp. Eurip. Phoen. 1172, &c.; comp. Soph. Antig. 133; Apollod. iii. 6. § 7; Ov. Met. ix. 404.) While his body was burning, his wife Eunade leaped into the flames and destroyed herself. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7; Eurip. Suppil. 953, &c.; Philostr. On. ii. 31; Ov. Ars Am. iii. 21; Hygin. Fab. 243.) Capella is one of those heroes whom Asclepius was believed to have called back into life. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 9.) At Delphi there was a statue of Capella dedicated by the Argives. (Paus. x. 10. § 2.) [L. S.]

CAPELIANUS. [COLDIANUS.]

CAPELLA, a Roman elegiac poet named by Ovid, concerning whom we know nothing. (Ovid, Ep. ex Pont. iv. 16. 36.) [W. R.]

CAPELLA, ANTIUSTIUS, the preceptor of the emperor Commodus. (Lamprid. e. l.) [W. R.]

CAPELLA, MARTIJA'NUS MINEUS FE- LIX, is generally believed to have flourished towards the close of the fifth century of our era, although different critics have fixed upon different epochs, and some, in opposition to all internal evidence, would place him as high as the reigns of Maximinus and the Gordians. In MSS. he is frequently styled Afer Carthagiensis; and since, when speaking of himself, he employs the expression "Beatus alumnus urae Elisa quae vis, " it seems certain that the city of Did is the place of his education, if not of his birth also. The assertions, that he rose to the dignity of praenest, and composed his book at Rome when far advanced in life, rest entirely upon a few ambiguous and probably corrupt words, which admit of a very different interpretation. (Lib. ix. § 999.) Indeed, we know nothing whatever of his personal history, but an ancient biography is said to exist in that portion of Barth's Adversaria which has never yet been published. (Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. c. 17.)

The great work of Capella is composed in a medley of prose and various kinds of verse, after the fashion of the Satyr Menippeus of Varro and the Saty- ricon of Petronius Arbiter; whereas, if he were of /the same age and country, it probably suggested the form into which Doctibus has thrown his Consolatio Philosophica. It is a voluminous compilation, forming a sort of encyclopaedia of the polite learning of the middle ages, and is divided into nine books. The first two, which may be regarded as a mystical introduction to the rest, consist of an elaborate and complicated allegory, entitled the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury, while in the remaining seven are expanded the principles of the seven liberal arts, which once were believed to embrace the whole circle of philosophy and science. Thus, the third book treats of Grammar; the fourth of Dialectics, divided into Metaphysics and Logic; the fifth of Physics, consisting chiefly of an abstract of Geography, to which are appended a few simple propositions on lines, surfaces, and solids; the seventh of Arithmetic, devoted in a great measure to the properties of numbers; the eighth of Astronomy; and the last of Music, including Poetry. We find here an immense mass of learning, but the materials are ill-selected, ill-arranged, and ill-digested; though from amidst much that is dull.
CAPELLA.

and frivolous, we can occasionally extract curious and valuable information, derived without doubt from treatises which have long since perished. Thus, for example, in one remarkable passage (viii. § 857) we detect a hint of the true constitution of the solar system. It is here so distinctly maintained that the planets Mercury and Venus revolve round the sun, and not round the earth, and their position with regard to these bodies and to each other is so correctly described, that the historians of science have considered it not improbable that Copernicus, who quotes Martianus, may have derived the first germ of his theory from this source. The style is in the worst possible taste, and looks like a caricature of Apulius and Tertullian. It is overloaded with feeble metaphors, and has all the sustained grandiloquence, the pompous pretension, and the striving after false sublimity, so characteristic of the African school, while the diction abounds in strange words, and is in the highest degree harsh, obscure, and barbarous. Some allowance must be made, however, for the circumstances under which the book has been transmitted to us. It was highly esteemed during the middle ages, and extensively employed as a manual for the purposes of education. Hence it was copied and re-copied by the monks, and being of course in many places quite unintelligible to them, corruptions crept in, and the text soon became involved in inextricable confusion. The oldest MSS. are those in the Bodleian library, in the British Museum, in the public library of the University of Cambridge, and in the library of Corpus Christi College, in the same university. A MS. exposition of Capella, written by Jo. Scotus, who died in 1175, is mentioned in L'Abbe (Bibl. Nova. MSS. p. 45); another, the work of Alexander Neckam, who belongs to the thirteenth century, is described by Leland (Commentar. de Script. Brit. p. 214); and Perizonius possessed a commentary drawn up by Remigius Antissiodorien about the year 1486. In modern times, Ugoletus had the merit of first bringing Capella to light; and the editio princeps was printed at Vicenza by Henricus de S. Urso, in fol. 1499, under the care of Franciscus Bodianus, who in a prefatory letter boasts of having corrected 2000 errors. This was followed by the editions of Mutina, 1500, fol.; of Vienna, with the notes of Dubravia, 1516, fol.; of Basle, 1532, fol.; of Lyons, 1539, 8vo.; of Basle, with the scholia, &c., of Vulemus, 1577, fol. in a vol. containing also the Origines of Isidorus. But all these were thrown into the shade by that of Leyden, 8vo. 1599, with the remarks of Hugo Grotius, who wrote his commentary a boy of fourteen, with the assistance probably of Joseph Scaliger, by whom he was advised to undertake the task. This edition was with justice considered the best, until the appearance of that by U. F. Kopp, 4to. Francof. 1896, which is immeasurably superior, in a critical point of view, to all preceding ones, and contains also a copious collection of the best notes. The last book was included by Melchior in his "Annores Vet. Musiv." 4to. 1632; the first two were published separately by Walthard, Bern, 1763, 8vo., and by J. A. Goetz at Nuremberg, 8vo. 1794, with critical and explanatory remarks. The poetical passages are inserted in the Collectio Pia- saurensis, vol. vi. p. 69.

The popularity of Capella in the middle ages is attested by Gregorius Turonensis, Johannes Sarisburiensis, Nicolaus Clemangius, and others. A number of clever emendations will be found in the notes of Heinsius upon Ordi; and Munkcr, in his commentary on Hyginus, has given several important readings from a Leyden MS. There is an interesting analysis of the work by P. Jacob in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia. [W. R.]

CAPELLA, STATLLIUS, a Roman eques, who at one time kept Flavia Domitilla, afterwards the wife of Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 3.) [L. S.]

CAPER (Καπήρ), of Byz., the son of one Pythagoras, who acquired great renown from obtaining the victory in wrestling and the pancration on the same day, in the Olympic games. (O. 142, n. c. 212.) He is said to have been the first after Hercules, according to Pausanias, or the second, according to Athenaeus, who conquered in these two contests on the same day. (Paus. v. 21. § 5, vi. 15, §§ 3, 6; Euseb. Epol. 68, p. 42, ed. Scaliger; Krause, Olymp. p. 306.)

CAPER, FLAVIUS, a Roman grammarian of uncertain date, whose works "de Latinitate," &c., are quoted repeatedly with the greatest respect by Chrysias, Rufinus, Servius, and others, but especially by Priscian. We possess two very short tracts entitled "Flavii Capri grammatici vetustissimi de Orthographia libelli," and "Caper de Verbis med."

Barthius (Advers. xi. i, xxxv. 9) has conjectured, with much plausibility, that these are not the original works of Caper, but mere abridgments by a later hand. Servius (ad Virg. Aen. x. 344) cites "Caper in libris enucleati sermone," and (ad Aen. x. 877) "Caper in libris dubii generalis." St. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. ii.) speaks of his grammatical "commentarii" as a book in common use; and Agroecus, who wrote a supplement to the "Libellus de Orthographia et Proprietate as Differentia Sermoonum," refers to his annotations on Cicero as the most celebrated of his numerous productions. He is also frequently ranked among the scholiasts upon Terence, but apparently on no good grounds. (Schoepf. de Terentio, &c., Bonn, 1621.)

Caper was first published among a collection of Latin grammarians printed at Venice about 1476, and reprinted in 1480, 1491, and often afterwards. The best edition is that contained in the "Grammat. Lat. Antiqu."

CAPEPUUS SULLIVIS. [SILVIUS.]

CAPHA. [THEODOSIA.]

CAPHO. [CAPO.]

CAPITO, the father of Butillemus Basius, or Cassius Butilleinus as Dion Cassius calls him, was compelled to be present at the execution of his son by order of Caligula, and was then put to death himself. (Dion Cass. I.xi. 24.) [Basius, p. 473.]

CAPITO (Κασωρύ). 1. Of Alexandria, is called by Athenaeus (x. p. 425) an epic poet, and the author of a work Epicure, which consisted of at least two books. In another passage (viii. p. 350) he mentions a work of his entitled ρως Κασωρον το λογομαθηματος, from which he quotes a stanza in which he says, "it is impossible to say to whom there is an epigram in the Greek Anthology (v. 67, ed. Tauchn.) may be the same person as the epic poet.

2. A native of Lydia, is called by Suidas (s. v. Κασωρός) and Boudica (p. 267) an historian, and the author of a work on Isauria (Ισαιας), which consisted, according to Suidas, of eight books, and is frequently referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium.
CAPITO. 599

trium. The latter writer (z. v. Ψυξίδα), quotes the fifteenth book of it; but the reading, in that passage, seems to be incorrect, and one MS. has 4 instead of τερεσκεδαιμών. This Capito also made a Greek translation of the sketch of Roman history which Eutropius had drawn up from Livy. The translation, which is mentioned by Suidas (z. c.) and Lydia (De Migrat. Procmn.), is lost, and his work or works on Lyceia and Pamphyllia have likewise perished. (Comp. Tschuck’s preface to his edition of Eutropius, p. lxv. &c.) [L. S.]

CAPITO (Καπίτους), a physician, who probably lived in the first or second century after Christ, and who appears to have given particular attention to diseases of the eyes. His prescriptions are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. soc. Loc. iv. 7. vol. xii. p. 731) and Aetius (Z. 3. 77, p. 392). He may perhaps be the same person as Arzomidos Capito (Ἀρζόμιδος); but this is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.]

CAPITO, C. ATEIUS, was tribune of the people in b. c. 55, and with his colleague, Aquilius Gallus, opposed Pompey and Crassus, who were consuls that year. Capito in particular opposed a bill, which the tribune Trebonius brought forward, concerning the distribution of the provinces, but in vain. Capito and Gallus afterwards endeavoured to stop the levy of the troops and to render the camps, which the consuls wished to undertake, impossible; and when Crassus, nevertheless, continued to make preparations for an expedition against the Parthians, Capito announced awful prodigies which were disregarded by Crassus. Aquilius, the previous, afterwards punished Capito with a note censoria, as he was charged with having fabricated the prodigies by which he had attempted to deter Crassus from his undertaking. Dion Cassius (xxxix. 34) says, that Capito, as tribune, also counteracted the measures adopted by the consuls in favour of Caesar; but some time afterwards Cicero (ad Famili. xiii. 29), who speaks of him as his friend, says that he favoured the party of Caesar, though it may be inferred from the whole tone of the letter of Cicero just referred to, that Capito had made no public declaration in favour of Caesar, as Cicero is at so much pains to induce Plancus to interfere with the matter. (Comp. Ael. His xiv. 5.) Cassius and Appian (Z. 3. 77) are the only ancient authors who speak of our Capito, whom Tacitus (Ann. iii. 45) calls a praetorian, is the same as the one whom Appian (B. C. v. 33, 50) mentions as a legate of Antony. (Comp. Dion Cass. xxxi. 42; xxxix. 33–39; Appian, B. C. i. 18; Plut. Cruus. 19; Cic. de Divinat. i. 16.) [L. S.]

CAPITO, C. AETIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, was the son of the preceding. He became a disciple of the jurist Oilius, who is said by Pomponius to have been more learned than Trebatius. Labeo, too, his elder contemporary and subsequent rival, had studied under Oilius, but had received his elementary education from Trebatius, and had listened to all the other eminent jurists of the day. Labeo and Capito became the highest legal authorities at Rome, and were reckoned the ornaments of their profession. Differing in opinion on many important points, they were the founders of two legal schools, analogous to the sects of philosophers. They were men of very opposite dispositions and political principles—Labeo, a sturdy and hereditary republican; Capito, a time-serving adherent to the new order of things. The compliance of Capito found favour with Augustus, who accelerated his promotion to the consulship, in order, says Tacitus (Ann. iii. 78), that he might obtain precedence over Labeo. It may be that Capito was made consul before the proper age, that is, before his 43rd year. He was consul successively with C. Vibius Postumus in a. d. 5. Several writers erroneously confound the jurist with C. Fonteius Capito, who was consul with Germanicus in a. d. 12.

Pomponius says (as we interpret his words), that Labeo refused the offer of Augustus to make him the colleague of Capito. "Ex his Aetius consul fuit: Labeo noluit, quem offeretur ci ab Augusto consulatus, et honorem susceperat." (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 47.) We cannot agree with the commentators who attempt to reconcile the statement of Pomponius with the inference that would naturally be drawn from the antithesis of Tacitus: "Hic [Labeoni], quod praetorium intra stetit, commentatio ex injuria, hic [Capitoni] quod consulatum adeptus est, odium ex invienda oratione." In a. d. 13, Capito was appointed to succeed Messala in the important office of "curator aquarum publicarum," and this office he held to the time of his death. (Frontinus, de Aquaed. 102, ed Dacier.)

Capito continued in favour under Tiberius. In a. d. 15, after a formidable and mischievous insurrection of the Tiber, he and Arruntius were intrusted with the task of keeping the river within its banks. They submitted to the senate whether it would not be expedient to divert the course of the tributary streams and lakes. Deputies from the coloniae and municipal towns, whose interests would have been affected by the change, were heard against the plan. Piso led the opposition, and the measure was rejected. (Tac. Ann. i. 76, 79.)

The grammarians, Aetius Philologus, who was a freedman, was probably (if we may conjecture from his name and from some other circumstances) the freedman of Capito. (Arzuus, p. 892, b.)

The few recorded incidents of Capito’s life tend to justify the imputation of servility which has been attached to his name; while Labeo, as if for the sake of contrast, appears to have fallen into the opposite extreme of superfluous insularity. Tiberius even edict relating to new citizens’ gifts (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Stevum) had employed a word, which recurred to his memory at night, and struck him as of doubtful Latinity. In the morning he summoned a meeting of the most celebrated verbal critics and grammarians in Rome, among whom Capito was included, to decide upon the credit of the word. It was condemned by M. Pomponius Marcellus, a rigid purist, but Capito pronounced that “it was good Latin, or if not, that it would become so.” “Capito does not speak the truth,” rejoined the inflexible Marcellus, “You have the power, Cnean, to confer a citizenship on men but not on words.” (Suet. de Jv. Gracch. 23; Dion. Cass. liv. 17.) We agree with Van Eck in holding that in Capito’s conduct on this occasion there is nothing that deserves blame. There was a faint condemnation lurking in his prophesy as to the future, and, peradventure he spoke the truth, for the authority of an emperor so fastidious in his diction as Tiberius, might fairly be expected to confer on a word, if not full citizenship, at least a limited jus Latini.

In the story of the (unknown) word, we dis-corn the spirit of a courier, without anything to call for serious blame, but Tacitus relates an incident which exhibits Capito in the shameless character of a hypocrite playing the game of a hypocrite—of a lawyer perverting his high authority, and using the pretence of adherence to constitutional freedom in order to encourage cruel tyranny.

L. Ennius, a Roman knight, was accused by some informer of treason, for having melted down a small silver statue of the emperor, and converted it into common plate. Tiberius employed his right of intercession to stop the accusation. Capito complained of such an interference with the jurisdiction of the senate, and deprecated the impunity of such an atrocious delinquency. "Let the emperor," said he, "be as slow as he likes in avenging his merely private griefs, but let his generosity have some limits—let it stop short of giving away the wrongs of the state." The men understood each other. The mock magnanimity of the emperor was proof against the mock remonstrance of the lawyer. (Tac. Ann. iii. 70.)

Shortly after this disgraceful scene Capito died, A.D. 22.

It is remarkable that, notwithstanding the great legal reputation of Capito, not a single pure extract from any of his works occurs in the Digest, though there are a few quotations from him at second hand. His works may have perished before the time of Justinian, though some of them must have existed in the fifth century, as they are cited by Macrobius. It may be that he treated but little of private law, and that his public law soon became superannuated.

Capito is quoted in the Digest by his contemporary Laboe: Dig. 23, tit. 3, s. 79, § 1; 32, s. 30, § 6; by Proculus, B, tit. 2, s. 13, § 1; by Iuvovculus, 34, tit. 2, s. 39, § 32; by Upian, 23, tit. 2, s. 29 (where mention is made of Capito's consulsip), by Paulus, 39, tit. 3, s. 2, § 4; 39, tit. 3, s. 14; though in this last-mentioned passage, the Florentine manuscript has Anteus, but there is no where else the slightest record of a jurist named Anteus. In Dig. 21, tit. 2, s. 79, § 1, and 24, tit. 2, s. 39, § 2, Capito himself quoting Servius Sulpicius, who thus appears at third hand. There are judicial fragments of Capito preserved in other authors (Gellius, Festus, Nonius, Macrobius). A collection of such fragments is given by Dicksen in his Bruchstücke aus der Schriften der Römisclien Juristen, pp. 83-92.

Capito was learned in every department of law, public, private, and sacred. He wrote 1. Conjectanea, which must have been exceedingly voluminous, as the 259th book is cited by Gellius. (xiv. 8.) Each book seems to have had a separate title. At least, the 9th book is said by Gellius (iv. 14) to have been inscribed de judicis publicis, and it is undoubtedly the same book which is cited (s. 6), as if it were a separate treatise, by the name Commentarius de Judicibus Publicis. Possibly the Conjectaneum libri were composed of all the separate works of Capito, collected and arranged under proper heads and subdivisions. The books of the ancient jurists, so far as we can judge by remaining specimens, were not long. Laboe left 400 behind him. 2. A treatise De Pontificio Jure, of which the 8th book is quoted by Gellius (iv. 6), and the 6th by Festus (e. v. Mendas). It is probably the same treatise, or a part of the same treatise, which is cited by Macrobius (Saturn. iii. 10) under the name De Jure Sacrificiorum. 3. A treatise, De Officio Senatorio. (Gell. iv. 10.)

Frontinus (De Aequaercent. 97) cites Capito on the law of the public waters of Rome, and it is very likely that he wrote specially on a subject with which his official duties connected him.

We have already seen Capito in the character of a verbal critic. The meaning and proper usage of words constitute a branch of study of considerable importance to a jurist, who has to interpret wills and other private dispositions of property, and to construe laws. There is a title De Significantia Verborum in the Digest. The subject engaged the attention of Laboe, and we are strongly disposed to believe that it did of Capito. In Pliny (H. N. xiv. 15), Capito is cited as agreeing with the jurist Scaevola, and with Locullus (Aelitus?) in holding (as Plautus, Pseud. ii. 4. 51, seems to have held), that the word "vnrreleva" comprehended sweets (utulca), as well as wines. In another passage of Pliny (H. N. xviii. 28), we find Capito tracing the variations in meaning of the words coqueus and pistor. In Servius (ad Verg. Aen. v. 45), Varro and Atius are cited as holding a peculiar opinion on the distinction between Deus and Dens. We take Atius here to be the jurist Capito, for Atius is the name by which he is generally denoted in the Digest; but it is not impossible that the freedom which AtiusPhilologus may be meant.

Aymarus Rivalibus, one of the earliest writers on the history of Roman law (v. 2) says, that Capito wrote commentaries on the 12 Tables, but no authority is produced for this assertion, which, however, is followed by Val. Forster (in i. Zetile, Tractatus Tractatum p. 48), and Rutillus. (De Jurispr. c. 46.)

Gellius (xiii. 12) cites a certain epistle of Capito, the authenticity of which has been called in question. It speaks in the past tense of Laboe, who died in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. It commends the great legal learning of Laboe, while it charges him with a love of liberty excessive, that he set no interdiction on "nisi quod regi juxta et sic eum esse Romam antiquitatis legisecet." It then relates an instance of Laboe's refusing to obey the summons of a tribune, while he admitted the right of a tribune to arrest. Gellius thereupon takes occasion to shew, very clearly and satisfactorily, from Varro, why it was that tribunes, having power to arrest, had not the apparently minor and consequential power of summons. That Capito should charge Laboe with adherence to the strict letter of constitutional law seems to be at variance with the character of the two jurists as drawn by Pompousius: "Capito kept to that which he received from his instructors; Laboe, who possessed an intellect of a different order, and had diligently cultivated other departments of human knowledge besides law, introduced many innovations." (Dig. 1, tit. 2, s. 2, § 47.)

For the purpose of reconciling these apparently conflicting testimonies, it has been supposed that Capito was a follower of the Old in private law, and Laboe in public law; while, on the contrary, in public law, Capito was an advocate of the New; in private law, Laboe.

Capito and Laboe became the founders of two celebrated schools of Roman law, to which most of the distinguished jurists belonged. Their respective followers, mentioned by Pompousius, are—
CAPITO.

Of Antistius Laboe. M. Coccus Nerva pater.

Sempronius Proculus. Nerva filius.
Pegasus. P. Juventius Celus pater.

Celus filius. Neratius Priscus.

To the list of Capito's followers may be added with certainty, Gaius; with the highest probability, Pomponius; and, with more or less plausible conjectures, a few others, as T. Annius. The schools, of which Capito and Laboe were the founders, took their respective names from distinguished disciples of those jurists. The followers of Capito were called from Maturius Sabinius, Sabinius; and afterwards, from Cassius Longinus, Cassinius. The followers of Laboe took from Proculus (not Proculius), the ill-formed name Proculiuei (so spelt, not Proculiuei, in all old manuscripts wherever it occurs). From a misunderstanding of the phrase Pegasusium jus, (meaning, the legal writings of Pegasius,) in the scholiast on Juvenal (iv. 77), some have supposed that the followers of Laboe were also called from Pegasius. (Dict. of Ant. s.v. Fariceusullie.) The controversy as to the characteristic differences between these schools has been endless, and most writers on the subject have endeavoured to refer those differences to some general principle. When continental jurists were disputing about the relative importance of equity, as compared with strict law, the Roman schools were supposed to be based upon a disagreement between the admirers of equity and the admirers of strictness. Those who thought Laboe the better man were anxious to enlist him upon their side of the question. According to Masconius and Hommel, Laboe was the advocate of sound and strict interpretation; according to Bach and Tyldemann, Capito was an opponent of that enlightened equity which seeks to penetrate beyond the literal husky rind. When modern jurists were divided into the philosophical (dyslogistically, unhistorical), and the historical (dyslogistically, unphilosophical), schools, Capito and Laboe were made to belong to one or other of these parties. Dirksen (Beiträge zur Kenntniss des Königlichen Rechts, pp. 1-159) and Zimmer (R. R. G. 1. § 66) think, that the schools differ chiefly in their mode of handling legal questions; that the votaries of Sabinius look for something external to hang their reasoning upon, whether it be ancient practice, or the text of a law, or the words of a private disposition, or analogy to a positive rule, and only at last, in default of all these, resort to the general principles of right and the natural feelings of equity; whereas the votaries of Proculius on the other hand, looking, in the first instance, more freely to the inner essence of rules and institutions, and anxious to construct law on the unchanged basis of morality, sometimes by an apparent deviation from the letter, arrive at results more correspondent with the nature of the subject. Puchta (Lust. 1. § 88) refers the original divergence to the personal characters of the founders, the acquiescence of Capito in received doctrines, the liberal and comprehensive intellect of Laboe, urging philosophical progress and scientific development.

CAPITO.

general principles, or whether they consisted in discordant opinions upon isolated particular points, it is clear that the political opposition between Capito and Laboe had not long any important influence on their respective schools, for Coccus Nerva, the immediate successor of Laboe, did not adopt the political opinions of his master, which, as the empire became consolidated, must have soon grown out of fashion, the more especially, since jurists now began to receive their authorization from the prince. Proculus was a still stronger imperialist than Nerva. Even in private law, the subsequent leaders on either side modified, perhaps, the general line of the ancient law; but still some of the most important, and original, juristic writers produced new matters of discussion. The distinction of the schools is strongly manifested in Gaius, who wrote under Antoninus Pius, but soon after that time it seems to have worn out from the influence of independent eclecticism. Even in earlier times, a jurist was not necessarily a bigoted supporter of every dogma of his school. Thus, we find a case in Gaius (iii. 140) where Cassins approves the opinion of Laboe, while Proculus follows that of Oflitus, the master of Capito. Not every question, on which the opinions of Roman jurists were divided, was a school question. When Justinian found it necessary to settle fifty disputed questions in the interval between the first and second editions of his Constitutionum Codex, he was obliged to look back to ancient controversies, and sometimes to annual by express sanction that which was already antiquated in practice. The consideration of this fact alone shews that, from his L. Decisiones, it would be wrong to infer, as some have done, that the old separation of the schools existed in his time; but further, there is no proof that any of the questions he settled were ever partly questions of the schools.

Though the distinctions of the schools gradually wore out, as eminent and original men arose, who thought for themselves, there is no proof that there was ever a distinct middle school. A school of Miscellaneous has been imagined in consequence of a passage of Festus which, however, has nothing to do with the profession of the law: "Miscellanea appellantur, qui non coram sunt sententiae, et variorum mixtumque judiciorum." Cujs, from a false reading of Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iii. 68), imagined the existence of an eclectic sect of Hercestundi. Servius, speaking of the opinions of the ancients concerning the soul, says that some believed that consciousness ceased with death; others, that the soul was immortal; while the Stoics, pursuing a middle course, held that it was buried in the earth, and lived as long as the body endured. "Stoici vero, terris comminato, e. a. medium secum, tan diu durare ducent, quamduo durat corpus." Cujs, for Servius Cujs, deciphered, as he thought, in his nearly illegible copy, "hercestundy," a technical word, which appears in the Familiae hercestundae causa. (Dig. 10. tit. 2.) The error of Cujs, in referring a name so strangely gotten to an eclectic sect of Roman jurists, gained general reception among the civilians of his day, on account of his great learning and authority.

Though Capito is little quoted—not once by his own follower, Gaius—though there are many (60) more citations bearing the name of Laboe in the Digest, and a vast number of citations of Laboe in fragments bearing the name of other jurists—the conclusions of Capito's school seem, in a majority of cases, to have prevailed in practice. This proceeded partly, perhaps, from the great authority acquired by Masarius Sabinus, and from the numerous commentators who wrote libri ad Sabinum. Among these, indeed, were some of the opposite party. According to Blumo’s celebrated hypothesis, first suggested by Jac. Godefroi, one of the great divisions in most of the titles of the Digest consisted of extracts from the writings of annotations on Sabinus. Some Sabinian influence may also have been exerted upon Roman jurisprudence through the labour of the Sabinian Salvis Ju- lianus in recasting the praetor’s edict. But there never was any general determination in favour of either school. In some points, Proculus and his party were preferred. For example, Galus (ii. 21) mentions a rescript of Hadrian, and (ii. 195) another of Antoninus Pius, against certain theoretical conclusions of the Sabinians (‘nostri preceptores’) and in favour of the ‘diversae scholae anotarum.’ The agreement of the majority of the jurists au-thorized by the emperor Jura condere, rather than the creed of this or that sect, became under the empire the text of legal orthodoxy. (Plin. H. N. xiv. 19; Rutilius, c. 48, in Francilii Fliae Triarii Usuram, contains several questions submitted to him without giving his authorities. He enters into conjectures as to the family of the jurist, and treats of several Roman names of the name of Capito. Bertrand, ii. 51; Guilt. Grat. i. 12; Ant. [C. J. T. G.]

CATPIO, CLAUDIUS, a Roman orator, a contemporary of the younger Pliny. (Ep. vi. 13.)

CATPIO, CUSUTTIA’NUS, a Roman advocate in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, who appears to have used his profession as a mere means for enriching himself. For this reason he and some of his profession opposed a law by which advocates were to be forbidden to accept any fees from their clients. In a. d. 66 he obtained Cicilia as his province, and there he acted with the same avarice and impudence as he had done before at Rome. In the year following, the Cilians accused him of extortion, and he was condemned, in consequence of which he lost his senatorial rank. But this he afterwards received back, through the mediation of Tigellinus, his father-in-law; and shortly after, a. d. 68, he accused the praetor Antistius Scaevolus of high treason. In a. d. 66, Annæus Mela, the brother of the philosopher Seneca, and father of the poet Annæus Lucan, left a large legacy to Tigellinus and Cossutianus Capito, the latter of whom came forward in the same year as the accuser of Thrasea Paetus, for Thrasea had formerly supported the cause of the Cilians against him, and had been instrumental in bringing about his condemnation. Capito was rewarded by Nero for this base act with an immense sum of money. (Tac. Ann. xii. 6, &c., xiii. 33, xiv. 48, xvi. 17, 21, 22, 26, 28, 33; Juv. Sat. viii. 93, 93.)

CATPIO, FONTEIUS. 1. T. FONTEIUS CATPIO, was praetor in a. d. 176, and obtained the command in Hispania Ulterior, which was left to him also for the year following, with the title of proconsul. (Liv. xl. 59, xli. 2, 19.)

2. P. FONTEIUS CATPIO, was praetor in a. d. 169, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xiii. 13, 17.)

3. C. FONTEIUS CATPIO, a friend of M. Antony, accompanied Maecenas, in a. d. 37, when he was sent by Octavius to Antony to restore friendship between Octavians and Antony. Capito remained with Antony, and was soon after sent by him to Egypt, to fetch Cleopatra to Syria. He is probably the same person as the C. Fonteius Capito who was appointed consul suffectus, in a. d. 33, together with M. Acilius. There is a coin of his extant with the heads of Antony and Cleopatra, and on which Capito is called proprietor, and bears the praenomen Galus. (Horat. Sat. i. 5. 32; Plut. Anton. 36; Eckel, Doctr. Num. v. p. 219.)

4. C. FONTEIUS CATPIO, a son of C. Fonteius Capito, the friend of M. Antony. [No. 3.] He was consul in a. d. 12, together with Germanicus, and afterwards had, as proconsul, the administration of the province of Asia. Many years later, in a. d. 55, he was accused by Vibius Serenus, apparently on account of his conduct in Asia; but, as no sufficient evidence was adduced, he was acquitted. (Fasti Cap.; Suet. Cal. 8; Tac. Ann. iv. 36.)

5. C. FONTEIUS CATPIO, consul in a. d. 59 together with C. Vipsanius. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 1; Plin. H. N. ii. 72, vii. 20; Solin. 6.)

6. L. FONTEIUS CATPIO, consul in a. d. 67 together with C. Julius Rufus, as we learn from the Fasti Siliici and the Chronicon of Cassiodorus; but whether he is the same as the Fonteius Capito who was put to death in Germany in the reign of Galba, a. d. 68, on the ground of having attempted to excite an insurrection, is uncertain. (Tac. Hist. i. 7, 37, 92, iii. 62, iv. 13; Suet. Gall. 11; Plut. Gall. 15, where Φωτίρης should be changed into Φωτόρης.)

It is uncertain to which of the Capitos the two following coins belong: the phenomenon Publius would lead us to refer them to No. 2. The former contains on the obverse a head of Mars with a trophy behind it and the inscription P. FONTIVS P. F. CATPIO IIII. VIR., and on the reverse a man riding on horseback at full gallop, with two men below fighting, and the inscription MAN. FONT. TR. MTR.

[LS]

The latter coin contains on the obverse the head of Concordia with the inscription P. FONTIVS CATPIO IIII. VIR. CONCORDOL. On the reverse a double portico with the inscription T. DRTN. IMP. VIT. PVBL.
CAPITOLINUS.

CAPITOLINUS, a centurion in the Roman army which carried on the war under Domi-nicus Cordulo against the Parthian Vologeses, A.D. 54. The king, after being defeated, sent hostages who were delivered up to Capito. He is probably the same whom we meet with three years later, in those same regions as profectus castrorum, to whom Cordulo entrusted some of the smaller fortresses in Armenia. (Tac. Ann. xii. 9, 39.) [L. S.]

CAPITO, LUCIUS, procurator of Asia in A.D. 23, was accused by the provincials of malversion, and was tried by the senate. (Tac. Ann. iv. 15; Dion Cass. iv. 23.) [L. S.]

CAPITO, C. MAURIUS, occurs on several coins of the Maria gens, a specimen of which is given below, but this Marius Capito is not mentioned by any ancient writer. The obverse re-

CAPITO, VIRGinius. During the war between the supporters of Vitellius and Vespasian, A.D. 69, Virginius Capito sent a slave to L. Vitelllius, the emperor's brother, promising to surrender to him the citadel of Terracina, if he would receive the garrison. The slave was afterwards hanged for having assisted in carrying out a treacherous design. (Tac. Hist. iii. 77, iv. 3.) [L. S.]

CAPITOLINUS, a family-name in several Roman gentes, which was no doubt originally given to a person who lived on the hill Capitolinus. In the same way Aventinensis, Caedimontanus, Esquilinus, frequently occur as the names of families at Rome. [L. S.]

CAPITOLINUS, JULIUS. We possess a volume containing the biographies of various Roman emperors and pretenders to the purple, compiled by writers who flourished towards the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century, dedicating their works for the most part to Diocletian or Constantine. The number of pieces is in all thirty-four. They reach from Hadrian to the death of Carinus, that is, from A.D. 117 to A.D. 284, extending over a space of 167 years, and forming a sort of supplement to the Caesars of Suetonius, which terminate with Domitian. No immediate connection, however, is established with the last-named work, since Nerva and Trajan are passed over; nor is the series absolutely complete, even within its own proper limits, for there is a gap of nine years, from the third Gordian to Valerinus, that is, from A.D. 244 to A.D. 253, including the reigns of Philippus, Decius, Gallus, and Aemilius. It is by no means unlikely, indeed, that these, as well as Nerva and Trajan, may or-inally have formed a part of the whole, and that the existing blanks are owing to the pining up of the MS. which formed the archetype; but this is merely a probable conjecture. The authors of the collection are commonly classed together under the title "Historiae Augustae Scriptores sex," their names being Aelius Spathianus, Julius Capitolinus, Vulciatus Gallicinus, Aelius Lampidius, Trebellius pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus. In consequence of the confusion which prevails in the MSS. it is impossible to assign each section with absolute certainty to its real owner, and no trustworthy con-munication can be derived from comparing the style of the different portions, for the lives do not exhibit the well-digested result of careful and extensive research, but are in many instances evidently made up of scraps derived from different sources and possessing different degrees of merit, loosely tacked together, and often jumbled into a rough mass destitute of form and symmetry. Hence we find numerous repetitions of frivolous details, a strange mixture of what is grave and valuable with the most puerile and worthless rubbish, and a multitude of irreconcilable and contradictory statements freely admitted without remark or explanation. We have history here presented to us in its lowest and crudest shape—a total want of judgment in the selection and classification of facts; an absence of all unity of purpose, no attempt being made to establish a relation between the circumstances recorded and the character of the individual under discussion; and a total disregard of philosophical combination and inference. The narratives have all the bare-ess and disjointed incoherence of a meagre chroniicle without possessing simplicity and methodical arrangement. These strictures may perhaps be slightly modified in favour of Vopiscus, who appears to have had access to valuable public records, and to have taken some pains to extract what was most interesting, although he often exhibits as little discretion as the rest in working up his raw materials. But, notwithstanding all these defects, this compilation is of some small importance, by dis-binding us to form a just conception of an important period of Roman history. We have no reason to question the general accuracy of the great events recorded, although blended with idle rumours and false details; nor the general fidelity of the portraits of the leading men, although the likeness may be in some instances flattened and in others caricatured, according to the predilections of the artist. The antiquarian, above all, will here discover a mass of curious statements with regard to the formal administration of public affairs and the history of jurisprudence, together with a multitude of particulars illustrating the state of literature and the arts, the social usages and modes of thought and feeling which prevailed among the different classes of the community during this stormy period.

Nay, the very frivolous minuteness with which these writers descant upon matters connected with the private life and habits of the personages who pass under review, although unworthy of the dignity of history, opens up to us a very singular region for observation and inquiry, the more interesting because usually inaccessible. In these departments we may receive the information conveyed without suspicion, for upon such topics there could be no conceivable motive for falsehood or misrepresentation; and the worst we have to fear is, that the love of the marvellous may occasionally have given rise to exaggeration in describing the fantastic conduct and manners so characteristic of that epoch.

Nine biographies bear the name of Capitolini:

these Antoninus Plus and L. Verus are inscribed to Dioecletian, who is also addressed in M. Aurelius (c. 19); Pertinax and Maximus with Balbi-us bear no inscription; the rest are inscribed to Constantine. Salmasius, following the authority of the Palatine MSS., assigns the first to Spartanus, and acknowledges the sixth, seventh, and 8th only, as the genuine productions of Capitolinus; but these are points on which it is foolish, in the absence of all satisfactory evidence, internal or external, to hazard even an opinion.

The edito princes of the Historiae Augustae Scriptores was printed at Milan in 1475 by Philip de Lagny, in a folio volume divided into three parts, of which the first contains Suetonius;
the second a piece entitled de Sermo Norvae, followed by the Augustan Historians; the third Eutropius and Paula Diaconus. It is excessively rare, and bears a high price. It was reprinted at Venice by Bernardinus, fol. 1489, and by Rubens, fol. 1490.

These lives are also to be found in various miscelnaries containing the history of the Caesars which appeared during the 16th century; but they were first brought out in an independent form at Paris, 4to. 1603, under the inspection of Isaac Casaubon; this was followed by the edition of Salmasius, fol. Paris. 1620, which exhibits a text greatly improved by a careful examination of MSS.
and copious notes containing a prodigious but ildigest mass of erudition. The most useful ed-tion is that by Schrevelius (Laud. Bal. 1671); but much remains to be done, for palpable corruptions appear in every page. (Dodd, Prosecc. Academ. 8vo.

397. In b. c. 390 he was one of the ambassadors whom the senate sent to Delphi, to dedicate there the golden crator which Camillus had vowed. In the straits of Sicily the ambassadors fell in with pirates of Lipara and were made prisoners, but they were restored to freedom and treated with distinction at Lipara, when it became known who they were. (Liv. iv. 61, v. 8, 16, 28.)

the famous deliverer of the Capitol from the Gauls, was consul in b. c. 392 with L. Valerius Potitius.
An insignificant war was carried on in that year against the Aeculans, for which Marcus was honoured with an ovation, and his colleague with a triumph. Rome was visited at the time by a pestilence, and as the two consuls were seized with it, they were obliged to abdicate, and an interregne followed. In b. c. 390, when the Gauls one night endeavoured to ascend the Capitol, Manlius, whose residence was on the Capitol, was roused from his sleep by the cackling of the geese, and on discovering the cause of it, he and as many men as he could collect at the moment hastened to the spot where the Gauls were ascending, and succeeded in repel-lung them. This gallant and successful deed was rewarded the next day by the assembled people with all the simple and rude honours and distinctions which were customary at the time. He is said to have received the surname of Capitolinus from this circumstance; but this is probably a mistake, as it had become a regular family-name in his gens before his time, and he would thus have inherited it from his father. In b. c. 387 he was appointed interrex, but two years later, b. c. 385, he abandoned the cause of the patricians, to whom he belonged, and placed himself at the head of the plebeians, who were suffering severely from their debts and the harsh and cruel treatment they experienced from their patrician creditors. The motive, however, from which Manlius came forward to support them was not pure; it appears that after his delivery of the Capitol he was so intoxicated with his exploit, that he could not bear seizing any man placed on an equality with or united above himself, and it is even believed that he harboured the scheme of making himself tyrant or king of Rome. With such or similar intentions he excited the plebeians against their oppressors, who became so alarmed that they resolved upon the appointment of a dictator, A. Cornelius Cossus.

While the dictator was absent from Rome, Manlius had recourse to violence to rescue the plebeians from the hands of their creditors, and conducted himself so frightfully that he was considered a complete demagogue. When the dictator returned to the city in order to put a stop to the proceedings of Manlius, he summoned Manlius to appear before him. The rebel was accompanied by a host of plebeians; but the dictator had him arrested by one of his victors and consigned to prison as a seditionus citizen.

The plebeians, though they did not venture anything against the orders of the dictator, displayed their grief by putting on mourning for their champion, and gathering around his prison. The attempts of the senate to allay the indignation of the plebeians by assignments of land, only irritated them the more, as they regarded these favours as bribes to betray their patron, and the inscription rose to such a height, that the senate and patricians saw themselves obliged to liberate Manlius. By this step, however, nothing was gained; the plebeians now had a leader, and the insurrection instead of decreasing spread further and further. In the year following, b. c. 384, the Romans had not to fight against any foreign enemy, and as Manlius did not scruple to instigate the plebs to open violence, the consular tribunes of the year received orders, videtur ne quid venire posset detrimenti suae.
Manlius was charged with high-treason, and brought before the people assembled in the campus Martius, but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Postolnian grove outside the city. On the following day the defendant was condemned, notwithstanding his former military glory and his appeals to the gratitude of the people, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian rock. The members of the Manlia gens considered that he had brought disgrace upon them, and accordingly resolved that none of them should ever have in future the praenomen of Marcus. (Liv. v.

5. A. MANLIUS A. F. A. N. CAPITOLINUS, four times consul tribune, in B. C. 359, 385, 383, and 370. In his first tribuniship Rome was attacked by several enemies at once, and A. Manlius obtained the command of one of the three armies then raised for guarding the city. In the second tribuniship he persuaded the senate to appoint a dictator to carry on the war against the Volscian, Latin, and Hernican. (Liv. vi. 1, 11, 21, 36.)

6. C. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in B. C. 355. (Liv. vi. 50.)

7. P. MANLIUS A. F. A. N. CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in B. C. 376. He was created dictator in B. C. 368, as the successor of M. Furius Camillius, for the purpose of restoring peace between the two orders, and during his government the Licinian laws were carried. In the year following he was elected consul tribune a second time. (Liv. vi. 30, 38, &c.; Plut. Camill. 39, 42.)

8. L. MANLIUS A. F. A. N. CAPITOLINUS IMPERIUS, was dictator in B. C. 363, elusi fingendi causa. (Liv. vii. 3.)

9. CN. MANLIUS L. F. A. N. IMPERIUS, was consul in B. C. 359 with M. Popilius Laenas, and carried on a war with the Tiburines. Two years later, B. C. 357, he was again called to the consulship, during which he had to carry on a war against the Faliscans and Tarquinienses. In B. C. 351 he was censor with C. Marcus Rutulius, and during the war with the Auruncienses in 345, he was magister equitum to the dictator L. Furius Camillius. (Liv. vii. 12, 16, 22, 28.)

[PRINTED ON THE REVISED EDITION.]

CITIPOLINUS, PETULLIUS, was according to the Scholast on Hornea (Sat. i. 4. 94) entrusted with the care of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol, and was accused of having stolen the crown of Jupiter, but was acquitted by the judges in consequence of his being a friend of Augustus. The Scholast states that Petullius received the surname of Capitoline from his being placed over the Capitol; but whether this be so, or whether it was a regular family-name of the gens, so much is certain, that the annexed coin of the gens refers to the connexion of one of the Petulli with the temple of Jupiter Capitoline, for the obverse represents the head of Jupiter, and the reverse the temple.

CITIPOLINUS, QUINCIUS. 1. T. QUINCIUS CAPITOLINUS BARBATUS, was consul in B. C. 471 with App. Claudius Sabina Regillensis. During the disputes about the Publilian law, he opposed his colleague and conciliated the plebeians, and the law was carried. He then conducted the war against the Aequians, and his great popularity with the soldiers enabled him to conquer the enemy, who did not venture to meet the Romans, but allowed them to ravage the country. The immense booty acquired in this campaign was all distributed among the soldiers. He obtained the consulship a second time in B. C. 468, during which year, without his advance was against the Volscians and Aequians, and by his presence of mind saved the Roman camp, which was attacked by the enemy during the night. After this war he was honoured with a triumph. In B. C. 326 he was made consul a third time. The war against the Aequians and Volscians was still continued, and Capitoline, who was stationed on mount Algidus and there heard of the ravaging inroads of the Aequians in the Roman territory, returned to Rome and delivered his fellow-citizens from their terror. The senate proclaimed a jutism, and the consul again marched out to protect the Roman frontier; but as he did not meet with the enemy, who had in the meantime been defeated by his colleague Q. Fabius, Capitoline returned to Rome four days after he had left it. The consulship was given him for the fourth time in B. C. 446, together with Agrippa Furius. During the quarrels which were then going on at Rome between the patricians and plebeians, the Aequians and Volscians again took up arms, began ravaging Latium, and advanced up to the very walls of the city. The people of Rome were too distracted among themselves to take the field against the enemy, but Capitoline succeeded in allaying the discontent of the plebs, and in rousing the nation to defend itself with all energy. The supreme command of the Roman army was given him with the consent of his colleague, and he routed the enemy in a fierce contest. In B. C. 345 he obtained his fifth consulship. In this year the censorship was instituted at Rome as an office distinct from the consulship. While his colleague M. Geganus Macerinus was engaged in a war against Ardeni, Capitoline gained equal laurels at home by acting as mediator between the patricians and plebeians, with both of whom he had acquired the highest esteem. The extraordinary wisdom and moderation he had shown on all occasions, obtained for him the sixth consulship in B. C. 483, together with Agrippa Memenius. Rome was at that time visited by a famine, and when he pointed out the necessity of appointing a dictator under the circumstances, the dignity was offered him, but he declined it on the ground of his advancing age recommending L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, who was accordingly raised to that dignity. In B. C. 437, he accompanied the dictator Mam. Aemilius Mamencinus as legate in his campaign against Fidenae, and a few years later he came forward as a suppliant for the son of the dictator Cincinnatus, who was tried before the comitia, and the prayer of the aged Quinctius procured his acquittal. After this time we hear no more of him. (Liv. ii. 56—60, 64, ill. 2, &c.; 65, ill. 8, 10, 18, 17, 41; Dionys. ix. 43, &c.; 57, 51, xl. 63; Zonar. vii. 19.)

2. T. QUINCIUS CAPITOLINUS BARRATUS, a son of No. 1, was consul in B. C. 421, together with Libullus Volumnius. (Liv. iv. 43.)

4. T. QUINCIUS CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in B. C. 385, and magister equitum in the same year to the dictator Q. Cornelius Cosus. (Liv. vi. 11.)

5. T. QUINCIUS CINCIENITUS CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in B. C. 368. (Cincinatus.)
6. T. Quinctius CINCINNATUS CAPTOLINUS, consul in b. c. 366. [CINCINNATUS.]

7. T. Quinctius T. P. PENNUS CAPTOLINUS CRISPINUS, was appointed dictator in b. c. 351, to conduct the war against the Gauls, as Livy thinks, who is supported by the triumphal fasti, which ascribe to him a triumph in this year over the Gauls. In the year following he was magister equitum to the dictator, Q. Servilius Ahala, who likewise fought against the Gauls. In b. c. 354 he was consul with M. Fabius Ambustus, and in that year the Tiburtines and Tarquiniienses were subdued. In b. c. 351, he was appointed consul a second time, and received the conduct of the war against the Faliscans as his province, but no battle was fought, as the Romans confined themselves to ravaging the country. (Livy vii. 9, 11, 18, 22.)

8. T. Quinctius P. PENNUS CAPTOLINUS CRISPINUS. In b. c. 214, when M. Claudius Marcellus went to Rome to sue for his third consulship, he left Capulinus in Sicily in command of the Roman fleet and camp. In b. c. 208, he was elected praetor, and obtained Capua as his province. The year after, in b. c. 208, he was elected consul together with M. Claudius Marcellus, and both consuls were commissioned to carry on the war against Hannibal in Italy. In a battle which was fought in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, Capitolinus was severely wounded and retreated. He was afterwards carried to Capua and thence to Rome, where he died at the close of the year, after having proclaimed T. Manlius Torquatus dictator. (Livy xxiv. 39, xxvii. 6, 7, 21, 27, 28, 83; Polyb. x. 32.)

CAPITOLINUS, P. SEXTIUS, surnamed VATICANUS, was consul in b. c. 432 with T. Menenius Agrippa. In this year the ambassadors who had been sent to Athens for the purpose of consulting its laws and institutions, returned to Rome, and in the year following P. Sextius was one of the decemvirs appointed to draw up a new code of laws. Festus (s. v. psecultus) mentions a lex multida, which was carried by P. Sextius and his colleague during their consulship. (Livy iii. 32, &c.; Dionys. x. 54.) [L. S.]

CAPITOLINUS, SP. TARPEIUS MONTANUS, consul in b. c. 454 with A. Atarinius Varus. A lex de muliebam sacramentum which was carried in his consulship, is mentioned by Festus (s. v. psecultus, comp. Cic. de Re Publ. iii. 85; Liv. iii. 31; Dionys. x. 45, 50). After the close of their office both consuls were accused by a tribune of the people for having sold the booty which they had made in the war against the Aquitains, and giving presents to the aediles instead of distributing it among the soldiers. Both were condemned notwithstanding the violent opposition of the senate. In b. c. 449, when the Roman army advanced towards Rome to revenge the murder of Virginia, and had taken possession of the Aventine, Sp. Tarpeius was one of the two ambassadors whom the senate sent to the revolted army to re-establish with them. In the year following, he and A. Atarinius, though both were patricians, were elected tribunes of the plebs by the cooperation of the college to support the senate in its opposition to the rotation of the tribune L. Trebonius. (Livy iii. 50, 55.) [L. S.]

CAPRAEA, a surname of Q. Cassius Metellus, consul in b. c. 113. [METELLUS.]

CAPRATINA, a surname of Juno at Rome, of which the origin is related as follows:—When the Roman state was in a very weak condition, after the ravages of the Gauls, the neighbouring people under Postumius Livius advanced from Fidenae before the gates of Rome, and demanded Roman women in marriage, threatening to destroy Rome completely unless their demand was complied with. While the Roman senate was yet deliberating as to what was to be done, a slave of the name of Tutela or Philets, offered to go with her fellow-slaves, in the disguise of free women, to the camp of the enemy. The stratagem succeeded, and when the Latins in their camp, intoxicated with wine, had fallen asleep, the slaves gave a signal to the Romans from a wild fig-tree (caprifolium). The Romans now broke forth from the city, and defeated the enemy. The senate rewarded the generosity of the female slaves by restoring them to freedom, and giving to each a dowry from the public treasury. The day on which Rome had thus been delivered, the 7th of July, was called nonae Caprotinae, and an annual festival was celebrated to Juno Caprotina in all Latium, by free women and by female slaves, with much mirth and merriment. The slave seemed to take place under the ancient caprifolium, and the milky juice flowing from the tree was offered as a sacrifice to the goddess. (Macrob. Sat. i. 11; Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 18; Plut. Rom. 29, Omn. 33.) [L. S.]

CAPREOLUS, succeeded Aurelius in the episcopal see of Carthage in the year 430, at the period when all Africa was overrun and ravaged by the Vandals. The state of the country rendering it impossible to send a regular delegation to the council of Ephesius, summoned in 431 for the purpose of discussing the doctrines of Nestorius, Capreolus despatched thither his deacon Beaulin, with an epistle, in which he deplores the circumstances which compelled his absence, and denounces the tenets of the patriarch Constantiopolis. Capreolus is believed to have died before 430, the year in which Carthage was stormed by the Vandals.

We possess, 1. Epistolae ad Symmachum Episcopum, written, as we have seen above, in 431. It is extant both in Greek and Latin.

2. Epistolae ad unam Chriatam veri Dei et Hominis Perepeta contra revem damnatum Maurierum Notoveri, a long and learned letter, addressed to two persons named Vitalis and Constantius, or Tonantius, who had written from Spain to consult Capreolus concerning the controversy which was then agitating the church. It is contained in the Varior. Ossian. of Strond, vol. i. Paris, 1675, 8vo.

Both of the above works, together with the epistle of Vitalis and Tonantius to Capreolus, will be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 490.

3. A fragment in reply to the letter addressed by Theodosius to Augustin with regard to the council of Ephesius, is preserved by Ferrandus in his "Epistolae ad Pelagium et Anatolium," and quoted by Galland.

4. Tillamont believes Capreolus to be the author of the Sermon de Tempore Barbarico, on the invasion of Africa by the Vandals, usually included among the works of St. Augustin. Galland, Bibl. Patrum. vol. ix. Prolegg. p. 31; Schoenemann, Bibl. Patrum Latinarum, c. v. 32, who enumerates all the editions. [W. R.]

CAPTA or CAPITA, a surname of the Minervæ.
worshipped on the Caelian hill at Rome. Its origin was not known. Ovid (Fast. iii. 857, &c.) proposes various conjectures about it. [L. S.]

CAPUSA, the son of Oseasus, who was the uncle of Maximian. While the latter was in Spain fighting on behalf of the Carthaginians, his father Gallo died, and was succeeded in the sovereignty by his brother Oseasus. Oseasus also dying shortly afterwards, his son Capusa obtained the throne; but as he had not much influence among his people, one Mezentius laid claim to the kingdom, and defeated and killed Capusa in battle. (Liv. xxix. 29.)

CAPYS (Κάρυς). 1. A son of Assaracus and Hieronemone, and father of Anchises. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 2; Hom. Il. x. 289; Virg. Aen. vi. 768; Dial. iv. 73.)

2. One of the companions of Aeneas, from whom the town of Capua was said to have derived its name. (Virg. Aen. x. 146.) This Capys was a Trojan, and is mentioned by Virgil among those who were of opinion that the wooden horse should be thrown into the water. (Aen. ii. 83.) Livy (iv. 37) states, that according to some traditions the town of Capua, which was previously called Vulturum, derived its name from a Samnite chief of the name of Capys. [L. S.]

CAPYS SLYTIUS. [Slytius.]

CAR (Κάρ), a son of Phoroneus, and king of Megara, from whom the acropolis of this town derived its name Caria. (Paus. i. 39, § 4, 40, § 5.) His tomb was shown as late as the time of Pausanias, on the road from Megara to Corinth. (i. 44, § 3.) Another mythical personage of the name of Car, who was a brother of Lydos and Myus, and was regarded as the ancestral hero of the Carian, is mentioned by Herodotus. (i. 171.)

CARACALLA or CARACALLUS. The genealogy of this emperor and of many other historical personages will be readily understood from the following table. An account of each individual is given in its proper alphabetical place.

Bassianus.

---|---|
Vaurius Marcellus. | M. Aurelius Severus Augustus, commonly called Elagabalus. |

Caracalla or Carcallus, son of Septimius Severus and his second wife Julia Domna, was born at Lyons on the 4th or 5th of April, A. D. 188, while his father was governor of Gallia Lugdun-eensis. The child was originally called Bas-sianus after his maternal grandfather, but when Severus thought fit to declare himself the adopted offspring of M. Aurelius, he at the same time changed the name of his boy to M. Aurelius Anto-ninus, a designation retained by him ever after. Caracalla or Carcallus, which never appears on medals or inscriptions, was a nickname derived from a long mustache or great coat with a hood, worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favourite dress after he became emperor, and introduced into the army. These vestments found great favour, especially among the lower orders, and were known as Antovinianae Caracallae.

Young Bassianus is said to have been remarkable in early life for a gentle and pleasing address. At this period he was beloved alike by his parents and the people, and displayed no indication of that ferocious temper which subsequently rendered him the scourge of the world. At the age of eight (196) he received the title of Caesar and Princeps Juven-tutis, in Maesia, while his father was marching from the East to encounter Albinus, and the year following (197) he was admitted an extraordinary member of the pontifical college. After the overthrow of Albinus, we find him styled Dei Gratiae Imperator; and in 198, when ten years old, he was invested with the tribunician power, and crenedt Augustus. He accompanied Severus in the expedition against the Parthians, sharing his victories and honours, put on the manly gown at Antioch in 201, entered upon his first consularship in 202, and, returning through Egypt to Rome, was married in the course of a few months to Plautilla, daughter of Plautianus, the pretorian praefect. The political events from this date until the death of Severus, which took place at York, on the 4th of February, A. D. 211, are given in the life of that prince, whose acuteness and worldly knowledge were so conspicuous, that he could not, under any circumstances, have failed to fathom the real character of his son, who assuredly was little of a hypocrite. But, although the youth was known to have tampered with the troops, and once, it is said, was detected in an open attempt to assassinate his father, no punishment was inflicted, and parental fondness prevented the feeble old man from taking any steps which might save the empire from being cursed with such a ruler. Geta, however, was named joint heir of the throne, having been previously elevated to the rank of consul and dignified with the apppellations of Caesar and Augustus.

The great object of Caracalla was now the destruction of this colleague, towards whom he entertained the most deadly hatred. Having failed in persuading the army to set aside the claims of his rival, he, on various occasions, sought his life secretly while they were journeying from Britain to Rome with the ashes of their father; but these treasonous schemes were all frustrated by the vigilance of Geta, who was well aware of his danger, and fear of the soldiery prevented open violence.

A pretended reconciliation now took place: they entered the city together, together bestowed a donative on the guards and the people, and a negotiation was commenced for a peaceful partition of the province. The pretensions of Caracalla could no longer be restrained. During an interview held in the chamber of Julia, soldiers, who had been craftily concealed, rushed forth and stabbed the younger son of the empress in his mother's arms, while the elder not only stood by and encouraged, but with his own hands assisted in completing the deed. The murderer sought to appease the irritated troops by pretending that he had only acted in self-defence; but was eventually compelled to purchase their forbearance by distributing among them the whole wealth accumulated during his father's reign. The senate he treated with well-meant contempt, and, feeling now secure, proceeded to glorify his vengeance by massacring all whom he suspected of having favored the pretenders or piloted the fate of Geta, whose name was forthwith erased from the public monuments. The number of persons sacrificed is said to have amounted to twenty thousand of both sexes, among the number of whom was Papinius, the celebrated jurist. But these crimes brought their own retribution. From this moment Caracalla seems never to have enjoyed tranquillity for a single hour. Never were the terrors of an evil conscience more fearfully displayed. After endeavouring in vain to banish remorse by indulgence in all the dissolute pleasures of Rome, by chariot-racing and gladiatorial shows and wild beast hunts, to each of which in turn he devoted himself with frantic eagerness; after grinding the citizens to the earth by taxes and extortions of every description; and after plundering the whole world to supply the vast sums lavished on these amusements and on his soldiers, he resolved if possible to escape from himself by change of place. Wandering with restless activity from land to land, he sought to drown the recollection of his past guilt by fresh enormities. Gaul, Germany, Dacia, Thrace, Asia, Syria, and Egypt, were visited in succession, and were in succession the scene of varied and complicated atrocities. His sojourn at Alexandria was marked by a general slaughter of the inhabitants, in order to avenge certain sarcastic pleasantry in which they had indulged against himself and his mother; and the numbers of the slain were so great, that no one ventured to make known the amount. The bodies were given to exist the bodies instantly into deep trenches, that the extent of the calamity might be more effectually concealed. The Greeks now believed that the furies of his brother pursued him with their scourges. It is certain that his bodily health became seriously affected, and his intellects evidently deranged. He was tormented by fearful visions, and the spectres of his father and the murdered Geta stood by him, in the dead of night, with swords pointed to his bosom. Believing himself spell-bound by the incantations of his foes, he had recourse to strange rites in order to evoke the spirits of the dead, from that them he might seek a remedy for his torments; but it was said that none would answer to his call except the kindred soul of Commodus. At last, he sought the aid of the contumacious one from whom it he impertinent by day and night with prayers and many victims; but no deity would vouchsafe a word of comfort to the fraticide.

While in this excited and unhappy condition, he demanded in marriage the daughter of Artabazes, the Parthian king; but the negotiation having been abruptly broken off, he suddenly passed the Euphrates in hostile array. The enemy were totally unprepared to resist an invasion so unexpected, and could offer no effectual resistance. Mesopotamia was wasted with fire and sword, Arbeia was captured, and the emperor, after digging up the sepulchres of the Parthian kings and scattering their bones, returned to winter at Edessa. Having treacherously gained possession of the person of Abgarus, king of the Osroemi, he seized upon his territory, and took the field in spring with the intention of carrying his arms beyond the Tigris. His course was first directed towards Carrhae, that he might offer homage at a celebrated shrine of the Moon deity in that neighbourhood; but during the march he was assassinated, at the instigation of Macrinus, the praetorian prefect, by a veteran named Marcellus, on the 8th of April, 217, in the thirtieth year of his age and the seventh of his reign.

The chronology of the last years of Caracalla is full of difficulty, and it is almost impossible to arrange the different events recorded in their proper order with anything like certainty. We hear of an expedition against the Alemani and another against the Getae. The former, commemorated by the epithet Germanicus, terminated in a purchased peace; the latter appears to have been partially successful. The portion of Dion Cassius which refers to this period consists of disjointed and imperfect chapters, between which we can seldom establish any connexion. They contain, however, much curious information, to which considerable additions have been made by the fragments recently discovered by Mommsen. Dion tells us, that after death Caracalla was usually spoken of under the insulting name of Tarantas, taken from a gladiator remarkable from his short stature, ugly features, and sanguinary disposition. The historian himself, having explained this term (lxxviii. 9), invariably employs it in the subsequent portions of his work.

We must not omit to observe, that Gibbon, following Spanheim and Burmann, ascribes to Caracalla the important edict which communicated to all free inhabitants of the empire the name and privileges of Roman citizens, while several ancient authors attribute this document to M. Aurelius. The truth seems to be, that M. Aurelius was the author of a very broad and liberal measure in favour of the provincials. The edict, however, by its conditions and restrictions which were swept away by Caracalla, in order that he might introduce an uniform system of taxation and extort a larger revenue in return for a worthless privilege.

and there took a position which was as favourable to himself as it appeared detrimental to the Romans. When Caracalla, in addition to this, had also fortified himself with artificial means, he exhorted his men either to die or to conquer in the approaching battle. The Roman propertor, P. Osternius, of the third cohort, who was labouring, would not have ventured upon an engagement, had not the courage of his soldiers and officers demanded it. The superior military skill of the Roman legions overcame all the difficulties, and a splendid victory was gained: the wife and daughters of Caracalla fell into the hands of the Romans, and his brothers surrendered. Caracalla himself sought the protection of Carthumianus, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him, and he was delivered up to the Romans, and carried to Rome. A.D. 51, after the war in Britain had lasted for nine years, as Tacitus says. The emperor Claudius wished to exhibit to the people this old and formidable foe in his humiliation, and ordered Caracalla and the members of his family, with their clients and ornaments, to be led in a sort of triumph before an assembly of the people and an array of soldiers. The emperor himself was present. The relatives of Caracalla walked by his side east down with grief, and entreated the mercy of the Romans; Caracalla alone did neither of these things, and when he approached the seat of the emperor, he stopped and addressed him in so noble a manner, that Claudius pardoned him and his friends. They appear, however, not to have returned to Britain, but to have spent the remainder of their lives in Ionia (Tac. Ann. 53–38 Hist. iii. 45; Dion Cass. lxx. 20.) [L. S.]

CARANUS (Káravos or Kávaros). 1. A hereditary of the family of the Temenidae, and according to some accounts, the founder of the Argive dynasty in Macedonia, about the middle probably of the eighth century B.C., since he was brother to Phileon, the Argive tyrant. The legend tells, that he led into Macedonia a large force of Greeks, and, following a flock of goats, entered the town of Edessus in the midst of a heavy storm of rain and a thick mist, unobserved by the inhabitants. Remembering the oracle which had desired him "to seek an empire by the guidance of goats," he fixed his tent as a seat of government, and named the place Aegae in commemoration of the oracle. Hereclitus gives a different tradition of the origin of the dynasty, and his account seems to have been adopted by Thucydides, who speaks of Archelaus I. as the ninth king, and therefore does not reckon Caranus and the other two who came before Perdiccas I. in the lists of Decipusses and Eusebius. Müller thinks that the two traditions are substantially the same, the one in Herodotus being the rude native legend, while the other, of which Caranus is the hero, was the Argive story; and he further suggests that Kávaros is perhaps only another form of Kávaros. (Diod. Frug. i. p. 207, ed. West; Plut. Alex. viii. 4; Plut. Alex. viii. 21. 22. Cato Lact. Post. i. p. 221; Müller, Dor. i. 7. § 13, App. i. § 15, and the authorities there referred to; Herod. viii. 137–189; Thuc. ii. 100.)

Pausanias, in mentioning that the Macedonians never erected trophies when victorious, records the national tradition by which they accounted for it, and which related, that a trophy set up by Caranus, in accordance with Argive custom, for a victory over his neighbour Cisseus, was thrown down and destroyed by a lion from Olympus; whereby it was said, the king learnt that its erection had been of evil counsel, as deepening the enmity of the conquered. (Paus. ix. 40.)

2. Mentioned by Justin (xi. 2) as a son of Philip and a half-brother of Alexander the Great. The latter sent Macedonians under the command of the younger Caranus and put him to death soon after his accession, A.D. 336.

3. A Macedonian of the body called grave (comp. Polyb. v. 38, xxxi. 3), was one of the generals sent by Alexander against Satibarzanes when he had second time excited Aria to revolt. Caranus and his colleagues were successful, and Satibarzanes was defeated and slain, in the winter of B.C. 330. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 25, v. 28; Cur. vi. 6 § 20, etc., vii. 3. § 2, Freinsheim, Ab loc. viii. 4 § 32, etc.; comp. Diod. xvii. 61.) In B.C. 329, Caranus was appointed, together with Andronicus and Menedemus, under the command of the Lycian Pharnaces, to act against Spithames, the revolted satrap of Sophiana. Their approach compelled him to raise the siege of Marananda; but, in a battle which ensued, he defeated them with the help of a body of Scythian cavalry, and forced them to fall back on the river Polytemus, the wooded banks of which promised shelter. The rashness however or cowardice of Caranus led him to attempt the passage of the river with the cavalry under his command, and the rest of the troops plunging in after him in haste and disorder, they were all destroyed by the enemy. (Arrian, Anab. iv. 35; comp. Curt. vii. 24, § 31, etc.; [E. E.]

CARAUSIUS, M. Aurelius Valerius. 1. Carausius, the Herulian, who had been made a senator and a naval force at Boulogne for the purpose of repressing the outrages of the Franks, who, leaving from place to place in their light stows were devastating the coasts of Holland, Gaul, and Spain, gave the command of the armament to a certain Carausius, a man of humble extraction, born in Mecapia, a district between the Scheldt and Meuse, who had been a pilot and had distinguished himself as a soldier in the war against the Baggandae. Carausius was by no means deficient in zeal and energy, but after a time his peculiar tactics and rapidly increasing wealth gave rise to a suspicion, probably not ill founded, that he permitted the pirates to do as they pleased, and then watching for their return, seized the ships laden with plunder and appropriated to his own use the greater portion of the spoils thus captured. Hereclitus accordingly gave orders for his death, but the execution of this mandate was anticipated by the vigilance of the intended victim, who having crossed the channel with the fleet, which was devoted to his interests, and having succeeded in gaining over the troops quartered in Britain, established himself in that island and assumed the title of Augustus. His subsequent measures were characterized by the greatest vigour and prudence. A number of new galleyes was constructed with all the speed, all of which were formed with various barbarous tribes, who were carefully disciplined as sailors, and the usurper soon became master of all the western seas. After several ineffectual attempts to break his power, Dioclétian and Maximianus found it necessary to acknowledge him as their colleague in the empire, an event commemorated by a medal bearing as a device three busts with appropriate emblems and the legend CARAVIUS, ETC. PRAETORIÆ SVL, while on the reverse we read the words PAN.
AVGVSTUS, or, in some cases, LAVITILAVGVSTUS, or HILARITASAVGVSTUS. On a second coin we find a laurel-leaf head with IMP. C. CARAVUS. P. AVG., and on the reverse, IOVI, ERVILE, HERCULS, AVG., indicating Iovius Diedatius and Herculeus Maximinius, and to a third we are indebted for the name M. AURELIUS VALERIUS, an appellation probably borrowed from his recently adopted brother. These transactions took place about A.D. 287, and for six years the third Augustus maintained his authority without dispute; but upon the elevation of Constantius the efforts of the new Caesar were at once directed to the recovery of Britain. Boutouga fell after a protracted siege, and Constantius was making active and extensive preparations for a descent upon the opposite coast, when Carausus was murdered by his chief officer, Allectus. This happened in 289. Such are the only facts known to us with regard to this remarkable man. Of his private character and domestic policy we are unable to speak, for the abusive epithets applied to him so liberally by the panegyrists indicate nothing except the feelings entertained at the imperial court, which could have been of no friendly description. (Eutrop. iv. 21; Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxxix., Epit. xxxix., who calls this emperor Carausio; Oros. vii. 25; Panegyr. Vet. ii. 12.

COIN OF CARAVUSUS.

CARAVANTTIUS, the brother of Gentius, king of the Illyrians, against whom the praetor L. Anicius Gallus was sent in B.C. 168. Caravantius fell into the hands of Gallus, and with his brother Gentius and the rest of the royal family walked before the chariot of Gallus in his triumph in the following year. (Liv. xiv. 30, 32, xiv. 45.)

CARBO, the name of a plebeian family of the Papiria gens.

1. C. Papirius Carbo, praetor in B.C. 168, when he obtained the province of Sardinia; but he appears not to have gone into his province, as the senate requested him to remain at Rome and there to exercise jurisdiction in cases between citizens and peregrini. (Liv. xlv. 17, xlv. 12.)

2. C. Papirius Carbo, born about B.C. 164, a son of No. 1, and a contemporary and friend of the Gracchi; but though he apparently followed in the footsteps of Tib. Gracchus, yet his motives widely differed from those of his noble friend, and towards the end of his life he showed how little he had acted upon conviction or principle, by deserting his former friends and joining the ranks of their enemies. After the death of Tiberius Gracchus he was appointed his successor as tribunus agrorum dividendum, and shortly after; in B.C. 131, he was elected tribune of the people for the year of his tribuneship he brought forward two new laws: 1. That a person should be allowed to be re-elected to the tribuneship as often as might be thought advisable; this law, which was strenuously opposed by P. Cornelius Scipio Afric anus the younger, was supported by C. Gracchus; and 2. A lex tabellarium, which ordained that the people should in future vote by ballot in the enactment and repeal of laws. In his tribuneship he continued to hold the office of tribunus agrorum dividendum. The difficulties connected with carrying out the division of land according to the republican agrarian law created many disturbances at Rome, and Scipio Afric anus, the champion of the aristocratical party, was found one morning dead in his bed. Among the various suspicions then ascribed to the cause of his death, one was that Carbo had murdered him, or at least had had a hand in the deed; and this report may not have been wholly without foundation, if we consider the character of Carbo. After his tribuneship, Carbo continued to act as the friend and supporter of the Gracchi. Upon the death of C. Gracchus, L. Opimius, his murderer, who was consul in B.C. 121, put to death a great number of the friends of the Gracchi; but at the expiration of his consulship he was accused of high treason by the tribune Q. Decius, and Carbo, who was now raised to the consulship himself (B.C. 120), suddenly turned round, and not only undertook the defence of Opimius, but did not scruple to say, that the murder of C. Gracchus had been an act of perfect justice. This inconsistency drew upon him the contempt of both parties, so that, as Cicero says, even his return to the aristocratical party could not secure him their protection. The aristocracy could not forget that he was suspected of having murdered Scipio, and seem to have been waiting for an opportunity to crush him. In B.C. 119 the young orator L. Licinius Crassus brought a charge against him, the exact nature of which is not known, but as Carbo foresaw his condemnation, he put an end to his life by taking cantharides. Valerius Maximus (liv. 7. § 6) states, that he was sent into exile. Carbo was a man of great talents, and his oratorical powers are mentioned by Cicero with great praise, although he otherwise abominates the man. There can be no doubt that Carbo was a person of no principle, and that he attached himself to the party from which he hoped to derive most advantages. (Liv. Epit. 55, 61; Appian, B. C. i. 13, 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. De Amicit. 25, De Leg. iii. 16, Ad Fam. xi. 21, De Orat. ii. 2, 25, 39, 40, i. 10, iii. 7, 20, Brut. 27, 43, 63, Tusc. i. 5; Tacit. Ann. 34.)

3. Cn. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, was consul in B. C. 113, together with C. Cecilius Metellus. He was according to Cicero (ad Fam. xi. 21) the father of Cn. Papirius Carbo, who was three consul [No. 7], whereas this latter is called by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 26) a brother of No. 6. This difficulty may be solved by supposing that our Cn. Papirius Carbo and Cn. Papirius Carbo [No. 2] were brothers, so that the word frater in Velleius is equivalent to frater patris or consin. (Pertinax, Animad. Hist. p. 66.) In his consulship the Cimbrians advanced from Gaul into Italy and Illyricum, and Carbo, who was sent against these, was put to flight with his whole army. He was afterwards recalled by M. Metellus, in order to be put to death for some unknown reason, and put an end to his own life by taking a solution of vitriol (a triumphant salutem, Cic. ad Fam. xi. 21; Liv. Epit. 63).

4. M. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, is mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. xi. 21) as having fled from Sicily.

5. P. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, is likewise mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. xi. 21) as having been accused by Flaccus and condemned.

6. C. Papirius Carbo, with the surname Arvina, was a son of No. 2 (Cic. Brut. 89), and throughout his life a supporter of the aristocracy, whereas Cicero calls him the only good citizen in the whole family. He was tribune of the people in B. C. 90, as we may infer from Cicero (Brut. 89), though some writers place his tribuneship a year earlier, and others a year later. In his tribuneship Carbo and his colleague, M. Plautius Silvanus, carried a law (lex Plautis et Papirio), according to which a citizen of a federal state, who had his domicile in Italy at the time the law was passed, and had sent in his name to the praetor within sixty days after, should have the Roman franchise. Carbo distinguished himself greatly as an orator, and though according to Cicero he was wanting in acuteness, his speeches were always weighty and carried with them a high degree of authority. We still possess a fragment of one of his orations which he delivered in his tribuneship, and which Orelli (Onom. Tull. ii. p. 440) erroneously attributes to his father. [No. 2]. In this fragment (Cic. Orat. 63) he approves of the death of M. Livius Drusus, who had been murdered the year before, B. C. 91. Cicero expressly states, that he was present when the oration was delivered, which shows incontrovertibly, that it cannot belong to C. Papirius Carbo, the father, who died long before Cicero was born. He was murdered in B. C. 82, in the cura Hostilia, by the praetor Brutus Damaclus [Brutus, No. 10], one of the leaders of the Marian party, (Cic. pro Arch. Brut. 62, 99, Ad Fam. xi. 21, De Orat. iii. 3; Scol. Boeth. p. 333, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Appian, B. C. i. 68.)

7. Cn. Papirius Cn. f. C. n. Carbo, a son of No. 3 and cousin of No. 6, occurs in history for the first time in B. C. 92, when the consul Appius Claudius Pulcher made a report to the senate about his seditious proceedings. (Cic. De Legg. iii. 19.) He was one of the leaders of the Marian party, and in B. C. 87, when C. Marius returned from Africa, he commanded one of the four armies with which Rome was blockaded. In B. C. 80, when L. Valerius Flaccus, the successor of Marius in his seventh consulsip, was killed in Asia, Carbo was chosen by Cinna for his colleague for B. C. 83. These two consuls, who fell alarmed at the reports of Sulla's return, sent persons into all parts of Italy to raise money, soldiers, and provisions, for the anticipated war, and they endeavoured to strengthen their party, especially by the new citizens, whose rights, they said, were in danger, and on whose behalf they pretended to exert themselves. The fleet also was restored to guard the coasts of Italy, and in short nothing was neglected to make a vigorous stand against Sulla. When the latter wrote to the senate from Greece, the senate endeavoured to stop the proceedings of the consuls until an answer from Sulla had arrived. The consuls were not only the most important members of the senate, but no sooner had the ambassadors to Sulla quitted Rome, than Cinna and Carbo declared themselves consuls for the year following, that they might not be obliged to go to Rome to hold the comitia for the elections. Legions upon legions were raised and transported across the Adriatic to oppose Sulla; but great numbers of the soldiers began to be discontented and refused fighting against their fellow-citizens. A mutiny broke out, and Cinna was murdered by his own soldiers. Carbo now returned to Italy with the troops which had already been carried across the Adriatic, but he did not rest content with this, although the tribunes urged him to continue in order that a successor to Cinna might be elected. At length, however, Carbo returned to Rome, but the attempts at holding the comitia were frustrated by prodigies, and Carbo remained sole consul for the rest of the year.

In B. C. 83, Sulla arrived in Italy. Carbo, who was now proconsul of Gaul, hastened to Rome, and there caused a decree to be made, which declared Metellus and all the senators who supported Sulla, to be enemies of the republic. About the same time the capitol was burnt down, and there was a great fire, not having set it on fire. While Sulla and his partizans were carrying on the war in various parts of Italy, Carbo was elected consul a third time for the year B. C. 82, together with C. Marius, the younger. Carbo's army was in Cisalpine Gaul, and in the spring of 82 his legetae, C. Carrinna, fought a severely contested battle with Metellus, and was put to flight. Carbo himself, however, pursued Metellus, and kept him in a position in which he was unable to do anything; hearing of the misfortunes of his colleague Marius at Paeonesta, he led his troops back to Ariminum, whither he was followed by Pompey. In the mean time Metellus gained another victory over an army of Carbo. Sulla, after entering Rome and making some of the most necessary arrangements, marched out himself against Carbo. In an engagement on the river Glanis, several of the Spaniards, who had joined his army a little while before, deserted to Sulla, and Carbo, either to avenge himself on those who remained with him, or to set a fearful example, ordered all of them to be put to death. At length a great battle was fought at Clusium between Carbo and Sulla: it lasted for a whole day, but the victory was not decided. Pompey and Cassius were engaged against Carinna in the neighbourhood of Spoleto, and when Carbo seem to have been on the right, Sulla who had been informed of the route which this army took, attacked them from an ambuscade and killed nearly 2000 men. Carinna himself however escaped. Marcus, who was sent by Carbo to the relief of Praeneste, was likewise attacked from an ambuscade by Pompey, and lost many of his men. His soldiers, who considered him to be the cause of their defeat, deserted him, with the exception of a few cohorts, with which he returned to Carbo. Shortly after Carbo and Norbanus made an attack upon the camp of Metellus near Faventia, but time and place were unfavourable to them, and they were defeated: about 10,000 of their men were slain, and 800 deserted to Metellus, so that Carbo was obliged to withdraw to Arretium with about 1000 men.

The desertion and treachery in the party, which had hitherto supported the cause of Marius, increased every day; Norbanus despairing of success fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life soon afterwards; and when Carbo found that the relief of Praeneste, which he had sent two legions under Damasippus, was hopeless, he too resolved to quit Italy, although he had still large forces at his command, and his generals, Carinna, Marcus, and Damasippus, were continuing the war in Italy. Carbo fled to Africa. After his party in Italy had been completely defeated, Pompey was sent against the remains of it in Sicily, which Carbo then repaired. From thence he went to the island of Cossyra, where he was taken prisoner by the emissaries of Pompey. His companions were put to death at once, but Carbo himself was brought in chains before Pompey at Lilýbaeum, and after a bitter inveigh, against him, Pompey had him executed and sent his head to Sulla, b. c. 32. (Appian, B. C. i. 69—96; Liv. Epit. 79, 83, 88, 89; Plut. Sull. 22, &c.; Pomp. 10, &c.; Cic. ad Verg. i. 4, 13; Pseudo-Athen. in Terr. p. 129, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. i. 21; Eutrop. v. 6, 3; Cron. v. 20; Zonar. x. 1.)

2. Of Naupactus, is mentioned by Pausanías (x. 36, § 6) among the cyclic poets; and Charon of Lampascus, before whose time Carinna must have lived, contributed to him the epic poem Naúrdæta, which all others ascribed to a Milesian poet.

3. A Greek rhetorician, who is referred to by Alexander (De Fig. Dict.), but of whom nothing further is known. [L. S.]

CAŘICUS, the commander of a portion of the fleet of Octavianus in the war against Sext. Pompéius, b. c. 36. (Appian, B. C. i. 111.) [L. S.]

CARDEA, a Roman divinity presiding over and protecting the hinges of doors (cardo). What is given as the date of the victory of v. 801, &c.) relating to Cardea belongs to Carde; the text seems, in fact, to pass over to condense three distinct divinities—Carma, Cardea, and Crane, the last of whom he declares to be merely an ancient form of Carum. Cardea was beloved by Janus, and after yielding to his embraces, the god rewarded her by giving her the protection of the hinges of doors, and the power of preventing evil demons from entering houses. She especially protected little children in their cradles against formidable night-birds, which witches used to metamorphose themselves into, and thus to attack children by night time, tearing them from their cradles and sucking the blood out of them. Cardea exercised this power by means of white thorn and other magic substances, and is said to have done so first in the case of Proclas, prince of Alba. (Tertull. de Cor. 13.) [L. S.]

CARDIANUS HIERÖNYMUS. [Hierönýmus.]

CARNEUS CARRHENES, a general of the Parthians who was defeated in a battle with Gortazes in a. d. 49. (The. Ann. xii. 12—14.) [L. S.]

CARFULENUS, called Caraulenus by Appian, served under Julian Caesar in the Alexandrine war (b. c. 47), in which he is spoken of as CARINUS.

a man of great military skill. (Hist. B. Alex. 31.) He was tribune of the plebs at the time of Caesar's death (a. c. 44); and as he was a supporter of the aristocratic party, and an opponent of Antony, was excluded from the senate by the latter on the 28th of November. (Cic. Philipp. iii. 9.)

[TL. CANUTIUS.] He took an active part in the war against Antony in the following year, and fell in the battle of Mutina, in which Antony was defeated. (Appian, B. C. iii. 66, &c.; Cic. ad Fam. x. 53, xv. 4.)

CARINAS. [CARINAS.]

CARINUS, M. AURELIUS, the elder of the two sons of Carus. Upon the departure of his father for the Persian war (a. d. 292), he was appointed supreme governor of all the Western provinces, and received the titles of Caesar and Emperor. After the death of Carus in 283, he assumed the purple conjointly with his brother, and upon receiving intelligence of the untimely fate of Numerianus and the elevation of Diocletian to the throne by the army of Asia, he set forth in all haste from Gaul to encounter his rival. The opposing hosts met in Mœna, several engagements followed, and at length a decisive battle was fought near Margum, in which Carinus gained the victory, but, in the moment of triumph, was slain by some of his own officers, whose rage he had excited in the course of his profligate indulgences. Historians agree in painting the character of this emperor in the darkest colours. When raised he was unquestionably not deficient in valour and military skill, as was proved by the vigour with which he repressed certain seditions movements in Gaul, and by the successful conduct of his last campaign. But during the greater part of his short career he abandoned himself to the gratification of the most brutal passions, and never scrupled at any act of oppression or cruelty. State affairs were totally neglected—the most upright of those by whom he was surrounded were banished or put to death, and the highest offices bestowed upon degraded ministers of his pleasures. Nine wives were wedded and repudiated in quick succession, and the palace, filled with a throng of players, dancers, harlots, and panders, presented a constant scene of riot and intemperance. It was bitterly observed, that in this prince the sensual enormities of Elagabalus were seen combined with the cold hypocrisy of Domitian. His only claims upon the affection of the populace consisted in the prodigal magnificence displayed in the celebration of games in honour of his brother and himself. These appear to have transcended in splendid splendour all previous exhibitions, and the scenes thus exhibited to us by Vopiscus are of a most strange and marvellous description.

Chronologers are at variance with regard to the precise date of the death of Carinus. Echkeil seems inclined to fix it at the close of the year 284, but it is generally referred to the May following. (Vopisc. Carin.; Aurel. Vict. Cass. xxxviii, Epit. xxxviii; Zonar. xii. 30; Buxtrop. ix. 12.)

[W. R.]

CARNA.

T. CARUSIUS, defeated the Aureses in Spain, and took their chief town, Lancia, about b. c. 25; but in consequence of the cruelty and insolence of Carusius, the Aureses took up arms again in b. c. 22. (Florus, iv. 12. § 55, &c.; Oros. vi. 21; Dion Cass. lii. 25, liv. 5.) There are several coins bearing the name of Carusius upon them, two specimens of which are given below. The former has on the obverse the head of a woman, and on the reverse a sphinx, with the inscription T. CARUSIUS III. VIR: the latter has on the obverse the head of Augustus, with the inscription IMP. CAESAR AVGVST., and on the reverse the gate of a city, over which is inscribed IMIRITA, and around it the words P. CARUSIUS LEG. PROPR. There is nothing in the former coin except the praenomen Titus to identify it with the subject of this article; but the latter one would appear to have been struck by the conqueror of the Aureses, and perhaps Dion Cassius has made a mistake in calling him Titus. The word IMIRITA, which is also written EMERITA in and IMIRITA on some of the coins, seems to refer to the fact mentioned by Dion Cassius (lii. 25) that after the conquest of the Cantabri and Aureses, Augustus dismissed many of his soldiers who had served their time (emeritis), and assigned them a town in Lusitania, to which he gave the name of Augusta Emerita. (Echkeil, v. p. 162, &c.)

CARIUS (Kapos), the Carian, a surname of Zeus, under which he had a temple at Mylassa in Caria, which belonged to the Carians, Lydians, and Myrians in common, as they were believed to be brother nations. (Herod. i. 171, v. 66; Strab. xiv. p. 689.) In Thessaly and Boeotia, Zeus was likewise worshipped under this name. (Phot. Lex. x. 2.)

CARMÆNOR (Kapudow), a Cretan of Tarra, father of Eubulus and Chrysothemis. He was said to have received and purified Apollo and Artemis, after they had slain the monster Python, and it was in the house of Carmanor that Apollo formed his connexion with the nymph Aeacallis. (Paus. ii. 7. § 7, 30. § 3, x. 16. § 2, 7. § 3; comp. Muller, Dor. ii. 1. § 5, 8. § 11.)

CARMIS (Kahara), a daughter of Eubulus, who became by Zeus the mother of Britomartis. (Paus. ii. 20. § 2.) Antoninus Liberalis (16) describes her as a grand-daughter of Agoman, and daughter of Phoenix. (L. S.)

CARMENTA, CARMENAE, CARMENTIS, [CAMENAE].

Carna or Carnea, a Roman divinity, whose name is probably connected with coro, flesh, for she was regarded as the protector of the physical well-being of man. It was especially the chief organ of the human body, without which man cannot exist, such as the heart, the lungs, and the liver, that were recommended to her protection. Junius Brutus, at the beginning of the commonwealth, was believed to have dedicated to her a sanctuary on the Caelian hill, and a festival was celebrated to her on the first of June, which day was called fabiaeiae calendae, from beans (faba) and bean being offered to her. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 12; Varro, ap. Nautam, s. v. Macare; Ovid, Fast. vi. 101, &c., who however confounds Cardea and Ceres in one person.) [L. S.]

Carneades (Karaedae). 1. The son of Epicorus or Philonous, was born at Cyrene about the year B.C. 213. He went early to Athens, and attended the lectures of the Stoics, and learnt there the logic of Diogenes. His opinions, however, on philosophical subjects differed from those of his master, and he was fond of telling him, "if I reason right, I am satisfied; if wrong, give me the kiss," which was the fee for the logic lectures. He was six years old when Chrysippus died, and never had any personal intercourse with him; but he deeply studied his works, and exerted all his powers in disputing and arguing in their refutation. To this exercise he attributed his own eminence, and often repeated the words

El μη γαρ ἡν Χρυσίππης, οὐκ ἡν δὲν ἐγώ.

He attached himself as a zealous partisan to the Academy, which had suffered severely from the attacks of the Stoics; and on the death of Hegesinnus, he was chosen to preside at the meetings of Academy, and was the fourth in succession from Arcesilas. His great eloquence and skill in argument revived the glories of his school; and, defending himself in the negative vacancy of asserting nothing (not even that nothing can be asserted), carried on a vigorous war against every position that had been maintained by other sects.

In the year B.C. 156, when he was fifty-eight years old, he was chosen with Diogenes the Stoic and Critolaus the Peripatetic to go as ambassador to Rome to depurate the five of 500 talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. During his stay at Rome, he attracted great notice from his eloquent declarations on philosophical subjects, and it was here that, in the presence of Cato the Elder, he delivered his famous orations on Justice. The first oration was in commendation of the virtue, and the next day the second was delivered, in which all the arguments of the first were answered, and justice was proved to be not a virtue, but a mere matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. The honest mind of Cato was shocked at this, and he moved the senate to send the philosopher home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demoralizing doctrines.

Carneades lived twenty-seven years after this at Athens, and died at the advanced age of eighty-five, or (according to Cicero) 50, B.C. 129. He is described as a man of unrivaled industry. He was so engrossed in his studies, that he let his hair and nails grow to an inordinate length, and was so absent at his own table (for he would never dine out), that his servant and concubine, Melissa, was constantly obliged to feed him. In his old age, he suffered from cataract in his eyes, which he bore with great impatience, and little resigned to the judgment of nature, that he used to ask angrily, if this was the way in which nature willed what she had done, and sometimes expressed a wish to poison himself.

Carneades left no writings, and all that is known of his lectures is derived from his intimate friend and pupil, Cleitomachus; but so true was he to his own principles of withholding assent, that Cleitomachus confesses he never could ascertain what his master really thought on any subject. He, however, appears to have defended atheism, and consistently enough to have denied that the world was the result of anything but chance. In ethics, which more particularly were the subject of his long and laborious study, he seems to have denied the conformity of the moral ideas with nature. This he particularly insisted on in the second oration on Justice, in which he manifestly wished to convey his own notions on the subject; and he there maintains that ideas of justice are not derived from nature, but that they are purely artificial for purposes of expediency.

All this, however, was nothing but the special application of his general theory, that man did not possess, and never could possess, any criterion of truth.

Carneades argued that, if there were a criterion, it must exist either in reason (λόγος), or sensation (ἀισθήμα), or conception (φαντασία). But then reason itself depends on conception, and this again on sensation; and we have no means of judging whether our sensations are true or false, whether they correspond to the objects that produce them, or carry wrong impressions to the mind, producing false conceptions and ideas, and leading reason also into error. Therefore sensation, conception, and reason, are alike disqualified for being the criterion of truth.

But after all, man must live and act, and must have some rule of practical life; therefore, although it is impossible to pronounce anything as absolutely true, we may yet establish probabilities of various degrees. For, although we cannot say that any given conception or sensation is in itself true, yet some sensations appear to us more true than others, and we must be guided by that which seems the most true. Again, sensations are not single, but generally combined with others, which either confirm or contradict them; and the greater this combination the greater is the probability of that being true which the rest combine to confirm; and the case in which the greatest number of conceptions, each in themselves apparently most true, should combine to affirm that which also in itself appears most true, would present to Carneades the highest probability, and his nearest approach to truth.

But practical life needed no such rule as this, and it is difficult to conceive a system more barren of all help to man than that of Carneades. It is not, indeed, probable that he inspired to any such designs of benefiting mankind, or to anything beyond his own celebrity as an acute reasoner and an eloquent speaker. As such, he preserved the spirit of an age when philosophy was fast losing the earnest and serious spirit of the earlier schools, and was degenerating to mere purposes of rhetorical display. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 62—66; Orelli, Onom. Tull. ii. p. 180, &c., where are given all the passages of Cicero, in which Carneades is mentioned; Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Math. vii. 159,
CARRINAS.

CARRINAS, a son of No. 1, was sent by Caesar, in b. c. 45, into Spain against Sext. Pompeius, but as he did not accomplish anything, he was superseded by Asinius Pollio. In 43, after the establishment of the triumvirate, Carrinas was appointed consul for the remainder of the year, together with P. Ventidius. Two years later, b. c. 41, he received from Octavius the administration of the province of Spain, where he had to carry on war with the Mauretanic Bocchus. In 36, he was sent with three legions against Sext. Pompeius in Sicily; and about 31, we find him as proconsul in Gaul, where he was successful

2. An Athenian philosopher and a disciple of Anaxagoras. (Suidas, s. v. Károledos.)
3. A Cynic philosopher in the time of Apollonius Tyanaeus. (Kamphius, Procr.)
CARNIEUS (Károdedos), a surname of Apollo under which he was worshipped in various parts of Greece, especially in Peloponnesus, as at Sparta and Seyon, and also in Thera, Cyncre, and Magna Graecia. (Paus. iii. 13. § 2, &c.; ii. 10. § 2, i. § 2; Phid. Phal. v. 16; Philem. Samia, vi. 1; Paus. iii. 24. § 5, iv. 31. § 1, 33. § 5.) The origin of the name is explained in different ways. Some derive it from Carnus, an Achaean soothsayer, whose murder by Hippotes provoked Apollo to send a plague into the army of Hippotes while he was on his march to Peloponnesus. Apollo was afterwards propitiated by the introduction of the worship of Apollo Carnes. (Paus. iii. 13. § 3; Schol. ad Theocr. v. 83.) Others believed that Apollo was thus called from his favourite Carnus or Carnes, a son of Zeus and Europa, whom Leta and Apollo had brought up. (Paus. i. 8. § 4, v. 36. § 6.) Several other attempts to explain the name are given in Pausanias and the Scholion on Theocritus. It is evident, however, that the worship of the Cretian Apollo was very ancient, and was probably established in Peloponnesus even before the Doric conquest. Respecting the festival of the Cretan see Dict. of Ant. a. v. Károdes. [L. S.] CARNIEUS (Károdedos), a Cynic philosopher, who is said to have been Cynicus (Kóonados), that is, the leader of dogs or Cynics, or, in other words, the leader and teacher of Cynic philosophers. He was a native of Megara, but nothing further is known of him. (Athen. iv. p. 186.) [L. S.]
CARNII/US, was accused, in the reign of Tiberius, of some crime not now known, and put an end to his own life to escape the cruel tortures inflicted by Tiberius upon other victims. When Tiberius heard of his death, he was grieved at losing an opportunity of killing a man in his own way, and exclaimed Caravie us mo vasit. (Suet. Tit. 60.) [L. S.]
Carpinthius, Joannes (Ilodës Károdedos), a bishop of the island of Carpathos, of uncertain date. At the request of the monks of Indis he wrote to them a consolatory work in 100 chapters, entitled πολλα προστασιας ουσιων προστασιας (Phot. Cod. 201.) This work is still extant, and a Latin translation of it by J. Pontanus is printed at the end of his "Dioptrae Philippi Solitarii," Ingolstadt, 1654, 4to, and in the "Bibliotheca Patrum," xii. p. 535, &c., The Greek original, as well as some other ascetic works of his, are still extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. x. p. 788, &c.; xl. p. 173.) [L. S.]

Carpinitius Philo. [Philo.]
Carpinitides (Károledos), a Greek poet, of whom there are extant two elegant epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 266; ix. 52.)
The name of the author of the second epigram is sometimes written Carpityldes; but whether this is a mere mistake, or whether Carpityldes is a different person from Carphylides, cannot be ascertained. [L. S.]
L. Carpinatius, the pro-magister or deput-against the Morini and other tribes, and drove the Suevi across the Rhine back into Germany. For those exploits he was honoured with a triumph in 29. (Appian, B. C. iv. 83, v. 26, 112; Dion Cass. xlvii. 15, II. 21, 22.)

3. Carrinas, whom Cicero speaks of in B.C. 45, as an unpleasant person, who visited him in his Tusculumum. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 33.)

4. Carrinas Secundus, a rhetorician of the time of Caligula, by whom he was expelled from Rome on account of his living, by way of exercise, declined against tyrannical interference. (Dion Cass. lxx. 20; Juven. vii. 204.) He is probably the same as the Secundus Carrinas whom Nero, in B.C. 65, sent to Asia and Achaea to plunder those countries, and carry the statues of the gods from thence to Rome. (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 45.)

CARSIGNATUS (Καρσίγνατος), a Galatian prince, who was at one time allied with Pharmace. When the latter threatened to invade Galatia, and Carsigntus had in vain endeavoured to maintain peace, he and another Galatian, Gaezotoris, marched against him, but the war was prevented by a Roman embassy. (Polyb. xxv. 4.)

CARSILUS, [Carcilusus].

CARLUS, a friend of C. Cassius, who was with him in Syria in B.C. 43. (Cass. esp. Cic. ad Fam. xii. 11.)

CARTHALO (Καρθάλω). 1. A commander of the Carthaginian fleet in the first Punic war, who was sent by his colleague Adherbal, in B.C. 249, to burn the Roman fleet, which was riding at anchor off Lilybaeum. While Carthalo was engaged in this enterprise, Himilco, the governor of Lilybaeum, who perceived that the Roman army on land was anxious to afford their support to the fleet, sent out his mercenaries against the Roman troops, and Carthalo endeavoured to draw the Roman fleet into an engagement. The latter, however, withdrew to a town on the coast and prepared themselves for defence. Carthalo was repulsed with some loss, and after having taken a few transports, he retreated to the nearest river, and watched the Romans as they sailed away from the coast. When the consul L. Junius Pul- lus, on his return from Symecea, had doubled Phrygum, he ordered his fleet to sail towards Lilybaeum, not knowing what had happened to those whom he had sent before him. Carthalo informed of his approach, immediately sailed out against him, in order to meet him before he could join the other part of the fleet. Pulus fled for refuge to a rocky and dangerous part of the sea, where Carthalo did not venture to attack him; but he took his station at a place between the two Roman fleets to watch them and prevent their joining. Soon after a fearful storm arose which destroyed the whole of the Roman fleet, while the Carthaginians, who were better sailors, had sought a safe place of refuge before the storm broke out. (Polyb. i. 53, 54.)

2. The Carthaginian commander of the cavalry in the army of Hannibal. In B.C. 217, he fought against L. Hostilius Mancinus, in the neighbourhood of Carthum, and put him to flight. The Romans, under Mancinus, who were merely a reconnitering band which had been sent out by the dictator, Q. Fabius, at last resolved to make a stand against the enemy, but nearly all of them were cut to pieces. This Carthalo is probably the noble Carthaginian of the same name, whom Hannibal, after the battle of Cannae, in B.C. 216, sent to Rome with ten of the Roman prisoners to negotiate the ransom of the prisoners, and to treat about peace. But when Carthalo approached Rome, a litter was sent out to bid him quit the Roman territory before sunset. In B.C. 205, when Tarentum was re-conquered by the Romans, Carthalo was commander of the Carthaginian garrison there. He laid down his arms, and as he was going to the consuls to sue for mercy, he was killed by a Roman soldier. (Liv. xxiii. 15, 58, xxvii. 16; Appian, de Bell. Afric. 49; Dion Cass. xxv. 152, ed. Reinhold.)

3. One of the two leaders of the popular party at Carthage after the close of the second Punic war. He held an office which Appian calls boetharchus, and which seems to have been a sort of tribuneship; and while in his official capacity he was travelling through the country, he attacked some of the subjects of Massinissa, who had pitched their tents on controverted ground. He killed several of them, made some booty, and extirped the Africans against the Numidians. These and other acts of hostility between the Carthaginians and Massinissa called for the interference of the Romans, who, however, rather fostered the hostile feeling, than allayed it. The result was an open war between the Carthaginians and Massinissa. When at length the Romans began to make preparations for the third Punic war, the Carthaginians endeavoured to conciliate the Romans by condemning to death the authors of the war with Massinissa; and Carthalo was accordingly executed. (Appian, de Bell. Punic. 63, 74.) [L. S.]

CARTILIIUS, an early Roman jurist, who probably lived not later than the time of Caligula, as in Dig. 28, tit. 5, s. 69, he is cited by Praenetus, who adopts his opinion in the case in question in preference to that of Trebatus. The case was this—Let A or B, whichever wishes, be my heir. They both wish. Cartiliius says, Both take: Tre- batius, Neither. In Dig. 13, tit. 6, s. 5, § 13, he is cited by Ulpian. It was Ant. Augustinus who (Eminent. 3, 9) first brought these passages into notice, and rescued the name of Cartiliius from oblivion. In the former passage the Halyandrian editions of the Digest have Cartillius, and, in the latter, an early corrector of the Florentine manuscript, not being familiar with the name Cartiliius, enclosed it in brackets as a mark of condemnation.

The jurist Cartiliius is evidently different from the Cartilius, not Cartiliius Severus, who was pontifex of Syria, prefect of urbi, and great-grandfather of the emperor M. Antoninus. (Plin. Ep. i. 23; ii. 12; Spart. Inscrip. 5, 15, 29; Capitol. Ant. Pius 2; M. Ant. 1; Dion Cass. ix. 21.) The name of this Cartiliius appears in the Fasti, A. D. 121, as consul for the second time, three years after the death of Trajan. His first consulate does not appear in the Fasti, and therefore it may be inferred that he was consul suffectus. If the rescript of Trajan, cited Dig. 29, tit. 1, s. 24, were addressed, according to the Halyandrian reading, to Cartiliius Severus, it is probably referable to the Cartiliius Severus, who was consul of the procurator succeeding his first consulate. (Bert. 22, 21, 1, Minucius, ii. p. 237—238.) [J. T. G.]

CARTIMANDUA, or CARTISMANDUA, queen of the Brigantes in Britain, about A. D. 50, in which year she treacherously delivered up to the Romans Caractacus, who had come to seek her of the troops was confirmed by the senate. The new ruler, soon after his accession, gained a victory over the Sarmatians, who had invaded Illyricum and were threatening Thrace and even Italy itself. Having conferred the title of Caesar upon both his sons, he nominated Carinus, the elder, governor of all the Western provinces, and, accompanied by Numerianus, the younger, set out upon an expedition against the Persians which had been planned by his predecessor. The campaign which followed was most glorious for the Roman arms. The enemy, distracted by internal dissensions, were unable to oppose a vigorous resistance to the invaders. All Mesopotamia was quickly occupied; —Seleucia and Ctesiphon were forced to yield. But the career of Carus, who was preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris, was suddenly cut short, for he perished by disease, or treachery, or, as the ancient historians commonly report, by a stroke of lightning, towards the close of 285, after a reign of little more than sixteen months. The account of his death, transmitted by his secretary Junius Calpurnius to the prefect of the city, is unaccountable, and mysterious that we can scarcely avoid the surmise that his end was hastened by foul play, and suspicion has rested upon Arrius Aper, who was afterwards put to death by Diocletian on the charge of having murdered Numerianus.

According to the picture drawn by the Augustan historian, Carus held a middle rank between those preeminent in virtue or in vice, being neither very bad nor very good, but rather good than bad. His character undoubtedly stood high before his elevation to the throne; no credit is to be attached to the rumour that he was accessory to the death of his benefactor, Probus, whose murderers he sought out and punished with the sternest justice, and the short period of his sway was unainted by any great crime. But the atrocities of Carinus threw a shade over the memory of his father, whom men could not forgive for having bequeathed his power to such a son. (Vopiscus: Carus; Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxxviii., Epit. xxxviii.; Zonar. xii. 30; Evrop. ix. 12.)

CARUS, JULIUS, one of the murderers of T. Vitius when Galba was put to death in A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 42.)

CARUS, METIUS, one of the most infamous informers under Domitian. (Tac. Agric. 45; Juv. i. 35; Marull. xi. 25; Plin. Ep. i. 5, vii. 10, 27.)

CARUS, SELIUS, son of Fasciarius, at one time praefectus urbi, was put to death by Elagabalus under the pretext that he had stirred up a mutiny among some of the soldiers quartered in the camp under the Alban Mount, but in reality because he was rich, elevated in station, and high in intellect. He was brought to trial in the palace and there executed, no one appearing to give evidence against him except his accuser the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 4.)
CARYATIS (Καρυάτις), a surname of Artemis, derived from the town of Caryae in Laconia. Here the statue of the goddess stood in the open air, and maidens celebrated a festival to her every year with dances. (Paus. iii. 10. § 5, iv. 16. § 5; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. viii. 30.)

CARYSTIUS, ANTYGONUS. [ANTIGONUS of CARYSTUS.]

CARYSTIUS (Καρύστιος), a Greek grammarian of Pergamus, who lived after the time of Nicander (Athen. xv. p. 684), and consequently about the end of the second century B.C. He is mentioned as the author of several works: 1. Iotopoeia ὑπογραφά, sometimes also called simply ὑπογραφά, an historical work of which great use was made by Athenaeus, who has preserved a considerable number of statements from it. (I. p. 24, x. p. 434, &c., xi pp. 506, 508, xii. pp. 542, 548, xiii. pp. 577, xiv. p. 639; comp. Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 573, ad Theocrit. xiii. 22.) It must have consisted of at least three books, as the third is referred to by Athenaeus. 2. Περί διδασκαλίας, that is, an account of the Greek dramas, of the time and place of their performance, of their success, and the like. (Athen. vi. p. 255; the Greek Life of Sophocles.) 3. Περί Χρήσεως, or a commentary on the poet Sotades. (Athen. xiv. p. 620.) All these works are lost.

CARYSTUS (Καρυστός), a son of Chersion and Charicle, from whom the town of Carystus in Euboea was believed to have derived its name. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 181; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 281.) [L. S.]

CASCA, the name of a plebeian family of the Servilia gens.

1. SERVILIUS CASCA, was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 212. In that year M. Postumius, a farmer of the public revenue, and a relation of Casca, was accused of having defrauded the republic, and his only hope of escaping condemnation was Casca, who, however, was either too honest or too timid to interpose on his behalf. (Liv. xxxv. 3.)

2. SERVILIUS CASCA, one of the conspirators against Caesar, who aimed the first stroke at his assassination, B.C. 44. He was in that year tribune of the plebs, and soon afterwards fled from Rome, as he anticipated the revenge which Octavianus was going to take. His leaving Rome as tribune was against the constitution, and his colleague, P. Titius, accordingly carried a decree in the assembly of the people, by which he was deprived of his tribunship. He fought in the battle of Philippi, and died shortly afterwards. (Appian B. C. ii. 113, 115, 117; Dion Cass. xiv. 32; xvi. 45; C. Cass. xiii. 16, ad Att. i. 17, ad Brut. i. 18; Plut. Brut. 17, 45.)

3. C. SERVILIUS CASCA, the son of the preceding, and a friend of Caesar, notwithstanding which he was likewise one of the conspirators against the life of the dictator. (Appian, B. C. ii. 119; Plut. Cæs. 66; Suet. Cæs. 32; Dion Cass. xiv. 32; C. Philipp. ii. 11.)

CASCELLIUS.

The foregoing coin of the Servilia gens belongs either to No. 2 or No. 3; it contains on the obverse the head of Neptune, and on the reverse a figure of Victory.

A. CASCELLIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, contemporary with Trebatius, whom he exceeded in eloquence, though Trebatius surpassed him in legal skill. Their contemporary, Ofilius, the disciple of Servius Sulpicius, was more learned than either. Casscellius, according to Pliny the Elder (H. N. viii. 40), was the disciple of one Volcatius, who, on a certain occasion, was saved by a dog from the attack of robbers. Pomponius (Dig. 1, tit. 2, s. 2, § 45), according to the Florentine manuscript, writes thus—"Fuit Casscellius, Macrius, Volcatius auctor: denique in illius honorum testamento P. Macrius nepotem ejus reliquit Aquedum." This may be understood to mean that, at the end of a long life, Casscellius made the grandson of his fellow-pupil his heir, but a man is more likely to honour his preceptor than his fellow-pupil, and, on this construction, the Latinity is harsh, both in the use of the singular for the plural, and in the reference of the word illius to the former of the two names, Macrius and Volcatius, which are connected merely by collocation. Hence the conjectural reading of Baldusius adopted by Bertranarius (C. c. 2, 19), viz. "Fuit Casscellius Macrii et Volcatii auctor," has gained the approbation of many critics.

Casscellius was a man of stern republican principles: of Caesar's proceedings he spoke with the utmost freedom. Neither hope nor fear could induce him, B.C. 41, to compose legal forms for the donations of the triumvirs, the fruits of their prescriptions, which he looked upon as wholly irregular and illegal. His independence and liberty of speech he ascribed to two things, which most men regarded as misfortunes, old age and childlessness. In offices of honour, he never advanced beyond the first step, the quaestorship, though he survived to the reign of Augustus, who offered him the consulship, which he declined. (Val. Max. vi. 2, § 12, Dig. 1, c.)

Casscellius is frequently quoted at second hand in the Digest, especially by Javolenus. In Dig. 35, tit. 1, s. 40, s. 1, and 32, s. 100, § 1, we find him differing from Ofilius. In the latter passage, the case proposed was this:—A man leaves by will two specific marble statues, and all his marble. Do his other marble statues pass? Casscellius thought not, and Labeo agreed with him, in opposition to Ofilius and Trebatius.

In Dig. 38, tit. 5, s. 17, § 5, the following word occurs in a quotation from Ulpian, "Labeo quarto Postumium scribit, cum Aesines, vel Aulus, utopia probable, notatur." For Aulus here it is not unlikely that Paulus ought to be read, for Casscellius is no where else in the Digest called Aulus simply. Moreover, he was of older standing than Labeo, and the only work of Casscellius extant in the time of Pomponius (who was anterior to Ulpian), was a book of legal bons mots (beneficiorum liber).

In conversation, Casscellius was graceful, amusing, and witty. Several of his good sayings are preserved. When a client, wishing to secure a partnership in a ship, said to him, "Navem dividere volo," his answer was, "You will destroy your ship." He probably remembered the story of the analogous quibble on the words of a treaty, which, to the disgrace of the Romans, deprived Antiochus the Great of his whole fleet. Vatinian, an unpopular personage, for whom it is to be presumed that Casselius had not great liking, had been peered with stones at a gladiatorial show, and consequently got a clause inserted in the edict of the aediles, "ne quis in arenam nisi pomen mitretur." About this time, the question was put to Casselius, whether a man's fruits were a pomus, it being a legal doubt whether fruits with hard as well as with soft, external rind, were included in the term. "Si in Vatinium misauras ex pomum est." (Quintil. vi. 3; Macrobr. Sativra. ii. 6.)

Horace (Ars Poet. 371, 372) pays a compliment to the established legal reputation of Casselius—

"—nec scit quantum Casselius Aulus, Et tumen in probo est." The old scholar on this passage remarks, that Gellius mentions Casselius with praise, but this seems to be a mistake, unless the lost portions of Gellius should bear out the scholar's assertion. He probably rewards the jurist with Cassellian Vindex, the grammarian, who is frequently cited by Gellius. The name of the jurist is often corruptly spelt Casselius, Ceselius, &c.

When an interdictum recperandae possessionis was followed by an action on a sponso, if the claimant were successful in recovering on the sponso, he was entitled as a consequence to the restitution of possession by what was called the Cassellianum or secturium judicium. (Onius. iv. 106, 169.) It is likely that this judicium was devised by A. Casselius.

Cicero (pro Balbo. 20) and Val. Maximius (viii. 12. § 1) say, that Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, a most accomplished lawyer, when he was consulted concerning jus praedialium, used to refer his clients to Furius and Casselius, who, being themselves praediiatores, and consequently personally interested in that part of the law, had made it their peculiar study. The quotations from our Casselius in the Digest, do not point to praedialium law, and a consideration of dates goes far to prove, that Casselius praediiator, was not our jurist, but perhaps his father. The old augur died when Cicero was very young, but our Casselius might still have been a child.

CA'SILUS. [Kasios], a surname of Zeus, derived from mount Casion not far from Pelaia, on which the god had a temple. (Strab. xvi. p. 760; Plin. H. N. iv. 20, v. 14.)

CA'SILUS. [Cadilus].

CA'SILUS, a centurion who served under the praefect Caelius Pollio, and commanded the garrison of a stronghold called Gomene in a. d. 52, during a war between the Armenians and Hiber- rians. Caelius Pollio acted the part of a traitor towards the Armenians, but found an honest oppo- nent in Casselius, who endeavoured, though in vain, to induce the Hiberrians to raise the siege. In a. d. 62 we find him still serving as centurion in Armenia, and Corbill sent him as ambassador to Vologeses to expostulate with him respecting his conduct. (Tac. Ann. xii. 45, 5.) [L. S.]

CASSANDRENE (Κασσανδρέη), a Persian lady of the family of the Achaeomkenae, daughter of Pharnaces, who married Cyrus the Great, and became the mother of Cassander and, after the death of her husband, who much lamented her loss, and ordered a general mourning in her honour. (Herod. ii. i, iii. 2.) [E. E.]

CASSANDRENE (Κασσανδρέη). 1. King of Maced- onia, and son of Antipater, was 35 years old before his father's death, if we may trust an incidental notice to that effect in Athenaeus, and must, therefore, have been born in or before n. c. 334. (Athen. i. p. 18 a.; Droysen, Gesch. der Nach- folger Alexanders, p. 255.) His first appearance in history is on the occasion of his being sent from Macedonia to Alexander, then in Babylon, to defend his father against his accusers: here, according to Plutarch (Alex. 74), Cassander was so struck by the sight, to him new, of the Persian ceremonial of prostration, that he could not restrain his laughter, and the king, incensed at his rudeness, is said to have seized him by the hair and dashed his head against the wall. Allowing for some exaggeration in this story, it is certain that he met with some treatment from Alexander which left on his mind an indelible impression of terror and hatred,—a feeling which perhaps nearly as much as ambition urged him afterwards to the destruction of the royal family. The story ascribed Alexander's death to poison [see pp. 201, 320], spoke also of Cassander as the person who brought the deadly water to Babylon. With respect to the satyr of Caria, which is said by Diodorus, Justin, and Curtius to have been given to Cassander among the arrangements of n. c. 323, the confusion between the names Cassander and Asander is pointed out in p. 379, a. (Comp. Dio. xviii. 83.) On Posphephon's being appointed to succeed Antipater in the regency, Cass- ander was confirmed in the secondary dignity of Chilarch (see Wess. ad Diol. xviii. 48; Pollag. Mon. 133; 140). A century or more after his time his name has been conferred on him by his father, that he might serve as a check on Antigonus, when (n. c. 321) the latter was entrusted by Antipater with the command of the forces against Eumenes. Being, however, dissatisfied with this arrangement, he strengthened himself by an alliance with Ptolemy Lagis and Antigonus, and entered into war with Posphephon. For the operations of the contending parties at Athens in n. c. 318, see p. 135 b. The failure of Posphephon at Megalopolis, in the same year, had the effect of bringing over most of the Greek states to Cassander, and Athens also surrendered to him, on condition that she should keep her city, territory, revenues, and ships, only continuing the ally of the conqueror, who should be allowed to retain Manychia till the end of the war. He at the same time settled the Athenian constitution by establishing 10 minae (half the sum that had been appointed by Antipater) as the qualification for the full rights of citizenship (see Bächl, Publ. Econ. of Athens, l. 7, iv. 3); and the union of clemency and energy which his general conduct exhibited, is said to have procured him many adherents. While, however, he was success- fully advancing his cause in the south, intelliunceasing cruelty of Cassander without his talent and decision, he was bribed by the latter, who promised him among other things the government of the Peloponnesus, to murder the young prince and his mother, B. 509. [Barnes, No. 1.] At this time the only places held by Cassander in Greece were Athens, Corinth, and Sicyon, the two latter of which were betrayed to Ptolemy by Cratesipolis, in B. 388; and in 307, Athens was recovered by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, from Demetrius the Phleecian, who had held it for Cassander from B. 318, with the specious title of "Guardian" (πυρης). In B. 306, when Antigonus, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy took the name of king, Cassander was saluted with the same title by his subjects, though according to Plutarch (Dem. 18) it he did not assume it himself in his letters. During the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius in 305, Cassander sent supplies to the besieged, and took advantage of Demetrius being thus employed to assail again the Greek cities, occupying Corinth with a garrison of 30,000 men, and sending a treaty to Athens. But, in B. 304, Demetrius having concluded a peace with the Rhodians, obliged him to raise the siege and to retreat to the north, whether, having made himself master of southern Greece, he advanced against him. Cassander first endeavoured to obtain peace by an application to Antigonus, and then failing in this, he induced Lysimachus to effect a diversion by carrying the war into Asia against Antigonus, and sent also to Seleucus and Ptolemy for assistance. Meanwhile Demetrius, with far superior forces remained unaccountably inactive in Thessaly, till, being summoned to his battles in Asia, he came to the assistance of Cassander, who was said by Cassander, providing nominally for the independence of all Greek cities, and passed into Asia, B. 302. In the next year, 301, the decisive battle of Ipsus, in which Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated and the former slain, relieved Cassander from his chief cause of apprehension. After the battle, the four kings (Seleucus, Cassander, Antigonus, and Lysimachus) divided among them the dominions of Antigonus as well as what they already possessed; and in this division Macedonia and Greece were assigned to Cassander. (Comp. Daniel, viii.; Polyb. v. 67; App. Bell. Syr. p. 123, ed. Reis. To B. 296 or 297 Cassander's invasion of Asia, which had remained free since its deliverance by Demetrius, B. 303, from the Spartan adventurer Cleonymus (Comp. Liv. x. 2; Dio. 105), and which may perhaps have been ceded to Cassander as a set-off against Demetrius' occupation of Cilicia, from which he had driven Cassander's brother Pilestratus. The island, however, was delivered by Agathocles of Syracuse, who compelled Cassander to withdraw from it. In B. 280, we find him carrying on his intrigues in southern Greece, and assailing Athens and Elatea in Phocis, which were successfully defended by Olympiodorus, the Athenian, with assistance from the Aetolians. Not being able therefore to succeed by force of arms, Cassander encouraged Lachares to seize the tyranny of Athens, whence however Demetrius expelled him; and Cassander's plans were cut short by his death, which was caused by dropy in the autumn of B. 297, as Droysen places it; Clinton refers it to 295. (Diod. xvii.—xx. xxi. Exc. 2; Plut. Phocion, Pyrrhus, Demetrius;
2. A Corinthian, who with his countryman Agathynus, having unsuspiciously entered the port of Leucas with four ships of Taurion's squadron, was treacherously seised there by the Illyrians, and sent to Scerdilaidas the Illyrian king. The latter had thought himself wronged by Philip V. of Macedon, in not receiving the full sum agreed on for his services in the social war, and had sent out by cutters to pay himself by Piraeus, n. c. 218. (Polyb. v. 92.)

3. An Aeginetan, who, at the Achaean congress, held at Megapolis, n. c. 186, followed Apollonides in dissuading the assembly from accepting the 120 talents proffered them as a gift by king Eumenes II. [See p. 237, a.] He reminded the Acheans, that the Aeginetans, in consequence of their adherence to the league, had been conquered and enslaved by P. Sulpicius (n. c. 206), and that their island, having been given up by Rome to the Aetolians, had been sold by them to Attalus, the father of Eumenes. He called on Eumenes to show his good-will to the Aeginetans, by the return of their possessions of Aegina than by gifts of money, and he urged the assembly not to receive presents which would prevent their ever attempting the deliverance of the Aeginetans. The money of the king of Pergamus was refused by the congress. (Polyb. xi. 6, xxiii. 7, 8, comp. Liv. xxxii. 33; Plut. Arat. 34.)

4. An officer in the service of Philip V. of Macedon, whom the king, exasperated by the Romans calling on him to give up Annas and Marcus in Thrace, employed as his chief instrument in the cruel massacre of the Maronites, n. c. 185. Being desired by the Romans to send Cassander to Rome for examination before the senate on the subject of the massacre, he caused him to be poisoned on his way, in Epirus, to prevent any untoward revelations. (Polyb. xxiii. 13, 14; Liv. xxxiv. 27, 34.) [E. B.]

CASSANDRA (Κασσάνδρα), also called Alexander (Paus. iii. 19. § 5, 26. § 3), was the fairest among the daughters of Priam and Hecabe. There are two points in her story which have furnished the ancient poets with ample materials to dilate upon. The first is her prophetic power, concerning which we have the following traditions: Cassandra and Hellenus, when yet children, were left by their parents in the sanctuary of the Thymbraean Apollo. The next morning they were found entwined by serpents, which were occupied with purifying them. Cassander was capable of understanding the divine sounds of nature and the voices of birds, and of thereby learning the future. (Tzet. Argum. ad Lyceoph.; Bustadh. ad Hom. p. 663.) After Cassandra had grown up, she once again spent a night in the temple of the god. He attempted to surprise her, but as she resisted him, he punished her by causing her prophecies, though true, to be disbelieved by men. (Hygin. Fab. 53.) According to another version, Apollo initiated her in the art of prophecy on condition of her yielding to his desires. The maiden promised to comply with his wishes, but did not keep her word, and the god then ordained that no one should believe her prophecies. (Aeschyl. Agam. 1207; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 247.) This misfortune is the cause of the tragic part which Cassandra acts during the Trojan war: she continually announces the calamities which are coming, without any one giving heed to what she says; and even Priam himself looks upon her as a mad woman, and has her shut up and guarded. (Tzet. t. c.; Lyceoph. 359; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 246.) It should, however, be remarked, that Homer knows nothing of the confinement of Cassandra, and in the Iliad she appears perfectly free. (Ili. xxiv. 200; comp. Od. xi. 421, &c.) During the war Olympos of Cabeus sued for her hand, but was slain by Idomeneus (Ili. x iii. 368); afterwards Corebus did the same, but he was killed in the taking of Troy. (Paus. x. 27. § 1; Virg. Aen. ii. 314, 425.)

The second point in her history is her fate at and after the taking of Troy. She fled into the sanctuary of Athena, and embraced the statue of the goddess as a suppliant. But Ajax, the son of Oileus, tore her away from the temple, and according to some accounts, even ravished her in the sanctuary. (Strab. vi. p. 264; comp. Ajax.) When the Greeks divided the booty of Troy, Cassandra was given to Agamemnon, who, in her capture, had committed the crime of rape. Her beauty was killed by Clytaemnestra, and Agamemnon put to death her children by Agamemnon, Telemaeus, and Polypoetes. (Aeschyl. Agam. 1260; Paus. ii. 16. § 5; Hom. H. iii. 365, xxiv. 699; Od. xi. 420.) She had a statue at Amyca, and a temple with a statue at Laconia. (Paus. iii. 19. § 5, 26. § 3.) Her tomb was either at Amyca or Mycenae (ii. 16. § 3), for the two towns disputed the possession of it.

There is another mythical heroine Cassandra, who was a daughter of Iobates, king of Lyca. (Schol. ad Hom. H. vi. 153; comp. Bellero-phon. 11. 2.)

CASSIA GENUS, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian. We have mention of only one patrician of this gens, Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, consul in B. C. 502, and the proposer of the first agrarian law, who was put to death by the patri- cians. As all the Cassii after his time are plebeians, it is not improbable either that the patri- cians expelled them from their order, or that they aban- doned it on account of the murder of Viscellinus. The Cassia gens was reckoned one of the noblest in Rome; and members of it are constantly mentioned under the empire as well as during the republic. (Comp. Tac. Ann. vi. 15.) The chief family in the time of the republic bears the name of LONGINUS: the other cognomina during that time are EMINA, FARMENISI, NAVILLA, SARACO, VARUS, VISCELINUS. Under the empire, the same family bore the names of other cognomina, but the list is given below. The few persons of this gens mentioned without any cognomina are given under CASSIUS.
CASSIANUS.

CASSIANUS (Κασσιανός), a Christian writer who was, according to Clements of Alexandria (ep. Hieron. Caten. Script. Ecles. 38), the author of a chronological work (χρονοργαφία). He may be the same as the Julius Cassianus from whose work "De Continentin" a fragment is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Ecles. vi. 15), and is perhaps also no other person than the Cassianus whose first book of a work entitled Αποτραχήλα is quoted by Clements of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 136). [1. 5.]

CASSIANUS, otherwise called JOANNES MASSILIENSIS and JOANNES EREMITA, is celebrated in the history of the Christian church as the champion of Semi-pelagianism, as one of the first founders of monastic fraternities in Western Europe, and as the great lawyer by whose codes such societies were long regulated. The date of his birth cannot be determined with certainty, although A. D. 360 must be a close approximation, and the place is still more doubtful. Some have fixed upon the shores of the Euxine, others upon Syria, others upon the South of France, and all alike appeal for confirmation of their views to particular expressions in his works, and to the general character of his phrasology. Without pretending to decide the question, it seems on the whole most probable that he was a native of the East. At a very early age he became an inmate of the monastery of Bethlehem, where he received the first elements of religious instruction, and formed with a monk named Germanus an intimacy which exercised a powerful influence over his future career. In the year 390, accompanied by his friend, he travelled into Egypt, and after having passed seven years among the Ascetics who swarmed in the deserts near the Nile, conforming to all their habits and usages, he returned for a short period to Bethlehem, but very soon again retired to consort with the brethren of the Thebaid. In 403 he repaired to Constantinople, attracted by the fame of Chrysostom, and received ordination as deacon from his hands.

When that great prelate was driven by persecution from his see, Cassianus and Germanus were employed by the friends of the patriarch to lay a statement of the case before Pope Innocent I., and since Pelagius is known to have been at Rome about this period, it is highly probable that some personal intercourse may have taken place between him and his future opponent. From this time there is a blank in the history of Cassianus until the year 415, when we find him established as a presbyter at Marseilles, where he passed the remainder of his life in godly labours, having founded a convent for nuns and the celebrated abbey of St. Victor, which while under his control is said to have numbered five thousand inmates. These two establishments long preserved a high reputation, and served as models for many similar institutions in Gaul and Spain.

The exact year of his death is not known, but the event must be placed after 433, at least the chronicle of Prosper represents him as being alive at that epoch. He was eventually canonized as a saint, and a great religious festival used to be celebrated in honour of him at Marseilles on the 25th of July.

The writings of Cassianus now extant are —

1. De Institutis Comes, from Libri XII., composed before the year 418 at the request of Castor (CASTOR), bishop of Apt, who was desirous of obtaining accurate information with regard to the rules by which the cloisters in the East were governed. This work is divided into two distinct parts. The first four books relate exclusively to the mode of life, discipline, and method of performing sacred offices, pursued in various monasteries; the remainder contain a series of discourses upon the eight great sins into which mankind in general and monks in particular are especially liable to fall, such as gluttony, pride, passion, and the like. Hence Photinus (Cod. exvii.) quotes these two sections as two separate treatises, and this arrangement appears to have been adopted to a certain extent by the author himself. (See Prael. Collatt. and Collat. xx. 1.) The subdivision of the first part into two, proposed by Gennadius, is unnecessary and perplexing.

2. "Collationes Patrum XXIV.," twenty-four sacred dialogues between Cassianus, Germanus, and Egyptian monks, in which are developed the spirit and object of the monastic life, the end sought by the external observances previously described. These were composed at different periods between 419 and 427. The first ten are inscribed to Leontius, bishop of Frejus, and to Hollandus, abbot of St. Castor, the following seven to Honoratus, afterwards bishop of Arles, the last seven to Jovinianus, Minervius, and other monks. In the course of these conversations, especially in the 13th, we find an exposition of the peculiar views of Cassianus on certain points of dogmatic theology, connected more especially with original sin, predestination, free-will, and grace, constituting the system which has been termed Semi-pelagianism because it steered a middle course between the extreme positions occupied by St. Augustine and Pelagius; for although he maintained that man was by nature utterly corrupt and incapable of everything from his lost state by any efforts of his own, the latter held, that the new-born infant was in the state of Adam before the fall, hence morally pure and capable in himself of selecting between virtue and vice; while Cassianus, rejecting the views of both, asserted, that the natural man was neither morally dead nor morally sound, but morally sick, and therefore stood in need of medical aid, that aid being the Grace of God. Moreover, according to his doctrines, it is necessary for man of his own free will to seek this aid in order to be made whole, but at the same time the free-will of man cannot set limits to the Grace of God which may be exerted on behalf of those who seek it not, as in the case of the Apostle Paul and others. Cassianus certainly rejected absolute predestination and the limitation of justification to the elect, but his ideas upon these topics are not very clearly expressed. Those who desire full information with regard to Semi-pelagian tenets will find them fully developed in the works enumerated at the end of this article.

3. "De Incarnatione Christi Libri VII.," a controversial tract in connection of the Nestorian heresy, drawn up about 430 at the request of Leo, at that time archdeacon and afterwards bishop of Rome.

The following essays have been ascribed erroneously, or at all events upon insufficient evidence, to Cassianus:—"De spirituali Medicina Monachi seu Doxis medica ad eximiantos Animi Afflictos!"; "Theologiae Confassio et De Conficiet Viitorum et Virtutum;" "Vita S. Victoris Martyris," etc. There are no grounds for believing that he wrote, as some have asserted, a Regula Monastica, now lost.

The attentive reader of this father will soon perceive that he was thoroughly engaged with his subject, and paid so little attention to the graces of style that his writings are often careless and slovenly. At the same time his diction, although it bears but in words and in construction a barbaric stomp deeply impressed, is far superior to that of many of his contemporaries, since it is plain, simple, unaffected, and intelligible, devoid of the fantastic conceits, shabby finery, and coarse paint, under which the literature of that age so often strove to hide its awkwardness, feebleness, and deformity.

The earliest edition of the collected works of Cassianus is that of Basle, 1558, fol., in a volume containing also Joannes Damascenus. It was reprinted at Basle in 1561, 1569, 1575, and 1581, the latter by the edition of Antwerp, 1578, 8vo. The most complete and best edition is that printed at Frankfort, 1722, fol., with the commentaries and preliminary dissertations of the Benedictine Gauzeus (Gazet), and reprinted at Leipzig in 1733, fol. The edition superintended by Gazet himself was published at Douay in 1618, 3 vols, fol., and again in an enlarged form at Arras in 1625.

The Institutiones appeared at Basle in 1485 and 1497, fol., and at Leyden, 1516, fol. The existence of the Venice edition of 1481, mentioned by Fabricius, is doubtful.

The Institutiones and Collationes appeared at Venice, 1491, fol.; at Bologna, 1521, 8vo.; at Leyden, 1528, 8vo.; at Rome, 1583 and 1611, 8vo.

The De Inscriptionibus, first published separately at Basle in 1534, and reprinted at Paris in 1545 and 1569, is included in Simler's "Scriptores veteres Latini de una Persona et duabus Naturis Christi," Zurich, 1762, fol.

There is a translation of the Institutiones into Italian by Buff, a monk of Camaldoli, Venice, 1563, 4to., of the Collationes into French by De Saligny, Paris, 1663, 8vo., and of the Institutiones, also by De Saligny, Paris, 1687, 8vo.

CASSIA'NUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

CASSIEPÆIA or CASSIEPÔA (Kassiepês or Kassiepês), the wife of Cepheus in Aethiopia, and mother of Andromeda, whose beauty she extolled above that of the Nereids. This pride became the cause of her misfortunes, for Poseidon sent a monster into the country which ravaged the land, and to which Andromeda was to be sacrificed. But Perseus saved her life. (Hygin. Fab. 64; comp. ANDROMÉDA.) According to other accounts Cassiepea boasted that she herself surpassed the Nereids in beauty, and was presented, when placed among the stars, as turning backwards. (Arat. Phœn. 187, &c.; Manil. Astron. i. 335.) [L. S.]

CASSIODOR'US, MAGNUS AUREL'LIUS, or CASSIODOR'IUS, for the MSS. vary between these two forms of the name, although the former has been generally adopted, was born about A. D. 468, at Seylacum (Squaliae), in the country of the Bruttii, of an ancient, honourable, and wealthy Roman family. His father was at one period secretary to Valentinian the Third, but retired from public life upon the death of that prince and lived at Rome. The first work of Cassiodorus was an Historia de Nilus, which, as it is said, was discovered and presented to him by the Emperor Theodoric. He resided at Rome till the year 519, when he was sent to hermitage of the monastery of Viviers (Conobium Vivarienses, Castellensa), and was assigned to the charge of the monastery of Viviers (Conobium Vivarienses, Castellensa), and passed the remainder of his life, which was prolonged until he had nearly completed a century, in the seclusion of the eloi; her. His activity of mind was no less conspicuous than when engaged in the stirring business of the world, and his efforts were directed towards the accomplishment of designs not less important. The great object which he kept steadily in view and prosecuted with infinite labor and unceasing vigor was to elevate the standard of education among ecclesiastics by inducing them to study the models of classical antiquity, and to extend their knowledge of general literature and science. To accomplish this he formed a library, disbursed large sums in the purchase of MSS., encouraged the monks to copy those with care, and devoted a great portion of his time to labour of this description and to the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the seven liberal arts, and divinity, which have rendered him not less celebrated as an author and a man of learning than as a politician and a statesman. The leisure hours which remained part in part in the construction of philosophical toys, such as sun-dials, water-clocks, everlasting lamps, and the like. The benefit derived from his precepts and example was by no means confined to the establishment over which he presided, nor to the epoch when he flourished. The same system, the advantages of which were soon perceived and appreciated, was gradually introduced into similar institutions, the transcription of ancient works became one of the regular and stated occupations of the monastic life, and thus, in all probability, we are indirectly indebted to Cassiodorus for the preservation of a large proportion of the most precious works of antiquity. The following is a list of all the writings of Cassiodorus with which we are acquainted:

1. "Variorum (Epistolarium) Libri XII.", an assemblage of state papers drawn up by Cassiodorus in accordance with the instructions of the sovereigns whom he served. In the first ten books the author always speaks in the person of the ruler for the time being; in the last two, in his own. The first five contain the ordinances of Theodoric, the sixth and seventh regulations (formulae) with regard to the chief offices of the kingdom, the eighth, ninth, and tenth, the decrees promulgated by the sovereign himself or by the nobles; the eleventh and twelfth the edicts published by Cassiodorus himself during the years 534—538, when prefect of the prætorium. This collection is of the greatest historical importance, being our chief and most trustworthy source of information in regard to everything connected with the constitution and internal discipline of the Ostrogothic dominion in Italy. We must not, however, expect to find much that is attractive or worthy of imitation in the style of these documents. While we cannot help admiring the ingenuity displayed in the selection and combination of phrases, moulded for the most part into neat and agreeable artificial forms, and polished with patient toil, we at the same time feel heartily wearied and disgusted by the sustained affectation and declamatory glitter which disfigure every page. The language is full of strange and foreign words, and little attention is paid to the delicacies of syntax, but Funcius is too harsh when he designates it as a mere mass of Gothic solemnities. Perhaps the best description which can be given of the general effect produced upon the reader by these compositions is contained in the happy expression of Tirabosco, who characterizes the diction of Cassiodorus as "barbara eleganza."

The Editio Princeps of the "Variorum" was printed under the inspection of Accursius by Henr. Silicenus, at Augsburg, in the month of May, 1383. For the disquisition "De Anima" being included in the same volume.

2. "Chronicon," a dull, pompous, clumsy summary of Universal History, extending from the creation of the world down to a. n. 519, derived chiefly from Eusebius, Hieronymus, Prosper, and other authorities still accessible. It was drawn up in obedience to the orders of Theodoric, and by no means deserves the respect with which it was regarded in the middle ages, since it is carelessly compiled and full of mistakes.

3. "Historiae Ecclesiasticae Triparim ab et Epphanio Scholastico Veris, per Theodoto ab Epitomen Senorem in Epitomen redactae Libri XII." The origin of this work is sufficiently explained by the title. It contains a complete survey of ecclesiastical history from Constantine down to the younger Theodosius. This, like the Chronicon, is of little value in the present day, since the authorities from which it is taken are still extant, and are infinitely superior both in matter and manner to the epitomizer. Prefixed we have an introduction, in which Cassiodorus gives full scope to his taste for inflated grandiloquence. The editio princeps of the Ecclesiastical History was printed by Johannes Schussler, at Augsburg, 1472, fol.

4. "Computus Paschalii sive de Indictionibus, Cyclis Solis et Lunae," s.c., containing the calculations necessary for the correct determination of Easter. This treatise belongs to the date 562, and this is the latest year in which we can prove the author to have been alive.

5. "De Orthographia Liber," compiled by Cassiodorus when 92 years old from the works of nine ancient grammarians,—Agnacus Cornutus, Volus Longus, Curtis Valerianus, Papirianus, Adamantius Martyrius, Euyches, Caeselius, Lucius Cassius Vindex, and Priscianus, in addition to whom we find quotations from Varro, Donatus, and Phocas.

6. "De Arte Grammatica ad Donati Mentem," of which a fragment only has been preserved. This tract, together with the preceding, will be found in the "Grammaticae Latini Auctores antiqui" of Putschius, Hanov. 1605, p. 2275 and p. 2389.

7. "De Artibus ac Discipulis Librarium," in two books, a compilation from the best authorities, much esteemed and studied during the middle ages. It contains a compendium of the seven liberal arts which were at one time supposed to embrace the whole circuit of human knowledge, Angelo Mai has recently published from a Vatican MS. some chapters, hitherto undecided, which seem to have formed the conclusion of the work.

(Cassiodorum Auctorum et Pat. Cod. vol. iii. p. 349.)

8. "De Anima," on the name, origin, nature, qualities, abode, and future existence of the soul, together with speculations upon other topics connected with the same subject.
9. "De Institutione Divinarum Literarum," an introduction to the profitable reading of the Holy Scriptures, intended for the use of the monks. This is perhaps the most pleasing of all our author's works. His profound and varied knowledge is here displayed to the best advantage, his instructions are conveyed in more plain and simple phraseology than he elsewhere employs, while a truly Christian tone and spirit pervades the whole.

10. "Expositio in Cantica Canticorum," also an exposition of the Canticles, and of the Psalms, extensively employed in the Breviary. The work is interspersed with moral reflections, extracted chiefly from the "Enarrationes" of St. Augustine, although we gather from internal evidence that the exegetical treatises of Hilarius, Ambrosius, Hieronymus, and others upon the same subject, had been carefully consulted. As a matter of course we detect in the copy the same features which distinguish the original, the same love of overstrained allegorical interpretation, the same determination to wring from the plainest and least ambiguous precepts some mystical and esoteric doctrine.

11. The "Expositio in Cantica Canticorum," although breathing a spirit similar to the commentaries of Jerome and Bede, is to be distinguished from all MSS. as the production of Cassiodorus, is throughout so different in style and language from all his other dissertations, that its authenticity has with good reason been called in question.

12. "Complexiones in Epistolas Apostolorum, in Acta et in Apocalypsem." Short illustrations of the apostolic Epistles, the Acts, and Revelations, first brought to light by Scipio Maffei, published by him at Florence from a Verona MS. in 1721, and reprinted at London with the notes of Chandler in 1723, and at Rotterdam in 1723, all in 8vo. These annotations are not considered by theologians of any particular value.

In addition to the above we frequently find two treatates included among the writings of Cassiodorus, one a rhetorical essay entitled, 1. De Schematibus et Tropis, and the other "De Amicitia Liber." Of these the former is now generally ascribed to the venerable Bede, while the latter is believed to have been composed by Petrus Blesensis, archdeacon of London, an ecclesiastic of the twelfth century. Among his lost works we may name, 1. "Libri XII De Rebus Gestis Gothorum," known to us only through the abridgment of Jornandes; 2. "Liber Titulorum s. Memorialis," short abstracts, apparently, of chapters in holy writ; 3. "Expositio Epistolae ad Romanos," in which the Pelagian heresy was attacked and confuted. The last two, together with the "Complexiones" and several other treatises already mentioned, are enumerated in the preface to the "De Orthographia Liber."

The first edition of the collected works of Cassiodorus is that published at Paris in 1584, 4to., with the notes of Fornerius; the best and most complete is that published by D. Garet at Rouen, 1679, 2 vols. fol., and reprinted at Venice in 1729.

On his life we have Vitta Cassiodori, prefixed to the edition of Garet; La Vie de Cassiodore avec un Abrégé de l'Histoire des Princes qui l'ont servit et des Événements qui se sont passés au cours de ses Oeuvres, by D. de Sales Martin, Paris, 1694, 8vo.; and Liber Cassiodori, by De Buet, in the first volume of the transactions of the Royal Academy of Munich, p. 79. There is frequently much confusion in biographical disquisitions between Cassiodorus the father and Cassiodorus the son, the former having been supposed by many to be the individual who held office under Odonacer, and the latter not to have been born until 479. But the question seems to be set at rest by the 4th epistle of the 1st book of the Variorum, where the father and son are clearly distinguished from each other; and since the latter unquestionably enjoyed a place of trust under Odonacer, whose downfall took place in 490, the young secretary, although still "adolescent," could not by any possibility have been so old as 479. For re-casting this work he will be found in Osamus, Beiträge zur Gr. und Röm. Literatur Geschichte, vol. ii. p. 160, Cassel 1839. The different dignities with which he was invested are enumerated, and their nature fully explained, in Manso, Geschichte des Ostgotischen Reichs.

CASSIUS (Κασσίος), a daughter of Odysseus by Circe, and sister of Telegonus. After Odysseus had been restored to life by Circe, when he had been killed by Teleomenus, he gave Cassiuphone in marriage to Telemachus, whom, however, she killed, because he had put to death her mother Circe. (Schol. ad Iliad. 750, &c.) [L. S.]

CASSIUS (Κασσίος), a native of Utica, who fought against Cassius in his second campaign against Britain, i. c. 54. He ruled over the country north of the river Tamesis (Thames), and as by his perpetual wars with his neighbours he had acquired the reputation of a great warrior, the Britons gave him the supreme command against the Romans. After the Britons and Romans had fought in several engagements, the former abstained from attacking the Romans with their whole forces, which emboldened Caesar to march into the dominions of Cassivaunum: he crossed the Thames, though its passage had been rendered almost impossible by artificial means, and put the enemy to flight; but he continued to be much harassed by the allies of the Britons from their forests. The Tribunates, however, with whom Cassivaunum had been at war, and some other tribes submitted to the Romans. Through them Caesar became acquainted with the site of the capital of Cassivaunum, which was not far off, and surrounded by forests and marshes. Caesar forthwith made an attack upon the place and took it. Cassivaunum escaped, but as one or two attacks which he made on the naval camp of the Romans were unsuccessful, he spent for peace, which was granted to him on condition of his paying a yearly tribute and giving hostages. (Cass. B. G. vii. 11–33; Dion Cass. xli. 2, 5; Polyb. Hist. vii. 46, 2.) [L. S.]

CASSIUS. 1. C. Cassius, tribune of the soldiers, i. c. 165, to whose custody the Ilyrian king Gentius was entrusted by the praetor Annius, when he fell into the hands of the latter in the Ilyrian war. (Liv. xlv. 31.)

2. L. Cassius, proconsul in Asia in i. c. 80, which province he probably received after his praetorship with the title of proconsul, as we know that he never obtained the consulship itself. In conjunction with M. Aquilius he restored to the archaic rites of the goddess Diana the sacred grove at Niconiana in Bithynia, but when Ariobarzanes was again driven out of his kingdom by Mithridates in the following year, Cassius made preparations to carry on war against the latter. He was, however, obliged to retire before Mithridates, and fled to Rhodes, where he was when Mithridates laid siege to the place. He afterwards fell into the hands of the king of Pontus, though on what occasion is not mentioned, but was restored to freedom at the end of the first Mithridatic war. (Appian, Mithr. 11, 17, 24, 112.)

3. L. Cassius, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 89, at the time of the Marsei war, when the value of landed property was depreciated, and the quantity of money in circulation was comparatively small. Debtors were thus unable to pay the money they owed, and as the praetor A. Sempronius Asellio decided against the debtors in accordance with the old laws, the people became exasperated, and L. Cassius was elected consul in 88 b.c. in order that he might be able to come to a judgment on the case, so that he was at length murdered by the people while offering a sacrifice in the forum. (Val. Max. ix. 7 § 4; comp. Liv. Epit. 74.)

4. Q. Cassius, legate of Q. Cassius Longinus in Spain in n. c. 46, and probably the same to whom Antony gave Spain at the division of the provinces at the end of n. c. 44. (Hirt. B. Aed. 52, 57; Cic. Philipp. iii. 10.)

CASSIUS (Κασσίους), a Sceptic philosopher, who wrote against Zeno the Stoic. (Diog. Laert. vii. 32, 34; Galen, Hypotheses, Empir. 3.) [L. S.]

CASSIUS, AGRIPPA, is called a most learned writer. He lived about 120, and in the reign of Septimius Severus, and wrote against the Gnostic philosophy of the heretics of Baalbled the Gnostic and his son Isidorus. A fragment of this work is preserved in Eusebius. (Hist. Eccl. iv. 7; comp. Hieron. Script. Eccl. 21, Indice. Haeres. 2; Theodor. De Haeret. Pah. i. 4.) [L. S.]

CASSIUS APRONIUS. [APRONIA-

CASSIUS ASCLEPIODOTUS. [ASCLE-PIODOTUS.]

CASSIUS, AVTIUS, one of the most able and successful among the generals of M. Aurélius, was a native of Cyrrhus in Syria, son of a certain Heliodorius, who in consequence of his eminence as a rhetorician had risen to be prefect of Egypt. While Verus was abandoning himself to all manner of profligacy at Antioch, the war against the Parthians was vigorously prosecuted by Cassius, who closed a most glorious campaign by the capture of Seleucia and Ctesiphon. He subsequently quelled a formidable insurrection in Egypt, organized by a tribe of marauders who dwell among the fens; and having been appointed governor of all the Eastern provinces, discharged his trust for several years with fidelity and firmness. The history of his rebellion and his miserable death are narrated under M. Aurélius. If we believe the authentic sources, and write those produced by Gallicanus, the conduct of Cassius excited the suspicion of Verus at a very early period, but Antoninus refused to listen to the representations of his colleague, ascribing them doubtless, and with good cause, to jealousy. (In addition to the notices contained in Dion Cassius lxxi. 2, 21, &c., we have a formal biography from the pen of one of the Augustan historians, named Vulciatus Gallicanus, but the style of this production is not such as to inspire much confidence in its author.) [W. R.]

CASSIUS BABA. [BABA.]

CASSIUS BETILLINUS. [BETILLINUS.]

CASSIUS CHAERA. [CHAERA.]

CASSIUS CLEMENS. [CLEMENS.]

CASSIUS DION. [DION CASSIUS.]

CASSIUS, DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος Κάσσιος), a native of Utica, lived about n. c. 40. He translated the great work of the Carthaginian Mago on agriculture from the Punice into Greek, but in such a manner that he condensed the twenty-eight books of the original into twenty, although he made numerous additions to it from the best Greek writers on agriculture. He dedicated this work to the praetor Sexilius. Diophanes of Bithynia, again, made a useful abridgment of the work in six books, which he dedicated to king Deloearma. The work of Dionysius Cassius is mentioned among those used by Cassianus in compiling the Geoponica at the command of Constantius Proporygeneta (Varro, De Re Rust. i. 1; Columella, i. 1; Athen. xiv. p. 648; Plin. H. N. xx. 44) Geoponica, i. 11.) Cassius also wrote a work Phìgarograph. (Scol. ad NIC. 520; Steph. Byz. v. 3. 'Iræov.) With the exception of the extants in the Geoponica, the works of Cassius have perished. [L. S.]

CASSIUS IATROSOPISTHA, or CAIUSIUS FELIX, the author of a little Greek medical work entitled Ἰατρικάλ Αναπόκειται καὶ Προσωπῶν χρωσμῶν, Καταστάσεως Μεθόδων καὶ Προβλημάτων Ναύταιρα. Nothing is known of the events of his life, nor is it possible to identify him with any other medical writer of the same period. [L. S.]

With respect to his date, it can only be said that he quotes Asclepiades, who lived in the first century B. C., and that he is generally supposed to have lived himself in the first century after Christ. His title Iatrosophiastha is explained in the Dict. of Ant. His work consists of eighty-four questions on medical and physical subjects, with the solutions, and contains much curious matter. It was first published in Greek at Paris, 1541, 12mo., and translated into Latin the same year by Hadrianus Junius, Paris, 4to. A Greek and Latin edition appeared in 1533, 4to. Lips., together with the work of Theophractus Simocatta; and the Greek text alone is inserted in the first volume of Ilder's Physici et Medicis Graeci Minoris, Berol. 1841, 8vo. The work is also to be found in various old editions of Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 169, ed. vet.; Chouan, Handbuch der Bücherkunde für die Alte Medizin.) [W. A. G.]

CASSIUS LONGUS, [LONGUS.]

CASSIUS PARMENIDES, so called, it would appear, from Parma, his birth-place, is in most works upon Roman literature styled C. Cassius Severus Parmenides, but erroneously, since there is no authority whateaver for assigning the praenome of Caius or the cognomen of Severus to this writer.

Hormo (Surt. i. 10, 61), when censuring careless and rapid compositions, exhibits his observations, by referring to a Cassius Eutracus, whom he compares to a river in flood rolling down a turbid torrent, and adds, that the story ran that this poet, his works, and book-boxes, were all consigned together to the flames. Here Aero, Porphyrio, and the Scholast of Cruguax agree in expressly declaring that the person spoken of is Cassius Parmenides, and the latter makes mention of a tragedy by him, called Thysastes, as still extant. Again, Horace (Epia. i. 4. 3), when writing to Albus, who is to his mind beloved to be Tibullus, questions him with regard to his occupations, and asks whether he is writing anything "quod Cassii Parmenidem opuscula vinct." Here the old commentators quoted above again agree in asserting that this Cassius served as tribune of the soldiers in the army of Brutus and Cassius, that he returned to Athens after their defeat, that L. Varus was despatched by Augustus to put him to death, and, after executing the order, carried off his portrait; whence a report became current, that the Thracianpublished by Varus was really the work of Cassius stolen and appropriated by his executioner. To this narrative Acro and the Scholiel of Craquias add, that he composed in various styles, and that his elegies and epigrams were especially admired.

These two passages and the annotations upon them have been the foundation of a lengthened controversy, in which almost all writers upon Roman literature have taken part. A variety of opinions have been expressed and hypotheses propose, many of them supported with great learning and skill. A full account of these will be found in the essay of Welchert "De Lucili Varril et Cassil Parmenis Vita et Carminibus," (Grüme, 1836), who, after patient examination, has shown by many arguments, that the following conclusions are the most probable which the amount and nature of the evidence at our disposal will enable us to form:

1. Cassius Etruscus and Cassius Parmensis were two separate personages. It is the intention of Horace to hold up the first to ridicule, while his words imply a compliment to the second.

2. Cassius Parmensis was one of the conspirators who plotted the death of Caesar. He took an active part in the war against the triumvirs, and, after the defeat and death of Brutus and Cassius, carried over the fleet which he commanded to Sicily, and joined Sextus Pompeius, with whom he seems to have remained up to the period of the great decisive sea-fight between Mylau and Naulochus. He then surrendered himself to Antonius, whose fortunes he followed until after the battle of Actium, when he returned to Athens, and was there put to death by the command of Octavianus. These facts are fully established by the testimony of Appian (B. C. v. 2) and of Valerius Maximus (i. vii. § 7), who tells the tale of the vision by which Cassius was forewarned of his approaching fate, and of Velleius (ii. 80), who distinctly states, that as Trebonius was the first, so Cassius was the second of the number of Cassius who perished by a violent end.

The death of Cassius probably took place about a. d. 30; and this fact alone is sufficient to prove that Cassius Parmensis and Cassius Etruscus were different persons; the former had held a high command in the struggle in which Horace had been himself engaged, and had perished but a few years before the publication of the epistles; the latter is spoken of as one who had been long dead, and almost if not altogether forgotten.

3. We have seen that two of the Scholastes on Horace represent that Cassius composed in different styles. We have reason to believe that he wrote tragedies, that the names of two of his pieces were Thespes and Brutus, and that a line of the latter has been preserved by Varro (L. L. vii. 7, ed. Müller). In like manner, a single line of one of his epigrams is quoted by Quintilian (v. 2, § 24), and a single sentence from an abusive letter addressed to Octavius is to be found in Suetonius (Aug. 4); in addition to which we hear from Pliny of an epistle to Antonius. (Plin. H. N. xxxi. 8). Many persons, and among these Drummian, believe that the letter to be found in Cicero (ad Fam. xii. 13) is from the pen of Cassius Parmensis, and strong arguments may be adduced in support of this opinion; but, on the whole, we are led to conclude from its tone, that it proceeded from some person younger and holding a less distinguished position than Cassius Parmensis at that time occupied.

We have a little poem in hexameters, entitled Orpheus, in which it is set forth, that the Thracian bard, although at first an object of ridicule to his contemporaries, by assiduous study and undeviating perseverance, at length acquired that heavenly skill by which he was enabled to charm the ears of listening rocks and woods, and draw them in his train. These verses were first published by Achilles Stadius in his edition of Suetonius, "de Clar. Rhetor." and we are told by the editor that they were found among the Bruttii and communicated to him by a very learned youth, Suetonius Quodritius; they were published again by Fabricius in his notes to Senec., Hercul. Oct. 1034, as having been discovered anew at Florence by Petrus Victorius, and are to be found in Durmann's Anthologia (i. 112, or n. 112, ed. Meyer), in Wernsdorfr's Poetae Latini Minores (vol. ii. p. 310), and many other collections. Various conflicting opinions were long entertained with regard to the author of this piece, which commonly bears prefixed the name of Cassius Parmensis or Cassius Severus, but is now proved to have been written by Antonius Thylyseus, a native of Cosenza in Calabria, a distinguished poet of the sixteenth century. See the edition of his works by F. Daniele, Naples, 1762, and the authorities quoted by Meyer in his edition of the Anthologia. An edition in a separate form was printed at Frankfort, 1585, 8vo., and two years afterwards "Cassius de Parma his Orpheus with Nathan Chitaeus his commentary abridged into short notes translated by Roger Rawlin of Lincoln's Inn, 8vo. Lond. 1587." [W. R.]

CASSIUS SCAEVA. [SCAEVA.]

CASSIUS SEVERUS. [SEVERUS.]

CASSOTIS (Kaosit), a Parthian nymph, from whom was derived the name of the well Cassotis at Delphi, the water of which gave the priestess the power of prophecy. (Paus. vii. 5. § 5.) [L. S.]

CASTALIA (Kastrala), the nymph of the Castilian spring at the foot of mount Parnassus. She was regarded as a daughter of Aecheleus (Paus. x. 8. § 5), and was believed to have thrown herself into the well when pursued by Apollo. (Lutuct. ad Stat. Theb. i. 697.) Others derived the name of the well from one Castalia, who was either a simple mortal, or a son of Apollo and father of Delphus, who came from Crete to Crissa, and there founded the worship of the Delphian Apollo. (Igen, ad Hom. hymn. in Apollo, p. 94.) A third accounts of the name, without identifying it with the nymph of Thespius. (Paus. vi. 18. § 6, x. 6 § 2.) [L. S.]

CASTALIDES (Kastralides), the Castilian nymphs, by which the Muses are sometimes designated, as the Castilian spring was sacred to them. (Theocr. vii. 148; Martial, vii. 11.) [L. S.]

CASTALIA. [CASTALIA.]

CASTICUS, the son of Catamanteles, a Se- quan, seized the government in his own state, which his father had held before him, at the instigation of Orgetorix, about B. C. 56. (Cass. B. G. i. 5.)
CASTOR.

CASTINUS, a general of the emperor Honorius, who was sent, in a.d. 422, with an army into Spain against the Vandals. At the same time Bonifacius, another general of Honorius, was likewise engaged against the Vandals in Spain, but Castinus offended him so much by his arrogant and impudent conduct, that he withdrew from the war. After the death of Honorius, in a.d. 423, Castinus was believed to be supporting secretly the usurper Joannes; and accordingly when the usurper was put to death in a.d. 425, Castinus was sent into exile. (Prosopographia. Caesar. Dict. 86, ed. Roncalli.) [L. S.]

CASTOR, brother of Polydemes. [DION. CH.] CASTOR, grandson of Deiotarus. [DEIOTAR.] CASTOR (Κάστωρ), either a native of Rhodes, of Messalia, or of Galatia, was a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, who was summoned ὀρθολόγιον, and is usually believed to have lived about the time of Cicero and Julius Caesar. He wrote, according to Suidas (if we adopt the readings of Bernhardy, the last editor): 1. Ἀναγραφὴ τῶν Ἀλκαίου. K. Περὶ ἱστορίας τῶν Ἥβετων. 4. Περὶ τῆς Ἀρρυτοῦς. 6. Τὰ Ἀλκαίου, of which a portion is still extant and printed in Walz's Ἀλκαίου. iii. p. 712, &c. To these works Clinton (Inst. Hell. iii. p. 546) adds a great chronological work (χρονοδιαγραφή), which is referred to several times by Eusebius (Chron. ad Ann. 893, 161, 562, &c., though it is not quite certain whether this is not the same work as the χρονοδιαγραφή mentioned above. He is frequently referred to as an authority in historical matters, though no historical work is specified, so that those references may allude to any of the above-mentioned works. (Buseb. Prosop. Evang. x. 3. Chron. i. 13, p. 36; Justin Mart. Parn. ad Græce, p. 9.) His patriotism to the Romans is indicated by his surname; but in what manner he shewed this partiality is unknown, though it may have been in a work mentioned by Phutarch (Quaest. Rom. 10, 76, comp. De Is. et Os. 31), in which he composed the institutions of the Romans with those of Pythagoras. Suidas describes the grammarian and rhetorician Castor as a son-in-law of the Galatian king Deiotarus (whom, however, he calls a Roman senator!), who notwithstanding afterwards put to death both Castor and his wife, because Castor had brought charges against him before Caesar—evidently alluding to the annexation of which Cicero defended Deiotarus. The Castor whom Suidas thus makes a relative of Deiotarus, appears to be the same as the Castor mentioned by Strabo (xii. p. 568; comp. Caes. B. C. iii. 4) who was summoned Saecundares, was a son-in-law of Deiotarus, and was put to death by him. But it is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether the rhetorician had any connexion with the family of Deiotarus at all. The Castor who brought Deiotarus into peril is expressly called a grandson of that king, and was yet a young man at the time (n. c. 44) when Cicero spoke for Deiotarus. (Cic. pro Deiot. 1, 10.) Now we have seen above that one of the works of Castor is referred to in the Bibliotheca of Apollodorus, who died somewhere about n. c. 140. The conclusion, therefore, must be, that the rhetorician Castor must have lived at or before the time of Apollodorus, at the latest, about n. c. 150, and can have had no connexion with the Deiotar that was Cicero spoke. (Compare Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 202, ed. Westermann; Orelli, Onomast. Toll. ii. p. 128, in both of which there is much confusion about Castor.) [L. S.]

CASTOR (Κάστωρ), a distinguished citizen of Phanagoria, who had once been ill treated by Tryphon, a eunuch of Mithridates the Great. When the king, after his defeat by Pompey, came to Phanagoria, Castor avenged himself by murdering Tryphon. Pompey afterwards honoured him with the title of friend of the Roman people. (Appian. Mithr. 105, 114.) [L. S.]

CASTOR, the chamberlain and confidential adviser of Septimius Severus. Being the most upright of all the courtiers, he became an object of suspicion and hatred to Caracalla, who upon ascending the throne immediately put him to death, having failed in an attempt, during the lifetime of Severus, to destroy him by treachery. (Dion Cass. lxvi. 14, lxvii. 1.) [W. R.]

CASTOR, bishop of Apt, was born at Nimes about the middle of the fourth century, and married an heiress, by whom he had a daughter. The family being fired with holy zeal, agreed to separate in order that they might devote their youth to the endowment of religious establishments, and their lives to seclusion and sanctity. Accordingly, they founded an abbey and a convent in Provence; the husband retired to the former, the wife and her daughter took the veil in the latter. There is still extant a letter addressed by Castor to Cassianus [CASSIANUS], soliciting information with regard to the rules observed in the monasteries of Palestine and Egypt. This request was speedily complied with, and produced the work "Institutiones Coenobiorum," dedicated to Castor, which was followed by the "Collationes Patrum," addressed to his brother, Leontius. The death of Castor took place in September, 419. We are told by Vincent St. Laurent, in the "Biographie Universelle," that at a recent period the archives of the cathedral of Apt contained a MS. life of its canonized prelate, in which were enumerated with circumstantial details all the miracles ascribed to him.

The letter above-mentioned, which is composed in a very rude and harsh style, was first discovered by Gazet, was prefixed to the "Institutiones" in his edition of Cassianus, and republished in a more correct form, from a MS. in the Royal Library at Paris, by Bahuze in his edition of Salvianus and Vincentius Lamiensis, Paris, 1858, 8vo., and in the reprint at Brunen, 1858, 4to.; it is also found in the edition of Vincentius, Paris, 1669. (Schoenemann, Biblioth. Patrum Latin. v. 27.) [W. R.]

CASTOR, ANTÔ'N'US, an eminent botanist at Rome in the first century after Christ, who is several times quoted and mentioned by Pliny. He enjoyed a great reputation, possessed a botanical garden of his own (which is probably the earliest on record), and lived more than a hundred years, in perfect health both of body and mind. (Pln. H. N. xxxv. 5.) [W. A. G.]

CASTOR, PARCONDA'RIUS, of Galatia, with Dorylus, gave 800 footmen to Pompey's army in b.c. 49. (Caes. B. C. iii. 4.)

CASTOR'ION (Καστορίον), of Soli, is mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 454) as the author of a poem on Pan, of which he quotes a fragment: but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]
CATAVATUÆS (Katauátuos), occurs as a surname of several gods. 1. Of Zeus, who is described by it as the god who descends in thunder and lightning. Under this name he had an altar at Olympia. (Paus. v. 14. § 8; Lycophr. 1570.) Places which had been struck by lightning, e. c. on which Zeus Catavatæs had descended, were sacred to him. (Pollux, ix. 41; Strid. and Hesych. s. n.)

2. Of Acheron, being the first river to which the shades descended in the lower world. 3. Of Apollo, who was invoked by this name to grant a happy return home (sardaseis) to those who were traveling abroad. (Ep. Ar. Phoe. 483; Schol. ad Eurip. Bacch. 1416.)

4. Of Hercules, who conducted the shades into Hades. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 649.)

CATAVATU/A LEDES, king of the Sequani in the former half of the first century B.C., had received the title of friend from the senate and the Roman people. (Cas. B. G. i. 3.)

CATAMITUS, the Roman name for Ganymedes, of which it is only a corrupt form. (Plaut. Menoech. i. 2. 34; Fest. s. v. Catamitum.)

CATHA/RIOS (Katharios), the purifier or atoner, a surname of Zeus, under which he in conjunction with Nice had a temple at Olympia. (Paus. v. 14. § 6.)

CATTENUS, described by Cicero as a low and mean fellow, but of equestrian rank, who was angry with Q. Cicero. (C. Cat. ii. 2. § 2.)

CATILINA, L. SERGIUS, the descendant of an ancient patrician family which had sunk into poverty, first appears in history as a zealous partisan of Sulla. During the horrors of the great proscription, among many other victims, he killed, with his own hand, his brother-in-law, Q. Caecilius, described as a quiet inoffensive man, and having seized and tortured the well-known and popular M. Marius Gratidianus, the kinman and fellow-townman of Cicero, cut off his head, and bore it in triumph through the city. Plutarch accuses him in two places (Sull. 92, Cat. 1.) of having murdered his own brother at the same period, under circumstances of personal atrocity, but there is probably some confusion here between the brother and the brother-in-law, for Sallust, when enumerating the crimes of Catiline, would scarcely have failed to add such a monstrous deed as this to the black catalogue. Although his youth was spent in the most reckless extravagances, and in the open indulgence of every vice; although he was known to have been guilty of various acts of the basest and most revolting character, and although he had incurred the suspicion of an intrigue with the Vestal Favia, sister of Tenuvia; and although it was said and believed that he had made away with his first wife and afterwards with his son, in order that he might wed the fair and rich but worthless Aurelia Orestilla, who objected to the presence of a grown-up step-child, yet this complicated impurity appears to have formed no bar to his regular political advancement,—for he attained to the dignity of praetor in n. c. 68, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 65, in order to press his suit for the consulship. The election for 65 was carried by P. Autronius Paetus and P. Cornelius Sulla, both of whom were soon after convicted of bribery, and their places supplied by their competitors and accusers, L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, Catiline, who was desirous of becoming a candidate, having been disqualified in consequence of an impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Claudius Pulcher, afterwards so celebrated as the implacable enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Autronius and Catiline forthwith formed a project along with a certain Cn. Calpurnius Piso, a young man of high family, but turbulent, needy, and profligate, to murder the new consuls upon the first of January, when offering up their vows in the Capitol, after which Autronius and Catiline were to seize the fasces, and Piso was to be despatched with an army to occupy the Spanias. Some rumours of what was in contemplation spread abroad, such precautions were taken that the conspirators were induced to delay the execution of their plan until the 5th of February, resolving at the same time to include many of the leading men of the state in the proposed massacre. This extraordinary design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, while the whole of the armed agents had assembled, and thus confounded the preconcerted combinations. The danger being past, certain resolutions were proposed in the senate with regard to the authors of this abortive attempt; but the proceedings were quashed by the intercession of a tribune. The plot was, however, a matter of common discussion, and no one seems to have entertained any doubt of its reality, while many did not scruple to assert that M. Crassus, and Julius Caesar, who was then aedile, were deeply involved. (Q. C. de pot. Cons. 2. 1.; Asconius in Tog. cod. in Cornet; Sall. Catil. 15—18; Liv. Epit. 101; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sueton. Jul. 9; C. pro Sulla, 1—24, pro Mun. 38, pro Catil. 4, in Catil. i. 6.) [Comp. p. 640, b.]

Encouraged rather than disheartened by a failure which had so nearly proved a triumph, and which had so distinctly demonstrated the practicability of such a project, if conducted with common prudence and caution, Catiline was soon after (n. c. 65), left completely unmolested by his accquittal upon a trial which, when suit was joined, was alleged, by the liberal bribes administered to the accuser as well as to the jury. From this time he seems to have determined to proceed more systematically; to enlist a more numerous body of supporters; to extend CATILINA.

the sphere of operations, and to organize a more comprehensive and sweeping scheme of destruction.
Accordingly, about the beginning of June, b. c. 64, probably soon after the successful termination of his second trial, when called to account for the blood which he had shed during the proscription of Sulla (Dion Cass. xcvii. 30), he began, while canvassing vigorously for the consulsiphip, to sound
the dispositions of various persons, by pointing out the probable success of a great revolutionary movement, and the bright prospect of power and profit opened up to its promoters. After having thus ascertained the temper of different individuals, he called together those who from their necessities, their characters, and their sentiments, were likely to be most eager and most resolute in the undertaking. The meeting, according to Sallust, was attended by eleven senators, by four members of the equestrian order, and by several men of rank and influence from the provincial towns. The most conspicuous were P. Cornelius Lentulus, who, when he was consul in b. c. 71, but having been passed over by the censors had lost his seat in the senate, which he was now seeking to recover by standing a second time for the pretorship (Dion Cass. xcvii. 30); C. Cornelius Cethegus, distinguished throughout by his impudence, headstrong impetuosity, and sanguinary violence (Sall. Cat. 43; Cic. pro Sull.
19); P. Antonius spoke of above; L. Cassius Longinus, at this time a competitor for the consuls-ship, dull and heavy, but bloodthirsty withal (Cic.
zu Cat. iii. 4—6; Pro Sulla, 13); L. Vargunteius, who had been one of the colleagues of Cicero in the quaezerishment, and had subsequently been condemned for bribery (Pro Sulla, 6, 18); S. Cal-brinius Bestia, tribune elect; Publius and Servius Sulla, nephews of the dictator; M. Porcius Laeca (Cic. zu Cat. i. 4, ii. 6, Pro Sull. 2, 18); Q.
Annius; Q. Curius; M. Fulvius Nobilior; L.
Statilius; P. Gabinius Capito; C. Cornelius. In addition to these, a great body of the youngest nobility were known to be favourably inclined although they had not openly committed themselves, and now,
as on the former occasion, rumour included Crassus and Caesar, although the report does not appear to have gained general belief. [Comp. p. 541, b.]

At this assembly Catiline, after expatiating upon a number of topics calculated to rouse the indignation and stimulate the cupidity of his audience, proceeded to develop his objects and resources. He proposed that all debts should be cancelled, that the most wealthy citizens should be proscribed, and that all offices of honour and emolument should be divided among the associates, while for support he was expected to call upon Piso in his house, Spain, P. Sittius Nucerinus with the army in Mauritania, and at home confidently anticipated the co-operation of C.
Antonius, whom he expected to be chosen consul along with himself for the following year, having formed a coalition with him for the purpose of excluding Cicero. The votes of the people, however, in some measure dashed these calculations. Cicero and
C. Antonius were returned, the former nearly unanimously, the latter by a small majority over Catiline.
This disappointment, while it increased if possible the faithfulness of this army (the army of the dispossessed party among the aristocracy and the independent portion of the middle ranks), rendered him more vigorous in the prosecution of his designs. Large sums of money were misspent upon his own security, or on the credit of his friends; magazines of arms and other warlike stores were secretly formed; troops were levied in various parts of Italy, especially in the neighbourhood of Faesulae, under the superintendence of C. Manlius, an experienced commander, one of the veteran centurions of Sulla (Dion Cass.
xxviii. 30), and numerous adherents were enrolled from the most disgraceful classes, including not a few women of ruined reputation; attempts also were made in various quarters to gain over the slaves;
and it was determined, when the critical moment
should arrive for an open demonstration, to set fire to the city in many different places at the same instant, and to slaughter the well-disposed portion of the population in the tumult. Meanwhile, in the midst of these extensive preparations, Catiline again (63) stood candidate for the consulsiphip, and used every effort to get rid of Cicero, who met him every turn and thwarted all his best-contrived machinations. Nor was this wonderful, for he was counterbalanced from a quarter whence he apprehended no danger. One of the most high-born, abandonned, but at the same time, weak and vacillating, among the conspirators, was a certain Q. Curius, who had been expelled from the senate by the censors on account of the infamy of his life. This man had long consortcd with a noble mistress named Fulvia, who appears to have acquired complete control over his mind, and to have been made the depository of all his secrets. Fulvia, alarmed by the intelligence obtained from her lover, divulged what she had learned to several of her acquaintances and,
through them, opened a correspondence with Cicero,
to whom she regularly communicated all the particulars she could collect, and at length persuaded Curius himself to turn traitor and betray his comrades. Thus the counsel was at once put in possession of every circumstance as soon as it occurred, and was enabled to keep vigilant watch over the conduct of every individual from whom danger was to be apprehended. By imparting to a certain extent his fears and suspicions to the senators and monied men, he excited a general feeling of distrust and suspicion towards Catiline, and bound firmly together, by the tie of common interest, all who having property to lose looked forward with dread to confusion and anarchy; Antonius, whose good faith was more than doubtful, he gained over by at once resigning to him the province of Macedonia, while he protected his own person by a numerous body of friends and dependants who surrounded him whenever he appeared in public. These preliminary measures being completed, he now ventured to speak more openly; prevailed upon the senate to defy the consuls in elections in order that the state of public affairs might be fully investigated; and at length, on the 21st of October, openly denounced Catiline, charged him broadly with treason, predicted that in six days from that time Manlius would take the field in open war, and that the 28th was the period fixed for the murder of the leading men in the commonwealth. Such was the consternation produced by these disclosures that many of those who considered themselves peculiarly obnoxious instantly fled from Rome, and the senate being now thoroughly roused, passed the decretum ulnimunium, the object of which was to provide for the immediate extinction of the conspirators, and meeting for the time being with absolute power, both civil and military. Thus supported, Cicero took such precautions that the Comitia passed off without any outbreak or even attempt at violence, although an attack upon the magistrates had been meditated. Catiline was again rejected; was forthwith impeached of sedition, under the Plautian law, by L. Aemilius Paulus; was forced to abandon the expectation he had entertained of surprising the strong fortress of Praeneste, which would have formed an admirable base for his warlike operations; and found himself every hour more and more closely confined and pressed by the net in which he was entangled through the activity of Cicero. Driven to despair by this accumulation of disappointments and dangers he resolved at once to bring matters to a crisis, and no longer to waste time by persevering in a course of policy in which he had been so repeatedly foiled. Accordingly, while he still endeavoured to keep up appearances by loud protestations of innocence, and by offering to place himself under the control and surveillance of M. Lepidus, of Q. Metellus, the praetor, or of M. Marcellus, in whose house he actually took up his abode, or even of Cicero himself; on the night of the 6th of November he met the ringleaders at the dwelling of M. Porcius Læcus, and after complaining of their backwardness and inactivity, informed them that he had despatched Manlius to Etruria, Septimius of Cameris, to Piscenum, C. Julius, to Apulia, and others of less note to different parts of Italy to raise open war, and to organize a general revolt of the slave population. He added that he was desirous to place himself at the head of his troops, but that it was absolutely necessary in the first place to remove Cicero, whose vigilance was most injurious to their cause. Upon this L. Vargunteius, a senator, and C. Cornelius, a knight, undertook to repair at an early hour the following morning to the house of the consuls, to make their way into his chamber as if for the purpose of paying their respects, and then to stab him on the spot. The whole of these proceedings were instantly reported to their intended victim; the assassins, when they presented themselves, were refused admission, and certain intelligence having been now received that the rebellion had actually broken out on the 27th of October in Etruria, Consular. Notwithstanding, the Senate was summoned to the senate which, for greater security, had been summoned to meet in the temple of Jupiter Stator, and there delivered his celebrated oration, "Quaeso tamquam abutère, Catilina, patientia nostra?" which paralysed the traitor, not so much by the vehemence of the invective, as by the intimate acquaintance which it displayed with all his most hidden contrivances. Catiline, who upon his entrance had been avoided by all, and was sitting alone upon a bench from which every one had shrank, rose to reply with downcast countenance, and in humble accents implored the fathers not to listen to the malignant calumnies of an upset foreigner against the noblest blood in Rome; but secretly he commenced when his words were drowned by the shouts of "enemy" and "parricide" which burst from the whole assembly, and he rushed forth with threats and curses on his lips. On his return home perceiving that there was now no hope of destroying his hated foe, and that the strict watch kept throughout the city rendered tumult and fire-raising difficult if not impossible for the present; he resolved to strike some decisive blow before troops could be levied to oppose him, and accordingly leaving the chief control of affairs at Rome in the hands of Lentulus and Cæcilius, with the promise at the same time to march with all speed to their support at the head of a powerful army, set forth in the dead of night (8th—9th November), and after remaining for a few days with his adherents in the neighbourhood of Arretium, where he assumed the fasces and other ensigns of lawful military command, proceeded to the camp of Manlius, having previously addressed letters to the most distinguished consuls and others, solemnly protesting his innocence, and declaring that unable to resist the cabal formed among his enemies he had determined to retire to Marseilles that he might preserve his country from agitation and disturbance.

On the 9th, when the flight of Catiline was known, Cicero delivered his second speech, which was addressed to the people in the forum, the senate proceeded to declare Catiline and Manlius public enemies, despatched officers of high standing to Etruria, Piscenum, Campania, Apulia, and the different districts from which danger was apprehended, directed the consuls to hold a levy with all speed, decreed that Antonius should go forth to the war, and that Cicero should remain to guard the city; offering at the same time an amnesty to all who should quit the rebels, and free pardon and great rewards to any who should give such information as might lead to the discovery and conviction of the conspirators within the walls. It is a remarkable fact, and one which indicates most strongly the disaffection of the lower classes to the existing order of things, that not one man could be found to take advantage of this proclamation, and that not a single soldier deserted from the rebel standard. This circumstance threatened to prove a source of most serious embarrassment. Although the existence of the conspiracy and the names of the leading conspirators were known, not only to the magistrates, but to the public at large, yet there was no legal evidence against any individual, for Cicuris, while he faithfully supplied secret intelligence, could not come forward openly without blasting himself for ever, and at the same time depriving the government of its most powerful auxiliary. The steadfastness of public opinion did not extend to certain foreigners belonging to a race proverbial in ancient times for the lightness of their faith. There was at Rome at this period a party of Allobroges, deputies despatched by their nation to seek relief from certain real or alleged grievances. Their suit, however, had not prospered, and their complaints of the capabilities of the magistrates and of the indifference of the senate were open and loud. Lentulus, conceiving that their discontent might be made available for his own purposes, opened a negotiation through the medium of P. Umbrenius, a freedman, who, in the course of mercantile transactions, was acquainted with many of the Galatian chiefs, and who now assuming a tone of warm sympathy with their wrongs, undertook to point out an easy method by which they might obtain ample redress. Finding that these mysterious hints were greedily caught up, he gradually disclosed the nature of the plot, and invited them to co-operate by stimulating their countrymen to insurrection. The men for a long while hesitated, but prudence prevailed. After calculating and balancing the chances, they resolved to secure a certain and immediate recompense, rather than to speculate upon doubtful and distant advantages. Accordingly, they revealed all to Q. Fabius Scaego, the patron of their state, who in his turn acquainted Cicero, and by the instructions of the latter enjoined the ambassadors to affect great zeal in the undertaking, and if possible to gain possession of some tangible documentary proof. The Gauls played well the part assigned to them. A written agreement, signed by Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilus, was placed in their hands; but when they quitted Rome soon after midnight on the 3rd of December, accompanied by T. Volturnius, of Croton, who was charged with despatches for Catilina, it being arranged that the Allobroges were to visit his camp on their way homewards for the double purpose of receiving his orders and obtaining a ratification of the pledges given by his agents. The whole cavalcade was surrounded and seized as it was crossing the Milvian bridge, by two of the praetors who had been stationed in ambush to intercept them. The Gauls quickly surrendered; Volturnius, after having vainly endeavoured to resist, was overpowered and forced to yield.

Information of the complete success of his plan instantly summoned Lentulus, Cethegus, Statilus, and Gabinius to his presence. Lentulus being praetor, the consult led him by the hand to the fane of Concord where the senate was already met; the rest of the accused followed closely guarded. The praetor Quinctius was also in attendance, bearing the portfolio with the papers still sealed. Volturnius finding escape impossible, agreed, upon his own personal safety being insured, to make a full confession. His statements were confirmed by the Allobroges, and the chain of testimony was rendered complete and conclusive, by the signatures in the handwriting of the ringleaders, which they were unable to deny. The guilt of Lentulus, Cethegus, and seven others being thus established beyond a doubt, Lentulus was forced to abdicate his office, and then along with the rest was consigned to the charge of certain individuals of high station who became responsible for their appearance.

These circumstances as they had occurred having been fully detailed by Cicero in his third oration delivered in the forum, a strong reaction took place among the populace, who all now joined in executing Catilina and demanding vengeance, from the well-founded conviction, that although they might have derived profit from riot or even from civil war, yet the general conflagration, which had always formed a leading feature in the schemes of the conspirators, must have brought ruin upon the humblest mechanics as well as upon the wealthiest of the aristocracy. On the other hand, a vigorous effort was made by the clients of Lentulus to excite the dread of the multitude to attempt his rescue. The danger appearing imminent, the senate was called together on the Nones (5) of December, the day so frequently referred to by Cicero in after times with triumphant pride, and the question was put, what was their pleasure with regard to those who were now in custody. After an animated debate, of which the leading arguments are strongly and pointedly expressed in the two celebrated orations assigned by Sallust to Caesar and to Cato, a decree was passed, that the last punishment should be inflicted according to ancient usage upon the convicted traitors. Therewith the consul led away Lentulus to the subterranean prison on the slope of the capitol, and the others were conducted thither by the praetors. On the same night the high-born patrician Lentulus, a member of the noble Cornelius gens, was strangled in that loudest dungeon by the common executioner, and the rest of his associates shared his fate. The legality of this proceeding, which was afterwards so fiercely impugned, is discussed in the life of Cicero.

While these things were going on at Rome, Catilina had gradually collected a force amounting to two legions, although not above one-fourth part of the whole, or about 5000 men, were fully equipped, the rest being armed with pikes, clubs, and other rude weapons which chance presented. On the approach of Antonius, Catilina fearing to encounter regular troops with this motley crowd, threw himself into the mountains and by constantly shifting his ground and moving rapidly in different directions, contrived to avoid a collision, while at the same time he exercised and disciplined his followers, whose numbers daily increased, although he now refused to carry slaves, multitudes of whom flocked to his banner, deeming that it might prove injurious to his prospects were he to identify their interests with what he termed the cause of Roman freedom. But when the news arrived of the disclosures that had taken place in the city, of the complete suppression of the plot, and of the execution of the leading conspirators, many who had joined his standard, from the love of excitement and the hope of plunder, gradually slunk away. Those who remained firm led into the territory of Pistoria with the design of crossing the Apennines and taking refuge in Gaul. But this movement was anticipated by the vigilance of Metellus Celer, who guarded Pistoria with three legions, and had marched straight to the foot of the hills that he might intercept the insurgents on their descent.

Catilina, therefore, at the beginning of the year 62, finding that escape was cut off in front, while Antonius was pressing on his rear, turned fiercely on his pursuers and determined as a last resource to hazard an engagement, trusting that, if successful, all Etruria would be thrown open for the maintenance of his soldiers, and that he would be able to keep his ground in the disaffected districts until some diversion in his favour should be made in the metropolis. The battle, in which the legions of the republic were commanded by M. Petreius, in consequence of the real or pretended illness of the proconsul Antonius, wasustinate and bloody. The rebels fought with the fury of despair, and long kept at bay the veterans by whom they were assailed. Catilina, in this his last field, nobly discharged the duties of a skilful general and a gallant soldier; his eye and his hand were everywhere; he brought up columns to support those who were most hotly pressed; withdrew the wounded and the weary, and supplied their place with the sound and fresh; flew from rank to rank encouraging the combatants, and strove by repeated feats of daring valour to turn the fortune of the day. But at length, perceiving that all was lost, he changed his front and took to flight. His body was found after the struggle was over far in advance of his own ranks in the midst of a heap of his enemies; he was yet breathing, and his features in the agonies of death.
still wore their habitual expression of reckless daring. His adherents, to the number of 3000, imitated the example of their leader. Each perished at his post, and not one freeborn citizen was taken alive either in the fight or in the pursuit. The victory cost the consulary army dear, for all the bravest were slain or grievously wounded.

Although we possess only a one-sided history of this famous conspiracy; although much that has been recorded seems so marvellous and incredible, that many have regarded the whole narrative as little better than a fabric of misrepresentation and falsehood, built up by violent political animosity, and resting on a very slender basis of truth; although it cannot be denied that some of the particulars, set down by Dion Cassius (xxxvii. 30) and alluded to by others (e.g. Sall. Cat. 32) of the revolting rites by which the compact between the associates was ratified, are evidently vulgar exaggerations; although little reliance can be placed on the self-penetrations of Cicero, who would studiously seek to magnify the danger in order to enhance the merits of his own exertions; yet upon a careful and dispassionate investigation, we shall discover no reasonable ground for entertaining any doubts with regard to the general accuracy of the facts as presented to us by Sallust, whose account is throughout clear and consistent, and is corroborated in all its important details by the information transmitted from other sources.

Nor, upon a close examination into the circumstances of the individuals concerned, of the times, and of the state of public feeling and public morals, shall we have much difficulty in forming a distinct idea of the character of Catiline himself, of the motives by which he was stimulated, and of the calculations by which he was encouraged to anticipate success.

Trained in the wars of Sulla, he was made familiar from his earliest youth with civil strife, acquired an indifference to human suffering, and imbued an utter contempt for the constitutional forms and government of his country, which had been so freely neglected or violated by his patron. The wealth quickly acquired was recklessly squandered; the indulgence of a nature of course sensuality; and, although his shattered fortunes may have been to a certain extent repaired by a wealthy marriage, and by the plunder of a province, yet the relief was but temporary; his pleasures were too costly; a considerable portion of his ill-gotten gains would be expended in bribing the different judges who pronounced his innocence, and his necessities soon became pressing. The remorse too produced by his frightful vices and crimes—remorse which was betrayed by the haggard cheek, the bloodshot eye, the wild glance, and the unsteady step, so graphically depicted by the historian—must have given rise to a frame of mind which would eagerly desire to escape from reflection, and seek relief in fierce excitement. On the other hand, the consciousness of those great mental and physical powers, from which even his most bitter enemies could not withhold a tribute of admiration, combined with the extensive popularity which he had acquired among the young by his agreeable address, varied accomplishments, and unwearying zeal in ministering to their pleasures, must have tended to augment his natural self-confidence, to foster his pride, and to stimulate his ambition. How soon the idea of destroying the liberties of his country may have entered his thoughts it is impossible to discover, but we can readily believe that the career of Sulla was ever present to his imagination, that his grand aim was to become what the dictator had been, and that, provided this end was accomplished, he felt little scrupulous about the means employed. And, in truth, when he looked abroad, the moment seemed most propitious for the advancement of a man of daring and powerful intellect uncontrolled by principle. The leading statesmen were divided into factions which eyed each other with the bitter jealousy engendered during the convulsions in which they had played an active part some twenty years before. The younger nobility, as a class, were thoroughly demoralized, nor had the most profligate and bankrupt in fortune as well as in fame, eager for any change which might relieve them from their embarrassments, while it held out the promise of unreserved licence. The rabble were reckless and discontented, filled with envy and hatred against the rich and powerful, ever ready to follow at the bidding of any seditious demagogue. Thus, at home, the dominant party in the senate and the equites or capitalists alone felt a deep interest in the stability of the government. Moreover, a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction extended over the whole of Italy. Many of the veterans of Sulla, accustomed to the lavish living and profligate expenditure, had already squandered, for the most part, their hoards, and looked forward with anxiety to the renewal of these scenes of blood which they had found by experience so profitable; while the multitudes whose estates had been confiscated, whose relations had been proscribed, and who themselves were suffering under civil disabilities in consequence of their connexion with those who had thus perished, were eagerly watching for any movement which might give them a chance of becoming oppressors, robbers, and murderers in their turn.

Never was the executive weaker. The senate and magistrates were wasting their energies in petty disputes, indifferent to the great interests of the commonwealth; Pompey, at the head of all the best troops of the republic, was prosecuting a long-protracted and doubtful war in the East; there was no army in Italy, where all was hushed in a treacherous calm. If then, Catiline, surrounded as he was by a large body of retainers all devotedly attached to his person, and detached from society at large by the crimes which he had suggested or promoted, had succeeded in striking his first great blow, had he assassinated the consul and the most able of the senators, the chances were, that the wavering among the higher ranks would have at once espoused his cause, that the populace would have been intimidated or gained over, and that thousands of ruined and desperate men would have rushed from all quarters to his support, enabling him to bid defiance to any force which could have been brought to bear upon the city until the return of Pompey from the East. But Pompey might never return, or might not return victorious, or, at all events, a long period must elapse, and ample time would be given for negotiations or resistance. Such were the probabilities which led on Catiline to hazard all upon one great throw—but the Fortune of Rome prevailed, the gambler was ruined, and the state saved.

CATIUS.

i. ii. iii. iv. pro Sulla, pro Murensis, 25, 26, in Pisum. 2, pro Flacco, 40, pro Planc. 37, ad Att. i. 19, ii. 1, xii. 21, xvi. 14, ad Fam. i. 9; Sallust. Jul. 14; Plut. Civ. 10-25, Cat. Min. 25. Muretus, ad Cic. Cat. i. 1, has collected from ancient authorities the names of forty persons connected with the conspiracy. Dion Cassius is very confused in his chronology. His account would lead us to suppose, that the first efforts of Catiline were confined in a great measure to the destruction of Cicero and those senators who supported the Tullian law against bribery, which he believed to be levied against himself individually, and that he did not form the project of a general revolution until after his second defeat, at the election in 63. But this is manifestly impossible; for in that case the whole of the extensive preparations for the plot must have been devised and completed within the space of a few days.

L. CATILLIUS SERVILIUS. [SERVILIUS.]

CATIVOLCUS, king of half of the country of the Eburos, a people between the Meuse and the Rhine, united with Ambiorix, the other king, in the insurrection against the Romans in B.C. 54; but when Caesar in the next year proceeded to devastate the territories of the Eburos, Cativolcus, who was advanced in age and unable to endure the labours of war and flight, poisoned himself, after imprecating curses upon Ambiorix. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, vi. 31.)

CATIUS, a Roman divinity, who was invoked under the name of dianus Catius pater to grant prudence and thoughtfulness to children at the time when their consciousness was beginning to awaken. (Augustin. De Civit. Dei, iv. 21.)

CATIUS. I. Q. CATIUS, plebeian sedile B.C. 210 with L. Porcius Licinus, celebrated the games with great magnificence, and with money arising from fines erected some brazen statues near the temple of Ceres. He served as legate in the army of the consul Claudius Nero in the campaign against Hasdrubal in B.C. 207, and was one of the envoys sent to Delphi two years afterwards to present to the temple some offerings from the booty obtained on the conquest of Hasdrubal. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 43, xxviii. 43.)

2. C. CATIUS, a Vestal, tribune of the soldiers in the army of Antony, B.C. 43. ( Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 29.)

CATIUS, an Epicurean philosopher, was a native of Gallia Transpadana (Insulam), and composed a treatise in four books on the nature of things and on the chief good (de Rerum Natura et de Summo Bono). Cicero, in a letter written B.C. 45 (ad Fam. xv. 16), speaks of him as having died recently, and jests with his correspondent about the "spectra Catiana," that is, the excreta or material images which were supposed by the disciples of the garden to present themselves to the mind, and thus to call up the idea of absent objects. Quintilian (x. i. § 124) characterises him briefly as "in Epicureis levis quidem sed non infameus assistor." The old commentator, on account of the silence of ancient writers, that the Catius addressed in the fourth satire of the second book, and who is there introduced as delivering a grave and sententious lecture on various topics connected with the pleasures of the table, is Catius the Epicurean, author of the work whose title we have given above. It appears certain, however, from the words of Cicero, that the satire in question had not been written until seven years after the death of Catius; and therefore it is probable that Horace may intend under this nickname to designate some of the gourmards of the court. (W.R.)

CATO, DIONYSIUS. We possess a small volume which commonly bears the title "Dionysii Catonis Disticha de Moribus ad Filium." It commences with a preface addressed by the author to his son, pointing out how prone men are to go astray for want of proper counsel, and inviting his earnest attention to the instructive lessons about to be inculcated. Next come fifty-six proverb-like injunctions, very briefly expressed, such as "parentem ama," "diligentiam adhibe," "justum servum," and the like, which are followed by the main body of the work, consisting of a series of sententious moral precepts, one hundred and forty-four in number, each apothegm being enunciated in two dactylic hexameters. The collection is divided into four books; to the second, third, and fourth of these are attached short metrical prefaces, and the whole is wound up by a couplet containing a sort of apology for the form in which the materials are presented to the reader.

It is amusing to take a survey of the extraordinary number of conflicting opinions which have been entertained by scholars of eminence with regard to the real author of this work, the period when it was composed, its intrinsic merits, and indeed every circumstance in any way connected with it directly or indirectly. It has been assigned with perfect confidence to Seneca, to Ausonius, to Serenus Samontius, to Boethius, to an Octavius, to a Publius, and to a variety of unknown personages. The language has been pronounced worthy of the purest stratum of Latin composition, and declared to be a specimen of the worst epoch of barbarism. The adages themselves have been extolled by some as the dignified exposition of high philosophy; by others they have been contemptuously characterised as, with few exceptions, a ferrago of rapid trash. One critic, at least, has discovered that the writer was undoubtedly a Christian, and has traced nearly the whole of the distichs to the Bible; while others find the clearest proofs of a mind thoroughly imbued with Pagan creeds and rites. In so far as the literary merits of the production are concerned, it is to be doubted whether, with some of its defects, it would have called for any hesitation in believing that what such men as Erasmus, Joseph Scaliger, Laurentius Valla, and Pithon concurred in admiring warmly and praising loudly, cannot, although its merits may have been exaggerated, be altogether worthless; and any scholar, who examines the book with an impartial eye, will readily perceive that, making allowances for the numerous and palpable corruptions, the style is not unworthy of the Silver Age. As to the other matters under discussion, it will be sufficient to state what facts we can actually prove.

The very circumstance that every one of the suppositions alluded to above has been ingeniously maintained and ingeniously refuted, would in itself be sufficient to conclude, that the evidence which admits of such opposite interpretations must be both scanty and indistinct.

The work is first mentioned in an epistle addressed by Vindicianus, Comes Architaurum, to Valentinian, in which he states that a certain sick man used often to repeat the words of Cato—"Corporis exigua (leg. auxiliario) medicum committio fideli."—
CATO.

a line which is found in ii. p. 22; the next allusion is in Isidorus, who quotes Cato as an authority for the rare word officiperta (see iv. p. 42);
and the third in order of time is in Alcuin, contemporary with Charlemagne, who cites one of the Disticha (ii. p. 51) as the words of the "philosopher Cato." In our own early literature it is frequently quoted by Chaucer. It is clear, therefore, that these sages were familiarly known in the middle of the fourth century, and recognized from that time forward as the composition of some Cato. So, in like manner, all the MSS. agree in presenting that name; while for the addition of Dionysius we are indebted to a single codex once in the possession of Simeon Bos, which was inspected by Scaliger and Vinet, and pronounced by them of great antiquity. We must remark, however, that the combination Dionysius Cato is exceedingly suspicious. Dionysius was a name frequently borne by slaves of Greek extraction;
but when combined with a Roman name, according to the fashion among libertini, it was added as a cognomen to the gentle appellation of the patron. Thus, C. Julius Dionysius appears in an inscription as a freedman of Augustus; so we find P. Aulus Dionysius, and many others; but it does not occur prefixed to a Roman cognomen, as in the present case. Names purely Greek, such as Dionysius Scrotates, Dionysius Philocalus, and the like, do not of course bear upon the question.

No one now imagines that either of the Catos celebrated in history has any connexion with this metrical system of ethics. Aulus Gellius (ix. 2), it is true, gives some fragments of a Carminum de Moribus in prose by the elder; and Pliny (H. N. xxxix. 6) has preserved a passage from the precepts delivered by the same sage to his son; but these were both works of a totally different description, and no hint has been given by the ancients that anything such as we are now discussing ever proceeded from Cato of Utica.

In truth, we know nothing about this Cato or Dionysius Cato, if he is to be so called; and, as we have no means of discovering anything with regard to him, it may be as well to confess our ignorance once for all.

Perhaps we ought to notice the opinion ententained by several persons, that Cato is not intended to represent the name of the author, but is merely to be regarded as the significant title of the work, just as we have the Brutus, and the Iaetus, and the Cato Major of Ciceron, and the treatise mentioned by Aulus Gellius, called Cato, aut de Libris cendidis.

Lastly, it has been inferred, from the introduction to book second, in which mention is made of Virgil and Lucret, that we have here certain proof that the distichs belong to some period later than the reign of Nero; but even this is by no means clear, for all the prolegomen have the air of forgeries;
and the one in question, above all, in addition to a false quantity in the first syllable of Macer, contains a most gross blunder, such as no one but an illiterate monk was likely to commit,—for the Punic wars are spoken of as the subject of Lucan's poem.

This Catechism of Morals, as it has been called,
seems to have been held in great estimation in the middle ages, and to have been extensively employed as a school-book. This will account for the vast number of early editions, more than thirty belonging to the fifteenth century, which have proved a source of the greatest interest to bibliogra-phers. One of these, on vellum, of which only a single copy is known to exist, is in the Spenser collection, and is believed by Dibdin to be older than the Gutenburg Bible of 1465. The title in the earlier impressions is frequently Cato Moralisatus, Cato Moralisissimus, Cato Carenna de Moriibus, and so forth.

The best edition is that of Otto Arntzenius, 8vo.
Amsterdam, 1754, which contains an ample collection of commentaries; the Greek paraphrases by Maximus Planudes and Joseph Scaliger; the dissertations of Boxhorn, written with as much exaggeration of bitterness as if the author of the Disticha had been a personal enemy; the learned but rambling and almost interminable reply of Cassiesteri; and two essays by Wither. These, together with the preliminary notices, contain everything that is worth knowing.

One of the oldest specimens of English typography is a translation of Cato by Caxton through the medium of an earlier French version: The Book CALLYD CATION, Translated out of Frenchie into English by William Caxton in the abbey of Westminster the year of our lorde mellxxiiij and the first year of the reign of Kyng Rychard the thvyto xxij day of December. From the preface to this curious volume we learn, that the same task had previously been accomplished in verse. "Here beginneth the prologue or preface of the book called Caton, which book hath been translated out of Latin into English, by Maister Benet Burgh, late Archdeacon of Colchester, and high canon of St. Stephen at Westminster; which full craftily hath made it, in bulld royal for the erdition of my Lord Bousher, son and heir at that time to my lord the Earl of Essex." The Cato we have been discussing is frequently termed by the first English printers Cato Magnus, in contradistinction to Cato Parvus, which was a sort of supplement to the for-er, composed originally by Daniel Church (Eclesiastis), a domestic in the court of Henry the Second, about 1180, and also translated by Burgh.
The two tracts were very frequently bound up together. (See Ames, Typographical Antiquities, vol.
i. pp. 195—202; Watton's History of English Poetry, vol. ii. section 27.)

CATO, PORCIUS. Caton was the name of a family of the plebeian Porcia gens, and was first given to M. Cato, the censor. [See below, No. 1.]

1. M. Porcius Cato Censorius, was born at Tusculum, a municipal town of Latium, to which his ancestors had belonged for some generations. His father had earned the reputation of a brave soldier, and his great-grandfather had received an honorary compensation from the state for five horses killed under him in battle. The haughtiest patron of Rome never excelled in the splendor of the purest nobility with a spirit more proud than Cato's when he remembered the warlike achievements and the municipal respectability of his family, to which he ascribed extreme antiquity. Yet the Tusculum Porcius had never obtained the honours of the Roman magistracy. Their illustrious descendant, at the commencement of his career in the great city, was regarded as a novus homo, and the feeling of his unmeet position, working along with the consciousness of inherent superiority, contributed to exasperate and stimulate his ambitious soul. Early in life, he so far eclipsed the previous glimmer of his race, that he is constantly spoken of, not only as the leader, but as the founder, of the Porcia Gens.

His ancestors for three generations had been named M. Porcius, and it is said by Plutarch (Cato Maj. 1), that at first he was known by the additional cognomen Priscus, but was afterwards called Cato—a word denoting that practical wisdom which is the result of natural sagacity, combined with experience of civil and political affairs. However, it may well be doubted whether Priscus, like Major, were not merely an epithet used to distinguish him from the later Cato of Utica, and we have no precise information as to the date when he first received the appellation of Cato, which may have been bestowed in childhood rather as an omen of eminence, than as a tribute to past desert. The qualities implied in the word Cato were acknowledged by the plainer and less arcanum title of Sapiens, by which he was so well known in his old age, that Cicero (Amic. 2) says, it became his quasi cognomen. From the number and eloquence of his speeches, he was styled orator (Justin, xxxiii. 2; Gell. xvii. 21), but Cato the Censor, or Cato Censorius, is now his most common, as well his most characteristic appellation, since he filled the office of censor with extraordinary repute, and was the only Cato who ever filled it.

In order to ascertain the date of Cato's birth, we have to consider the testimony of ancient writers as to his age at the time of his death, which is known to have happened b.c. 149. How far we are to go back from this date is a question upon which the authorities are not unanimous. According to the consistent chronology of Cicero (Suet. d.), Cato was born b.c. 284, in the year preceding the first consulship of Q. Fabius Maximus, and died at the age of 85, in the consulship of L. Marcius and M. Manlius. Pliny (H. N. xxxix. 8) agrees with Cicero. Other authors exaggerate the age of Cato. According to Valerius Maximus (viii. 7. § 1) he survived his 86th year; according to Livy (xxxix. 40) and Plutarch (Cato Maj. 15) he was 90 years old when he died. The exaggerated age, however, is inconsistent with a statement recorded by Plutarch (Cato Maj. 1) on the asserted authority of Cato himself.

Cato is represented to have said, that he served his first campaign in his 17th year, when Hannibal was over-running Italy. Plutarch, who had the works of Cato before him, but was careless in dates, did not observe that the reckoning of Livy would take back Cato's 17th year to b.c. 223, when there was not a Carthaginian in Italy, whereas the reckoning of Cicero would make the truth of Cato's statement reconcilable with the date of Hannibal's first invasion.

When Cato was a very young man, the death of his father put him in possession of a small hereditary estate in the Sabine territory, at a distance from his native town. It was here that he passed the greater part of his boyhood, hardening his body by healthful exercise, superintending and sharing the operations of the farm, learning the manner in which business was transacted, and studying the rules of rural economy. Near his estate was an humble cottage which had been tenanted, after three triumphs, by its owner M. Curio Dentatus, whose warlike exploits and rigidly simple character were fresh in the memory of the old, and were often talked of with admiration in the neighbourhood. The ardour of the youthful Cato was kindled. He resolved to imitate the character, and hoped to rival the glory, of Dentatus. Opportunity was not wanting: in the school of Hannibal he took his first military lessons, namely in the campaign of b.c. 217. There is some discrepancy among historians as to the events of Cato's early military life. In b.c. 214 he served at Capua, and Drannm (Gesch. Roms, v. p. 89) imagines that already, at the age of 20, he was a military tribune. Fabius Maximus had now the command in Campania, during the year of his fourth consulship. The old general admitted the young soldier to the honour of intimate acquaintance. While Fabius communicated the valued results of military experience, he omitted not to instil his own personal and political partisalities and dislikes into the ear of his attaché follower. At the siege of Tarentum, b. c. 209, Cato was again at the side of Fabius. Two years later, Cato was one of the select band who accompanied the consul Claudius Nero on his northern march from Lucania to check the progress of Hasdrubal. It is recorded that the services of Cato contributed not a little to the decisive victory of Sama on the Metaurus, where Hasdrubal was slain.

In the intervals of war, Cato returned to his Sabine farm, using the plainest dress, and working and fearing like his labourers. Young as he was, the neighbouring farmers liked his hardy mode of living, relished his quaint and sententious sayings, and recognized his abilities. His own active temperament made him willing and anxious to employ his fortune for the benefit of his neighbourhood. He was engaged to act, sometimes as an arbiter of disputes, and sometimes as an advocate, in local causes, which were probably tried before recuperators in the country. Thus was he enabled to strengthen by practice his oratorical faculties, to gain self-confidence, to observe the manners of men, to dive into the springs of human nature, to apply the rules of law, and practically to investigate the principles of justice.

In the vicinity of Cato's Sabine farm was the estate of L. Valerius Flaccus, a young nobleman of considerable influence, and high patrician family. Flaccus could not help remarking the energy of Cato's oratorical style, his unaffected eloquence, his praiseful and simple life, and his old-fashioned principles. Flaccus himself was one of that old-fashioned party who professed their adherence to the severer virtues of the ancient Roman character. There was now in progress a transition from Samnite rusticity to Greek civilization and oriental voluptuousness. The chief magistrates of the state had become almost the patriarchy of a few distinguished families, whose wealth was correspondent with their illustrious birth. Popular by lavish expenditure, by acts of graceful but corrupting munificence, by winning manners, and by the charm of hereditary honours, they united with the influence of office the material power conferred by a numerous retinue of clients and adherents, and the intellectual ascendancy which the monopoly of philosophical education, of taste in the fine arts, and of acquaintance with elegant literature, could not fail to bestow. Nevertheless, the reaction was strong. The less fortunate nobles, jealous of this exclusive oligarchy, and keenly observant of the degeneracy and disorder which followed in the train of luxury, placed themselves at the head of a party which professed its determination to resort to purer models and to stand upon the ancient ways. In their eyes, rusticity, austerity, and plainness were the virtues to be remembered. Scipio had founded and established the new civilization; Fabius had founded and established the old plainness.

Flaccus was one of those clear-sighted politicians who seek out and patronize remarkable ability in young and rising men. He had observed Cato's mortal spirit and eloquent tongue. He knew how much courage and eloquence were prized at Rome. He knew that the distinctions of the battle-field opened the way to the success of the gowns; and that, for a municipal stronger like Cato, forensic success was almost the only possible avenue to magisterial honours. Accordingly, he recommended Cato to translate his ambition to the fitter soil and ampler field of Rome. The advice was eagerly followed. Invited to the town-house of Flaccus, and countenanced by his support, Cato began to distinguish himself in the forms, and became a candidate for office.

We have dwelt upon the accidents of his early history, since they affected the whole tenor of Cato's life. We have seen a youth, indomitably active and strong-minded—the fellow-workman and oracle of rustics—not suffered to drop from want of practice or encouragement, but befriended by opportunity and always equal to the exigencies of his position, disciplined in the best school of arms, the sanctuary of his general, listened to with applause in the courts of Rome, and introduced at once into a high political circle. What wonder if, in such scenes, the mind of Cato received a better training for wide command and worldly success than could have been supplied by a more regular education? What wonder if his strength and originality were tinged with dogmatism, coarseness, harshness, vanity, self-sufficiency, and prejudice,—if he had little sympathy with the pursuits of calm and contemplative scholars,—if he disdain ed or hated or despised the accomplishments which he had no leisure to master,—if he raised on himself and his party a name, a weight, a horror, a fear, and a terror to a more polished society to which he and his party were opposed,—if he confounded delicacy of sentiment with unmanly weakness, and refinement of manners with luxurious vice?

In b. c. 205, Cato was designated questor, and in the following year entered upon the duties of his office, and followed P. Scipio Africanus to Sicily. When Scipio, acting on the permission which, after much opposition, he had obtained from the senate, transported the army from the island into Africa, Cato and C. Laelius were appointed to convey the baggage-ships. There was not that cordiality of co-operation between Cato and Scipio which ought to subsist between a quaestor and his procurator. Fabius had opposed the permission given to Scipio to carry the attack into the enemy's home, and Cato, whose appointment was intended to operate as a check upon Scipio, adopted the views of his friend. It is reported by Plutarch, that the lax discipline of the troops under Scipio's command, and the extravagant expense incurred by the general, provoked the remonstrance of Cato; that Scipio thereupon retorted haughtily, saying he would give an account of victories, not of pelf; that Cato, returning to Rome, denounced the prodigality of his general to the senate; and that, at the instigation of the two quaestors, the commission of tribunes was despatched to Sicily to investigate the conduct of Scipio, who was acquitted upon the view of his extensive and judicious preparations for the transport of the troops. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 3.) This account is scarcely consistent with the narrative of Livy, and would seem to attribute to Cato the irregularity of quitting his post before his time. If Livy be correct, the commission was sent upon the complaint of the in-the boldness to accost and implore the praetors and consuls and other magistrates. Even Fleucus wavered, but his colleague Cato was inexorable, and made an ungallant and characteristic speech, the substance of which, remodelled and modernized, is given by Livy. Finally, the women carried the day. Worn out by their importunity, the resumptive tribune withdrew their opposition. The hated law was abolished by the suffrage of all the tribes, and the women breathed their and triumph by going in procession through the streets and the forum, bedizened with their now legitimate finery.

Scarcely had this important affair been brought to a conclusion when Cato, who had maintained during its progress a rough and sturdy consistency without, perhaps, any very serious damage to his popularity, set sail for his appointed province, Citerior Spain.

In his Spanish campaign, Cato exhibited military genius of a very high order. He lived abstemiously, sharing the food and the labours of the common soldier. With indefatigable industry and vigilance, he not only gave the requisition orders, but he personally superintended their execution. His movements were bold and rapid, and he never was remiss in reaping the fruits and pushing the advantages of victory. The sequence of his operations and their harmonious combination with the schemes of other generals in other parts of Spain appear to have been excellently contrived. His stratagems and manoeuvres were original, brilliant, and successful. The plans of his battles were arranged with consummate skill. He managed to set tribe against tribe, availed himself of native treachery, and took native mercenaries into his pay.

The details of the campaign, as related by Livy (lib. xxiv.), and illustrated by the incidental anecdote of Pintarch, are full of horror. We read of multitudes who, after they had been stripped of their arms, put themselves to death for every shame; of wholesale slaughter of surrendered victims, and the frequent execution of merciless razvixus. The political elements of Roman patriotism incited the maxim, that the good of the state ought to be the first object, and that to it the citizen was bound to sacrifice upon demand natural feelings and individual morality. Such were the principles of Cato. He was not the man to feel any compunctions visitings of conscience in the thorough performance of a rigorous public task. His proceedings in Spain were not at variance with the received idea of the fine old Roman soldier, or with his own stern and imperious temper. He boasted of having destroyed more towns in Spain than he had spent days in that country.

When he had reduced the whole tract of land between the Iberus and the Pyrenees to a hollow, sulky, and temporary submission, he turned his attention to administrative reforms, and increased the revenues of the province by improvements in the working of the iron and silver mines. On account of his achievements in Spain, the senate decreed a thanksgiving of three days. In the course of the year, n. c. 194, he returned to Rome, and was received with a triumph, at which he exhibited an extraordinary quantity of captured brass, silver, and gold, both coin and bullion. In the distribution of prize-money to his soldiers, he was more liberal than might have been expected from so strenuous a professor of parsimonious economy. (Livy. xxxiv. 46.)
The return of Cato appears to have been accelerated by the enmity of P. Scipio Africanus, who was consul, b. c. 194, and is said to have coveted the command of the province in which Cato was stationed. There was enmity between Nepos (or the pseudo-Nepos), and Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 11), in their accounts of this transaction. The former asserts that Scipio was unsuccessful in his attempt to obtain the province, and, offended by the repulse, remained after the end of his consulship, in a private capacity at Rome. The latter relates that Scipio, who was disgusted by Cato's severity, was actually appointed to succeed him, but, not being able to procure from the senate a vote of censure upon the administration of his rival, passed the time of his command in utter inactivity. From the statement in Livy (xxiv. 43), that b. c. 194, Sex. Digidius was appointed to the province of Citerior Spain, it is probable that Plutarch was mistaken in assigning that province to Scipio Africanus. The notion that Africanus was appointed successor to Cato in Spain may have arisen from a double confusion of name and place, for P. Scipio Nasica was appointed, b. c. 194, to the Ulterior province.

However this may be, Cato successfully vindicated himself by his eloquence, and by the production of detailed pecuniary accounts, against the attacks made upon his conduct while consul; and the existing fragments of the speeches, (or the same speech under different names,) made upon his return, attest the vigour and boldness of his defence.

Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 12), states that, after his consulship, Cato accompanied Tb. Sempronius Longus to Thrace, but here there seems to be some error, for though Scipio Africanus was of opinion that one of the consuls ought to have Macedonia, we soon find Sempronius in Cisalpine Gaul (Livy. xxxiv. 43, 46), and in b. c. 193, we find Cato at Rome dedicating to Victoria Virgo a small temple which he had vowed two years before. (Livy. xxxiv. 9.)

The military career of Cato was not yet ended. In b. c. 191, he was appointed military tribune (or legatus? Liv. xxxvi. 17, 21), under the consul, M. Fulvius Nobilior. He was dispatched to Greece to oppose the invasion of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. In the decisive battle of Thermopylae, which led to the downfall of Antiochus, Cato behaved with his wonted valour, and enjoyed the good fortune which usually awaits upon genius. By a daring and difficult advance, he surprised and dislodged a body of the enemy's Aetolian auxiliaries, who were posted upon the Calidromus, the highest summit of the range of Oeta. He then commenced a sudden descent from the hills above the royal camp, and the panic occasioned by this unexpected movement at daybreak, caused the Romans to take flight. After the action, the general embraced Cato with the utmost warmth, and ascribed to him the whole credit of the victory. This fact rests on the authority of Cato himself, who, like Cicero, often indulged in the habit, offensive to modern taste, of sounding his own praises. After an interval spent in the pursuit of Antiochus and the pacification of Greece, Cato was despatched to Rome by the consul Clabrio to announce the successful result of the campaign, and he performed his journey with such celerity that he had commenced his report in the senate before the arrival of L. Scipio, (the subsequent conqueror of Antiochus,) who had been sent off from Greece a few days before him. (Liv. xxxvi. 21.)

It was during the campaign in Greece under Clabrio, and not from the account of Plutarch, (rejected by Drummann,) before the battle of Thermopylae, that Cato was commissioned to keep Corinth, Patras, and Aegium, from siding with Antiochus. It was then too that he visited Athens, and, to prevent the Athenians from listening to the overtures of the Syrian king, addressed them in a Latin speech, which was explained to them by an interpreter. Already perhaps he had a smattering of Greek, for, it is said by Plutarch, that, while at Tarentum in his youth, he became intimately acquainted with Nearuchus, a Greek philosopher, and it is said by Aurelius Victor that while praetor in Sardinia, he received instruction in Greek from Eumius. It was not so much, perhaps, on account of his still professed contempt for everything Greek, as because his speech was an affair of state, that he used the Latin language, as was observed in a diplomatic mark of Roman majesty. (Val. Max. ii. 2, 2.)

After his arrival at Rome, there is no certain proof that Cato was ever again engaged in war. Scipio, who had been legatus under Clabrio, was consul b. c. 190, and the province of Greece was awarded to him by the senate. An expression occurs in Cicero (pro Mur. 14), which might lead to the opinion that Cato returned to Greece, and fought under L. Scipio, but, as to such an event, history is silent. "Nuncum cum Scipione esset profectus [M. Cato], si cum multiusiellis hodiannam esse arbitraror." That Cicero was in error seems more likely than that he referred to the time when Cato and L. Scipio served together under Clabrio, or that the words "cum Scipione," as some critics, have thought, are an interpolation.

In b. c. 189, M. Fulvius Nobilior, the consul, obtained Aetolia as his province, and Cato was sent thither after him, as we learn from an extract (preserved by Festus, s. v. Oratora), from his speech "de suis Virtutibus contra Thermum." It seems also from Cicero (pro Mur. 14) that he was richly paid for his service, and that he was sent to confer with Fulvius on the petition of the Aetolians, who were placed in an unfortunate situation, not sufficiently protected by Rome if they maintained their fidelity, and yet punished if they were induced to assist her enemies.

We have seen Cato in the character of an eminent and able soldier: we have now to observe him in the character of an active and leading citizen. If Cato were in b. c. 189 with L. Scipio Asiaticus (as Cicero seems to have imagined), and in b. c. 189 in Aetolia with Fulvius, rather he must still have been at the military, and that he was sent to confer with Fulvius on the petition of the Aetolians, who were placed in an unfortunate situation, not sufficiently protected by Rome if they maintained their fidelity, and yet punished if they were induced to assist her enemies.

Cato. Cato's opposition was successful; but the passage of Festus already referred to shows that, after his return from Aetolia in 189, he had to defend his own conduct against Themist, who was tribune in c. 180, and died in battle in 185.

In c. 180, Cato and his old friend L. Valerius Flaccus were among the candidates for the censorship, and, among their competitors, was their former general M. Aelius Glabrio. Glabrio, who did not possess the advantages of nobility, determined to try what the influence of money could effect. In order to counteract his endeavours, he was met by an accusation of having applied the treasures of Antiochus to his own use, and was ultimately obliged to retire from the contest. Cato was active in promoting the opposition to his old general, and declared that he had seen vessels of gold and silver among the royal prey in the camp, but had not seen them displayed in the parade of Glabrio's triumph. Neither Cato nor Flaccus was elected. The choice fell upon two of the opposite party, T. Flamininus and M. Marcellus.

Cato was not to be daunted by a failure. In c. 187, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned from Aetolia, and sought the honour of a triumph. Again, Cato was found at his post of opposition. Fulvius was indulgent to his soldiers. He was a man of literary taste, and patronized Eminius, who was his companion in hours not devoted to military duty. All this was repugnant to the old Roman principles of Cato, who, among other charges, found fault with Fulvius for keeping poets in his camp (Cic. Tusc. i. 2), and impairing military discipline, by giving crowns to his soldiers for such mighty services as digging a well with spirit, or valorously throwing up a mound. (Gell. v. 6.)

Again, Cato was unsuccessful, and Fulvius obtained the triumph he sought for.

When P. Scipio Africanus was charged with having received sums of money from Antiochus, which had not been duly accounted for to the state, and with having allowed the unfortunate monarch to come off too leniently, Cato is said to have been the instigator of the accusation. (Liv. xxxviii. 54.) Every one has read how the praetors of ancient Rome examined the accounts of their predecessors, and how Lucius was producing to the senate; and how, on the day of his own trial, he bade the people follow him from the rostra to the Capitol to return thanks to the immortal gods on the anniversary of the battle of Zama. Unused to submit to question, and conscious of his great benefits to the state, he deemed himself almost above the law. Though Cato devoted upon others the obloquy of accusating Africans, he hesitated not openly to speak in favour of a proposition which was calculated to prepare the way for the successful prosecution of a similar charge against L. Scipio Asia- ticus. By his influence a plebiscitum was carried, referring it to the senate to appoint a commissioner to inquire into the charge concerning the money of Antiochus. The result was, that Lucius and others were condemned. As to the dates and details of these transactions, there is the utmost variance in the early authorities. [Scripi.]

Cato was now again a candidate for the censorship, with his old friend L. Valerius Flaccus and six others, among whom were the patricians P. and L. Scipio, and the plebeian L. Fulvius Nobilior. He was loud in his promises or threats of reform, and declared that, if invested with power, he would not belch the professions of his past life. The dread of his success alarmed all his personal enemies, all who were notorious for their luxuries, and all who derived profit from the mismanagement of the public finances. Notwithstanding the combined opposition of the six other candidates, he obtained the censorship in c. 184, bringing in by his own influence L. Valerius Flaccus as his colleague.

This was a great epoch in Cato's life. He applied himself strenuously to the duties of his office, regardless of the enemies he was making. He repaired the watercourses, paved the reservoirs, cleansed the drains, destroyed the communications by which private individuals illegally drew off the public water to supply their dwellings and irrigate their gardens, raised the rents paid by the public for the farm of the taxes, and diminished the contract prices paid by the state to the undertakers of public works. It may be doubted whether he did not go too far in his reforms, from considering rather the cheapness of an offer than the security which was afforded by the character and circumstances of the applicant; but there can be no doubt that great abuses existed, with which nothing but the undaunted courage and extraordinary administrative faculties of Cato could have successfully grappled. He was disturbing a nest of hornets, and all his future life was troubled by their buzz and their attempts to sting. After his censorship, he was appointed by one of the tribunes, at the instigation of T. Flamininus, for misconduct in this department of his office, and condemned to pay a fine of two talents (Plut. Cat. Maj. 10), or in Roman money 12,000 asses. Though he was accused no fewer than forty-four times during the course of his life, this is the only recorded instance in which his enemies prevailed against him.

The provisions against luxury, contained in his memoria edict, were severe and stringent. He directed unauthorized statues erected to the honour of unworthy men to be removed from the public places, and declared against the unceasing profanity and want of religious feeling with which the images of gods and other objects of veneration were used, like ordinary household furniture, to ornament the mansions of the nobles. In the lustral census, young slaves, purchased at 10,000 asses and upwards, were valued at ten times their cost, and then taxed, upon this fictitious value at the rate of three, instead of one, per 1000—a circuitous mode of imposing a rate of three per cent. The same course was pursued in rating the dress, furniture, and equipage of the women, when their real value amounted to 15,000 asses. (Liv. xxxix. 44.) Whether or not the rating were unctiously or usually confined to rue municipi, such was clearly not the case upon the present occasion. In the exercise of the tremendous power of the nota censoria, he was equally uncompromising. He most justly decried from the senate L. Quintius Flamininus (the brother of Titus, his former successful opponent in the canvass for the censorship), for having committed (whatever version of the story we accept) an act of the most abominable cruelty, accompanied by circumstances of the most disgusting profligacy (Liv. xxxix. 42, 43; Plut. Cat. Maj. 17; Cic. Senec. 12); yet such was already the low state of morals at Rome, that a mob could be procured to invite the degraded wretch to resume his former place at the theatre in the seats allotted to the consuls. He degraded Manlius, a man of praetorian rank, for having kissed his wife in his daughter's presence in open day. Whether Cato's strange statement as to his own practice (Plut. Cato, 17) is to be taken as a hyperbolical recommendation of decent reserve, or to be explained as Balzac (cited by Bayle, s. v. Porcius) explains it, we cannot stop to inquire. He degraded L. Nasica (or, as some conjecturally read, L. Porcius Laccu) for an unseemly and irreverent joke in answer to a solemn question. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 64.) In order to detect that celibacy which it was the duty of the censors to put an end to or to punish, men of marriageable age were asked, "Ex tui animi sententia, tu uxorom habes?" "Non hereula," was the answer of L. Nasica, "ex me animi sententia." At the muster of the knights, he deprived L. Scipio Asiaticus of his horse for having accepted the bribes of Antiochus. L. Scipio was a senator, but senators, not beyond the age of service, still retained the public horse of the knight, and took their place at the muster. (Dict. Ant. s. v. Equites.) He deprived L. Veturius of his horse for having omitted a stated sacrifice, and for having grown too copulent to be of use in battle. (Fest. s. v. Stata.) Several others he deprived and deprived of their horses, and, not content with this, he publicly exposed, with bitter ridicule, the vices of his victims.

It does not appear that, in the exercise of the theoretically exorbitant and anomalous power of the censorship, Cato acted unfairly, although personal motives and private enmities or party dislikes may sometimes have conspired with his views of political and moral duty.

The remarkable censorship of Cato was rewarded by a public statue, with a commemorative and laudatory inscription.

Henceforward the public life of Cato was spent chiefly in forensic contests, senatorial debates, and speeches to the people. The fragments of his orations show his unceasing activity, and the general consistency of his career. He pursued his political opinions with relentless animosity, for with him, true Italian as he was, revenge was a virtue. In his own words, the most honourable obsequies which a son could pay to the memory of his father were the condemnation and tears of that father's foes. With greenish-gray eyes and sandy hair, an iron frame, and a stentorian voice, he gave utterance to such bitter invective as to provoke the pungent Greek epigram recorded by Plutarch. (Cato, 1)

Πυθύν, πανδαικτίν, γλώναςματόν, αυξί δαμάντα Πέρκων αις αυξών Περινθιφή δέξηται.

His resistance to luxury continued. In b. c. 181, he urged the adoption of the Lex Orthis for restricting the number of guests at banquets. In b. c. 169 (according to Cicero, Sest. 5, or several years earlier, according to the epitomizer of Livy Epit. xiii.) he supported the proposal of the Lex Vovonia, the provisions of which were calculated to prevent the accumulation of wealth in the hands of women.

In some questions of foreign policy we find him taking the side of the oppressed. The proconsular governors of both Spains compelled the provincial inhabitants to pay their corn-assessments in money at a high arbitrary commutation, and then forced the provincial farmers to supply the Romans with corn at greatly reduced price. When the Spanish duties came to Rome, b. c. 171, to complain of such unjust exaction, Cato was chosen advocate of his former province, Citerior Spain, and conducted the prosecution with such spirit as to draw down upon himself powerful enmity, although the guilty governors, M. Matienus and P. Furius Philus, escaped condemnation by voluntary exile. (Liv. xlixii. 2.)

Again, when the Rhodians besought the senate not to punish the whole island for the unauthorized acts of a few factious individuals, on the charge of general disaffection towards the Roman arms in the wars with Antiochus and Perses, Cato pleaded the cause of Rhodes before the senate in an able and effective speech. The minute and artificial criticisms of Tiro, the freedman of Cicero, upon parts of this speech, are reported and refuted by Gellius (vii. 3). Cicero himself speaking by the mouth of Atticus (Brutas, 85), was scarcely able sufficiently to appreciate the sturdy, rugged, sententious, passionate, nay, oratory of Cato. It was tinged with some affectations of striking expressions— with quaintnesses, vulgarisms, archaisms, and neologisms, but it told— it worked— it came home to men's business and bosoms. If we may judge of Cato by his fragments, he possessed the living fire spirit and the sacredness of the Doric example, without the elevation of thought, the harmony of language, and the perfection of form which crowned the eloquence of the Athenian.

The strong national prejudices of Cato appear to have diminished in force as he grew older and wiser. He applied himself in old age to the study of Greek literature, with which in youth he had no acquaintance, although he was not ignorant of the Greek language. Himself an historian and orator, the excellences of Demosthenes and Thucydides made a deep impression upon his kindred mind. In many important cases, however, throughout his life, his conduct was guided by prejudices against classes and nations, whose influence he deemed to be hostile to the simplicity of the old Roman character. It is likely that he had some part in the senateconsultum which, upon the appearance of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, at Brundisium, n. c. 166, forbade kings to enter Rome, for when Eumenes, upon his former visit, after the war with Antiochus, was received with honour by the senate, and splendidly entertained by the nobles, Cato was indignant at the respect paid to the monarch, refused to go near him, and declared that, "kings were naturally carnivorous animals." He had an antipathy to physicians, because they were mostly Greeks, and therefore unfit to be trusted with Roman lives, insomuch as all Greeks looked upon the barbarians, including the Romans, as natural enemies. He loudly cautioned his eldest son against physicians, and dispensed with their attendance. He was not a bad physician himself in recommending as a peculiarly salutary diet, ducks, geese, pigeons, and hares, though hares, he tells us, are apt to produce dreams. With all his antipathy, there is no ground in ancient authors for the often-repeated statement that he carried a law for the expulsion of physicians from the city. When Athens sent Cermnes, Diogenes, and Critolaus to Rome in order to negotiate a remission of the 800 talents which the Athenians had been awarded to pay by way of compensation to the Oropians, Carchemis excited great attention by his philosophical conversation and lectures, in which he preached the pernicious doctrine of an expediency distinct from justice, and illustrated his doctrine by touching on a dangerous and delicate subject—the example of Rome herself. "If Rome were stiff of all that she did not justly gain, the Romans might go back to their huts." Cato, offended with these principles, and jealous of the attention paid to this Greek, gave advice which the senate followed. "Let these deputes have an answer, and a polite demolition as soon as possible." Upon the conquest of Punicus, the leading men of the Achaian union, to the number of nearly 1,000, including the historian Polybius, were brought to Rome, B.C. 167, as hostages for the good behavior of the Achaians, and, afterwards, without any proof of dissatisfaction, were detained in exile from their country, and distributed among the colonies and municipia of Italy. When their numbers were reduced to about 300, by an exile of 16 years, the intestine of the younger Africans, the friends of Polybius, prevailed with Cato to vote that they should be permitted to return to their country. The conduct of the old senator—he was now eighty-three—was kinder than his words. He did not interpose until the end of a long debate, and then assented to the proposal on the ground, that it was a matter of perfect indifference. "Have we nothing better to do than to sit here all day long debating whether a parcel of worn-out Greeks shall be carried to their graves here or in Achaia?"

When the exiles further besought the senate that they might be restored to their former status and honors in their own country, Cato intimated that they were fools for going home, and were much better off as they were. He said with a smile, that Polybius was like Ulysses returning to the cave of the Cyclops for his hat and sash. The active powers of Cato had been so much more educated than his affections, that he appears to have been nearly devoid of sympathy with fine and tender feelings, though some allowance may be made for a little assumed ungenerousness of demeanour, in order to keep up his Catoian character. Nowhere in his writings or his speeches do we meet with generous and elevating sentiments. His strong will and powerful passions of anger and ambition were guided by a keen and cold intellect, and a practical, utilitarian, common sense.

Even in the closing years of his protracted life, Cato had no reposo. In his 81st year, B.C. 158, he was accused by C. Cassius of some capital crime (the nature of which is not recorded), and defended against an overwhelming strength, with unfaiering voice, and with unshaken memory. "How hard it is," he said, "for one whose life has been past in a preceding generation, to plead his cause before the men of the present!" (Val. Max. viii. 7. § 1; Plut. Cato, 15.)

In the very year before his death, he was one of the chief instigators of the third Punic war. The anxiety of the senate had been excited by the report that a large army, under Arbiobrazes, was assembled on the Carthaginian territory. Cato recommended an instant declaration of war against the Carthaginians, on the ground that the real object in procuring the assistance of the Numidians was hostility to Rome, although their nominal object was the defence of their frontier against the claim of Massinissa to part of their dominions. Seipio Nasica thought that no causas bolit had arisen, and it was arranged that an embassy should be sent to Africa to gain information as to the real state of affairs. When the ten deputies, of whom Cato was one, came to the disputed territory, they offered their arbitration, which was accepted by Massinissa, but rejected by the Carthaginians, who had no confidence in Roman justice. The deputies accurately observed the warlike preparations, and the defences of the frontier. They then entered the city, and saw the strength and population it had acquired since its conquest by the elder Aferines. Upon their return home, Cato was the foremost in assenting that Rome would never be safe, as long as Carthage was so powerful, so hostile, and so near. One day he drew a bunch of early ripe figs from beneath his robe, and throwing it upon the floor of the senate-house, said to the assembled fathers, who were astonished at the freshness and fineness of the fruit, "Those figs were gathered but three days ago at Carthage; so close is our enemy to our walls." From that time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were "I vote that Carthage no longer be," or, according to the more accepted version of Florus (ii. 15) "Delenda est Carthago." Seipio Nasica, on the other hand, thinking that Carthage in its weakened state was rather a useful check than a formidable rival to Rome, always voted to "let Carthage be." (Liv. Epit. xlviii. xlix.; Appian, de Bell. Pum. 69; Plin. H. N. xv. 17.) This story must appear strange to those who know not that, during the republic, it was a Roman custom for senators, when called upon for their votes, to express—no matter what the question—any opinion which they deemed of great importance to the welfare of the state. (Tac. Ann. ii. 39.)

In the very last year of his life, Cato took a conspicuous part in the righteous but unsuccessful prosecution of S. Sulpius Galba. This peridious general, after the surrender of the Massilian army, in fragrant breach of faith, put to death some of the soldiers, and sold others as slaves in Gaul, while a few escaped by flight, among whom was Viriathus, the future avenger of his nation. Galba pretended to have discovered that, under cover of the surrender, the Massilians had concerted an attack; but he obtained his acquittal chiefly through the compassion excited by the theatrical parade of his young weeping sons and orphan ward. Cato made a powerful speech in an earlier age, and at his own instance, and in his last moments, his Origenes, a few days or months before his death, B.C. 149, at the age of 85. (Cic. Brutus, 23.)

Cato was twice married; first to Licinia, a lady of small property but noble birth, who bore a son, M. Porcius Cato Licinianus, the jurist, and lived to an advanced age. After her death he secretly cohabitated with a female slave; for, though he was a faithful husband, and as a widower was anxious to preserve his reputation, the well-known "sententia, dixit Catonis" proves that he set but little value upon the virtue of chastity. When his amour was discovered by his son, he determined to marry again, and chose the year of his marriage in his epistle to Q. Tullius, the son of the orator, as the year of his birth. The mother, therefore, to whom he was to have been diligent, was his wife, and not his client, M. Sabonius. The way in which a patron could command his client, and a father Cato. He was contemporary with some of the earliest writers of eminence in the adolescence of classical literature. Nenaeus died when he was auestor under Scipio, Plautus when he was censor. Before his own death the more cultivated muse of Terence, who was born in his consulsip, had appeared upon the stage.

The work De Re Rustica, which we now possess under the name of Cato, is probably substantially his, though it is certainly not exactly in the form in which it proceeded from his pen. It consists of very miscellaneous materials, relating principally to domestic and rural economy. There we may find rules for libations and sacrifices; medical precepts, including the sympathetic cure and the verbal charm; a receipt for a cake; the making of a contract; the description of a tool; the mode of rearing garden flowers. The best editions of this work are those which are contained in the collected Scripturei Rerum Rusticarum of Genner (Lips. 1775-4) and Schmieder. (Lips. 1794-7.)

Cato's instructions to his eldest son, published in the form of letters, treated of various subjects suited to the education of a Roman youth. They were divided into books, which, being quoted by various names, have been counted as separate treatises. The Apollodorus, for example, may have formed one of the books of the general collection. Of Cato's instructions to his son a few fragments remain, which may be found in H. Alb. Lion's Catonisana, Göt, 1826, a work of small critical merit.

The fragments of the omissions are best given in H. Meyer's Ovatorum Romanorum Fragmenta, Turici, 1842.

The few passages in the Digest where Cato is cited are commented upon by Miqansis (ad XXX X' Catos); but it is probable that the citations in the Digest refer not to the Censor, but to his eldest son, who confined himself more exclusively to jurisprudence than his father. Other juridical fragments of Cato are given by Dickars in his "Bruchstücke aus den Schriften der Römischen Juristen," p. 44, &c.

Cato, when he was already advanced in life, composed an historical work entitled "Origines," of which many fragments have been preserved. It was probably published in parts from time to time as the several books were completed. Livy (xxxiv. 5), in a speech which he puts into the mouth of the tribune Valerius during the consulship of Cato, makes Valerius quote the Origines in reply to their author; but this is generally thought to be an anachronism. The first book contained the history of the Roman kings; the second and third treated of the origin of the Italian towns, and from these two books the whole work derived its title. There was introduced into the story of the origins of the kings to the commencement of the first Punic war, which formed the subject of the fourth book. The events of the second Punic war were related in the fifth book, and the sixth and seventh continued the narrative to the year of Cato's death. (Nepos, Cato, 3.) It is said, by Nepos, Gallius, and Pliny (H. N. viii. 5), that he suppressed the names of the generals who carried on the wars which he relates; but the remaining fragments show that he made at least some exceptions to this practice. He is unanimously acknowledged by the ancients to have been an exceedingly industrious and learned antiquary; but Livy, in his early decades, makes no use of the Origines. According to Dionysius (l. 74) Cato placed the building of Rome in the 132nd year after the Trojan war, or in the first of the 7th Olympiad, n. c. 751. The best collection of the remains of the Orations is in Krause's Vite et Fragmenta Vat. Hist. Rom. Berlin, 1833.

The life of this extraordinary man was written by Cornelius Nepos, Plutarch, and Aurelius Victor. Many additional particulars of his history are to be collected from Livy, who portrays his character in a splendid and celebrated passage (xixir. 40). Some facts of importance are to be gleaned from Cicero, especially from his Cato Major or de Senectute, and his Brief, or short letters. Writers he was regarded as a model of Roman virtue, and few names occur oftener in the classics than his. Much has been written upon him by the moderns. There are some Latin verses upon Cato in the Juvenalia of Theodore Beza. Majanius (ad XXX Jclos) composed his life with remarkable diligence, collecting and comparing nearly all the ancient authorities, except a few which were creditable to his hero. (See also Wetzel's Excerpts in his edition of Cie. de Senec. p. 256, &c.; De M. Porci Cato in Vitas et Scriptis, in Schneider's "Scriptores Rer. Rusticae," vol. I. part. ii. init.; Bayle, Dict. s. v. Porcius; Krause, Vite et Fragment. &c. pp. 89-97; G. E. Weber, Commentatio de M. Porci Cato in Censoris Vite et Moribus, Brunse, 1831; and Gerlach, Scipio und Cato, in Schweizerisches Museum für historische Wissenschaften, 1837; above all, Drumman, Gesch. Romes, v. pp. 97-148.)

2. M. Porcius Cato Licinius, a Roman jurist, the son of Cato the Censor by his first wife Licia, and hence called Licinius to distinguish him from his half-brother, M. Porcius Cato, the son of Salonia. His father paid great attention to his education, physical as well as mental, and studied to preserve his young mind from every immoral taint. He was taught to ride, to swim, to wrestle, to fence, and, perhaps, the memory of a weak constitution, was exposed to vicissitudes of cold and heat in order to harden his frame. The Censor would not allow his learned slave Chilo to superintend the education of his son, lest the boy should acquire slavish notions or habits, but wrote lessons of history for him in large letters with his own hand, and afterwards composed a kind of Encyclopedia for his use. Under such tuition, the young Cato became a wise and virtuous man. He first entered life as a soldier, and served, u. c. 173, in Liguria under the consul M. Popilius Laenas. The legion to which he belonged having been disbanded, he returned to Rome, a second time, by the advice of his father, in order to qualify himself legally to fight against the enemy. (Cic. de Off. i. 11.) In u. c. 168, he fought against Perseus at Pydna under the consul Aemilius Paulus, whose daughter, Aemilia Tertia, he afterwards married. He distinguished himself in the battle by his personal prowess in a combat in which he first lost and finally recovered his sword. The details of this combat are related with variations by several authors. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 29; Justin, xxxiii. 2; Val. Max. iii. 12, § 16; Frontin. Strat. iv. 5. § 17.) He returned to the troops on his horse, on the side of his comrades, and met the enemy with applause by the consul, who gave him his discharge in order that he might get cured. Here again his father seems to have cautioned him to take no further part in battle, as after his discharge he was no longer a soldier. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 39.)

Henceforward he appears to have devoted himself to the practice of the law, in which he attained considerable eminence. In the obscure and corrupt fragment of Pompomius de Orat. Look at sctus et Publicus Aelius and Publicus Attilus, the author proceeds to speak of the two Catos as follows: "Has sctatus ad aliquid cat Cato. Deinde M. Cato, princeps Porciac familie, enquis et libri extant; sed plurimi filli eja; ex quibus notabilis est posteaque," i.e. this passage (p. 9) is the account of a Cato before the Censor, but Pompomius wrote in paragraphs, devoting one to each succession of jurists, and the word Deinde commences that of the Catos, though the Censor had been mentioned by anticipation at the end of the preceding paragraph. From the Catos, father and son (ex quibus), the subsequent jurists trace their succession. Apollinaris Sulpidius, in that passage of Gellius (xiii. 18) which is the principal authority with respect to the genealogy of the Cato family, speaks of the son as having written "agreglos de juris disciplinis libros." Festus (v. r. Menses) cites the common extract jurid civilis of Cato, probably the son; and Paulinus (Dig. 45. tit. 1. s. 4. § 1) cites Cato's 15th book. Cicero (de Orat. i. 23) censures Cato and Brutus for introducing in their published responses the names of the persons who consulted them. Celsus (Dig. 50. tit. 16. s. 98. § 1) cites an opinion of Cato concerning the intercalary month, and the regula or sententia Catoniaca is frequently mentioned in the Digest. The regula Catoniaca was a celebrated rule of Roman law to the effect, that a legacy should never be valid unless it would have been valid if the testator had died immediately after he had made his will. This rule (which had several exceptions) was a particular case of a more general maxim: "Quod initio non valet, id tecto tempore non potest convalesere." The name and celebrity of the son as a jurist, and the language of the citations from Cato, render it likely that the son is the Cato of the Digest. From the manner in which Cato is mentioned in the Institutes (Inst. 1. tit. 11. § 12)—"Apud Catonem bene scriptum referant antiquitas,"—it may be inferred, that he was known only at second hand in the time of Justinian.

He died when praetor designatus, about B. C. 152, a few years before his father, who bore his loss with resignation, and, on the ground of poverty, gave him a fragual funeral. (Liv. Epic. 40; comp. Cic. de Senect. 1.)

Cato, Catonis, i. 1-113; E. L. Harnier, de Regula Catoniaca, Heidelb. 1829; Drumman's Rom. v. p. 149.)

3. M. Porcius Cato Salonianus, the son of Cato the censor by his second wife Salonia, was born u. c. 154, when his father had completed his 80th year, and about two years before the death of his step-brother. He lost his father when he was five years old, and lived to attain the praetorship, in which office he died. (Gell. xiii. 19; Plut. Cat. Maj. 27.)

4. M. Porcius Cato, elder son of Cato Licinius. [No. 2.] Like his grandfather, the Censor, he was a noted orator, and was said to have written speeches. In u. c. 119, he was consul with Q. Marius Rex, and in the same year died in Africa, whither he had proceeded.
CATO.

probably for the purpose of arranging the differences between the heirs of Mischops in Numidia. (Gell. xiii. 19; Liv. Epit. ix.)

5. C. PORCIUS CATO, younger son of Cato Lici-dianus [No. 2], is mentioned by Cicero as a muddling orator. (Brut. 28.) In his youth he was a follower of Tib. Gracchus. In b.c. 114, he was consul with Aelius Balbus, and in the same year obtained Macedonia as his province.
In Thracia, he fought unsuccessfully against the Scardisci. His army was cut off in the mountains, and he himself escaped with difficulty, though Ammiannus Marcellinus erroneously states that he was slain. (xxvii. 4. § 4.) Disappointed of booty in war, he endeavoured to indemnify himself by extortions in Macedonia. For this he was accused and sentenced to pay a fine. Afterwards, he appears to have served as a legate in the war with Jugurtha in Africa, where he was won over by the king. In order to escape condemnation on this charge, in b.c. 110, he went to Tarraco in Spain, and became a citizen of that town. (Cic. pro Balb. 11.) He has been sometimes confounded with his elder brother. (Vell. Pat. ii. 8; Extrop.
iv. 24; Cic. in Ver. iii. 80, iv. 10.)

He was a friend of Sulla, whose prescriptions he did not live to see. He was tribunus plebs, and died when a candidate for the praetorship. (Gell. xiii. 19; Plut. Cat. Muc. 1–3.) Cicero, in discussing how far a venue is bound to disclose to a purchaser the defects of the thing sold, mentions a decision of Cato on the trial of an actio arbitaria, in which Calpurnius was plaintiff and Claudius defendant. The plaintiff, having been ordered by the augurs to pull down his house on the Mons Caecilum because it obstructed the auspices, sold it to the defendant without giving notice of the order. The defendant was obliged to obey a similar order, and brought an action to recover damages for the fraud. Upon these facts, Cato decided in favour of the purchaser. (De Off.
iii. 16.)

7. L. PORCIUS CATO, the son of No. 3, and uncle of Cato of Utica, attached himself to the party of the senate. In the year b.c. 100, he was tribune of the plebs, and in that office opposed the attempts of L. Apuleius Saturninus, and assisted in rejecting a resolution on behalf of the exiled Metellus Numidicus. In the social war, b.c. 90, he defeated the Etruscans, and in the following year was consul with Pompeius Strabo. On one occasion a portion of his troops, consisting of town rabbles, was instigated to disobedience and mutiny by the impudent prating of one C. Titius. He lost his life in an unlucky skirmish with the Marsians, near Lake Fucinus, at the end of a successful battle. It was thought by some that his death was not to be attributed to the enemy, but to the art of the younger Marius; for Cato had boasted that his own achievements were equal to the Cim-brian victory of Marius the father. (Liv. Epit.
Ixxv.; Oros. v. 17.)

8. M. PORCIUS CATO, son of No. 4. After having been curule aedile and praetor, he obtained the government of Gallia Narbonensis, where he died. (Plut. Cat. Muc. 25.)

9. M. PORCIUS CATO, son of No. 6 by Livia, great-grandson of Cato the Censor, and surname Uticensis from Utica, the place of his death, was born b.c. 95. In early childhood he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus, along with his sister Porcia and the children of his mother by her second husband, Q. Servilius Caepio. While yet of tender age, he gave token of a certain sturdy independence. The Italian socii were now seeking the right of Roman citizenship, and Q. Pompaedi Silo was endeavouring to enlist Drusus on their side. Silo playfully asked Cato and his half-brother Q. Caepio if they would not take part with their uncle. Caepio at once smiled and said he would, but Cato was silent, and persisted in saying that he would not, though Silo pretended that he was going to throw him out of the window for his refusal. This story has been doubted on the ground that, as Drusus lost his life b.c. 91, Cato could not have been more than four years old, and consequently was not of an age to form an opinion on public affairs at the time when it is stated to have occurred. This criticism will be appreciated at its due value by those who understand the spirit of the anecdote, and know the manner in which little boys are commonly addressed.

After the death of Drusus, Cato was placed under the charge of Sarpoden, who found him difficult to deal with, easily led by argument rather than authority. He had not that quick comprehension and instinctive tact which make learning to some happily-organized children a constant but unobtrusive growth. He did not trust, and observed, and felt, but he acquired his knowledge by asking questions and receiving explanations. That which he thus acquired slowly he retained temerously. His temper was like his intellect: it was easily roused; but, being roused, it was not easily calmed. The child was father to the man.
Throughout his life, the same want of flexibility and gradation was one of his obvious defects. He had none of that almost unconscious intuition
by which great men modify the erroneous results of abstract reasoning, and take hints from passing events. There was in him no accommodation to circumstances, no insight into the windings of character, no power of gaining influence by apt and easy insinuation. The influence he gained was due to his name for high and stubborn virtue.
As a boy he took little interest in the childish pursuits of his fellows. He rarely smiled, and he exhibited a firmness of purpose which was not to be cajoled by flattery nor daunted by violence.
Yet was there something in his unsocial individuality which attracted notice and inspired respect.
Once, at the game of Trials, he remained by force from a higher boy a youth continued to prison who appealed to him for protection, and, burning with passion, led him home accompanied by his comrades. When Sulla gave to the noble youths of Rome the military game called Troja, and proposed as their leaders the son of his wife Metella and Sex. Pompeius, the boys with one accord cried out for Cato in place of Sextus. Sarpoden took him occasionally, when he was in his fourteenth year, to pay his respects to Sulla, his late father's friend. The tortures and executions which sometimes were conducted in Sulla's house made it resemble (in the words of Plutarch) "the place of the dead". In the course of his visits, during the heads of several illustrious citizens carried forth, and bearing with indignation the suppressed groups of those who were present, he turned to his preceptor with the question "Why does no one kill that tyrant?" “Because,” answered Sarpedon, “men fear him more strongly than they hate him.” “Why then,” subjoined Cato, “would you not let me have a sword, that I might put him to death, and restore my country to freedom?” This outbreak induced his tutor to watch him, lest he should attempt something desperate.

He received 120 talents as his share of his father's fortune, and, being now his own master, still further contracted his expenditure, hitherto extremely moderate. He addicted himself to political studies, and practised in solitude oratorical declamation. As he hated luxury and was accustomed to self-denial, the precepts of the Porch found favour in his sight; and, under the guidance of Antipater of Tyre, he pursued with all the ardour of a devotee the ethical philosophy of the Stoics. The virtue he chiefly worshipped was a rigid justice, not only unmoved by favour, but rejecting the corruptive of equity and mercy.

Differing widely in disposition and natural gifts from his great ancestor the Censor, he yet looked up to him as a model, adopted his principles, and imitated his conduct. His constitution was naturally vigorous, and he endeavoured to harden it still more by excessive toil. He travelled bare-headed in the heat of summer, and amidst the winter snow. When his friends were making long journeys on horseback, he accompanied them on foot. In illness and fever, he passed his hours alone, not hearing any witness of his physical infirmities. He was singular in his dress, preferring, by way of sober contrast, a dark purple to the rich crimson then in vogue, and he often appeared in public after dinner without shoes or tunic. Up to his twentieth year, his inseparable companion was his half-brother, Q. Servilius Caepio, to whom he was affectionately attached. When Caepio was praised for his moderation and frugality, he acknowledged that he was but a Sippian (a notorious prodigal) when compared with Cato. Thus Cato became a mark for the eyes of the throng. Vicious luxury was one of the crying evils of the times, and he was pointed out as the natural successor of his ancestor in reforming manners, and in presenting the old, simple, undegenerate Roman. It is said he would often decline the invitation of a dinner, and order the waiter to give the lights out.

The first occasion of his appearance in public life was connected with the name of his ancestor. The elder Cato in his censorship had erected and dedicated a building called the Porcia Basilica. In this the tribunes of the people were accustomed to transact business. There was a column in the way of the benches where they sat, and they determined either to remove it altogether or to change its place. This proposition called forth the younger Cato, who successfully resisted the measure in a speech which was graceful while it was cutting, and was elevated in tone without any of the turgidity of an orator's style.

Cato was capable of warm and tender attachment, and much that was stiff and angular in his character was enhanced by early disappointment and blighted affection. Lepida had been betrothed to Metellus Scipio, who broke off the match. Free once more, she was wooed by Cato; but the attentions of a new admirer recalled the ardour of her former lover, who sued again, and was again accepted. Stung to the quick, Cato was with difficulty prevented, by the entreaties of friends, from exposing himself by going to law, and expounded the bitterness of his wrath against Scipio in satirical hunks. He soon afterwards married Atilia, the daughter of Serranus, but was obliged to divorce her for adultery after she had borne him two children.

He served his first campaign as a volunteer, b. c. 72, under the consul Gallius Publicola, in the service of Spartacus. He joined the army rather from a desire to be near Caepio, who was tribune militum, than out of any love for a military life. In this new career he had no opportunity of distinguishing himself; but his observation of discipline was perfect, and in courage he was never found wanting. The general offered him military rewards, which he refused on the ground that he had done nothing to deserve them. For this he was reckoned perverse and cross-grained, but his own estimate of his services was not perhaps much below the mark. He had many of the qualities which make a good soldier, but of that peculiar genius which constitutes a great general he had not a spark.

About the year b. c. 67, he became a candidate for the post of tribune militum, and obeyed the law by canvassing without nomenclatures. He was elected, and joined the army of the proprietor M. Rutilus in Macedonia. Here he was appointed to command a legion, and he won the esteem and attachment of the soldiers by the force of reason, by sharing all their labours, and by a strict attention to his duty. He treated them as rational beings, not as mere machines, and he preserved order without harsh punishments or lavish bribes. But the life of the camp was ill suited to his temperament. Hearing that the famous Stoic philosopher Athenodorus, surnamed Cordylien, was at Pergamus, he obtained a free legation, which gave him leave of absence for two months, travelled to Asia in search of the philosopher, and succeeded in persuading Athenodorus to return with him to Macedonia. This was deemed by Cato a greater triumph than the capture of a rich city, for the Stoic had refused repeated offers of friendship and society from kings and emperors.

Cato was now doomed to suffer a severe misfortune, and to put to the test the lesions of his youth. He married Metellus Caepio, on his way to Asia, was taken ill at Amus, a town of Thrace. Cato was informed of this by letter, and, embarking without delay in a small vessel, set sail in stormy weather from Thessalonica; but he did not arrive in time to close the eyes of his beloved brother. The tumult of his grief was excessive. He embraced the corpse with tears and cries, and spared no expense in the splendour of the funeral. He sent back to the provincials their preferred gifts of money, and paid them for the odours and precious vestments which they contributed to the sad solemnity. At the cost of eight talents, he erected a temple to Ceres at Corfu, on the coast of Thessalian marble in the market-place at Amus.

He now returned to Rome in a ship which conveyed the ashes of his brother. At Rome his time was divided between the lessons of philosophy from the lips of Athenodorus, the advocacy of his friends' causes in the forum, and the studies that were necessary to qualify him for political offices. He was now of an age to offer himself for the quaestorship, but he determined not to put himself forward as a candidate until he was master of the details of his duties. He was able to purchase for five talents a book which contained the pecuniary accounts of the quaestorship from the time of Sulla, and this he attentively perused. Further, he made himself acquainted with all the laws relating to the public treasure. Armed with this knowledge, he was elected to the quaestorship. The scribes and subordinate clerks of the business, anxious to oblige official business and official documents, relied upon their own experience and the ignorance of ordinary quaestors, and thus were able to teach their teachers and to rule their rulers. Cato broke in upon this official monopoly, which had been made a cover for much fraud and abuse, and, in spite of the resistance which might have been expected from such an interested swarm, he routed and exposed their misdeeds. The debts that were due from the state to individuals he promptly paid, and he rigidly demanded prompt payment of the debts that were due to the state. He took effectual measures to prevent the falsification of the decrees of the senate and other public documents which were entrusted to the custody of the quaestors. He obliged the informers who had received blood-money from Sulla out of the public treasure to refund their ill-gotten gains. His colleagues, who were at first offended at his strictness, finding that he continued to act with impartiality and upon consistent principle, sought to avoid his reproach and began to admire his conduct. By his honest and determined administration he replenished the treasury, and quitted office at the end of the year amid the general applause of his fellow-citizens.

It is probable that after the termination of his quaestorship, Cato, about the middle of the year 80 B.C., took the invitation of king Decebalus of the Parthian empire, which was sent to him through his father's friend, for, as Drumm has observed (Geschichte Roms, v. p. 157), the narrative of Plutarch, which makes the events of this Asiatic journey anterior to his quaestorship, is hext with numerous difficulties and anachronisms. In his travels in the east, he neglected that external splendour to which the Orientals were accustomed, and sometimes was treated with slight on account of the meanness of his equipage and apparel. By Pompey, Cato was received with the utmost civility and respect, and this external show of honour from the great man upon whom all eyes were turned, considerably excited Cato's dignity and importance elsewhere. But there was no cordiality in Pompey's welcome. The visitor, who seemed to be a damper upon his free command, was not invited to stay, and was dismissed without regret.

Deotarbus, upon the arrival of Cato, offered him all kinds of presents, and pressed their acceptance with an earnestness which offended his guest, who departed early on the following day. Upon reaching Pessinus, Cato found that still richer presents had been sent on with a letter from the king, beseeching him, if he would not take them himself, to let his attendants take them; but, much to the dissatisfaction of some of his attendants, he rejected them with indifference.

Upon Cato's return to Rome, B. c. 63, he found Lucullus, who had married one of his half-sisters, Servilia, before the gates soliciting a triumph for his success against Mithridates. In obtaining this object, he succeeded by the assistance of Cato and the nobility, notwithstanding the opposition of Memmius and other creatures of Pompey.

Cato was now looked upon by many as a suitable candidate for the tribuneship, but he declined to stand for that office, and determined to pass some time at his country seat in Lucania in the company of his books and his philosophers. On his way he met a long train of baggage, and was informed that it belonged to Metellus Nepos, who was hastening from Pompey's army to seek the tribuneship. His resolution was at once taken. He determined to oppose this emissary of Pompey, and, after spending a day or two in the country, reappeared in Rome. He compared the sudden arrival of Metellus to a thunderbolt falling upon the state, but his own arrival equally surprised his friends. The nobles, who were jealous of Pompey's power and designs, flocked in crowds to vote for him, and he succeeded in gaining his own election, but not in ousting Metellus. One of his first acts after his election was the prosecution of L. Licinius Muraena for bribery at the consul's comitia; but Muraena, who was defended by Cicero, Hortensius, and Crassus, was acquitted by the jury. This (B. c. 63) was the first act of Cicero's consuls, and of the suppression of Catiline's conspiracy. Cato supported the counsel in proposing that the conspirators should suffer death, and was the first who gave to Cicero the name of pater patriae. It was Cato's speech of the 5th of December which determined the senate, previously wavering from the force of Caesar's oratory. The severer sentence was carried, and Cato's part in this transaction occasioned a rupture between him and Caesar, whom he charged with being a secret accomplice of Catiline. Plutarch (Cato Minor, 29) speaks of Cato's speech as extant, and it was preserved by the six or seven Roman and Latin writers placed in the senate-house for that purpose by Cicero. Sallust gives two well-known orations as the speeches of Caesar and Cato, but there is reason to believe that not only is the language Sallust's own, but that the fabricated speeches differ considerably in several particulars from those which were actually delivered.

The crushing of Catiline's conspiracy was an important step, but, in order to accomplish the political theories of Cato, much remained to be done. Induced by the example of Sulla, several ambitious men were now aspiring to supreme power, and those who, like Catiline, endeavoured to grasp it in the disorder occasioned by civil discord, was not the most formidable. The wealth of Crassus and the character and position of Pompey were directed to the same end. Caesar, who had watched the conspiracy of Catiline, and, if it had succeeded, would most likely have been the person to profit by its success, saw their object, and had the address to baffle their schemes. Pompey, his more formidable rival, wished to obtain supreme power by constitutional means, and waited in hope of a voluntary surrender; but he had not the unsavoury courage which would have been required to seize it, or to keep it when gained. Caesar, of a more daring, vigorous, and impetuous nature, was not morbidly strained by similar scruples. He contrived by entering into a combination with Pompey and Crassus to detach both from the senatorial party, from which they were already estranged by their own unambitious ambition. Cato wished to defeat this combination, but the measures he resorted to were clumsy and injudicious. His opposition to Pompey was conducted in a manner which promoted the views of Caesar, who turned every combination of events to the purposes of his own aggrandizement, and availed himself at once of the influence of Pompey and the wealth of Crassus.
The state of political parties at Rome was now such, that neither energy nor foresight could long have retarded the downfall of the republic.
The party of the Senate professed to adhere to the an-cent doctrines of the constitution, clinging in practice to oligarchical principles, but it possessed in its ranks no man of great popularity or commanding political genius. Lucullus had often led his troops to victory, and had considerable influence over the army, but he preferred the quiet enjoyment of the vast wealth he had acquired in Asia to the leadership of the party of the nobles. Had he not lacked ambition, he might have given the Senate effective support. Cato attached himself to the Senate, and may be numbered among its leaders; but neither he nor his chief conditors in the same cause, Catulus and Ciceron, could boast of that practical ability and ready command of resources which were wanting at the present crisis. He was far better suited for contemplation than for action, and would have been more at home, more happy, and not less useful, in the calm pursuits of literature and philosophy, than amidst the turmoil of public life. A man more pure and disinterested could not be found. His opinion as a judge and his testimony as a witness were regarded as almost decisive. Such was the reverence for his character, that when he went into the theatre during the games of Flora, given by Meotius, the dancing-women were not required to perform the punishment of their accustomed nudity; but when Cato learned from Samnius that his presence damped the enjoyment of the people, he retired amidst applause. The conduct of his political friends was analogous. They rather praised than imitated his virtues, and those who praised him liked him best when he was at such a distance as not to impose restraint upon their actions. Irregularity and corruption were so general, that an honest man, in order to do good, must have been master of remarkable discretion, whereas the straightforward and uncompromising strictness of Cato generally appeared ill-timed, and was deemed better suited to the imaginary republic of Plato than to the actual condition of the Roman people.
In the year of his tribunate he opposed the proposition of Metellus Nepos to recall Pompey from Asia, and to give him the command of the legions against Catiline. Cato exerted himself in the midst of a riot to prevent the voting of the proposetion, and exposed himself to considerable personal danger without much prudence or much dignity.
In n. c. 60, he opposed the rogetation of the Tribune
L. Flavius to reward Pompey's veterans with allotments of land. Caesar, when he was returning from Spain, sought the honour of a triumph, and desired in the meantime to be allowed, though absent, to be a candidate for the consulship. In order to prevent a resolution to this effect from being carried on the day when it was proposed, Cato spoke against time until sunset; but Caesar renounced his triumph and gained the consulship.
By a course of conduct which to the eyes of the statesmen of that day appeared to be a series of half-measures and vacillating policy, Cato desired to prove that, while some were for Caesar and some for Pompey, he, Cato, was for the commonwealth.

Though Cato seemed generally to waste his strength in ineffectual efforts, he still was found to be a trouble and a hindrance to the designs of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. They accordingly met Clodius, during his tribunate, to propose that Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, should, without even a plausible pretext, be deprived of his dominions, and that Cato should be charged with the task of reuniting the island to the Roman empire, and restraining the exiles who had been sent to Byzantium.
Constitutionally averse to active military measures,
as well as benevolently anxious to prevent the unnecessary shedding of blood, Cato sent a messenger to Ptolemy to signify the determination of the Roman people. The unfortunate king put an end to his life by poison, and Cato took possession of the island, and sold the royal treasures at the highest price, offending some of his friends, who hoped to enrich themselves by cheap bargains.
After restoring the Byzantine exiles, and successfully accomplishing a commission which, however abstemiously unjust, he considered himself bound to undertake by his duty to the state, he returned to Rome in n. c. 56, displaying to the eyes of the people the public wealth thus acquired. This very treasure afterwards came to the hands of Caesar, and contributed to the destruction of republican liberty. The pecuniary accounts of the sale by some accident were lost, and Clodius Pulcher took occasion to accuse Cato of embezzlement. His answer was, "What greater disgrace could befall this age, than that Pulcher should be an accuser or Cato be accused?" (Senec. Controvers. v. 80.)
Cicero, on his return from banishment, insisted that Clodius was not the man to form a public tribune, and that therefore all his official acts ought to be annulled. The proposition was opposed by Cato, as it would have rendered void his legislation to Cyprus. This affair produced a marked coldness between Cicero and Cato.

After his divorce from Atia, Cato had married Marcia, the daughter of Philippus, and had three children by his second wife. About the year n. c.
56 happened that strange transaction by which he ceded Marcia to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the consent of her father. At the death of Hortensius in the year 50, he took her back again. Heineceus (Antiq. Rom. lib. i. append. c. 47) infers, from the words of Plutarch (Cato, M. 350), that Cato did not, according to the common belief, "bequeath his wife, but that she was divorced from him by the ceremony of sale, and married to Hortensius. Heneceus quotes the case as an instance of a marriage contracted by covatico and dissolved by renunciacipato, in accordance with the maxim "ununmque quo modo dissolvitur quo colligitum est." But it does not appear that Cato married her again after the death of Hortensius, and yet it seems that she returned to her former relation of wife.

Cato continued to oppose the triumvirs. In
n. c. 56 he actively assisted L. Domitius Ahenbardus in canvassing for the consulship against Pompey and Crassus, who were elected. In the latter he was wounded, and narrowly es-engaged in popular tumults and personal conflict. At length, b. c. 54, he was made praetor, and this was the highest office to which he attained. His exertions during his praetorship to put down the notorious bribery of the consular comitia disgusted both the buyers and the sellers of votes. Again he was attacked by a hoarding and pelting mob, who put his attendants to flight; but he persisted in mounting the tribunal, and eventually succeeded in appeasing the fury of the populace.

After the death of Crassus, when the senate had to make choice between Pompey and Caesar, it naturally wished to place itself under the protection of the former. In b. c. 52, Pompey was anxious to obtain the dictatorship; but as the nobles had not given him their full confidence, and yet at the same time were anxious to gratify him, BIBLUS proposed that he should be created sole consul, and in this proposition was supported by Cato. In the following year, Cato himself, mistrusting Pompey, was a candidate for the consulship; but he would not budge, and his competitors, S. Sulcius and M. Claudius Marcellus, who had the support of Pompey, were elected. On the day of his defeat, Cato amused himself with playing at ball, and denounced for ever all aspiration after an office which the people had not thought proper to confer upon him.

On the commencement of the civil war, b. c. 49, Cato supported those illegal proceedings [CAESAR, p. 550] which gave some colour of right to the hostile preparations of Caesar. On the approach of Caesar to the city, Cato took flight with the consuls to Campania, and yielded himself up to unwavering grief. From that day forth he allowed his hair to grow; he never after wore a garland, but seeing that Roman blood must be shed, whichever party might prevail, he determined to mourn until his death the unhappy lot of his country. It was a time for decisive and strong measures. Caesar was not now to be bought by laws or resolutions, and the time for negotiation was past. Cato recommended a temporizing policy. Thoughts of patriotic philanthropy were uppermost in his mind. He made Pompey promise to pillage no Roman town, and, except in battle, to put to death no Roman citizen.

The senate entrusted Cato, as proconsul, with the defence of Sicily; but, on the landing of Curio with three of Caesar's legions, Cato, thinking resistance useless, instead of defending the island, took flight, and proceeded to join Pompey as Dyrachium. Little confidence was placed in his military skill, or in the course that he would pursue if his party succeeded; for, though it was now his object to crush the rebellion of Caesar, it was felt that his efforts might soon be directed to limit the power of Pompey. After Pompey’s victory at Dyrachium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and was thus saved from being present at the disastrous battle of Pharsalia. (b. c. 48.) After this battle, he set sail for Corcyra with the troops and the fleet left in his charge; but he offered to resign his command to Cicero, who was now anxious for a reconciliation with Caesar. Cicero, a man equally incompetent to command, declined the offer. Cato now proceeded to Africa, where he hoped to find Pompey; but on his route he received intelligence from Cornelius of Pompey’s assassination. After a circuitous voyage he effected a landing, and was admitted by the inhabitants of Cyrene, who had refused to open their gates to Labienus.

In the spring of the year b. c. 47 Cato marched his troops across the desert, for six days supporting hunger and thirst, and every privation, with remarkable fortitude, in order to form a junction with Scipio Metellus, Atius Varus, and the Numidian Juba. Here arose a question of military precedence, which in this case was not to be decided by a duel; but, as a strict disciplinarian, he thought it necessary to yield to the consular Scipio. Most probably he was glad to rid himself of a position in which immediate action appeared inevitable, and felt himself oppressed by the weight of a responsibility to which his shoulders were unequal. Here the mildness of his disposition was again manifest. He resisted the counsel of Scipio to put Utica to the sword, and, though now nothing could be hoped but a putting-off of the evil day, wisely advised him not to risk a decisive engagement; but Scipio disregarded his advice, and was utterly routed at Thapsus. (April 6th, b. c. 46.) All Africa now, with the exception of Utica, submitted to the victorious Caesar. Cato wanted to inspire the Romans in Utica with courage to stand a siege; but they quailed at the approach of Caesar, and were inclined to submit. Plutarch relates in detail the events which now occurred at Utica, and his narrative exhibits a lamentable picture of a good man standing at bay with fortune. Careless for his own safety, or rather determined not to live under the slavery of Caesar’s despotism, Cato yet was anxious to provide for the safety of his friends, advised them to flee, accompanied them to the port, besought them to make terms with the conqueror, composed the speech in which L. Caesar interceded for them, but would not allow his own name to appear. Bewildered and oppressed, driven into a corner where his irresolution could not lurk, and from which he had not strength to break forth, he deeply felt that the only way to preserve his high personal character and unbending moral dignity, and to leave to posterity a lofty Roman name, was—to die. For the particulars of his death, which our limits prevent us from giving, we must refer our readers to the graphic account of Plutarch. After spending the greater part of the night in persuading Plato’s Phaeo several times, he stabbed himself below the breast, and in falling overturned an abacus. His friends, hearing the noise, ran up, found him bathed in blood, and, while he was fainting, dressed his wound. When however he recovered feeling, he tore open the bandages, let out his entrails, and expired, b. c. 46, at the age of forty-nine.

There was deep grief in Utica on account of his death. The inhabitants buried him on the coast, and celebrated his funeral with much pomp. A statue, with sword in hand, was erected to his memory on the spot, and was still standing when Plutarch wrote.

Caesar had hastened his march in order to catch Cato; but arriving too late, he exclaimed, “Cato, I grudge thee thy death, since thou hast grudged me the glory of sparing thy life.”

The only existing composition of Cato (not to count the speech in Sallust) is a letter written in b. c. 50. It is a civil refusal in answer to an elaborate letter of Cicero, requesting that Cato would use his influence to procure him a triumph. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 4—6.)
CATO.

Cato soon became the subject of biography and panegyric. Shortly after his death appeared Cicero’s "Cato," which provoked Caesar’s "Anti-cato," also called "Anticatores," as it consisted of two books; but the accusations of Caesar appear to have been wholly unfounded, and were not believed by his contemporaries. Works like Cicero’s Cato were published by Fabius Gallus, and M. Brutus. In Lucan the character of Cato is a personification of godlike virtue. In modern times, the closing events of Cato’s life have been often dramatized. Of the French plays on this subject that of Deschamps (1715) is the best; and few dramas have gained more celebrity than the Cato of Addison. (Plut. Cato Minor; Sall. Catil. 54; Tacit. Hist. iv. 8; Cic. ad Att. i. 16, ii. 9; Senec. Ep. 58; Val. Max. vi. 2. 5; Luctian. i. 138, ii. 380; Hor. Carm. i. 12. 38, ii. 1. 34; Virg. Aen. vi. 941, viii. 670; Juuv. xii. 30; Druman’s Gesch. Romes, v. p. 153.)

10. II. PORCIUS. [PORC.]
12. M. PORCIUS CATO, a son of Cato of Utica [No. 9] by Atia. He accompanied his father upon his flight from Italy, and was with him at Utica on the night of his death. Cesar pardoned him, and allowed him to possess his father’s property. (Bell. Afr. 59.) After Caesar’s death, he attached himself to M. Brutus, his sister’s husband, and followed him from Macedonia to Asia. He was a man of warm and sensual temperament, much addicted to illicit gallantry. His long stay in Cappadocia on a visit to Marphadates, who had a very beautiful wife named Psyche, gave occasion to the jest that the young Cato and his host had one soul (Psyche) between them. (Plut. Cato Minor, 78.) At the battle of Philippi (B. C. 42) he behaved bravely, and sold his life dearly.

13. PORCIUS CATO, son of Cato of Utica [No. 9] by Marcia, and therefore half-brother of No. 12. Nothing more is known of him than that, at the commencement of the civil war, he was sent by his father to Munatius Rufus at Bruttium. (Plut. Cato Min. 52.)
14. PORCIA. [PORC.]
15. A son or daughter of Cato of Utica [No. 9], and a sister or brother of Nos. 13 and 14, as we know that Cato of Utica had three children by Marcia. (Luctian. ii. 381.)
16. C. PORCIUS CATO, of uncertain pedigree, perhaps descended from No. 5. He appears in the early part of his life as an opponent of Pompey. In B. C. 59, he wanted to accuse A. Gabinius of ambition, but the praetors gave him no opportunity of preferring the accusation against Pompey’s favourite. This so vexed him, that he called Pompey priecus deditorum, and his boldness nearly cost him his life. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. i. 1. 2. 9.) In B. C. 56, he was tribune of the plebs, and prevented the Romans from assisting Ptolemy Auletes with troops, by getting certain priests to read to the people some Sibylline verses which they said were mere words of danger if such aid were given to a king of Egypt. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 15.) He took the side of Clodius, and Milo in revenge raised a laugh against him in the following manner:—Cato used to go about attended by a gang of gladiators, whom he was too poor to support. Milo, learning this, employed a stranger to buy them of him, and then got Raecilius the tribune to make a public announcement, "se familiar Cato niamm venditum." (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6.) Afterwards he made himself useful to the triumvir by delaying the comitia in order to promote the election of Pompey and Crassus, when they were candidates for the consulship in B.C. 55. In his manoeuvre on this occasion he was assisted by Nonius Sufenas, one of his colleagues in the tribunate. (Dion Cass. xxxviii. 27, 28.) In the following year he and Sufenas were accused of violating the Lex Junia et Liciaria and the Lex Filipa, by proposing laws without due notice and on improper days. (Ascon. in Cic. pro Scauro.) Cato was defended by C. Licinius Calvus and M. Scarrus, and obtained an acquittal, which, however, was chiefly owing to the interest of Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 5, 6.)

[J. T. G.]

On the coins of the Pordia gens, we find only the names of C. Cato and M. Cato. Who the former was, is quite uncertain; the latter is M. Cato of Utica. In the two coins annexed the obverse of the former represents the head of Pallas, the reverse Victory in a biga; the obverse of the latter a female head, the reverse Victory sitting.

CATO, VALEFRIUS, a distinguished grammarian and poet, who flourished at Rome during the last years of the republic. Some persons asserted, that he was of Gaulish extraction, the freedman of a certain Bursenus; but he himself, in a little work entitled Indicatio, maintained, that he was pure from all servile stain, that he had lost his father while still under age, and had been stripped of his patrimony during the troubles which attended the usurpation of Sulla. Having studied under Philo- cumas with Lucilius for a text-book, he afterwards acted as preceptor to many persons of high station, and was considered particularly successful in teaching such as had a turn for poetry. In this manner he seems to have accumulated considerable wealth; for we find that at one period he was the possessor of a magnificent abode at Tuscumal; but, having fallen into difficulties, he was obliged to yield up this villa to his creditors, and retired to a poor hovel, where the remainder of his life, which was prolonged to extreme old age, was passed in the greatest penury. In addition to various works upon grammatical subjects, he was the author of poems also, of which the Laudes and the Deina were the most celebrated. The fame thus acquired by him as an author and a teacher is commemorated in the following complimentary distich, probably from the pen of some admiring contemporary:—"Cato Grammaticus, Latina Siren, Qui solus legit, ac facit poetas." Suetonius (De Iul. Gram. 2—9), to whom exclusively we are indebted for all these particulars.
CATO.

has preserved, in addition to the above lines, short testimonies from Ticiida and Cinna to the merits of the Lydias and the Diana, together with two epigrams by Furius Bibaculus (BIBACULUS), which contrast, in no very feeling terms, the splendour of Cato in the full flush of his fame and prosperity—'unicum magistrum, summum grammaticum, optimum poetae'm—with his subsequent distress and poverty. From the circumstance already already noticed, that the only depository among his earlier works to the productions of Lucullus, he is probably the Cato named in the proemium to the tenth satira of Horace (lib. I.), and may be the same with the Cato addressed by Catullus (liv.), and with the Cato classed by Ovid (Trist. ii. 435) along with Ticiida, Memmius, Cinna, Anser, and Cornificius.

In all the collections of the minor Latin poets will be found 183 hexameter verses, which, ever since the time of Joseph Scaliger, have been known under the title "Valerii Catonis Diarum." We gather from the context, that the lands of the author had been confiscated during civil strife, and assigned to the enemies of the soldiers and friends of his son, Scipio. Filled with remorse and indignation on account of this cruel injustice and oppression, the rightful owner solemnly devotes to destruction the fields he had loved so well. Then in gentler mood he dwells upon the beauty of the scenes he was about to quit for ever; scarcely taming himself away from an eminence whence he was gazing on his flocks, he bids a last farewell to them and his adored Lydia, to whom he vows eternal constancy. Such is the argument as far as the end of the 103rd line. In the portion which follows, the bard dwells with envy on the felicity of the rural retreats haunted by his beautiful mistress, and complains of his relentless destiny, which had separated him from the object of his passion. It must also be observed, that in the first line we find an Invocation of some person, place, or thing, designated by the appellation of Battarum—'Battarum cyanenses carminis voces'—and that this word occurs again and again, as far as line 97, forming a sort of burden to the song. These matters being premised, it remains for us to investigate: 1. The connexion and arrangement of the different parts of the "Diarum." 2. The real author. 3. What we are to understand by Battarum.

1. To all who read the lines in question with care it will at once become evident, that they in reality constitute two pieces, and not one. The first, containing the impressions, and addressed to Battarum, concludes with l. 103, and is completely distinct in subject, tone, spirit, and phraseology, from the second, which ought always to be printed as a separate strain. This opinion was first advanced by F. Jacob (Bibliothek der alien Literatur und Kunst, n. ix. p. 56, Götting. 1795), and has been fully adopted by Putsch, the most recent editor. The confusion probably arose from the practice common among the ancient scribes of copying two or more compositions of the same author continuously, without interposing any space or mark to point out that they had passed from one to another. The error, once introduced, was in this case perpetuated, from the circumstance, that both poems speak of the charms of certain rural scenes, and of the beauty of Lydia, although in the one these objects are regarded with feelings very different from those expressed in the other.

2. In all MSS. these lines are found among the minor poems attributed to Virgil, and in several are specifically ascribed to him. Moreover, in the catalogues of Virgil's works drawn up by Donatus and by Servius, "Diarum" are included. Joseph Scaliger, however, considering that in language and versification the Diarum bore no resemblance whatever to the acknowledged compositions of Virgil, and that the sentiments expressed were completely alien to the gentle and subtile style in which Virgil displayed under like circumstances, was convinced that he could not be the author; but, recollecting, on the other hand, that the incidents described and the name of Lydia corresponded in some degree with the details transmitted to us with regard to Valerius Cato, determined, that they must be from the pen of that grammariam; and almost all subsequent editors have acquiesced in the decision. It is manifest, however, that the conclusion has been very rashly adopted. Granting that we are entitled to neglect the authority of the MSS., which in this case is perhaps not very important, and to remove these pieces from the works usually assigned to Virgil, we find that the sources on which they have been so confidently transferred to Cato are singularly weak. We can build nothing upon the fictitious name of Lydia; and even if we grant that the estate of Cato was actually distributed among the veterans of Sulla, although of this we have not the slightest evidence, we know well that hundreds of others suffered under a like calamity. Nor is there anything in the context by which we can fix the epoch of the forfeiture in question. All the circumstances are just as applicable to the times of Octavianus as to those of Sulla.

3. The discordant opinions which have been entertained with regard to Battarum are spoken of under Battarum.

The Diarum were first printed at the end of the edito princes of Virgil, at Rome, by Swayneheim and Pannartz in 1469, and are always included among the early impressions of the Catalecta. They appeared in an independent form at Leyden (12mo. 1652), under the inspection of Christopher Arnold, who adopted the corrected text of Scaliger. Since that period, they have been edited by Eckstädt (Jena, 4to. 1826), and with very complete prolegomena by Putsch (Jena, 8vo. 1828), whose work was reprinted at Oxford by Dr. Giles in 1838. They are to be found also in the "Anthologia" of Furmann (vol. H. p. 647), and in the "Poetarum Latini Minoris" of Wernsdorff (vol. iii. p. xiv. &c.), who prefixed a very learned dissertation on various topics connected with the work. An essay by Närke, who had prepared a new edition of Valerius Cato for the press, appeared in the "Rheinisches Museum" for 1838. [W. R.]

CATO, VETTIANUS. [SCATO.]

CATONIUS JUSTUS, a centurion in one of the Pannonian legions which revolted on the accession of Tiberius, a. d. 14. When the insurrection was quelled by Drusus, Catonius and some others were sent to Tiberius to sue for pardon. (Tac. Ann. i. 29; Dion Cass. xe. 18.) [L. S.]

CATUMBRUS, a chief of the German tribe of the Catti, from whom the mother of Italicus, the Cheruscan chief, was descended. (Tac. Ann. xii. 16.) He is probably the same as the one whom Strabo (vii. p. 292) calls Uccromerus. [L. S.]

CATUALDA, a noble youth of the German tribe of the Gotones. Dreading the violence of Marobodus, he took to flight; but when the power of Maroboduus was in its decline, Cataulds resolved upon taking vengeance. He assembled a large force, and invaded the country of the Marcomanni. Maroboduus fled across the Danube, and solicited the protection of the emperor Tiberius. But Catauld in his turn was conquered soon after by the Hermunduri under the command of Vitalius. He was made prisoner, and sent to Forum Julium in Gallia Narbonensis. (Tac. Ann. ii. 62, 63.) [L. S.]

CATUGNATUS, the leader of the Allobroges in their revolt against the Romans in n. c. 61, defeated Manlius Lentinus, the legate of C. Pompeius, the praetor of the province, and would have destroyed his whole army but for a violent tempest which arose. Afterwards Catugnatus and his army were surrounded by C. Pompeius near Solonium, who made them all prisoners with the exception of Catugnatus himself. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 47, 48; comp. L. v. Epit. 108; Cit. de Propr. Cons. 13.)

CATULLUS, VALERIUS, whose praenomen is altogether omitted in many MSS., while several, with Apuleius (Apologeticus), designate him as Caius, and a few of the best with Pliney (Hist. Nat. xxvii. 6) as Quinctius, was a native of Verona or its immediate vicinity, as we learn from the testimony of many ancient writers (e. g. Ov. Am. iii. 15, 17; Plin. l. c.; Martial, i. 82, x. 133, xiv. 195; Auson. Deipn. &c.). According to Hieronymus in the Baselian Chronicle, he was born in the consulsiphip of Cinna and Octavius, n. c. 67, and died in his thirtieth year, n. c. 57. The second date is undoubtedly erroneous, for we have positive evidence from his own works that he survived not only the second consulsiphip of Pompey, n. c. 55, and the expedition of Caesar into Britain, but that he was alive in the consulsiphip of Vatinius, n. c. 47. (Carm. i. 6. 24.) We have no reason, however, to conclude that the allusions to Mammura, contained in a letter written by Cicero (ad Att. iii. 52) in n. c. 45, refers to the lampon of Catullus; we can attach no weight to the argument, deduced by Joseph Scaliger from an epigram of Martial (iv. 14), that he was in literary correspondence with Virgil after the publication of the latter was fully established; and still less can we admit that there is the slightest ground for the assertion, that the hymn to Diana was written after the death of Catullus, by Annaeus Sextus, n. c. 17. He must have outlived the consulsiphip of Vatinius, but our certain knowledge does not extend beyond that period.

Valerius, the father of Catullus, was a person of some consideration, for he was the friend and habitual enterainer of Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. 73), and his son must have possessed at least a modeste independence, since in addition to his paternal residence on the beautiful promontory of Sirmioc, he was the proprietor of a villa in the vicinity of Tiberis, and performed a voyage from the Pontus in his own yacht. On the other hand, when we observe that he treated his poet at Rome and encouraged his poetical career while still in the very spring of youth (lxxvii. 15), that he mingled with the gayest society and indulged freely in the most expensive pleasures (iii. 65), the metropolis, we need feel no surprise that he should have become involved in pecuniary difficulties, nor doubt the sincerity of his frequent humorous lamentations over the empty purses of himself and his associates. These embarrassments may have induced him to make an attempt to better his fortunes, according to the approved fashion of the times, by proceeding to Bithynia in the train of the praetor Memmius, but it is clear from the bitter complaints which he pours forth against the exclusive capacity of his chief, that the speculation was attended with little success.

The death of his brother in the Troad—a loss which he repeatedly deplores with every mark of heartfelt grief, more especially in the affecting elegy to Hortulus—is generally supposed to have happened during this expedition. But any evidence we possess leads to a different inference. When riling against the evil fortune which attended the journey to the East, he makes no allusion to any such misfortune as this; we find no notice of the event in the pieces written immediately before quiting Asia and immediately after his return to Italy, nor does the language of those passages in which he gives vent to his sorrow in any way confirm the conjecture.

That Catullus plunged into all the debauchery of his times is evident from the tone which pervades so many of his lighter productions, and that he enjoyed the friendship of the most celebrated literary characters, seems clear from the individuals to whom many of his pieces are addressed, among whom we find Cicero, Alphenus Varus, Licinius Calvis, the orator and poet, Cnina, author of the Smyrna, and several others. The lady-love who is the theme of the greater number of his amatory effusions is styled Lesbia, but her real name we are told by Apuleius was Clodia. This bare fact by no means entitles us to jump to the conclusion at which many have arrived, that she was the sister of the celebrated Clodius slain by Milo. Indeed the presumption is strong against such an inference. The tribute of highflew praise paid to Cicero would have been but a bad recommendation to the favour of one whom the orator makes the subject of scurrilous jests, and who is said to have cherished against him all the vindictive animosity of a woman first slighted and then openly insulted. Catullus was warm in his resentments as well as in his attachments. No prudential considerations interfered with the free expression of his wrath when provoked, for he attacks with the most bitter vehemence not only his personal enemies, but even his in-law, on two occasions to indulge in the most offensive imputations on Julius Caesar. This petulance was probably the result of some temporary cause of irritation, for elsewhere he seems fully disposed to treat this great personage with respect (cxi. 10), and his grossness was productive of no unpleasant consequences to himself or to his family, for not only did Caesar continue upon terms of intimacy with the father of Catullus, but at once accepted the apology tendered by the son, and admitted him on the same day as a guest at his table. (Suet. Jul. 73.)

The works of Catullus which have come down to us consist of a series of 116 poems, thrown together apparently at random, with scarcely an attempt at arrangement. The first of these is an epistle dedicatory to a certain Cornelius, the author of some historical compendium. The grammarians decided that this must be Cornelius Nepos, and consequently entitled the collection Valerii Catulli ad Cornelium Nepotem Liber. The pieces are of different lengths, but most of them are very short. They refer to such a variety of topics, and are composed in so many different styles and different CATULUS.

The epistle doctus applied to our poet by Tibullus, Ovid, Martial, and others, has given rise to considerable discussion. It was bestowed, as a sort of probability, in consequence of the intimate acquaintance with Greek literature and mythology displayed in the Atys, the Peleus, and many other pieces, which bear the strongest internal marks of being formed upon Greek models. Catulus also, it must be remembered, was the first who naturalized many of the more beautiful species of Greek verse, and Horace can only claim the merit of having extended the number. At the same time, most of the shorter poems bear deep impress of original invention, are strikingly national, and have a strong flavour of the old republican roughness. Nay more, as a German critic has well remarked, even when he employs foreign materials he works them up in such a manner as to give them a Roman air and character, and thus approaches much more nearly to Lucrètius and the ancients than to the highly polished and artificial school of Virgil and the Augustans. Hence arose the great popularity he enjoyed among his countrymen, as proved by the long catalogue of testimonies from the pens of poets, historians, philosophers, men of science, and grammarians. Horace alone speaks in a somewhat contemptuous strain, but this is in a passage where he is professedly decrying the older bards, towards whom he so often displays jealousy.

The first mention of Catulus were first discovered about the beginning of the 14th century, at Verona, by a poet named Benvenuto Campesani. None of the MSS. at present known ascend higher than the 15th century, and all of them appear to have been derived from the same archetype. Hence, as might be expected, the text is very corrupt, and has been repeatedly interpolated.

The Edito Princeps bears the date 1472, without the name of place or printer; a second appeared at Parma in 1472, and two at Venice in 1475 and 1485 respectively. In the sixteenth century Muretus and Achilles Statius, and in the seventeenth Passeratius and Isaac Vossius, published elaborate and valuable commentaries, but their attempts to make the text intelligible with little success. The most complete of the more recent editions is that of Volpi (Pavv. 1710), the most useful for ordinary purposes is that of F. W. Doering, (Ed. sec. Altona, 1834.) Laschmann (Bcr. 1829) has exhibited the genuine text, so far as it can be ascertained, cleared in great measure of conjectural emendations.

An English metrical translation of the whole works of Catulus, accompanied by the Latin text and short notes, was published by Doctor Nott, Lond. 1793, 2 vols. 8vo.; but by far the best which has appeared in our language is that of the Hon. George Lamb, Lond. 1851, 2 vols. 12mo. There are also numerous translations into French, Italian, and German of the collected poems and of detached pieces.

CATULUS, a name of a family of the plebeian Lutatia gens, etymologically connected with the words Cato, Catus, and indicating shrewdness, sagacity, caution, or the like.

L. C. LUTATIUS C. N. CATULUS, consul c. 242 with A. Postumius Albinius. The first Punic war had now continued for upwards of twenty-two years. Both parties were exhausted by the long struggle, but neither of them shewed any inclination to abandon the contest. Ever since the battle of Panormus (250) the Romans had been in possession of all Sicily with the exception of Lilybaeum, Drepanum, and the fortified camp upon Mount Eryx; but these strongholds had hitherto defied every effort upon the part of the besiegers, who having abandoned in despair all active measures, were blockading them by land, while Hamilcar Baram was gradually forming an army with which he hoped that he might soon venture to meet his adversaries in the open field. The Carthaginians were undoubted masters of the sea, for the Romans, dispirited by the loss of four large fleets within a very short period (255—249), amounting in all to upwards of 600 ships, had, after the great victory of Adherbal over P. Claudius Pulcher (249), completely abandoned their navy. In this juncture the senate, feeling convinced that only one path to success lay open, determined to make a desperate effort. A fleet of 200 ships of war was built and manned with astonishing rapidity, chiefly through the patriotic liberality of individuals who came forward to support the state with voluntary loans, and both consuls were ordered to the coast. The harbour of Mars, prohibited by the chief pontiff from quitting the city, and his place was supplied by Q. Valerius Falto, then praetor. Catulus before setting out, filled with anxiety in regard to the result of an enterprise so important, had determined to consult the oracle of Fortune at Praeneste; but this was forbidden, on the ground that it was unbecoming in a Roman general to intermeddle with any deities save those of Rome. These measures were so prompt, that the new fleet appeared upon the Sicilian coast early in summer, while the navy of the enemy was still in winter-quarters at Carthage. The harbour of Drepanum was instantly occupied, and the siege vigorously pressed both by land and sea. But while the struggle was most fierce, Catulus received a serious wound which compelled him to suspend operations for a time. Meanwhile he trained his sailors with unceasing activity, and by constant practice rendered them expert in all ordinary nautical evolutions. News had now reached Africa of the events in Sicily. A powerful armament was launched in haste and set to sea, deeply laden with provisions and warlike stores for the relief of Drepanum, navigated, however, by raw, ill-trained, and awkward crews. The great object of Hannibal, the admiral, was, as we are told by Polybius, to run over to Eryx without attracting the notice of the Romans, to lighten his vessels by landing their cargo, and to take on board a number of the brave and well-disciplined troops of Hamilcar. His movements, however, were known by Catulus, who resolved at every hazard to force an engagement, and being himself still unfit for active exertion, entrusted the execution of his plans in a great measure to Falto. The fleet accordingly passed over to the island of Aegusa, opposite to Lilybaeum, and from thence, at day-break on the morning of the 10th of March 241, they described the hostile squadron bearing down under a great cloud of dust right before the Carthaginian vessels which was blowing a gale from the west and had raised a heavy sea. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the Romans formed their line of battle with their pros to windward. The Carthaginians, perceiving that they were cut off, prepared for action by hauling down their sails, thus altogether sacrificing the advantage of the weather gage. The result of the contest seems never to have been for a moment doubtful. The deep-laden ships of Hannibal could neither manoeuvre nor fight; seventy were captured, fifty were sunk; the rest taking advantage of a lucky shift of the wind which veered round to the East, were saved and escaped. This blow, which at an earlier period would scarcely have been felt, was decisive. The Carthaginians, upon receiving intelligence of the disaster, feeling that they had neither officers, men, nor money, left for prosecuting the war, despatched a messenger with all speed to Hamilcar, investing him with full authority to accept the best terms he could obtain. Catulus was eager to meet these overtures, that he might have the honour of concluding a glorious peace before the period of his command, which was fast drawing to a close, should expire. With these dispositions preliminaries were quickly arranged, and the following conditions were agreed upon: 1. That the Carthaginians should evacuate all Sicily, and should not remain within ten miles of the cities or villages of the Syracusans. 2. That there should restore all the Roman prisoners without ransom. 3. That they should pay to the Romans 3200 Bubonic talents by instalments, extending over a space of twenty years. These stipulations, when submitted to the Roman people, did not meet with their approbation, and ten commissioners were despatched to examine into the state of affairs, who, when they arrived, insisted upon certain changes to the disadvantage of the Carthaginians, and Hamilcar thought fit to submit. These were, that the compensation money should be augmented by the sum of one thousand talents, and that the period allowed for payment should be diminished by ten years; moreover, that the Carthaginians should evacuate all the islands between Italy and Sicily.

Catulus on his return home claimed and was allowed his well-won triumph, which he celebrated on the 4th of October, 241, not, however, without a vexatious opposition on the part of Falto, who pretended, contrary to those principles of military law by which the Romans were invariably guided, that he was entitled to all the glory because the commander-in-chief had been disabled by his wound from taking an active share in the final engagement. (Polyb. i. 50—64; Liv. Epit. 19; Enтроп. ii. 27; Oros. iv. 16; Val. Max. ii. 8 § 3; Zonar. viii. p. 308, &c.)

2. C. LUTIUS CATULUS, perhaps the son of No. 1, consul b.c. 220, with L. Veturius Philo. (Zonar. viii. p. 405.)

3. Q. LUTIUS Q. F. CATULUS, consul b.c. 102 with C. Marcius IV., having been previously defeated in three successive attempts, first by C. Attius Serranus, who was consul in 106, secondly by Cn. Manlius (or Mallius, or Manlius), who was consul in b.c. 105, and thirdly by C. Flavius Firmicius, who was consul in b.c. 104. He either was not a candidate for the consulship of 103, or if unsuccessful, his disappointment is not alluded to by Cicero in the passage, where the rest of his remarks are enumerated. (Pro Paim. 5.) At the time when Catulus entered upon office, the utmost consternation reigned at Rome. The Cimbri, who in their great migration westward had been joined by the Teutoni, the Ambraones, the Tigurini, and various other tribes, after sweeping the upper valley of the Danube and spreading over Southern Gaul and Northern Spain, after defeating four Roman consuls, Carbo (113), Silanus (109), Cassius (107), Manlius (105), together with the pro-consul Cecco (105), and destroying five Roman armies, were now preparing to pour down on Italy. The invading host was divided into two vast columns. The Teutoni were marching through Provence with the intention of turning the Alps at Nice, and following the coast road along the shores of the Ligurian gulf, while the Cumiri were preparing to cross the passes from the Tyrol which lead down by Botzen and Trent to the plains of the Po. It was determined that Marius should oppose the Teutoni, and that Catulus with Sulla for his lieutenant should be ready to attack the Cumiri while their cumbersome array was entangled in the mountain defiles. How well the former executed his task by the great battle fought on the Rhone near Aix (Aqua Sextiae) is detailed elsewhere. [MARIUS.] Meanwhile the campaign of his colleague had been less glorious. Catulus, fearing to weaken his force by attempting to guard the passes, took up a position on the Adige (Athesis) where it begins to emerge from the rocky gorges which confine its waters near their source, and having thrown a bridge across the stream and erected forts on both sides, reached there with the intention of attack. The Cumiri, pouring down from the higher ground along the left bank, attacked the Roman works with such fury, that the soldiers, dispirited probably by the timid defensive tactics of their general, were seized with a panic, abandoned their camp, and fled in confusion. Had it not been for the gallantry of the detachment who defended a redoubt which served as a tete de pont, the bridge would have at once been won, and the whole Roman army might have been destroyed. Catulus on this occasion, according to the construction which Plutarch thinks fit to put upon his conduct, like an able and excellent general, preferred the glory of his fellow-citizens to his own. For when he found himself unable to prevail upon his men to keep their ground, choosing that the disaster might fall upon his own head, he ordered a retreat, and placing himself in front of the fugitives, fell back behind the Po, thus abandoning the whole of Transpadane Gaul to the ravages of the enemy. As soon as the news of this disaster, which happened in the spring of 101, reached Rome, Marius, who had recently returned to the city, instantly set forth to the assistance of his late colleague. The united armies of the consul and proconsul crossed the Po, and hastened in search of the Cumiri, whom they found to the westward of Milan, near Verceil (Vercellae), searching, it would appear, for the Teutoni, of whose destruction they had not yet received intelligence. The account of the engagement, which was fought on the 30th of July, transmitted to us by Plutarch, savours not a little of the marvellous. The Roman forces amounted to about fifty thousand men, of whom twenty thousand under Catulus occupied the centre, while the remainder, commanded by Marius, were posted on the wings. When the battle was joined, a prodigious dust arose which hid the combatants from each other. Marius missed the enemy, and having passed beyond, wandered about seeking them in vain, while the chief brunt of the conflict fell upon Catulus, and to him therefore belonged the honour of the decisive victory which was gained. It must be remarked that this version of the story is confessedly derived from the commentaries of Sulla, and probably also from the historical work of Catulus himself, and since both of these authorities were not only inclined to make the most of their own exploits, but were also stimulated by violent hatred towards Marius, we cannot receive their testimony with any confidence. It is certain that great jealousy existed between the two armies; it is certain also that at Rome the whole merit of having saved his country was given to Marius, and, that the same feeling existed to a certain degree nearly two centuries afterwards is proved by the well-known line of Juvenal (viii. 253). "Nobilis ornatus lauro collega secunda." Catulus was one of those who took an active share in the death of Saturninus; he served with distinction in the Social war, and having eagerly espoused the cause of Sulla in the civil strife which followed, his name was included among the list of victims in the great proscription of 87. As escape was impossible, he shut himself up in a newly-plastered chamber, kindled a (charcoal) fire, and was quickly suffocated by the vapours. Catulus was a highly educated and generally accomplished man, deeply versed in Greek literature, and especially famed for the extreme grace and purity with which he spoke and wrote his own language. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 8, Brut. 35.) He was the author of several orations, of an historical work on his own Consulship and the Cumiri war, composed in the style of Xenophon, and of poems; but the whole of these have perished with the exception of a couple of epigrams, not remarkable for any peculiar ease or felicity of expression, one of which is given by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 28), and the other by A. Oellius (six. 9). Two edifices in Rome are spoken of by ancient writers as "Monumenta Catuli"—the temple of "Fortuna hujusce diei," vowed at the battle of Verceil, and the "Porticus Catuli" on the Palatine built with the proceeds of the Cumiri spoils. A portion of the latter edifice was destroyed by Clodius when he razed the house of Cicero. (The passages of Cicero referring to Catulus are given in Orelli, Oonm. Tull. ii. p. 366, &c.; Plut. Mar. Sull.; Appian, B. C. i. 74; Vell. Pat. ii. 21; Flor. iii. 21; Val. Max. vi. 3, ix. 12; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19. Catulus is introduced in the De Oratore, and is represented as accompanying his half-brother, C. Julius Caesar Strabo, to the Tusculanum of Crassus. The mother of Catulus was Popillia, whose second husband was L. Julius Caesar, father of the above-named Caesar. [Comp. Caes. N. B., B. 16.] 4. Q. LUCIUS CAELIUS Q. F. Q. N. CATULUS, son of No. 3, narrowly escaped his father's fate, having been included in the same proscription. Throughout life he was distinguished as one of the prominent leaders of the aristocracy, but rose far superior to the great body of his class in purity and singleness of purpose, and received from the whole community marks of esteem and confidence seldom bestowed with unanimity in periods of excitement upon an active political leader. Being consul along with M. Acchlorius Lepidus in B. C. 78, the year in which Sulla died, he steadily resisted the efforts of his colleague to bring about a counter revolution CATU.S. by abrogating the acts of the dictator, and when, the following spring, Lepidus marched against the city; at the head of the remnants of the Marian faction, he was defeated by Catulus in the battle of the Milvian bridge, and forced to take refuge in Sardinia, where he soon after perished in an attempt to organize an insurrection. [Lepidus.] Catulus, although true to his party and his principles, denounced the corrupt practices which disgraced the senate while they possessed the exclusive right to act as judges on criminal trials; his opinion upon this subject was most unequivocally expressed when Pompeius brought forward his measure (b. c. 70) for restoring the privileges of the tribunes, and his presence as a judex upon the impeachment of Verres was probably one of the circumstances which deprived the culprit of all hope. He came forward as an opponent of the Gabinian and Manilian laws (b. c. 67 and 60), and Cicero records the tribute paid by the populace, on the latter occasion, to his character and talents; for when, in the course of an argument against the extravagant powers which the contemplated enactment proposed to bestow upon a single individual, Catulus asked the multitude to whom they would look should any misfortune befall their favourite, the crowd, almost with one voice, shouted back the reply, that they would look to himself. When censor along with Crassus in 65, he withstood the measures of his colleague, who desired to make Egypt tributary to Rome, and so firm was he in maintaining his position, that at length both resigned without effecting anything. During the progress of the Catilinarian plot (b. c. 63), he strenuously supported Cicero, and either he or Cato was the first to hail him as “pares patriae.” If we are to believe Sallust, Catulus used every effort to prevail upon Cicero to insert the name of Caesar among the conspirators, stimulated, it is said, by a recent gratitude; for, when candidate for the office of chief pontiff, he had been defeated by Caesar. That a bad feeling existed between them is clear, for the first act of Caesar when he became praetor, on the first of January, 62, was an attempt to deprive his former rival of the office of commissioner for the restoration of the Capitol, which had been destroyed by fire during the civil war. (Cato, in his commentaries on the history of Catulus, says that he had even endeavored to prejudice the death of Sulla. But the optimates who were escorting the new consuls, upon hearing of the attempt, rushed in a body to the forum and by their united efforts threw out the bill. Thus the name of Catulus became connected with the Capitol and remained inscribed on the temple until it was again consumed in the reign of Vitellius.

Catulus died during the consulship of Metellus Celer, b. c. 60, happy, says Cicero, both in the splendour of his life and in having been spared the spectacle of his country’s ruin. He was not considered an orator, but at the same time possessed the power of expressing his opinions with learning, grace, and wisdom. [Orelli, Onom. Tulli, p. 367, &c.; Sall. Catil. 33, 49, Frug. Histor. i. iii.; Tacit. Hist. iii. 72; Sueton. Jul. 15; Gall. 2; Val. Max. vi. 9, § 5; Plut. Cunn. 13; Cat. Min. 16; Senec. Epist. 97; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 13, calls him princeps senatus, τά τε πρώτα τες θουλείς τερ, at the time of the Gabinian law. See also xxxvii. 37, 46, xxv. 2; Orelli, Inscrip. n. 51.) [W. R.]

CA.UTUS, a word indicatingleshedness, caution, sagacity, or the like, was a surname of Sex. Aelius, consul in A. d. 4, with C. Sentius Saturninus. (Vell. Pat. ii. 103.)

CAUTUS, DECIA NUS, procurator of Britain when the people rose against the Romans in A. d. 62 under Boudicca, was by his extortion and avarice one of the chief causes of the revolt. The Britons commenced the war by laying siege to Camulodunum, and as Suetonius Paulinus, the legate of the province, was absent upon an expedition against the island of Mona, the colonists applied to Catus for assistance, who, however, able to send them only 200 men. After the fall of Camulodunum and the defeat of Petilius Cerealis, Catus fled in alarm to Gaul. He was succeeded in his office of procurator by Julius Glaucinus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32, 39; Dion Cass. xxii. 2; comp. Boa. dea.)

CATU.S, FYRMIUS, a senator, was the accus- cator of Scribonius Libo Drusus in A. d. 16. A few years afterwards (A. d. 24), Catus was condemned by the senate to be banished to an island, on account of a false accusation of majestas which he brought against his sister; but in consequence of his former service in the accusation of Drusus, Tibertius remitted his banishment, but allowed him to be expelled from the senate. (Tac. Ann. ii. 27, iv. 31.)

CAVARYNUS, a Senonian, whom Caesar made king of his people, was expelled by his subjects and compelled to fly to Caesar, b. c. 54. He afterwards accompanied Caesar in his war against Ambiorix. (Cass. B. G. v. 34, vi. 5.)

CAVARUS (Kavaroς), the last king of that portion of the Gauls which settled in Thrace and for many years exacted an annual tribute from Byzantium. It was chiefly by his mediation that Prusias I. and the Rhodians were induced to make peace with Byzantium in b. c. 219. He was ultimately slain in battle against the Thracians, who defeated and utterly destroyed all the Gauls in their country. (Polyb. iv. 46, 52.) Polybius calls him “a royal-hearted and magnanimous man” (βασιλικὸς τῇ φύσιν καὶ μεγαλοπληρός), and says that he gave great protection to merchants sailing to the Euxine; he adds, however, that he was much deceived by Sertorius and by events which followed his death.

Polyb. viii. 24, and ap. Athen. vi. p. 252, d.) “Caurus” was perhaps rather a national name than one peculiar to the individual, the Caveri having been a tribe of some consequence which dwelt on the eastern bank of the Rhone, between Avignon and Valence. (Strab. iv. p. 186; Dalechamp, ad Athen. l. c.) [E. E.]

CAV. CALUS (Kavkæla), of Chios, a rhetorician, of whom an eulogium on Hercules is mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 412), who also states that he was a brother of the historian Theopompos. It is very probable, that Suidas and Photius (x. x. Ἀθην. καλ. καρ.) refer to our rhetorician, in which case the name Kavkæla must be changed into Kavkæla.

[SL. S.]

CAVON (Kawwvn), a son of Calenus, who was believed to have carried the orgies of the great goddess from Eleusis to Messene, where he was worshipped as a hero. His tomb was shown in Lepreon. (Paus. iv. 1, § 4, 27. § 4, v. 5, § 4.) One of the sons of Lycaon also bore the name of Caucon. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1.)

CAVIDIUS, a surname of several of the Cornelli Lentuli. [Lentulus.]
CEBES.

CAUNUS. [Barlis.]

CAUSIUS (Kǔsu̱s), a surname of Asclepius, derived from Caunus in Arcadia, where he was worshipped. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Kaoös ; comp. Paus. viii. 25, § 1.)

CAYSTRIUS (Kaistrios), a son of Achilles and the Amazon Penthesileia, from whom the river Caystrus was believed to have derived its name. Caystrus, together with Asius, had a hermua on the banks of that river. (Strab. xiv. p. 650 ; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 661.)

CEBALINUS (Kebalinos), a brother of Nico- machus, who lived on licentious terms with Dimnus, the author of the plot against the life of Alexander the Great in n. c. 350. Nicomachus acquainted his brother with the plot, and the latter revealed it to Philota that he might lay it before the king; but as Philotas neglected to do so for two days, Cebalus mentioned it to Metron, one of the royal pages, who immediately informed Alexander. Cebalus was forthwith brought before the king, and orders were given to arrest Dimnus. (Curt. vi. 7 ; Diod. xxvii. 79.)

CEBES (Kebeō), of Thebes, was a disciple of Philinus, the Pythagorean, and of Socrates, with whom he was connected by intimate friendship. (Xen. Mem. i. 2 ; § 28, iii. 11 ; § 17 ; Plat. Crit. p. 45, b.) He is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Phaedo, and as having been present at the death of Socrates. (Phaedo, p. 59, e.) He is said on the advice of Socrates to have purchased Phaedo, who had been a slave, and to have instructed him in philosophy. (Gell. ii. 18 ; Macrob. Sat. i. 11 ; Lucian, iii. 24.) Diogenes Laertius (ii. 125) and Suidas ascribe to him three works, viz. πίαξες, Ειδοπεια, and Φιλοσοφια, all of which Eudocia (p. 272) erroneously attributes to Callippus of Athens. The last two of these works are lost, and we do not know what they treated of, but the πίαξες is still extant, and is referred to by several ancient writers. (Lucian, Apocol. 42, Rhod. Prospept. 6 ; Polliux, iii. 95 ; Terent. De Præscript. 35 ; Aristot. i. 2.) This πίαξες is a philosophical explanation of a table on which the whole of human life with its dangers and pleasures was symbolically represented, and which is said to have been dedicated by some one in the temple of Cronus at Athens or Thebes. The author introduces some youths contemplating the table, and an old man who steps among them undertakes to explain its meaning. The whole drift of the little book is to shew, that only the proper development of our mind and the possession of real virtues can make us truly happy. Suidas calls this πίαξες a διάγραφες τῶν ἐν Ἡθον, an explanation which is not applicable to the work now extant, and some have therefore thought, that the πίαξες to which Suidas refers was a different work from the one we possess. This and other circumstances have led some critics to doubt whether our πίαξες is the work of the Theban Cebes, and to ascribe it to a later Cebes of Cyzicus, a Stoic philosopher of the time of Marcus Aurelius. (Athen. iv. p. 156.) But the πίαξες which is now extant is manifestly written in a Socratic spirit and on Socratic principles, so that at any rate its author is much more likely to have been a Socratic than a Stoic philosopher. There are, it is true, some few passages (e. g. c. 13) where persons are mentioned belonging to a later age than that of the Theban Cebes, but there is little doubt but that this and a few similar passages are interpolations by a later hand, which cannot surprise us in the case of a work of such popularity as the πίαξες of Cebes. For, owing to its ethical character, it was formerly extremely popular, and the editions and translations of it are very numerous. It has been translated into all the languages of Europe, and even into Russian, modern Greek, and Arabic. The first edition of it was in a Latin translation by L. Odaxius, Bologna, 1497. In this edition, as in nearly all the subsequent ones, it is printed together with the Euchologion of Epictetus. The first edition of the Greek text with a Latin translation is that by J. A. Alciatus (Venice, 1603, without date), who printed it together with the "Institutiones et alia Opuscula" of C. Lascaris. This was followed by a great number of other editions, among which we need notice only those of H. Wolf (Basel, 1650, 8vo.), the Leiden edition (1640, 4to., with an Arabic translation by Blichmann) of J. Gronovius (Amsterdam, 1689, 8vo.), J. Schultze (Hamburg, 1694, 12mo.), T. Hemsterhuis (Amsterdam, 1708, 12mo., together with some dialogues of Lucian), M. Melchior, and Adr. Reland (Utrecht, 1711, 4to.), and T. Johnson. (London, 1720, 8vo.) The best modern editions are those of Schweigger in his edition of Epictetus and also a more accurately printed (Strasbourg, 1806, 12mo.,) and of A. Coraës in his edition of Epictetus. (Paris, 1826, 8vo.)

CECIDEDES (Kedides), of Hermione, a very ancient Greek dithyrambic poet, whom Aristophanes (Nub. 881) reckons among those who belonged to the good old times, but had become obsolete in his own days. The Scholiast on that passage remarks, that Cecdides was also mentioned by the comic poet Cotinus in his "Panopte." (Comp. Suidas, s. v. Kedides ; Boëth. Gesch. der Lyri. Dichter der Helleni. ii. p. 303, note 1.)

CECROPS (Kekrops), according to Apollodorus (iii. 14, § 1, &c.) the first king of Attica, which derived from him its name Cecropia, having previously borne the name of Acte. He is described as an autokhthon, and is accordingly called a γγυναικας, the upper part of whose body was human, while the lower was that of a dragon. Hence he is called διαιτης or γενειασ. (Hygin. Fáb. 48; Anton. Lib. 6; Diod. i. 28; Aristoph. Vesp. 459; Ov. Met. ii. 555.) Some ancient referred the epithet διαιτης to marriage, of which tradition made him the founder. He was married to Aglaurus, the daughter of Actaeus, by whom he had a son, Eryxichthon, and three daughters, Agraulos, Heso, and Pandrosos. (Apollod. i. 2, § 5.) In his reign Poseidon called forth with his trident a well on the acropolis, which was known in later times by the name of the Erechtheum well, from its being enclosed in the temple of Erechtheus. (Paus. ii. 26, § 6; Herod. viii. 55.) The marine god now wanted to take possession of the country; but Athena, 2 u who entertained the same desire, planted an olive-tree on the hill of the acropolis, which continued to be shown at Athens down to the latest times; and as she had taken Cercops as her witness while she planted it, he decided in her favor when the possession of Attica was disputed between her and Poseidon, who had no witness to attest that he had created it. Cercops is regarded as the first of the Attic legends as the author of the first elements of civilized life, such as marriage, the political division of Attica into twelve communities, and also as the introducer of a new mode of worship, inasmuch as he abolished the bloody sacrifices which had until then been offered to Zeus, and substituted cakes (πᾶνα) in their stead. (Paus. viii. 2. § 1; Strab. x. p. 397; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1156.)

The name of Cercops occurs also in other parts of Greece, especially where there existed a town of the name of Athens, such as in Bocotia, where he is said to have founded the ancient towns of Athe- nes and Eleusis on the river Trion, and where he had a heroon at Halirratus. Tradition there related him to a son of Hestor. (Paus. vi. 83. § 1; Strab. x. p. 407.) In Euboea, which had likewise a town Athens, Cercops was called a son of Elec- theus and Praxidem, and a grandson of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 1, 5; Paus. i. 5. § 3.) From these traditions it appears, that Cercops must be regarded as a hero of the Pelasgian race; and Müller justly remarks, that the different mythical personages of this name connected with the towns in Bocotia and Euboea are only multiplications of the one original hero, whose name and story were transplanted from Attica to other places. The later Greek writers describe Cercops as having in- migrated into Greece with a band of colonists from the Sicyon in Euboea. (Diod. i. 28; Schol. ad Arist. Poet. 775.) But this account is not only rejected by some of the ancient themselves, but by the ablest critics of modern times. (Müller, Orchem. p. 123; Thirlwall, Greece, i. p. 66, &c.)

CELEONEUS, GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος ο Κε- λεόνης), a Greek monk, of whose life nothing is known, lived in the eleventh century, and is the author, or rather compiler, of an historical work (Αιτωλία τιτροποία) which begins with the creation of the world and goes down to the year 1057. This extensive work is written in the form of annals, and must be perused with great caution, as its author was not only very deficient in historical knowledge, but shews a great want of judgment and a degree of credulity which may suit a writer of legends, but which becomes absurd and ridiculous in historians. The latter part of the Synopsis, which treats of events of which Cercopes was a contemporary, is not quite so bad, but it still shews that the author was utterly unable to form a judgment respecting the times in which he lived. However, as the work is extensive and contains an abundance of facts, it may frequently be used in conjunction with other authors; but a careful writer will seldom make him his sole authority, except where he has copied good sources.

A great number of passages, many long epi- sodes of the Synopsis also found in the Annals of Ioannes Scylitis Cypriotes, the contempor- ary of Cercopes, and the question has often been discussed, whether Cypriotes copied Cercopes or Cercopes Cypriotes. The work of Cypriotes goes down to the year 1081, but the latter writer was a man of much more intellection and judgment than Cercopes, and there is no doubt that Cercopes was the plagiarist, although, of course, he can have used only the first part of the annals of Cypriotes. The style of Cercopes is very barbarous. Oudin (Comment. de Script. Eccles. vol. ii. p. 1189) thinks, but without sufficient evidence, that Cercopes lived in the twelfth century. The general Latin title of the Synopsis is "Com- plementum Historiarum ab H. H. S. Conditius in Occidentum Commennum (1057)." The first edition, published by Xylander, Basel, 1506, fol., with a Latin translation and a preface, is very deficient, as Xylander perused an incomplete MS. A good edition was published by Goar and Fabrot, to- gether with the Annals of Cypriotes, Paris, 1647, 2 vols. fol., with a new translation, a glossary of barbarisms, and a preface of Fabrot. This edition is complete, or very nearly so, the editors having collated good MSS., and paid particular attention to the numerous passages taken from Cypriotes; it belongs to the Paris collection of the Byzantine historians, and is reprinted in the Venetian edition of Theophylact. The Latin edition is by Immanuel Beller, Bonn, 1838-39, 2 vols. in 8vo; it is the revised French edition, and contains likewise the Annals of Cypriotes. (The Prefaces of Xylander and Fabrot to their editions of Cercopes; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 464, &c.; Leo Allatius, De Georgiis.)

CELO'NIIUS, a common name under the emperors.

1. CELEONIUS ALBINUS, the name of a distin- guished Roman, probably a relation of the emperor Albinus, put to death by Severus (Spart. Sever. 13), and also the name of the praefectus urbi under Valerianus. (Vopisc. Aurelian. 31.)

2. CELEONIUS BASUS, a friend of the emperor Aurelian, to whom the latter wrote a letter, preserved by Vopiscus (Aurelian. 31), respecting the destruction of Palmyra. His full name was Ceo- nius Virius Basus, and he was consul in A.D. 271. (Fast.)

3. CELEONIUS COMMODOUS. [COMMODUS.]

4. CELEONIUS JULIANUS, a friend of the historian Vopiscus. (Vopisc. Firm. 2.)

5. CELEONIUS POSTUMIUS, the father of the emperor Albinus (Capitol. Celt. Albin. 4), whose full name was Decius Ceionius Septimius Albi- nus [p. 93, b.].

6. CELEONIUS POSTUMIANUS, a relation of the emperor Albinus. (Capitol. Celt. Albin. 6.)

7. CELEONIUS VERUS. [VERUS.]

CELAENO (Κέλανος), a Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and by Poseidon the mother of Lyceus and Euryprykos, or, according to others, of Lyceus and Chmiereus by Prometheus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Ov. Her. xix. 135; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1561; Vett. ad Lycurg. 132.)

There are several other mythological beings of this name: namely, a Harpy (Verg. Aen. ill. 211), a daughter of Ergusus (Hygin. Fab. 167), a daughter of Hyamus (Paus. x. 6. § 2), a Damaid (Strab. xii. p. 579; Apollod. ii. 1. § 5), and an Amazon. (Dod. iv. 16.)

CELEDONES (Κελεδόνες), the soothsaying godesses, were frequently represented by the soothsayers in works of art, and were believed to be endowed, like the Sirens, with a magic power of song. For this reason, they are compared to the Lynges. Hephaestus was said to have made their golden images on the ceiling of the temple at Delphi.
CELEUS.

CELER. 1. A freedman of Atticus, in all probability. (Cic. ad Att. x. 1, xi. 4, xii. 8.) 2. A V. 83, who, according to Pseudo-Juvenal Silanus at the instigation of Agripina, in the first year of Nero’s reign, A. D. 55. (Tac. Ann. xiii. i. 33.)

3. A Roman knight in the time of Domitian, was scourged to death in the comitium for having committed incest with Cornelia, a Vestal virgin, although he persisted in his innocence to the last. (Plin. Ep. iv. 11; comp. Suet. Dom. 8; Dion Cass. lxvii. 3.)

CELENTIUS, an artist of considerable talent and renown, was, together with Severus, the principal architect of Nero’s immense building, the golden house, of which only a few remains are now visible in the baths of Titus, and perhaps at the foot of the Palatine near the arch of Titus. Not satisfied with the completion of this colossal palace, both artists, whose daring and talent did not shrink from the mightiest works, undertook a still more gigantic enterprise. Since the sea-ports of Ostia and Portus were small and dangerous, so that all larger vessels entered the port of Puteoli, they got the emperor’s consent to dig a canal from the lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber, and began actually by working a way through the hills near the lake, but were probably prevented from executing their intention by the death of their employer. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 42; Oros. rosea. 170, 4.) [L.U.]

CELER, ASINIUS, lived in the reign of Caligula, and is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. i. 17. a. 31) as a man of consular rank; but when he was consul is not known. He may have been the son of C. Asinius Gallus, consul B.C. 8.

CELER, CANINIUS, a Greek rhetorician, the teacher of M. Aurelius and L. Verus, was one of the secretaries of Hadrian, and was distinguished for his skill in the composition of the imperial letters. He wrote a work on the art of rhetoric. (Philos. Vit. Soph. i. 22, who calls him τηγεροφόρος; Capitol. Ver. 2; Aristot. Or. sacr. 5. vol. i. p. 335, ed. Jech.)

CELER, DIMITRIUS, an intimate friend of Piso, persuaded the latter, after the death of Germanicus, to return to Syria, and was himself previously sent by Piso into the province. (Tac. Ann. ii. 77—79.)

CELER, P. EGNATIUS. [Barba.]

CELER, METELLUS. [Metellus.]

CELEUS (Καλέος), a king of Eleeus, and husband of Metaneira. When Demeter, on her wanderings in search of her daughter, came to Eleeus, she stayed in the house of Celeus. The goddess wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and, in order to destroy his mortal parts, she put him at night into the fire; but Metaneira, ignorant of the goddess’ design, kindled the same fire to cook the meat, and Demophon was destroyed by the flames. Demeter, to make up for the loss, bestowed great favours upon Triptolemus, the other son of Celeus. (Apollod. i. 5. § 1; Triptolemus.) Celeus is described as the first priest of Demeter at Eleusis, and his daughters as priestesses of the goddess. (Hom. Hymn, in Dem. 101, &c.; Paus. i. 38. § 3, ii. 14. § 2.) There is another mythical personage of this name. (Anton. Lib. 19.) [L.S.]

CELEUS (Τ. Cornelius), one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio. [Comp. Aurelius.] In the twelfth year of Gallienus, A. D. 265, when usurpers were springing up in every corner of the Roman world, a certain Celeus, who had never risen higher in the service of the state than the rank of a military archon, was elevated to command in Africa. In no way remarkable except as a man of upright life and commanding person, was suddenly proclaimed emperor by Vibius Passianus, proconsul of the province, and Fabius Pompianus, general of the Libyian frontier. So sudden was the movement, that the appropriate trappings of dignity had not been provided, and the hands of Gallienus, a cousin it is said of the lawful monarch, invested the new prince with a robe snatched from the statue of a goddess. The downfall of Celeus was not less rapid than his elevation; he was slain on the seventh day, his body was devoured by dogs, and the loyal inhabitants of Sicca testified their devotion to the reigning sovereign by devising an insult to the memory of his rival unheard-of before that time. The effigy of the traitor was raised high upon a cross, round which the rabble danced in triumph. The names T. Cornelius rest upon the authority of modus published by Golzianus now universally recognised as spurious. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyrann.) [W. R.]

CELERUS, an Epicurean, who lived in the time of the Antonines, and was a friend of Lucian. There was another Celeus, who lived in the time of Nero, but he is of no historical importance. Neither would the other have been so, but for the doubt whether he is not the author of the attack on Christianity called the Αυγος Καθηματη, which has acquired so much notoriety from the answer written to it by Origen. [Origines.] To the Epicurean Celeus, Lucian dedicated his life of the magician Alexander, and in the course of it (§ 21) praises a work written by him against the belief in magic. But in the book against Christianity, Celeus stated with apparent approbation the opinion of the Platonists, that enchanters had power over all who have not raised themselves above the influence of the passions and nature (§ 93), and that the planets, elevated to communion with the Deity; the whole of which sentiment is inconsistent with the doctrine of Epicurus. Again, he talked of the sinner’s relation to God, of the spirit of man as immortal and derived from the Divinity, of evil spirits springing from the Satyrs and opposing the designs of God. All these are plainly the sentiments, not of an Epicurean, but of a Platonist. Indeed, the only reason for supposing the author of this work to be the Epicurean Celeus, is the positive assertion of Origen, who, however, is obliged to have recourse to some curious hypotheses to account for the prevalence of the Platonic sentiments. One is, that the author chose to conceal his real views, because there was at the time a strong prejudice against Epicureans as enemies of all religion, and therefore unfit to be judges of the merits of Christianity. But this seems improbable, and on the whole it is better to suppose Celeus the Epicurean and Celeus the author of this book to be different persons. With regard to the work itself, it is a mixture of self-sufficiency, ignorance, and inconsistency. In one place the author reproached the Christians as slaves of a blind belief, in another with their numerous sects and ever-varying opinions. Sometimes he spoke of them as the slaves of their senses (ἐνθὸν καὶ φιλοσωφικῶν γνῶσις), on another occasion as persons who rejected all external worship whatever. He was indignant that the Christian promises are offered to sinners, and said in reference to our Lord's coming to save them, οὐκ ἔστι διὰ δικαιομαχίαν οὐχ ἐπιστέφων; he also urged the Jews against the doctrines of a special Providence, the Fall, and the Redemption, asserting that God made his work perfect once for all, and had no need to improve it afterwards. (Origenes, adv. Cels.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil., Per. ii., i. 1, 2, 8; Neander, Geschichte der Christl. Kirche, vol. i. sect. 2.) [G. E. L. C.]

CELSUS ALBINOVANUS, the secretary of Tib. Claudius Nero, and a friend of Horace, to whom the latter addressed one of his Epistles (i. 8). He is thought to be the same as the poet Celsus mentioned in another of Horace's Epistles (i. 3), in which he is said to have composed his poems from other persons' writings. He must not be confused with the poet Pede Albinovanus, the friend of Ovid. [ALBINOVANUS.]

CELSUS, APPULEIUS, a physician of Corinth in Sicily, who was the tutor of Valens and Scribonia Laurus (Scrib. Larg. De Compos. Medicam. capp. 94, 171), and who must therefore have lived about the beginning of the Christian era. He has been supposed to be the author of the work entitled Herbarum, seu de Medicamentis Herbarum, which goes under the name of Appuleius Barbarus [APPULEIUS], but this is probably not the case. He may, however, perhaps be the person who is quoted several times in the Geoponika, Cantab. Ò. 1704. [W. A. G.]

CELSUS, ARLEUNTUS, an ancient commentator on Terence, who probably lived in the second half of the fourth century of the Christian era. (Schoepen, De Torrato et Dovalo, Bonn, 1821.)

CELSUS, A.* CORNELIUS, a very celebrated Latin writer on medicine, of whose age, origin, or even actual profession, we know but little. There are some incidental expressions which lead to the conjecture, that he lived at the beginning of the Christian era, under the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius; and particularly the mode in which he refers to Themison (Præf. lib. i. pp. 5, 9, iii. 4, p. 43) would indicate that they were either contemporaries, or that Themison preceded him by a short period only. With respect to the country of Celus (though he has been claimed as a native of Verona), we have nothing on which to ground our opinion, except the purity of his style, which at most would prove no more than that he had been educated or had passed a considerable part of his life at Rome. With regard to his profession, there is some reason to doubt whether he was a practitioner of medicine or whether he only studied it as a branch of general science, after the manner of some of the ancient Greek philosophers. This doubt has arisen principally from the mode in which he is referred to by Columella (de Re Rust. i. 1. 14) and by Quintilian (xii. 11), and by his not being enumerated by Pliny among the physicians of Rome in his sketch of the history of medicine. (H. N. xxix. 1, &c.) But, on the other hand, his work appears to bear very strong evidence that he was an actual practitioner, that he was familiar with the phenomena of disease and the operation of remedies, and that he described and recommended what fell under his own observation, and was sanctioned by his own experience; so that it seems upon the whole most probable that he was a physician, and not a mere theorist, that he devoted part of his time and attention to the cultivation of literature and general science. Quintilian speaks rather slightingly of him, calls him (xii. 11) "medicini vir ingenios," and says he not only wrote on all sorts of literary matters, but even on agriculture and military tactics. Of these numerous works only one remains entire, his celebrated treatise on Medicine; but a few fragments of a work on Rhetoric were published under his name in 1569, Óvo, Colon., with the title " Aurelii Cornelii Celsi, Rhetoriarum vetustissimum et clarissimum, de Arte Discehi Libellus, primum in Locum editum, cum autem, Sexto de Popma Physico." This little work is preserved in the earlier part of the Bibliotheca Latina, where it fills about six small quarto pages, and is chiefly occupied with the works of Cicero.

The treatise of Celsus "De Medicina," On Medicine, is divided into eight books. It commences with a judicious sketch of the history of medicine, terminating by a comparison of the two rival sects, the Dogmatici and the Empiriæ, which has been given in the Dict. of Ant. pp. 356, 379. The first two books are principally occupied by the consideration of diet, and the general principles of therapeutics and pathology; the remaining books are devoted to the consideration of particular diseases and their treatment; the third and fourth to internal diseases; the fifth and sixth to external diseases, and to pharmaceutical preparations; and the last two to those diseases which more particularly belong to surgery. In the treatment of disease, Celsus, for the most part, pursues the method of Asclepiades of Bithynia; he is not, however, servilely attached to him, and never hesitates to adopt any practice or opinion, however contrary to his, which he conceives to be sanctioned by direct experience. He adopted to a certain extent the Hippocratic method of observing and watching over the operations of Nature, and of regulating rather than opposing them,—a method which, with respect to acute diseases, may frequently appear inert. But there are occasions on which he displays considerable decision and boldness, and particularly in the use of the lancet, which he employed with more freedom than any of his predecessors. His regulations for the employment of blood-letting and of purgatives are laid down with minuteness and precision (ii. 10, &c., p. 30, &c.); and, although he was in some measure led astray by his hypothesis of the crudity and concoction of the humours, the rules which he prescribed were not very different from those which were generally adopted in the commencement of the present century. His description of the symptoms of fever, and of the different varieties which it assumes, either from the nature of the epidemic, or from the circumstances under which it takes place (iii. 3, &c., p. 43, &c.), are correct and judicious; his practice was founded upon the principle already referred to, of watching the operations of Nature, conceiving that fever consisted essentially in an effort of the constitution to throw off some morbid cause, and that, if not unduly interfered with, the process would terminate in a state of health. We here see the germ of the doctrine of the "vis medica M.Naturne," which has had so much influence over the practice of the most enlightened physicians of modern times, and which, although erroneous, has perhaps led to a less hazardous practice than the hypotheses which have been substituted in its room.

But perhaps the most curious and interesting parts of the work of Celsus are those which treat of Surgery and surgical operations, of which some account is given in the Dict. of Ant. art. Chirurgia. It is very remarkable that he is almost the first writer who professedly treats on these topics, and yet his descriptions of the diseases and of their treatment prove that the art had attained to a very considerable degree of perfection. Many of what are termed the "capital" operations seem to have been well understood and frequently practised, and it may be safely asserted, that the state of Surgery at the time when Celsus wrote, was comparatively much more advanced than that of Medicine. The Pharmacy of Celsus forms another curious and interesting part of his work, and, like his Surgery, marks a state of considerable improvement in this branch of the art. Many of his formulae are well arranged and efficacious, and, on the whole, they may be said to be more correct and even more scientific than the multifarious compounds which were afterwards introduced into practice, and which were not completely discarded until our own times. The style of Celsus has been much admired, and it is in fact equal in purity and elegance to that of the best writers of the Augustan age. This is probably one of the chief reasons of his having been chosen as a text-book in modern times; but it would be great injustice to suppose that this is its only merit, or that it contains nothing but a judicious and well-arranged abstract of what had been said by his predecessors. Some instances of his lux and inaccurate use of certain anatomical terms are mentioned in the Dict. of Ant. art. Physiologia; but his anatomical and physiological knowledge does not appear to have been at all inferior to that of his contemporaries. In many passages of his work he follows Hippocrates, especially when treating of the general symptoms and phenomena of diseases; and occasionally we meet with sentences literally translated from the Greek. He does not, however, by any means blindly embrace his doctrines, and differ from him occasionally both in theory and practice.

The work of Celsus, entitled De Medicina Libri Octo, has been published very often; Choulant mentions four editions in the fifteenth century, fifteen in the sixteenth, five in the seventeenth, thirteen in the eighteenth, and twelve in the first thirty-five years of the nineteenth. The first edition was published at Florence, 1478, small fol., edited by Barthol. Pontius: it is said to be very scarce, and is described by Dibbon in his Biblioth. Spencer, i. 303. Perhaps the other editions that have been noticed are those of Van der Linden, in 4to, Brus. 1657, 12mo, by Almavovo, Amsterdam, 1657, 12mo, (which was several times reprinted); Tanga, Patav. 1769, 4to. (whose text has been the basis of most subsequent editions); Lugd. Bat. 1785, 4to.; Argent. 1806, 8vo, 2 vols.; and Milligan, Edinb. 1826, 8vo. The latest edition—mentioned by Choulant is that by F. Ritter and H. Albers, Colon. ad Rhen. 1835, 12mo. The work has been translated into English, French, Italian, and German. The English translations appear to have been chiefly made for the use of medical students in London who are preparing for their examination at Apothecaries' Hall, and are not very good. A great number of works have been published on Celsus and his writings, which are not mentioned by Choulant, but which must be mentioned here. Further particulars respecting his medical opinions may be found in Le Clerc's Hist. de la Méd. Haller's Biblioth. Medica. Pract. vol. i.; Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii. See also Bostock's Hist. of Med., and Choulant's Handbuch der Bücherei für die Aeltest Medizins. Leipzig, 1840, 8vo., from which works the greater part of the preceding account has been taken.

[W. A. G.]

CELSUS, JULIUS, a tribune of the city-cohort, was condemned to death under Tiberius, and broke his own neck in prison by means of the chains with which he was fettered, in order to escape the disgrace of a public execution. (Tac. Ann. 19, 7; Suet. Tiber. 16.)

CELSUS, JULIUS, a scholar at Constantinople in the seventh century after Christ, who made a recension of the text of Caesar's Commentaries, whence we find subjoined to many MSS. of Caesar, Julius Caesar Ver Clariissim.is et Comes reecomi, or Julius Caesar Constantiav V. C. legi. Many modern writers, indeed, have maintained that Celsus was the author of these commentaries, and still more have attributed to him the works on the Spanish and African wars; but the former supposition is ridiculous, and the latter destitute of proof. Julius Celsus has been usually regarded as the author of the life of Caesar, which has been frequently printed with the editions of Caesar's Commentaries under the title of Julii Celsi Commentatoris de Vita Caesaris; but this work has been proved by C. E. Sch. Schneider (Petrarchae, Historia Julii Caesaris, Lips. 1827) to be a work of Petrarch's. There is a dissertation on Julius Celsus by Dodwell, appended to his Annales Quincentenni et Statiani, Oxon. 1899.

CELSUS, JUVENTIUS, a Roman jurist, who flourished, as Majoan and Helmeculus have clearly shewn, in the second half of the first century of the Christian æon. He succeeded Pegasus, the follower of Proculus, and was himself succeeded by Celsus, the same Nemotius Priscus. (Dig. 1. 11. 2. 2. 47.) He belonged (at least on one occasion) to the consilium of the consul Duenus Verus, who was probably a consular suffectus, and is nowhere named except in Dig. 31. a. 29. The numerous attempts of learned men to identify Duenus with recorded consuls are without ground, and most of their conjectures refer to too late a period, unless Celsus the father attained to an unusual age. Thus Wieling (Jurisprudentia Romana, i. 331) and Guill. Grotius (De Vitis Jurisprud. ii. 2. § 2) make Duenus the same as L. Ceionius Commodus Verus, who was consul A. D. 106. Others are for L. Annius Verus, consul A. D. 121. Ant. Augustinus in Notissimae Paterinis Pandectarum (1604, p. 258, [gld]) seems to think he might have been the Juventius Verus, who was consul for the third time A. D. 124. Helmeculus (Hist. Jur. Civ. § 241, n.) is for Decennius Gmai-Celsius, who was consul successively in A.D. 57, and whose cognomen might have been Verus. It was in the council of Decimus Verus that the opinion of Celsius the father was given upon an important point, and was adopted as law. He held (to use the nomenclature of English jurisprudence), that the beneficial interest in a legacy did not lapse by the death of the trustee before the testator. (As to the consilium of the consil and other magistrates, see Diet. of Ant. s. v. Conservatus; also Cic. Brut. 22; Plin. Ep. i. 20; Ann. Max. xcviii. c. xii.; Suet. Tib. 42. 11. It is Ulpian. l. s. 13; Cod. l. tit. 51; Dig. l. tit. 21. s. 3, pr.; tit. 22.) In Dig. 17. tit. l. s. 39, his opinion is cited along with that of Aristob, who was rather younger than Celsius the father. The Celsius to whom Aristob gives answers in Dig. 2. tit. 14. s. 7. § 2, and Dig. 40. tit. 7. s. 29. § 1, was Celsius the son, who, having gained greater celebrity as a jurist than his father, is understood to be meant in the Digest whenever Celsius is named without the addition pater or filius. Bach, who thinks the contrary more likely (Hist. Jurisp. Rom. iii. c. 1. § 22. n. [h.]), is certainly mistaken. Compare Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 3. §§ 6, 7; Dig. 31. s. 509. Here the name of the father was the same as that of the son, viz. P. Juvenalis Celsius, for otherwise he would probably have been distinguished by the difference of name, whereas he is never mentioned by any other appellation than Celsius pater. There is no direct citation from him in the Digest. Stockmann (ad Bachi Hist. Jurisp. Rom. loc. cit.) mentions a conjecture of Ev. Otto (Praef. ad Theod. i. p. 28), that there were three jurists named Celsius, viz. father, son, and grandson; but the reference to Otto seems to be incorrect. It is, indeed, highly probable that the P. Juvenalis, who appears from an inscription in Gruter (p. 607) to have been promagistratus scudi under Antoninus Pius, A.D. 155, was a grandson of the elder Celsius, but there is no proof that he was a jurist. Those who, like Mange (Amoen. Jur. c. xx.), identify the promagistratus with the son, must suppose that the son discharged an exceedingly laborious office in a very advanced age. Very little is known of Celsius the father, though much has been written upon him. Among the legal biographers who have attributed to his life one or more of the events that belong to the life of his son, are Guili. Gratiosus, Gravina, and Strachus. (Vitas vet. J.Clorum, No. 2, p. 14.) The Gens Juvenalis was an ancient race, and could boast of several jurists, as T. Juvenalis, T. Juvenalis, and M. Juvenalis Laterens. In manuscripts and monuments, from the ordinary interchange of V and B, the name is often spelt Juventius. (Maginians, ad XXX J. C. Is. pp. 256—255.)

Celsius, P. JUVENALIUS, a Roman jurist, the son of the subject of the preceding article. He was an accomplice in a conspiracy against Domitian, along with Nerva (who was afterwards emperor) and others; but although he was denounced to the emperor, he contrived to rescue himself and his companions, by flattering the emperor, by professing his innocence, and by promising to unravel the whole plot, and thus creating delays until the conspiracy was quiet. (B. J. lviii. 13; Philostr. Vict. Apoll. Tyrm. vii. 3.) He was afterwards highly favoured by Nerva and his son Trajan. Pliny (Ep. vi. 5) mentions an altercation between him and Licinius Nepos, concerning the cause of Pomponius Rufus Varinus. Celsius was then praetor, and, as the leges annuales were at that time religiously observed (Plin. Ep. vii. 16), may be supposed to have been 34 years of age. This would give A.D. 67 for the year of the birth of Celsius, for the cause of Pomponius Rufus was pleaded when M. Acilius was consul-elect (Plin. Ep. v. 20), that is to say, in A. D. 101. Celsius was twice consul. The date of his first consulship is not recorded. The second occurred A.D. 129, when he led the G. Neronis Magnus. (Dig. 5. tit. 3. s. 20. § 6.) He was a friend of Hadrian, and one of that emperor's counsellors. He was a Spartan. Hadrian, c. 13, where for Julius Celsius is to be read Juventius Celsius, and he probably died towards the end of Hadrian's reign, for Julianus, the jurist, in a fragment of a work (Digesta) which was written in the commencement of the reign of Antoninus Pius (compare Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 6. §§ 12; 4. tit. 2. s. 18), speaks of Celsius in the past tense:— "Quod etiam Juventius Celsius apertissime placuit." (Dig. 28. tit. 2. s. 28. pr.)

Celsius received legal instruction from his father, and is supposed from several inscriptions to have applied himself to studied philosophy, especially the philosophy of the Stoics. His education was probably attended to with great care, for his style is terse and elegant, and his mannerism so pure, that Laevianus Valla and Floridus, who unsparingly criticised the diction of the ancient Roman jurists, find little or nothing to carp at in Celsius. There are fragments which prove that he was acquainted with Greek. (Dig. 33. tit. 10. s. 7, 13. tit. 3. s. 3.) He early commenced the practice of the law. One of his youthful opinions was followed by Julianus, and is cited by Paulus. (Dig. 45. tit. 1. s. 91. § 3, unless by Celsius abodes we are here to understand Celsius the younger.) Celsius was manifestly well versed in the writings of his predecessors, for in the 20 pages which his 142 fragments occupy in Hommel. (Polignac. Pandect.) will be found references to Sex. Aelius, Brutus, Cassellius, Cato, Livius Drramus, Q. Mucius Scaevola, Q. Antonius Labeo, C. Trebatius Testa, Aelius Tubero, M. Tullius Cicero, Servius Sulpicius, Nerva, M. Aurelius Sabinus, Semp. Proculeus, and Neratius Priscus. In return, we find him quoted by many of the most eminent later jurists, as Julianus, Pomponius, Maelianus, Ulpian, and Paulus, and by Justinian himself in the Institutes and the Code. In Cod. 6. tit. 2. s. 10 Justinian mentions a curious physiological opinion of Celsius concerning deafness. He belonged, like his father, to the sect of Proculeus, but he was an independent thinker, sometimes differing from Labeo, Nerva, and his own father, and sometimes agreeing with Sabinus and Cassius. (Dig. 47. tit. 2. s. 25. § 1; 21. tit. 2. s. 29. pr.; 12. tit. 4. s. 3. §§ 6, 7; 12. tit. 5. s. 6.) In the fragments of Celsius there are several passages which betoken great self-confidence and uncivil dogmatism. In this he deviated from the usual practice (almost amounting to professional etiquette) of jurists ancient and modern. A Roman or an English lawyer would say, "mihii videtur," but "I think," or "The better opinion is," but Celsius compares himself unfavourably to Cicero and other ancient jurists in the manner of his expressions. For example, it appears from Dig. 21. tit. 2. s. 29. pr., that he called Nerva's opinion false. But the greatest instance of rudeness occurs in an answer to one Domitius Labeo, who inquired whether the person by whose hand a will was written was thereby disqualified from being one of the attending witnesses. "Juventius Celsus Laboni suo salutem. Aut non intelligo de quo me consuelturis, aut valde stulta est consutlatio tua: plus enim quam ridiculum est dubitare, an aliquis puer testis adhibitus sit, quomiam idem et tabulos testimoni i unguentari." (Dig. 28. tit. 1. a. 27.)

This question and this answer obtained such undeserved celebrity among civilians, that silly questions were called Quaestiones Domitianae, and blunt answers Respondiones Celsinae.

He wrote—1. Digestorum Libri XXXIX. After the order of the praetor's edict. Seven books of this work, viz. xxx—xxxvi, were occupied by a commentary on the Lex Julia et Papia Poppaea. This is the only one of the works of Celsus of which pure fragments are preserved in the compilations of Justinius, and perhaps the only one then extant. It belongs, according to Blum's theory, to the Classis Editalis of the Digest. 2. Epistolarum, of which Ulpius (Dig. 4. tit. 4. a. 3. § 1) cites the 11th book. 3. Questions, which, according to a citation of Ulpian (Dig. 24. tit. 2. a. 19. § 3), consisted of at least 19 books. 4. Commentaria, of which the 7th book is cited by Ulpian. (Dig. 24. tit. 2. a. 19. § 6.) 5. Institutiones, in 7 books, according to the testimony of the old scoliast on Juvenal (vi. 243). Gravina (Orig. Juv. Civ. lib. i. § 49, p. 68) says, that Celsus left a work De Ursu perspicuo, in which he referred to his father; but this statement is given without authority, and appears to be an error partly copied from Panecrati (de Claris Leg. Interp. p. 44), who cites a passage in the Digest (Dig. 31. tit. 4. a. 47) referring not to Celsus, but to Neverus filius. (Heinmee. de Jusjnto Cels. Op. ii. pp. 512-519; Schott. de Quaestiones Domitianae, Lips. 1771; Hub. Greg. van Vryhoff. Obser. Jur. Civ. c. 35; Neuber, Die juridische Klassiker, pp. 133-145; Kämmerer, Beiträge zur Gesch. u. Theorie des Röm. Rechts, i. No. 3, pp. 208-226.) [J. T. G.]

CELSUS, P. MA'RIUS, consul in A. D. 62 (Postum), was the commander of the fifteenth legion in Pannonia, with which he was sent to join Corbulo in his expedition against the Parthians in 64. On the death of Nero in 68, Celsus joined Galba's party, at which time he is spoken of as consul designatus, but whether he had been nominated to the consulship by Nero or by Galba is uncertain. He was one of the ablest and most faithful of Galba's supporters; and when the troops rebelled against the new emperor, Celsus was sent to endeavour to propitiate the detestation of the Illyrian army which had encamped in the Vipissine porticus. It was probably thought that Celsus would have more influence with this army than any one else, on account of his former connexion with it; but he was unable to quell the insurrection. The death of Galba soon followed, and Otho obtained the sovereignty. The life of Celsus was now in great danger; the partizans of Otho loudly de- nied the death of Galba; but Otho, who appreciated his fidelity to his late master, remunerated him for his life, but admitted him to the circle of his most intimate friends. Celsus served Otho with the same fidelity as he had the late emperor. He was sent, together with Suetonius Paulinus and Annius Gallus, in command of the army to oppose the generals of Vitellius, who were advancing into Italy. At first he and his colleagues were completely successful; in the campaign on the Po, in the neighbourhood of Placentia and Cremona, they defeated all the plans of Cæcina, the general of Vitellius [Cæcina, No. 9]; and it was not till the latter had been joined by Fabius Valens, and Otho had resolved, against the advice of Celsus as well as Suetonius Paulinus, to risk a battle, that the aspect of affairs was changed. The battle of Bedriacum, in which Otho's army was defeated, gave Vitellius the empire; but Celsus, who had remained faithful to Otho to the last, again did not suffer for his fidelity. Vitellius allowed him to enter on the consulship on the calends of July (A. D. 69), as had been arranged from the first. (Tac. Ann. xx. 25, Hist. i. 14, 31, 59, 45, 71, 77, 87, 90, ii. 23, 23, 60.)

CELSUS, PAP'PIUS. Celsus appears as a surname of the Papia gens on several coins of the republican period, but does not occur in any ancient writer. Two of the most remarkable of these coins are given below. On the obverse the former contains a youthful head with a trophy behind it, the latter the head of Juno Sospita. The reverse of both represents the same subject, namely, a wolf with a piece of wood in its mouth, and an eagle standing before a burning heap of wood. This subject appears to refer to a legend related by Dionysius (i. 59) in connexion with the foundation of Latium by the Trojans. He tells us that the forest in which the city was afterwards built took fire of its own accord, and that a wolf was seen bringing dry wood to feed the flame, which was fanned by an eagle with its wings; but that a fox at the same time tried to extinguish the fire by its tail, which had been dipped in water; and that it was not till after several efforts that the wolf and eagle were able to get rid of him. Now we know that the Papia gens came originally from Luniuvm, which was also one of the chief seats of the worship of Juno Sospita. Hence it has been conjectured, that Dionysius has made a mistake in referring this legend to Latium; but it is not improbable that the same story may have been told, in later times, of the foundation of each city.

CELSUS, L. PUBLIC'LIUS, consul under Trajan in A. D. 113 (Postum). was so much esteemed by this emperor, that he had a statue erected to his honour. He was, however, a personal enemy of Hadrian's, and accordingly the latter caused him to be put to death at Baiae immediately after his accession, A. D. 117. (Dion Cass. Iv. 16, lxxxix. 2; Sarmattin. Hadr. 4, 7.)

CENAEUS (Kænæus), a surname of Zeus, derived from cape Cenaeum in Euboea, on which the

It was to this Censorinus that the philosopher Chrysippos dedicated one of his works. (Cic. Acad. ii. 92.)

3. C. MARCUS CENSORINUS, one of the leading men of the Marian party, is first mentioned as the accuser of Sulla on his return from Asia in u. c. 91. (Plut. Sull. 5.) He entered Rome together with Marius and Cinna in u. c. 87, and took a leading part in the massacres which then ensued. It was Censorinus who killed the consul Octavius, the first victim of the proscription; he cut off his head and carried it to Cinna, who commanded it to be hung up on the rostra. Censorinus shared in the vicissitudes of the Marian party, and took an active part in the great campaign of u. c. 82, which established the supremacy of Sulla. He had the command of one of the Marian armies, and is first mentioned as suffering a defeat from Pompey near Sena. He was afterwards sent with eight legions by the consul Carbo to relieve the younger Marius, who was kept besieged at Praeneste; but on his march thither, he was attacked from an ambush by Pompey, and was compelled after considerable loss to take refuge on a neighbouring hill. His men, believing him to be the cause of their defeat, deserted him in a body, with the exception of seven cohorts, with which insensible remnant he was compelled to return to Carbo. When Carbo shortly afterwards abandoned Italy in despair, Censorinus united his forces with those of Brutus Damosippus and Cæcina, and these three generals, after an ineffectual attempt to force the passes of Praeneste with the object of relieving the younger Marius, marched on to Rome to take the city as it was destitute of men and provisions. Sulla, however, hastened after them, and a dreadful battle was fought near the Colline gate, which ended in the total defeat of the Marian army. Censorinus and Cæcina took to flight, but were overtaken and brought back to Sulla, who commanded them to be put to death, and their heads to be cut off and carried round the walls of Praeneste to inform Marius of the fate of his friends. (Appian, B. C. i. 71, 83, 90, 92, 93.) Censorinus is spoken of by Cicero as one of the orators of his time, and as tolerably well versed in Greek literature. ( Brut. 97, 98.)

4. (Marcus) CENSORINUS, one of the friends of Q. Cicero in Asia, u. c. 59 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 4), may possibly be the same as the following.

5. L. MARCUS L. C. N. CENSORINUS, a violent partisan of M. Antony, and one of the praetors in u. c. 43. (Cic. Puteoli, xii. 5, 14, xiiii. 2, duo praetores, xiiii. 8; comp. Caraton. ad xiiii. 8.) When Antony passed over into Asia after arranging the affairs of Greece in u. c. 41, he left Censorinus governor of the province. (Plut. Anton. 24.) His adherence to Antony procured him the consulship in 39 (Dion Cass. xlvii. 34), and we learn from the Triumphal Fasti, that he obtained a triumph for some successes he had gained in Macedon, which must subsequently have been his province.

6. C. MARCUS L. L. N. CENSORINUS, son of No. 5, was consul in u. c. 8 (Dion Cass. iv. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxiiii. 10, s. 47; Censorin. 22; Stat. Vit. Horat. Lapis Ancyranus), and seems to have obtained subsequently the government of Syria, from the way in which he is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi. 6. § 2) in the decree of Augustus.

CENCHRIAS (Κέντριας), a son of Poseidon and Peirere, was killed accidentally by Artemis. He and his brother Leches were believed to have given their names to Cenchrea and Lechaia, the two port-towns of Corinth. (Paus. ii. 2. § 8, 3. § 3, 24. § 4.) [LS.]

CENSORINUS, the name of a plebian family of the Marcia gens. The name of this family was originally Rutillus, and the first member of it who acquired the name of Censorinus, was C. Marcus Rutillus [No. 1, below], who is said in the Capitoline Fasti to have received this surname in his second censorship, u. c. 265. Niebuhr, however, remarks (Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 550), that this statement is doubtful, as he might have derived it from the circumstance of his father having first gained for the plebs a share in this dignity.

1. C. MARCUS C. F. L. N. RUTILUS CENSORINUS, was the son of C. Marcus Rutillus, the first Roman dictator (u. c. 356) and censor (u. c. 361). He was consul in u. c. 310 with Q. Fabius Maximus, and while his colleague was engaged in his brilliant campaign in Etruria, Rutillus conducted the war in Samnium and took the town of Allilae. He afterwards fought a battle with the Samnitians, in which he was probably defeated; for the statement of Livy, that the battle was a drawn one, is almost outweighed by his confession, that the consul himself was wounded and a legate and several tribunes of the soldiers killed. (Livy. ix. 33, 38; Diod. xx. 27.)

On the admission of the plebs to the priestly colleges by the Oghulian law in u. c. 300, by the insertion of their names in the list of their members was increased, Rutillus was elected one of the pontiffs. (Livy. x. 9.) He was censor with P. Cornelius Arvina in 294 (Livy. x. 47), and a second time with Cn. Cornelius Blasio in 265, the only instance in which a person held the office of censor twice. It is mentioned above that he is said to have received the surname of Censorinus in this honour. After his election Rutillus rebuked the people for having conferred this dignity upon him again, and brought forward a law enacting that no one in future should be eligible to this office a second time. (Livy. Epit. 18; Entrop. ii. 18; Val. Max. iv. 1. § 3; Plut. Coriol. 1.)

2. L. MARCUS C. F. C. N. CENSORINUS, consul with M. Manilius in u. c. 149, the first year of the third Punic war. Both consuls were ordered to proceed to Carthage; the command of the army was entrusted to Manilius, and that of the fleet to Censorinus. In the negotiations between the consuls and Carthaginians which preceded actual hostilities, and of which Appian has given us a detailed account, Censorinus acted as spokesman because he was the better orator. After the Carthaginians had refused compliance with the commands of the Romans, which required them to abandon Carthage and build another town not less than ten miles from the sea, the consuls formally laid siege to the city; but Censorinus was compelled shortly afterwards to return to Rome in order to hold the comitia, leaving the conduct of the siege in the hands of his colleague. (Appian, Pau. 75—90, 97—98; Liv. Epit. 49; Flor. ii. 15; Eutrop. iv. 10; Oros. iv. 22; Vell. Pat. i. 13; Zonar. iv. p. 463; Cic. Brat. 15, 27, ad Att. xii. 5.) Censorinus was censor in u. c. 147, with Marcia gens claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius [MARCIA GENES], and the latter was supposed to be the grandson of Numa Pompilius. In these three coins Numa is represented with a beard, and Ancus without, probably to mark the relation between them of grandfather and grandson. The obverse of the first contains the inscription NVMAR, POMPILL. ANCI. MARC., and that of the second NVMAR, POMPILL, ANCUS, MARCI. The reverse of the first represents two arches, in one of which Victory stands on a pillar, and in the other is the prow of a vessel, with the moon above. The reverse of the second contains two prows also with a figure of Victory; and both coins seem to have reference to the harbour of Ostia, which was built by Ancus Marcius. The reverse of the third coin represents a desultor riding with two horses, as he was accustomed to leap from one to another in the public games, while they were at full gallop. (Dict. of Ant. a. v. Desultor.) The fourth and fifth coins are of less importance: the fourth has on the obverse a youthful head, and on the reverse a horse at full gallop; the fifth has on the obverse the head of Apollo, and on the reverse, Silemus. (Eckhel, v. p. 245, &c.)

CENSORINUS (Appius Claudius) is ranked by Trebellius Pollio among the thirty tyrants [comp. AURIALES], although the number is complete without the addition of his name, and he belongs not to the reign of Gallicanus, but of Claudius Gothicus. Censorinus, having devoted his youth and manhood to a military career, attained to the highest dignities. He was twice consul, twice praefect of the praetorium, twice praefect of the city, four times praetorian, and discharged at various periods the duties of numerous inferior appointments. Full of years, and disabled by an honourable wound received in the Persian war, under Valerian, he had retired to pass the evening of his days on his estate, when he was suddenly proclaimed emperor by a body of mutinous troops, and invested with the purple at Bologna, in A. D. 270. Having, however, displayed a determination to enforce strict discipline, he was forthwith put to death by the same soldiers who had raised him to a throne. If any genuine medals of this prince exist, which is very doubtful, they have never been described with sufficient accuracy to render them of any certainty, or even to enable us to determine whether the names Appius Claudianus formed part of his designation. Biringo, in his Numismata (Mediol. 1683), quotes a Greek coin supposed to indicate the third year of the reign of Censorinus; but, since no account is given of the place where it was preserved, it was in all probability a forgery, especially as we have no reason to believe that the pretender maintained his authority beyond the space of a few days. Tillmont supposes, that the Victorinus mentioned by the younger Victor as having assumed the purple under Claudius is the same person with our Censorinus. (Treibel. Pollio, Trig. Tyr.; Tillmont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. p. 67. [W.R.])

CENSORINUS, the compiler of a book entitled de Die Natalis, which treats of the generation of man, of his natal hour, of the influence of the stars and genii upon his career, and discusses the various methods employed for the division and calculation of time, together with sundry topics connected with astronomy, mathematics, geography, and music. It affords much valuable information with regard to the various systems of ancient chronology, and is constantly referred to by those who have investigated these topics. The book is dedicated to a certain Q. Cerialius, whom the writer addresses as his patron and benefactor (c. 1), and was composed in the year A. D. 258, in the consulship of Ulpian and Pontianus (c. 21). Censorinus terms Rome the "communis patria" of himself and Cerialius (c. 16); and this fact, along with those detailed above, comprise the whole knowledge we possess with regard to the work and its author. A fragment de Metris and lost tracts de Accentibus and de Geométris are ascribed, but upon no sure evidence, to this same Censorinus. Carrici, in his
As regards the origin of the notion respecting the centaurs, we must remember, in the first place, that bull-hunting on horseback was a national custom in Thessaly (Schol. ad Pind. p. 319, ed. Boeckh), and, secondly, that the Thessalians in early times spent the greater part of their lives on horseback. It is therefore not improbable that the Thessalian mountaineers may at some early period have made upon their neighbouring tribes the same impression as the Spaniards did upon the Mexicans, namely, that horse and man were one being. The centaurs were frequently represented in ancient works of art, and it is here that the idea of them was first fully developed. There are, indeed, representations by which the centaurs were associated in works of art. In the first they appear as men down to their legs and feet, but the hind part consists of the body, tail, and hind legs of a horse (Paus. v. 19 § 2); the second form, which was probably not used before the time of Phidias and Alcamenes, represents the centaurs as men from the head to the loins, and the remainder is a horse with its four feet and tail. (Paus. v. 10 § 2; Plin. H.N. xxxvi. 4.) It is probably owing to the resemblance between the nature of the centaurs and that of the satyrs, that the former were in later times drawn into the sphere of Dionysiac beings; but here they appear no longer as savage monsters, but as tamed by the power of the god. They either draw the chariot of the god, and play the horn or lyre, or they appear in the train of Dionysus, among the Satyrs, Fauns, Nymphs, Erotes, and Bacchantes. It is remarkable that there were also female centaurs, who are said to have been of great beauty. (Phil. Ins. i. 3; comp. Voss. Mythol. Briefe, ii. p. 265, &c.; Böttiger, Versamml. ii. p. 75, &c.)

G. CENTENIUS, propraetor in n. c. 217, was sent by the consul Cn. Servilius Gemina from the neighbourhood of Ariminum with 4000 cavalry to the assistance of his colleague C. Flaminius in Etruria, whom he intended to join with all his forces. Centenus took possession of a narrow pass in Umbria near the lake Plistine, so called from a town, Plistia, in its neighbourhood; and here, after Hannibal's victory at the Trasimenic lake, he was attacked by Maharbal, one of Hannibal's officers, and defeated; those of his troops that were not killed took refuge on a hill, but were compelled to surrender next day. Appian, who is the only writer that gives us the exact place of this defeat, confounds C. Centenus with the M. Centenius mentioned below. (Polyb. i. 89; Liv. xxxi. 8; Appian, Asid. 9—11, 17; Zonar. viii. 25, 26, 27.)

M. CENTENIUS PIGNULA, first centurion of the triarii (gerini pilis), who had obtained his discharge after serving his full military time, and was distinguished for his bravery, obtained from the senate in n. c. 212 the command of 8000 men, half of whom were Roman citizens and half allies, by his assurance that his knowledge of the enemy and the country would enable him to gain some great advantage in a short time. The number of men granted him by the senate was nearly doubled by volunteers; and with these he marched into Lucania, offered battle to Hannibal, and was, as a matter of course, defeated. (Liv. xxv. 19; Oros. iv. 25.)

CENTHO, a surname of C. Claudius, consul n. c. 240. [Claudius.] Cephalius, the name of a family of the plebeian Fulvia gens.

1. CN. Fulvius CN. F. CN. N. Maximus Centumal, legate of the dictator M. Valerius Corvinus in the Etruscan war, b.c. 301, served consul in 298 with L. Cornelius Scipio, when he gained a brilliant victory over the Samnites near Boianum, and afterwards took this town and Aufidena. It would also appear that he subsequently obtained some successes in Etruria, as the Capitoline Fasti speak of his triumph in this year as celebrated over the Samnites and Etruscans. In 295 he served as praeproctus in the great campaign of Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Decius Mus, and gained a victory over the Etruscans. (Liv. x. 4, 11, 22, 26, 27, 30.)

The Fasti Capitolini mention a dictator of this name in 208, who is either the same as the preceding, or his son.

2. CN. Fulvius CN. F. CN. N. Centumal, consul b.c. 229 with L. Postumius Albinus, conducted the war with his colleague in Illyria. They met with no effectual resistance; and after the troops of the Illyrian queen, Teuta, had been completely dispersed, and she herself had retired with a very few followers to a strongly fortified town, called Rhizon, Centumalus returned to Rome with the greater part of the navy and land forces, leaving Albinus behind with forty ships. Centumalus triumphed in the following year, the first time that a triumph had been celebrated over the Illyrians. (Polyb. ii. 11, 12; Flor. ii. 5; Eutrop. iii. 4; Oros. iv. 13; comp. Dion Cass. Fugit. 151, ed. Reimar.)

3. CN. Fulvius CN. F. CN. N. Centumal, son apparently of No. 2, was curule aedile in b.c. 214, and was elected to the praetorship while he held the former office. As praetor in the following year, b.c. 213, Suessaullus was assigned to him as his province with the command of two legions. He was consul in 211 with P. Sulpicius Galba, and his command was prolonged in the next year, in which he was defeated by Hannibal near the town of Herdesia in Apulia, and he himself with eleven tribunes of the soldiers perished in the battle. (Liv. xxxv. 49, 44, xxv. 41, xxvi. i, 267, xxvii. 1, Polyb. iii. 13; Oros. iv. 17.)

4. M. Fulvius Centumalus, praetor urbanus b.c. 192, had to take an active part that year in the preparations for the war against Antiochus the Great, and was commanded, among other things, to superintend the building of fifty new quinqueremes. (Liv. xxxv. 10, 20, 23, 24.)

Centumalus, Ti. Claudius, had an action brought against him by P. Calpurnius Laurus on account of illegal fraud in the sale of some property to the latter. Judgment was pronounced against Centumalus by M. Porcius Cato, the father of Cato Uticensis. (Cic. de Off. iii. 16; Val. Max. viii. 19; Polyb. iii. 13; Comp. Cato, No. 6, p. 643, a.)

Cephalius (Κεφαλίος or Κεφαλάιος), an historian of the time of Hadrian, who wrote, besides other works, a θρόνος ἱστορίας extending from the time of Nemes and Semiramis to that of Alexander the Great. It was written in the Ionic dialect, and was divided into nine books, called by the names of the Muses; and as in this heaped Herodotus, so he is reported to have aimed at resembling Homer by concealing his birth-place. Hadrian banished him to Sicyon where this work was composed. (Suidas, s. v.; Photius, Cod. 68; Euseb. Chron. i. p. 30; Syncell. p. 167; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 262, ed. Westermann.)

Cephalius (Κεφαλίος), called Περγείδης or Περγειακός, a town in Bithynia, but he is named Περγεύς or Περγιέδης. (Strab. xiii. p. 583.) He wrote an account of the fortunes of Aeneas after the taking of Troy, called Τροία (Τροια). His date is unknown, but he is called by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (ι. 72) συγγραφέας ποιαῖς πάντι. Athenaeus (ι. 883, d.) calls him Cephalius, and remarks, that the Τροία which went under his name, was in reality the work of Hesiod of Alexandrinum. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 412, ed. Westermann.)

Cephalius (Κέφαλος). 1. A son of Hermes and Hebe, was carried off by Eos, who became by him the mother of Tithonus in Syria. (Apollod. iii. 14 § 6.) Hyginus (Fab. 169, 270) makes him a son of Hermes by Crousa, or of Pandion, and Hesiod (Theog. 986) makes Phaeton the son of Cephalius instead of Tithonus. On the pediment of the kingly Stoa in the Ceramicus at Athens, and on the temple of Apollo at Amyclae, the carrying off of Cephalius by Hemera (not Eos) was represented. (Paus. i. 3 § 6, i. 18 § 7.)

2. A son of Deion, the ruler of Phocis, and Diomedes, was married to Procris or Priscus, by whom he became the father of Archius, the father of Laerbos. He is described as likewise beloved by Eos (Apollod. ii. 3 § 4; Hygin. Fab. 125; Schol. ad Call. Heracl. in De Gen. 575; Paus. xiv. 3 § 2). Procris was sincerely attached to him, and promised to remain faithful to each other. Once when the handsome Cephalius was amusing himself with the chase, Eos approached him with loving entreaties, which, however, he rejected. The goddess then made him not break his vow until Procris had broken hers, but advised him to try her fidelity. She then metamorphosed him into a stranger, and gave him rich presents with which he was to tempt Procris. Procris was induced by the brilliant presents to break the vow she had made to Cephalius, and when she recognized her husband, she fled to Crete and discovered herself to Artemis. The goddess made her a present of a dog and a spear, which were given to her by the goddess, and then sent her back to Cephalius. Procris returned home in the disguise of a youth, and went out with Cephalius to chase. When he perceived the excellence of her dog and spear, he proposed to buy them of her; but she refused to part with them for any price except for love. When he accordingly promised to love her, she made herself known to him, and he became reconciled to her. As, however, she still feared the love of Eos, she always jealously watched him when he went out hunting, but on one occasion he killed her by accident with the never-erring spear. (Hygin. Fab. 189.) Some what different version of the narrative by Apollodorus (ii. 13 § 1) and Ovid. (Met. vii. 394, &c.; comp. Anton. Lib. 41; Schol. ad Enni. Orest. 1643.) Subsequently Amphitrion of Thebes came to Cephalius, and persuaded him to give up his dog to hunt the fox which was ravaging the Cadmean territory. After doing this he went out with Amphitrion against the Teleboans, upon the conquest of whom he was rewarded by Amphitrion with the island which he called after his own name Cephallenia. (Apollod. ii. 4 § 7; Strab. x. p. 456; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 607, &c.) Cephalius is also called the father of Iphicles by Clymenus.
CEPHALUS.

(Paus. x. 29. § 2.) He is said to have put an end to his life by leaping into the sea from Cape Lecanis, on which he had built a temple of Apollo, in order to atone for having killed his wife Procris. (Strab. x. 453; comp. Paus. i. 37. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 40.)

[II. S.]

CEPHALUS (Κέφαλος), a Molossian chief, who, together with another chief, Antinous, was driven by the calumny of a harpocrates to fall on the side of Pericles, in self-defence, against the Romans. [Antinous. Some have inferred from the language of Polybius that, after the outbreak of the war, Cephalus slew himself to avoid falling into the hands of the conquerors; but Livy tells us, that he was killed at the capture of the Molossian town of Teumon, which he had obstinately defended against L. Aemilius, the Roman commander, b. c. 167. Polybius speaks of him as "a man of wisdom and consistency," φρονίμασι καὶ στάδιοι ἀδυνάτως. (Polyb. xxvii. 15, xxx. 7; Liv. xiii. 18, 22, xlv. 26.)

B. E.]

CEPHALUS (Κέφαλος). 1. The son of Lyssandros, an Athenian of Cephalus, and father of the orator Lyssias, was a Syracuse by birth, but went to Athens at the invitation of Pericles, where he lived thirty years, till his death, taking a part in public affairs, enjoying considerable wealth, and having so high a reputation that he never had an action brought against him. He is one of the speakers in Plato's Republic. (Lys. c. Eratosth. p. 120. 36, ed. Steph.; Plat. Repub. p. 328, b, &c., comp. Cic. ad Att. iv. 16; Taylor's Life of Lyssias, in Kelscei's Oratora Graece.) He died at a very advanced age before b. c. 443, so that he must have settled at Athens before b. c. 473. (Clinton, Fast. Hell. s. aum. 443.) He left three sons: Polemarchus, Lyssias, and Ephialtides. 2. An eminent Athenian orator and demagogue of the Collydian demos, who flourished at and after the time of the Thirty Tyrants, in effecting whose overthrow he appears to have bore a leading part. He is placed by Clinton at b. c. 402, on the authority of Delianarchus. (c. Demosth. p. 100. 4, ed. Steph., compare p. 95. 7-8.) This date is confirmed by Demosthenes, who mentions him in connexion with Callistratus, Aristophanes the Azanian, and Thrasylus. (De Coron. p. 301.) He is summoned by Andocides to plead for him at the end of the oration De Mystereis. (a. c. 400.) He flourished at least thirty years longer. Aeschines (who calls him δὲ παλαῖτε διόνυσος δὲ δαίων δημοτικονομός γεγονός) relates, that, on one occasion, when he was opposed to Aristophon the Azanian, the latter boasted that he had been acquitted seventy-five times of accusations against his public conduct, but Cephalus replied, that during his long public life he had never been accused. (c. Oesteph. p. 81. 39, ed. Steph.; see the answer of Dem. de Coron. pp. 310–11.) He had a daughter named Oea, who was married to Cheropas. (Suid. s. v.; Harpocrat. s. a. Oeifier.) Thucides (Chil. vi. Hist. 54) confounds this Cephalus with the father of Lyssias. In spite of the calumnies the parent (of whom having been accused, they must have been different persons, at least if the date given above for the death of Lyssias's father he correct.

CEPHISO-DORUS.

The Scholast in Aristophanes asserts, that the Cephalus whom the poet mentions (Eccl. 248) as a surreful and low-born demagogue, but powerful in the Ecclesia, was not the same person as the orator mentioned by Demosthenes. "This is perhaps a mistake, into which the Scholast was led by the high respect with which Cephalus is referred to by Demosthenes, as well as by Aeschines and others." The attacks of an Athenian comic poet are no certain evidence of a public man's worthlessness.

According to Suidas (s. v.), Cephalus was the first orator who composed ἐρωτήματα and ἐφικτονία. A small fragment from him is preserved in the Byzantologicon Magnum (s. v. Ἐρωτήματα). Athenaeus (xiii. p. 592, e) states, that he wrote an ἐρωτήματα on the celebrated courtezan Laisis (or Laia), the mistress of Lyssias. Rhode (Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. § 5) supposes, that the writer mentioned by Athenaeus was a different person from the orator, but his only reason for this opinion is, that such an ἐρωτήματα is unworthy of the distinguished orator. [P. S.]

CEPHAIUS (Κήπαεος). 1. A son of Belus and husband of Cassiopia, was king of Ethiopia and father of Andromeda. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 6, 4, 3; Herod. vii. 61; Tab. Hist. v. 2.)

2. A son of Aleus and Neerea or Cleobule, and an Argonaut from Tegea in Arcadia, of which he was king. He had twenty sons and two daughters, and nearly all of his sons perished in an expedition which they had undertaken with Hecules. The town of Cephalus was believed to have derived its name from him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16, ii. 7. § 3, iii. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. i. 161; Hygin. Fab. 24; Paus. viii. 8. § 3, 25. § 8.)

3. One of the Calydonian hunters. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2.)

CEPHISO-DORUS (Κήπασθοδωρός). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, gained a prize in b. c. 402. (Lyssias, Διαγρ. p. 162. 2, ed. Steph.; Suidas, s. v.; Eudoc. p. 270.) This date is confirmed by the title of one of his comedies, Ἀστροχάδας, which evidently refers to the celebrated courtezan Laia; and also by his being mentioned in connexion with Cnatinus, Aristophanes, Callias, Diocles, Eupolis, and Hermippus. The following are the known titles of his plays: Ἀστροχάδας, Ἀραμέθις, Τραπεζάς. A few fragments of them are preserved by Photius and Stobaeus (Ch. Quer Gern.), by Pollux (vi. 175, vii. 40, 87), and by Athenaeus. (iii. p. 119, d., viii. p. 346, f., xi. p. 459, a., xii. p. 558, a., xiv. p. 629, d., xv. p. 667, d., vi. p. 689, f., vii. p. 701, b.)

2. An Athenian orator, a most eminent disciple of IScare, wrote an apology for Isocrates against Aristoteles. The work against Aristoteles was in four books, under the title of ἀδίσκοντα ἀριστοτέλην ἀντιγραφα. (Dionys. Tyg. ad Anam. p. 120, 32, Syll.; Isoc. p. 102. 17; Issaeus. p. 111. 37; Dem. p. 120. 31; Athen. ii. p. 60, e., iii. p. 122, b., viii. p. 533, e.) He also attacked Plato. (Dionys. Tyg. ad Iseum. p. 157. 3, Syll.)

The author of the same name is mentioned by the Scholast in Aristoteleis (Eth. Nicus, iii. 8) as the author of a history of the Sacred War. As the disciples of Isocrates paid much attention to historical composition, Ruhnken conjectures that the orator and the historian were the same person. (Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. § 38.) There is a Cephsodorus, a Theban, mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 548, c.) as an historian. It is possible that he may be the same person. If so, we must suppose that Cephi-sodotus was a native of Thebes, and settled at Athens as a πείρατος: but this is mere conjecture.

[C. P. S.]

CEPHISODOTUS. An illustrious painter mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 9 s. 36 § 1), together with Ag.
phon, Phrylos, and Evenor, the father of Parrhasius, under the 90th Olympiad (b. c. 420), at which date, the end of the Archidamian war, Pliny's authorities made a stop and enumerated the distinguished men of the age. (Heyne, Antiq. Anf. l. p. 220.) At least, this reason for the date of Pliny seems more probable than the victories of Alcibiades in the Olympian and other games which were celebrated by Agathon.

(Agl.ophon; and Böttiger, Archiologie der Mar
, p. 269.)

[U. L.]

CEPHISODOTUS (Κεφισοδότος). 1. One of the three additional generals who, in b. c. 405, were joined by the Athenians in command with Conon, Adimantus, and Philocles. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Aegospotami, and put to death. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. 5, &c.)

2. An Athenian general and orator, who was sent with Antigonus, Aegialeus, and others (b. c. 371)
to negotiate peace with Sparta. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. 2.)

Again, in b. c. 369, when the Spartan ambassadors had come to Athens to settle the terms of the desired alliance between the states, and the Athenian council had proposed that the land-forces of the confederacy should be under the command of Sparta, and the navy under that of Athens, Cephi-sodotus persuaded the assembly to reject the pro-sal, on the ground that, while Athenian citizens would have to serve under Spartan generals, few but Helots (who principally manned the ships) would be subject to Athenian control. Another arrangement was then adopted, by which the command of the entire force was to be held by each state alternately for five days. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1.

§§ 12—14.) It seems to have been about b. c.
350 that he was sent out with a squadron to the Hellepont, where the Athenians hoped that the Euboean adventurer, Charidemus, the friend of Cephisodotus, would, according to his promise made through the latter, co-operate with him in re-annexing the Chersonese to their dominion.
But Charidemus turned his arms against them,
and marched in particular to the relief of Alopeconnesus, a town on the south-east of the Chersonese, of which Cephisodotus had been ordered to make himself master under the pretext of dissolving a band of pirates which had taken refuge there. Unable to get Charidemus, he entered into a compromise by which the place was indeed yielded to Athens, but on terms so disadvantageous that he was recalled from his command and brought trial for his life. By a majority of only three votes he escaped sentence of death, but was condemned to a fine of five talents. (Dem. o. Aristoc. pp.
670—676; Suid. v. Κεφισοδότος.) This was perhaps the Cephisodotus who, in b. c. 355, joined Aristophon the Azemian and others in defending the law of Leptines against Demosthenes, and who is mentioned in the speech of the latter as inferior to none in eloquence. (Dem. o. Lept. p. 591, &c.; comp. Rhetor. Lat. Histus, p. 25, p. 14.) Un-tailed speeches of him (Rhet. iii. 10) as an opponent of Chares when the latter had to undergo his σφάλ
after the Olynthian war, b. c. 347. [E. E.]
of all these idle people together. In fact the two ladies whom Cephsidonotus is there stated to have represented, are very well known to us as poetesses, —Myro or Moero of Byzantium, mother of the tragic poet Homer (who flourished n. c. 284); see Suidas, s. v. 'Omujoj, and Anthy. [Antye.]

All the works of Cephsidonotus are lost. One only, but one of the noblest, the Symplegma, praised by Pliny (xxxvi. 4 § 6) and visible at his time to Pergamus, is considered by modern antiquarians as still in existence in an imitation only, but a very good one, the celebrated group of two wrestling youths at Florence. (Gall. di Firenze Statue, iii. tavv. 121, 122.) Winckelmann seems to have changed his mind about its meaning, for in one place (Gesch. d. Kunst, ii. 28) he refers it to the group of Niobe with which it was found, and in another (ix. 3 § 19) he takes it to be a work either of Cephsidonotus or of Heliodorus; and to the former artist it is ascribed by Maffei. (Collect. statuar. Antiq., tab. 29, p. 31; Meyer, in his Note to Winckelmann, Gesch. der bildenden Kunst, ii. 129, p. 401; Holbein, Arch. 126, p. 402.) Consequently the chief Kunsthistoriker der alten Kunst, Heft, iii. 148.) Now this opinion is certainly more probable than the strange idea of Hirt (Gesch. d. bildender Kunst b. d. Altert., p. 187), that we see in the Florentine work an imitation of the wrestlers of Daedalus (Plin. xxxvi. 8 s. 19 § 15), which were no group at all, but two isolated athletes. But still it is very far from being true. There is no doubt that the Florentine statues do not belong to the Niobids, although Wagner, in his able article respecting these master-works (Kunstblatt, 1830, No. 55), has tried to revive that old error of Winckelmann, and Krause (Gymnasiet der Hellenen, vol. i. pp. 414, 540) admits as possible. (Comp. Wackler, Rhein Museum, 1836, p. 264.) But they have nothing to do with the work of Cephsidonotus, because Pliny's words point to a very different representation. He speaks of "digitis verius corpori quam marmori impressi," and in the group of Florence there is no impression of fingers at all. This reason is advanced also by Zannoni (Gall. di Firenze, iii. p. 108, &c.), who, although he denies that Cephsidonotus invented the group, persists in considering it as a combat between two athletes. The "altera in terris symplegma nobile" (Plin. xxxvi. 4 § 10) by Heliodorus showed "Pana et Olympum luctantes." Now as there were but two figures in symplegmatas, one of which was certainly of an amorous description, that of Cephsidonotus could not be a different one, but represented an amorous strife of two individuals. To this kind there belongs a group which is shown by its frequent repetitions to have been one of the most celebrated of ancient art, namely, the beautiful though indecent contest of an old Satyr and a Hermaphrodite, of which two fine copies are in the Dresden museum, the print and description of which is contained in Böttiger's Archäologie und Kunst (p. 165, &c.). This seems to be the work of our artist, where the story is told in a particular agreement precisely with Pliny's description. [L. U.]

CEPHSIPHON

(Keparafoe), a friend of Euripides, is said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them. (Arist. Rhet. 942, 1404, 1448, with the Schol.) Traditionary scandal accuses him of an intrigue

CEPHSIDOTUS.

2. The younger Cepheus, likewise of Athens, a son of the great Praxiteles, is mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 8, § 19) with five other sculptors in bronze under the 120th Olympiad (n. c. 300), probably because the battle of Iphesus, n. c. 301, gave to the chroniclers a convenient pause to enumerate the artists of distinction then alive; it is, therefore, not to be wondered at if we find Cepheus mentioned before and probably after that time. Heir to the talent and name of his father Cepheus, Pliny (xxxiv. 8 § 19) therefore always a sculptor in bronze and marble, never, as Sillig (p. 144) states, a painter, he was at first employed, together with his brother Timarchus, at Athens and Thebes in some works of importance. First, they executed wooden statues of the orator and statesman Lycurgus (who died n. c. 323), and of his three sons, Abrous, Lycurgus, and Lycophron, which were probably ordered by the family of the Butades, and dedicated in the temple of Erechtheus on the Acropolis, as well as the pictures on the walls placed there by Abrous. (Paus. i. 26 § 6; Ptol. V. X. Orat. p. 943.)

Another group consists of images of Athenians with the statues of Praxiteles' sons (πυγκος και κεδας θραμα). The marble basement of one of these statues has been discovered lately on the Acropolis, together with another pedestal dedicated by Cepheusotus and Timarchus to their uncle Theoxenides. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 12.) It is very likely that the artists performed their task so well, that the people, when they ordered a bronze statue to be erected to their benefactor, n. c. 307 (Paus. ap. Philo. l. c. p. 652, Paus. i. 3 § 2), committed it to them. The vicinity at least of the temple of Mars, where the sons of Praxiteles had wrought a statue of Mars (Paus. i. c. § 5), supports this supposition. Another work which they executed in common was the altar of the Cadmean Dionysus at Thebes (Paus. ix. 12 § 3: ηερμαν τον γελας, not the vulgate καθαρον), probably erected soon after the restoration of Thebes by Cassander, n. c. 315, in which the Athenians heartily concurred. This is the last work in which both artists are named.

The latter part of the life of Cephsidonotus is quite unknown. Whether he remained at Athens or left the town after n. c. 303 in its disasters, for the brilliant courts of the successors of Alexander, or whether, for instance, as might be inferred from Pliny (xxxvi. 4 § 6), he was employed at Pergamus, cannot be decided. It would seem, on account of Myro's portrait, that he had been at Alexandria at any rate. Of his statues of divinities four—Letona, Diana, Aesclapius, and Venus, were admired at Rome in various buildings. (Plin. l. c.) Cepheusotus was also distinguished in portrait-sculpture, especially of philosophers (Plin. xxxiv. 8 s. 13 § 27), under which general term Pliny comprises perhaps all literary people. According to the common opinion of antiquarians (Sillig. l. c.; Meyer, Note to Winckelmann, l. c.; Hirt, Geschichte der bildenden Kunst, p. 220) Pliny's account of Praxiteles' likewise contemporaries, for which they quote Tation (advers. Graecos, c. 52, p. 114, ed. Worth.), and think probably of the well-known similar works of Praxiteles. But Tation in that chapter does not speak of contemporaries, but of poets and poetesses, whose endeavours were of no use to mankind; it is only in c. 53 that he speaks of dissipated men and women, and in c. 55 with one of the wives of Euripides, whose eminence to the sex has sometimes been ascribed to this cause. But the story is more than suspicious from the absence of any mention of it in Aristophanes, unless, indeed, as some have thought, it be alluded to in the Frogs (1044). We can hardly suppose, however, that the comic poet would have denied himself the pleasure of a more distinct notice of the tale, had it been really true, especially in the Thesmophoriumae and the Frogs. (Comp. Horng., Epist. restitution, 1. p. 164, &c., and the passages there referred to.)

CEPHISSUS (Κέφίσσος), the divinity of the river Cephissus, is described as a son of Pontus and Phoebus, and father of Eryx, who is therefore called Cephisus. (Hygin., Fab. Praef. ; Apollod. iii. 5. § 1 ; Or. Met. iii. 343, &c.) He had an altar in common with Pan, the Nymphs, and Acheleus, in the temple of Amphiporus near Oropus. (Paus. i. 34. § 2.)

CEPHREN (Κέφρην) is the name, according to Diodorus, of the Egyptian king whom Herodotus calls Chephren. He was the brother and successor of Cheops, whose example of tyranny he followed, and built the second pyramid, smaller than that of Cheops, by the compulsory labour of his subjects. His reign is said to have lasted 56 years. The pyramid, which was called Merenre, must have been the burial place of the royal builders; but the people, graving under their yoke, threatened to tear up the bodies, and therefore both the kings successively desired their friends to bury them elsewhere in an unmarked grave. In Herodotus it is said that the Egyptians so hated the memory of these brothers, that they called the pyramids, not by their names, but by that of Philitlion, a shepherd who at that time fed his flocks near the place. We are told by Diodorus that, according to some accounts, Chembes (the Cheops of Herodotus) was succeeded by his son Chabrys, which name is perhaps only another form of Cephren. In the letter in which Synesius, bishop of the African Poecilems, makes mention of his dream, he speaks of his sentence of excommunication against Andronicus, the president of Libya, Cepheus is classed, as an instance of an atrocious tyrant, with Phalaris and Sommacberich. (Herod. ii. 127, 128; Diod. i. 64; Synes. Epist. 58.)

CER (Κήρ), the personified necessity of death (Κήρ or Kîpès Σαπτάρων). The passages in the Homerian poems in which the Kîp or Kîpes appear as real personifications, are not very numerous (II. iii. 302, iv. 354, xviii. 555), and in most cases the word may be taken as a common noun. The plural form seems to allude to the various modes of death. Dying by fire (II. iii. 332, 333) is, indeed, very frequent, but dying by disease or by toil of the body, and may be a natural, sudden, or violent death. (Od. xi. 171, &c., 398, &c.) The Kîpes are described as formidable, dark, and hateful, because they carry off men to the joyless house of Hades. (II. iii. 359, iv. 454; Od. iii. 410, xiv. 207.) The Kîpes, although no living being can escape them, have yet no absolute power over the life of men; they are under Zeus and the gods, who can stop them in their course or hurry them on. (Od. xii. 402, xviii. 113, iv. 11; Od. xii. 397.) Even mortals themselves may for a time prevent their attaining their object, or delay it by flight or flight. (Od. ii. 314.) But when the Kîpes are engaged in the battle the Kîpes wander about with Eris and Cydipnos in bloody garments, quarrelling about the wounded and the dead, and dragging them away by the feet. (II. xvii. 535, &c.) According to Herodotus, with whom the Kîpes assume a more definite form, they are the daughters of Nyx and sisters of the Mœmes, and punish men for their crimes. (Theocr. 211, 217; Paus. v. 19, § 1.) Their fearful appearance in battle is described by Hesiod. (Scat. Herc. 249, &c.) They are mentioned by later writers together with the Erinnyes as the goddesses who avenge the crimes of men. (Aesch. Sept. 1655; comp. Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1653, &c.) Epidemic diseases are sometimes personified as Kîpes. (Orph. Hymn. xiii. 12, lxvi. 4, Liti. vii. 6; Ennius, Ann. i. 472, 474, 347.)

CERAMEUS, THEOPHANES (Κεραμεύς, Θεοφάνης), bishop of Taurumenum in Sicily during the reign of Roger (A. D. 1129—1159), was a native of this town or of a place in its immediate vicinity. He wrote in Greek a great number of homilies, which are said to be superior to the majority of similar productions of his age. Sixty-two of these homilies were published by Franciscus Socrus at Paris, 1644, fol., with a Latin version and notes. There are still many more extant in manuscript. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. iv. p. 206, &c.)

CERBERUS (Κέρβερος), the many-headed dog that guarded the entrance of Hades, is mentioned in the Homerian poems, but simply as the "dog," and without the name of Cerberus. (II. viii. 368, Od. xi. 623.) Hesiod, who is the first that gives his name and origin, calls him (Theog. 311) fifty-headed and a son of Typhon and Echidna. Later writers describe him as a monster with only three heads, with the tail of a serpent and a mane consisting of the heads of various snakes. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 12; Eurip. Herc. fur. 24, 611; Virg. Aen. vi. 417; Or. Met. iv. 449.) Some poets again call him many-headed or hundred-headed. (Horat. Carm. ii. 33, 34; Tzetzs, ad Lyogph. 678; Soc. Herc. fur. 704.) The place where Cerberus kept watch was according to some at the mouth of the Acheron, and according to others at the gates of Hades, into which he admitted the shades, but never let them out again.

CERICAS (Κερείδας). 1. A poet, philosopher, and legislator for his native city, Megalopolis. He was a disciple of Dionysius, whose death he recorded in some Melambic lines. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 76.) He is mentioned and cited by Athenaeus (viii. p. 347, e. xii. p. 554, d.) and Stobaeus (iv. 43, lvii. 10). At his death he ordered the first and second books of the Iliad to be buried with him. (Ptol. Hekatost. ap. Phot. Cod. 190, p. 151, a., 14, ed. Bekker.) Adian (V. v. 39) relates that a later Roman emporium was called Cericas. (It. v. 189.)

C. S. in the history of the philosophers, Heimstern of the historians, Olympos of the musicians, and Homer of the poets, which clearly implies that he himself cultivated these four sciences. He appears to be the same person as Ceridias the Arcadian, who is mentioned by Demosthenes among those Greeks, who, by their cowardice and corruption, enslaved their states to Philip. (De Coro, p. 324; see the reply of Polybius to this accusation, xvii. 14.)

2. A Megalopolitan, who was employed by Aratus in an embassy to Antigonus Doson to treat of an alliance, b. c. 224. He returned home after his mission, b. c. 222, and, in a short time after, he commanded a thousand Megalopolitans in the army which Antigonus led into Laconia, b. c. 222. (Polyb.
CEROPES.

ii. 48—50, 65.) He may have been a descendant of the preceding, but on this point we have no information. [P. S.]

CERCO, the name of a family of the plebeian Lutatia gens.

1. Q. LUTATIUS C. F. C. N. CERCO, consul with A. Manilius Torquatus Atticus, B. C. 241, in which year the first Punic war was brought to a close by the victory of C. Lutatius Catulus at the Aegates. Cerco is called by Zonaras (viii. 17) the brother of Catulus, which statement is confirmed by the Capitoline Fasti, in which both are described as C. F. C. N. Zonaras also says, that Cerco was sent into Sicily to regulate the affairs of the island in conjunction with his brother Catulus. After peace had been concluded with Carthage, the Falisci or people of Faluiri, for some reason which is unknown, rose against the Romans: both consuls were sent against them, and the war was finished by the conquest of the infatuated people within six days. Half of their domain land was taken from them and their town destroyed. For this success, Cerco as well as his colleague obtained a triumph. (Liv. xxxv. 44, Epit.; Bucrat. ii. 29; Oros. iv. 11; Polyb. i. 65; Zonar. viii. 18.)

Cerco was also a man of great good fortune, since he was elected by the people of Pella to the highest office in the state. [Fast. Capit.]

2. CN. LUTATIUS CERCO, one of the five ambassadors sent to Alexander, B. C. 173. (Liv. viii. 6.)

The annexed coin of the Lutatia gens contains on the obverse the name Cerco with the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Q. LUTATI, with a ship enclosed within a wreath made of oak-leaves.

The reverse probably refers to the victory of Q. Lutatius Catulus, which would of course be regarded by the Cercopes as well as the Catuli as conferring honour upon their gens. (Eckehl, v. p. 240.)

CEROPES (Κέροπες), droll and thievish gnomes who play a part in the story of Heracles. Their number is commonly stated to have been two, but their names are not the same in all accounts,—either Olaus and Eurybatus, Silius and Triballus, Passalus and Aecemon, Andalus and Atlalus, or Candalus and Atlas. (Suidas, s. v.; Schol. ad Lecuch, Alex. 4; Tzetcs. Child. v. 75.)

Diodorus (iv. 31), however, speaks of a greater number of Cercopes. They are called sons of Theia, the daughter of Oceanus; they annoyed and robbed Heracles in his sleep, but they were taken prisoners by him, and either given to Omphale, or killed, or set free again. (Tzetcs. ad Lycoph. 91.)

The place in which they seem to have made their first appearance, was Thermopylae (Herod. vii. 216), but the comic poem Kéropes, which bore the name of Homer, probably placed them at Oceania in Euboia, whereas others transferred them to Lydias. (Suidas, s. v. Κέροπες), or the islands called Pitheusae, which derived their name from the Cercopes who were changed into monkeys by Zeus for having cunningly deceived him. (Ov. Met. xiv. 50, 64; Pomp. Mela. ii. 7; compare Müller, Dicr. ii. 12: § 10; Hallmann, De Cyclop. et Cerop. 1824; Ripley, De Herculis et Cerop., Cologne, 1825, &c. 4to.)

CERCOPS (Κέρως). 1. One of the oldest Orphic poets, called a Pythagorean by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 333, ed. Paris, 1692) and Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 38), was said by Epipgenes of Alexandria to have been the author of an Orphic epic poem entitled "the Descent to Hades (τὸ ἔξοδον τὰς ἁδών ταὐτάκειον), which seems to have been extant in the Alexandrine period. (Clem. Alex. l.c.) Others attribute this work to Prodicus of Samos, or Herodenes of Perinthus, or Orphens of Camarina. (Suidas, s. v. Ὄρφης.)

Explanations to Cercops (Clem. Alex. l.c.) the Orphic ἐπίσης λόγος was which was ascribed by some to Theognostus of Thessaly, and was a poem in twenty-four books. (Fabric., Bibl. Graec. i. pp. 161, &c., 172; Bode, Gesch. der Episc. Dichter von der Hellenen, p. 125, &c.)

2. Of Milctus, the contemporary and rival of Hesiod, is said by some to have been the author of an epic poem called "Aegimius," which is also ascribed to Hesiod. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 46; Athen. xi. p. 503; Apollod. ii. 3 § 3; comp. AEGIMIUS, P. 25, a.)

CERYDON (Κέρηδος), a son of Poseidon by a daughter of Amphitryon, and accordingly a half-brother of Triptolemus. (Paus. i. 14, § 1.) Others call him a son of Hephaestus. (Hygin. Fab. 38.)

He came from Arcadia, and dwelt at Eleusis in Attica. (Plut. Thés. 11; Ov. Met. vii. 439.) He is notorious in ancient story for his cruelty towards his daughter Alope (Alope) and all who refused to fight with him, but he was in the end conquered and slain by Theseus. (Paus. i. 59, § 3.) Another personage of the same name is mentioned by Pausanias. (vii. § 3; comp. Agamemnon.) [L. S.]

CEREALES, a Roman general, commanded the fifth legion in the Jewish war under Titus. (A. D. 70.) He slew a number of Samaritans on mount Gerizim; overran Idumaea, and took Hebron; made an unsuccessful night attack on the temple, and was present at the council of war held by Titus immediately before the taking of Jerusalem. (Joseph. B. J. iii. 7 § 32, iv. 9 § 9, vi. 2 §§ 5, 6; c. 4 § 3.) [P. S.]

CEREALES or CEREALES, ANCIUS, was consul designate on A. D. 65, and proposed in the senate, after the detection of Piso's conspiracy, that a temple should be built to Nero as quickly as possible at the public expense. (Tac. Ann. xv. 74.) In the following year, he, in common with several other noble Romans, fell under Nero's suspicions, was condemned, and anticipated his fate by putting himself to death. He was but little publicized, but it cannot be forgotten that he had exposed the conspiracy of Lepidus and Lentulus. (A. D. 39.) The alleged ground of his condemnation was a mention of him as an enemy to the emperor in a paper left by Mella, who had been condemned a little before; but the paper was generally believed to be a forgery. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17.) [P. S.]

CEREALES, CIVICA, a Roman senator who, while proconsul of Asia, was put to death by Domitian, shortly before A. D. 90. (Suet. Dom. 10; Tac. Agric. 42.) [P. S.]

CEREALES, JUlius, a Roman poet, contemporary with Quintus the Younger and Martial, by both of whom he is addressed as an intimate friend. He wrote a poem on the war of the Gallic.

(Plin. Epist. ii. 19; Martial, Epig. xi. 52.) [P. S.]
CEREALIS or CERELIS, PETILUS, a Roman general, and a near relative of the emperor Vespasian, is first mentioned as legate of the 9th legion, under Vettius Bolanus, in Britain, when he was defeated by the British insurgents under Boudecia, A.D. 61. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32.) When Vespasian set up his claim to the empire (A.D. 69), Petillus Cerealis escaped from Rome, joined his army in Italy under Antonius, and was made one of his generals. He commanded an advanced party of cavalry, and is charged, in common with the other generals, with not advancing upon Rome quickly enough. He suffered a defeat in a skirmish beneath the walls of Rome. In the following year, he was sent to the Rhine, to suppress the revolt of Civis, in which he was completely successful. [CIVIL.] While holding this command, he was solicited by Domitian to give up to him his army. Domitian's object was partly to gain reputation by finishing the victory which Cerealis had secured, but chiefly to seize the empire. Cerealis, however, laughed at the request, as being the fancy of a boy. (Tac. Hist. iii. 58, 78, 79, iv. 86.) In the following year (A.D. 71), he was sent as consular legate to the government of Britain, in which he was active and successful. He conquered a great part of the Brigantes, and called out the talents of Agricola. (Tac. Agr. 8, 17.) As a commander he was energetic, but rash. (See especially Tac. Hist. iv. 71.)

CEREALIS (Κερεάλης), a poet of the Greek Anthology, whose time and country are unknown. Three epigrams are ascribed to him by Bruene (Anat. ii. p. 315), but of these the third is of very doubtful authorship. Of the other two the first is a libation to the Muse, the second to the poet himself at the Olympic games; the second is in ridicule of those grammarians who thought to pass for pure Attic writers on the strength of a few Attic words and, in general, of the use of obsolete words. [P. S.]

CERES. [DEMETER.]

CERINTHUS (Κερινθός), probably belonged to the first century of the Christian era, though he has been assigned to the second by Basnage and others. The fathers by whom he is mentioned make him contemporary with the Apostle John, and there is no ground for rejecting their testimony. He has been universally placed in the list of heretics, and may be reckoned the first who taught principles afterwards developed and embodied in the Gnostic system. According to Epiphanius, he was a Jew by birth; and Theodoret (Haeret. Rabul. lib. ii.) asserts, that he studied philosophy at Alexandria. It is probable, however, that during his residence in Egypt he had not imbibed all the sentiments which he subsequently held; they rather seem to have been adopted while he abode in Asia Minor, where he spent the greater part of his life. This is accordant with the statement of Epiphanius that he propagated his doctrines in Asia. Whether he ever encountered the apostles themselves at Jerusalem, Cæsarea, and Antioch, as the same writer asserts, is questionable. Tradition states, that he lived at Ephesus while John was in that city. Nothing is known of the time and manner of his death.

It is not difficult to reconcile the varying accounts of his system given by Irenæus, Epiphanius, Caius, and Dionysius of Alexandria. Irenæus reckons him a thorough Gnostic; while Caius and Dionysius ascribe to him a gross and sensual Chiliasm or Millenarianism, abhorrent to the nature of Gnosticism. If it be true that the origin of the Gnosticism is to be sought in the Judæo-sect, as Neander believes, the former uniting Jewish Theosophy with Christianity, Cerinthus's system represents the transition-state, and the Jewish elements were subsequently refined and modified so as to exhibit less grossness. Irenæus himself believed in Chiliasm, and therefore he did not mention it as a peculiar feature in the doctrines of Cerinthus; while Caius, a strenuous opponent of Millenarianism, would naturally describe it in the worst colours. Thus the accounts of both may be harmonised.

His system, as collected from the notices of Irenæus, Caius, Dionysius, and Epiphanius, consisted of the following particulars: He taught that the world was created by angels, over whom presided one from among themselves. This presiding spirit or power was so far inferior to the Supreme Being as to be ignorant of his character. He was also the sovereign and governor of the Jews. Different orders of angels existed in the klēroma, among whom those occupied with the affairs of this world held the lowest rank. The man Jesus was a Jew, the son of Joseph and Mary by ordinary generation, but distinguished for his wisdom and piety. Hence he was selected to be the Messiah. When he was baptized by John in the Jordan, the Christ, or Logos, or Holy Spirit, descended from heaven in form of a dove and entered into his soul. Then did he first become conscious of his future destination, and receive all necessary qualifications to enable him to discharge its functions. Henceforward he became perfectly adequate in every respect. So far as God is concerned, to man, was exalted above all the angels who managed the affairs of the world, and wrought miracles by virtue of the spiritual energy that now dwelt in him. When Jesus was apprehended at the instigation of the God of the Jews, the logos departed from him and returned to the Father, so that the man Jesus alone suffered. After he had been put to death and consigned to the grave he rose again. Epiphanius says, that Cerinthus adhered in part to Judaism. He appears to have held that the Jewish law was binding upon Christians in a certain sense, probably that sense in which it was explained by the logos when united to Jesus. He maintained that there would be a resurrection of the body, and that the righteous should enjoy a paradise of delights in Palestine, where the man Jesus appearing again as the Messiah by virtue of the logos associated with him, and having conquered all his enemies, should reign a thousand years. It is not likely that he connected with the millennial reign of Christ such carnal pleasures as Caius and Dionysius allege. It is clear that he received the books of the Old Testament; and the evidence which has been adduced to prove his rejection of the gospels, or any part of them, is unsatisfactory. Epiphanius affirms, that he rejected Paul on account of the apostle's repudiation of circumcision, but whether this means all Paul's writings it is impossible to determine. Several of the Fathers relate, that John on one occasion went into the bath at Ephesus, but on seeing Cerinthus came out in haste, saying, "Let us flee home, lest the bath should fall while Cerinthus is within." It is also an ancient opinion that John wrote his Gospel to refute Cerinthus. (Walch, Entwurf der 2 x) in consequence of the refusal of Amidaone to allow Philip a passage through his territory. But after the passing of the decree above-mentioned, Philip became the enemy of Cersobleptes, and in b.c. 352 made a successful expedition into Thrace, gained a firm ascendancy in the country, and brought away a son of Cersobleptes as a hostage. (Dem. Olynth. i. p. 12 ad fin.; Isocr. Pæd. p. 86; a; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 30.) At the time of the peace between Athens and Philip in b.c. 346, we find Cersobleptes again involved in hostilities with the Macedonian king, who in fact was absent in Thrace when the second Athenian embassy arrived at Pella, and did not return to give them audience till he had completely conquered Cersobleptes. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. pp. 390, 391, de Cor. p. 235; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 29, 40, &c.) In the course of the next three years, Cersobleptes seems to have recovered strength sufficient to throw off the yoke, and, according to Diodorus, persisted in his attacks on the Greek cities on the Hellespont. Accordingly, in b.c. 343, Philip again marched against him, defeated him in several battles, and reduced him to the condition of a tributary. (Diod. xvi. 71; Ep. Phil. ad Att. ap. Dem. pp. 160, 161; Dem. de Cherr. 105.)

CERSOBLTEPS (Κερσοβλέπτης), was son of Cotys, king of Thrace, on whose death in b.c. 338 he inherited the kingdom in conjunction with Beresades and Amiades, who were probably his brothers. He was very young at the time, and the whole management of his affairs was assumed by the Euboean adventurer, Charidemus, who was connected by marriage with the royal family, and who bore the prominent part in the ensuing contests and negotiations with Athens for the possession of the Chersonesus. Cersobleptes appearing throughout as a mere cipher. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 628, 629, 674, &c.) The peninsula seems to have been finally ceded to the Athenians in b.c. 357, though they did not occupy it with their settlers till 353 (Diod. xvi. 34); nor perhaps is the language of Isocrates (de Pac. p. 163, a, με) γαρ δεῦτε μνήμενα Κερσοβλέπτης, κ. ν. λ. so decisive against this early date as it may appear at first sight, and as Clinton (on n. c. 356) seems to think it. (Comp. Thirlwall’s Greece, vol. v. pp. 229, 244.) For some time after the cession of the Chersonesus, Cersobleptes continued to court assiduously the favour of the Athenians, being perhaps reproached for aggression by the fear of their squadron in the Hellespont: but on the death of Beresades, before 352, he conceived, or rather Charidemus conceived for him, the design of excluding the children of the deceased prince from their inheritance, and obtaining possession of all the dominions of Cotys; and it was with a view to the furtherance of this object that Charidemus obtained from the Athenian people, through his party among the émigrés, the singular decree in his favour for which its mover Aristocrates was impeached, but unsuccessfully, in the speech of Demothenes yet extant. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 624, 625, 660.) [Charidemus in propria personam (p. 681), it appears that Cersobleptes had been negotiating with Philip for a combined attack on the Chersonesus, which however came to no effect.

CEREU/RIUS PROCULIUS. [F. E.

CERVIDUS SCAEVOLA. [SCAEVOLA.]

CERYX (Κέριξ), an Attic hero, a son of Hermes and Aglauros, from whom the priestly family of the Cerycetes at Athens derived their origin. (Paus. i. 38. § 3.)

CSEFLIUS BASUS. [BASUS, p. 472, b.]

CSTIANUS, a surname which occurs on several coins of the Plastorius gens, but is not mentioned in any ancient writer. [PLASTORIUS.]

CSTITUS. 1. Cicero mentions three persons of this name, who perhaps are all the same: one in the oration for Flaccus, b.c. 59 (c. 13), another (C. Cestius) in a letter to Atticus, b.c. 51 (ad Att. v. 13), and a third (C. Cestius) as procurator in b.c. 44, who, he says, refused a province from Antony. (Phil. iii. 10.) As the last belonged to the aristocratic party, it is probable that he is the same Cestius who perished in the proscription, b.c. 43. (Appian, B. C. iv. 26.)

2. Cestius, surnamed MACEDONIUS, on account of his having formerly served in Macedonia, was a native of Persia. When this town was taken by Augustus in b.c. 41, he set fire to his house, which occasioned the conflagration of the whole city, and then stabbed himself and leaped into the flames. (Appian, B. C. v. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 74.)

3. CESTIUS GALLUS. [GALLUS.]

4. CESTIUS PROCULUS, accused of repetundas, but acquitted, a. n. 56. (Tac. Ann. xii. 30.)

5. CESTIUS SEVERUS, an infamous informer under Nero. (Tac. Hist. iv. 41.)

The name Cestius is chiefly remarkable on account of its connexion with two monuments at Rome, the Pons Cestius and the Pyramid of Cestius, both of which are still remaining. This bridge, which connects the island of the Tiber with the Janiculum, is supposed by some writers to have been built by the consul C. Cestius Gallus, in the reign of Tiberius; but as it seems improbable that a public person would have been allowed to give his name to a public work under the empire, its erection is generally referred to the time of the republic. The Pyramid of Cestius, which was used as a burial-place, stands near the Porta Ostiensa, and part of it is within and part without the walls of Aurelian. From an inscription upon it we are told, that it was erected, in accordance with a testamentary provision, for C. Cestius, the son of Lucius, who had been Eques, Prætor, Tribunus of the plebs, and one of the seven Epalones; and from another inscription on it, in which the names of M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus and M. Agrippa occur, we learn, that it was built in the reign of Augustus. Whether this C. Cestius is to be identified with one of the persons of this name mentioned by Cicero [see above, No. 1], as some modern writers have supposed, cannot be determined. The name of L. Cestius occurs on two coins, together with that of C. Norbanus; but who these two persons were is quite uncertain. A specimen of one of these coins is given below: the obverse represents a female head covered with an elephant’s skin, the reverse a sela curulis with a helmet on the top of it. (Eckhel, v. p. 168.)

L. CÆSIIUS PIUS, a native of Smyrna, taught rhetoric at Rome a few years before the commencement of the Christian era. He was chiefly celebrated on account of the declamations which he was wont to deliver in places of public resort in reply to the orations of Cicero; but neither Scecanor Quintilian speaks of him with any respect. No fragment of his works has been preserved. (Hieronymum. ap. Chron. Euseb. ad. Or. cxxi.; Suidas. Contra, iii. p. 521; Quintilian. x. § 20; Meyer, Orat. Roman. Fragm.) [W. R.]

CEITHEGUS, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelius gens. The family was of old date. They seem to have kept up an old fashion of wearing their arms bulks, to which Horace alludes in the words cinctet Catuli (Ars Poët. 50); and Lucan (i. 543) describes the attitude of Catiline [see No. 8] thus, exerentique marmi vesana Cæthesi. I. M. Cæthesiius, c. M. N. Cæthesius, was curule aedile in B.C. 181, and pontifex maximus in the same year upon the death of L. Lentulus; praetor in 211 when he had the charge of Apulia; censor in 209 with P. Sempronius Tuditanus; and consul with the same colleague in 204. In the next year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where with the praetor Quintilius Varius he defeated Mago, the brother of Hannibal, and compelled him to quit Italy. He died in B.C. 196 (Liv. xxv. 2, 41, xxvii. 11, xxxii. 11, xxxvi. 18.) His eloquence was rated very high, so that Ennius gave him the name of Student medulla (op. Cic. de Agr. 14); censure. 15; and Horace twice refers to him as an ancient authority for the usage of Latin words. (Epist. ii. 2. 116, Ars Poët. 50, and Schol. ad loc.)

2. C. Cæthesiius, L. P. M. N. Cæthesiius, commanded in Spain as proconsul in B.C. 200, before he had been aedile. Elected aedile in his absence he exhibited the games with great magnificence. (B. C. 199.) As consul (B.C. 197) he defeated the Insularians and Cenomannians in Cisalpine Gaul, and triumphed. He was censor in 194; and towards the close of the next year, after holding the lustrum, he went as joint commissioner with Scipio Africanus and Mnaecus Rufus to mediate between Masinissa and Carthage. (Liv. xxvi. 45, 50, xxxix. 7; 37—50, xxxvii. 23, xxxviii. 44, 62.)

3. P. Cæthesiius, L. F. P. N. Cæthesiius, curule aedile in B.C. 187, praetor in 185, and consul in 181. The grave of Numa was discovered in his consulship. He triumphed with his colleague Baebius Tamphilus over the Ligurians, though no battle had been fought,—an honour that had not been granted to any one before. In 175 he was one of the ten commissioners for dividing the Ligurian and Gallic lands. (Liv. xxxviii. 7, 23, xl. 16; Val. Max. i. 1. § 12; Plut. Rom. xiii. 3. 27; Plut. Nat. 22; Liv. xl. 38, xiiii. 4.)

4. P. Cæthesiius, C. C. N. Cæthesiius, praetor in 184 B.C. (Liv. xxxix. 32, 33, 39.)

5. M. Cæthesiius, C. C. N. Cæthesiius, was sent in B.C. 171 as one of a commission into Cisalpine Gaul, to inquire why the consul C. Cassius Longinus had left his province. In 169 he was triumvir coloniae dedicadææ, in order to plant an additional body of citizens at Aquileia. As consul in 160 he drained a part of the Pontine Marshes. (Liv. xliii. 1, 17, Epict. 46.)

6. L. Cæthesiius, one of the chief supporters of a bill brought in (B.C. 149) by L. Scribonius Libo, tribune of the plebs, to impeach Serv. Sulpicius Galba for breach of his word, in putting some of the Lusitanians to death, and selling others as slaves. (Liv. Epict. 49; Cic. de Orat. 2, Brut. 25, Att. xxxiv. 4.)

7. P. Cæthesiius Carus, a friend of Marcus, who being proscribed by Sulla (B.C. 88) fled with the younger Marius into Numidia, but returned next year to Rome with the heads of his party. In 83, however, he went over to Sulla, and was pardoned. (Appian. B.C. i. 60 62, 80.) Notwithstanding his notorious bad life and utter want of faith, he retained great power and influence even after Sulla’s death; and it was he who joined the consul M. Cotta in procuring the unlimited command of the Mediterranean for a man like himself, M. Antonius Cicernus [Antonius, No. 9]; nor did Lucullus disdain to sue Cæthesius’ connubium to use her interest in his favour, when he was seeking to obtain the command against Mithridates. (Cic. Pueril. v. 3; Plut. Lucull. 5, 6; comp. Cic. pro Cluent. 31.)

8. C. Cæthesiius, one of Catiline’s crew. His profligate character shewed itself in early youth (Cic. pro Sull. 25); the heavy debts he had contracted made him ready for any desperate political attempt; and before he was old enough to be aedile, he had leagued himself with Catiline. (B.C. 63.) When his chief left Rome, after Cicero’s first speech, Cæthesius stood behind under the orders of Lentulus. His charge was to murder the leading senators. But the tardiness of Lentulus did not prove him the more. Cæthesius was arrested and condemned to death with the other conspirators, the evidence against him being the swords and daggers which he had collected in his house, and the letter under his hand and seal which he had given to the Allobrogian ambassadors. Cæthesius was a bold, rash, enterprising man (massus vesana Cæthesi, Lucan, i. 543; comp. Cic. in Cat. iv. 6); and if the chief part, after CATILINE'S DEPARTURE.

Catiline's departure, had fallen to him instead of Lentulus, it is more than possible that Rome would have been fired and pillaged, and her best citizens murdered. (Sall. Cat. 17, 40—50, 53; Cic. in Cat. iii. 3, 4—7, pro Sulp. 6, 55, &c., post Red. in Sen. 4, pro Domu. 24; Appian, B. C. ii. 2—5, &c., 15.) [H. O. L.]

CEYPH (Këps), lord of Trachis, was connected by friendship with Heracles. He was the father of Hippus, who fell in battle fighting as the ally of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 6, &c.) According to others, Ceyp has been a nephew of Heracles, who built him for his town of Trachis. Müller (Der. ii. 11, § 3, comp. i. 3, § 5) supposes that the marriage of Ceyp and his connexion with Heracles were subjects of ancient poems. [L. S.]
